TO THE KING.

May it pleaſe Your MAJESTY,

THE value of the Letters and Papers of Sir Thomas Roe, and the relation which many of them bear to the moſt Serene Princeſs from whom Your Majeſty is deſcended, together with the zeal and affection of the author to Your Royal Anceſtors, give them ſo natural a claim to Your Majeſty's protection, that it may rather ſeem a duty, than preſumption, to lay this Firſt Volume of the Negotiations and Correſpondence of a Miniſter ſo perſonally favour'd by the Queen of Bohemia, at Your Royal feet.

FOR, the whole Collection, of which this is a part, contains a large number of Letters, written to Sir Thomas Roe by the King and Queen of Bohemia, by their Eldeſt Son the Prince Elector Palatine, Prince Rupert, and the celebrated Princeſs Elizabeth Eldeſt

Siſter of Your Majeſty's Grandmother, the moſt Excellent Princeſs SOPHIA: all which manifeſt the high regard they had for that Gentleman, on whoſe abilities, zeal, and attachment to their intereſts, they repoſed the greateſt confidence, and to whoſe care they intruſted their neareſt concerns.

I SHALL only preſume to obſerve further, with regard to the Letters and Negotiations of this wiſe and able Miniſter, that they will on peruſal be found to contain ſuch a fund of Knowledge in almoſt every uſeful branch of it; ſuch deep, but honeſt Policies, ſuch a Zeal for his Prince, ſuch a Love for his Country, and ſuch rare Abilities to manage the moſt arduous Affairs, and in the moſt difficult and dangerous times; that it may be boldly ſaid, the laſt Century has not produced a more valuable Collection of this kind.

MAY God Almighty proſper Your Majeſty's juſt deſigns for the good of Your People, and bleſs You with increaſe of Glory and Happineſs. And as the heroick patience and perſeverance of Your Royal Anceſtors the King and Queen of Bohemia have been rewarded in their Deſcendants by the poſſeſſion of a much brighter Diadem, than that they were deprived of; that theſe Nations may be always happily governed by a Prince of Your Royal Houſe to the End of Time, is the fervent prayer of,

May it pleaſe Your MAJESTY,

YOUR MAJESTY'S

Moſt Dutiful and Loyal

Subject, and Servant,

Samuel Richardſon.

PREFACE.

WE here preſent to the publick the firſt volume of the Letters and Negotiations of Sir Thomas Roe, which completes his ambaſſy to the Porte from the year 1621, to the year 1628 incluſive: A Period ſo fruitful of great events, that in the firſt fifteen months of it only, Sir Thomas obſerves, that he had ſeen there three emperors of the Turks, ſeven prime viſiers, two captain baſſa's, five aga's of the Janiſſaries, three great-treaſurers, ſix baſſa's of Cairo, and other changes in proportion: and which at the ſame time that it ſhews the diſtreſſes of the Turkiſh empire, then ſtruggling, as it were, to preſerve itſelf from diſſolution, lays open the genius and policies of the Turks, as well in regard to their own government, as to their conduct with their neighbours. For this able miniſter contented not himſelf with giving a bare detail of facts in his letters and relations, but mixes with them ſuch reflections and obſervations, as, at the ſame time that they ſet forth the extent of his genius and capacity, inlighten the readers with the knowledge of the cauſes and ſprings of the actions and counſels he deſcribes and communicates. For, as he well obſerves in the relation which he gives of the depoſition and murther of ſultan Oſman, "that the practices, reaſons, ſecrets, "and counſels of all actions, are the ſoul of hiſtory, and res geſtæ but the "bare carcaſe;" he therefore thought it neceſſary to lay open the great and ſecret deſigns of that monarch, which drew upon him this fatal cataſtrophe. This, then, being the rule which Sir Thomas propoſed to follow, and which he diligently obſerved in all his relations and letters to the miniſters of ſtate, and to the many other great perſons with whom he correſponded, the reader will know what he is to expect from this collection.

AND indeed there are, generally ſpeaking, no memorials or accounts of paſt facts, more inſtructive or authentick, than thoſe of ambaſſadors reſiding at the time of thoſe tranſactions in the countries to which they relate, tranſmitted to the Princes or States by whom they are employed. For being attached to no party about the courts to which they are ſent, by any intereſt or paſſion, and converſant with the principal perſons therein, they want not proper opportunities and means of diſcovering the true cauſes of events, with the ſecret ſprings or motives of actions that paſs before their eyes, and of which they are not unconcerned ſpectators; it being part of their charge to give their principals or conſtituents conſtant and early intelligence of all conſiderable occurrences, and to acquaint them with the real truth on all occaſions without reſerve. Their letters are indeed more or leſs intereſting and inſtructive according to the nature of their ſubject, and the importance of the affairs they relate; and their intelligence likewiſe is more or leſs authentick in proportion to the penetration and judgment of the writer, or the credit he has in the courts of his reſidence; but impartial accounts, at leaſt, may generally be expected from all ambaſſadors.

Few miniſters have ever poſſeſſed the advantages above-mentioned in a greater degree than Sir Thomas Roe, or were ever better qualified for a difficult, intricate and important negotiation. He underſtood, perfectly, as will be ſhewn afterwards, the nature and various branches of commerce throughout the world, the maxims and arts of politicks, the different intereſts and ſituations of ſtates; and was maſter of all thoſe different parts of learning and knowledge, which are neceſſary to enable a perſon to diſcharge the functions of an ambaſſador. He was a man of admirable penetration, and excellent judgment, exceeding happy in diſcerning the arts and deſigns of the miniſters with whom he treated, and ever guarded himſelf againſt all ſurprizes. His eminent virtues, extraordinary capacity, and approved wiſdom, integrity, and probity, gained him credit and procured him the confidence of every court to which he was employed, and the greateſt deference was always paid to his judgment.

He made himſelf thoroughly acquainted, as will be ſeen in this volume, with the nature of the Turkiſh government, the maxims of their policy, the ſtate of their revenues, the condition of their forces, the ſituation of their provinces, and the circumſtances of the ſubjects in all their dominions; and the reader will probably be ſurprized to peruſe his accounts of it, and ſee on what a precarious footing that empire ſubſiſts; how few reſources it has in caſe of conſiderable diſaſters, and how likely it is to be overturned in a moment by the effects of a ſingle, if complete, victory over their forces in a general battle. Sultan Oſman indeed had formed a ſcheme to reſtore the ancient diſcipline of their troops, and to curb the imperious janiſſaries; which, had it taken effect, would have given new vigour to their empire, and render'd it formidable to all Europe: but his tragical fate has ſufficiently diſcouraged his ſucceſſors from attempting the like reformation; ſo that corruption reigns there as much as ever, and the empire, ſubſiſting rather by the opinion than by the reality of its power, is ſtill continually expoſed to the danger of a ſudden ruin; from which nothing but the diviſions and ſeparate intereſts of the Chriſtian princes, has hitherto preſerved it.

It may probably be expected, that we ſhould give ſome account to whom the publick ſtands indebted for theſe papers, and how it happen'd, that they were ſo long kept from the world. All that we are permitted to ſay on this head, by the gentleman who communicated them to us, and who will not be named on this occaſion, is, That he finding them a very valuable treaſure, ſure, and abounding with ſuch material facts and hiſtories, and repleniſh'd with ſuch inſtructive reflections and obſervations, as will make them uſeful to all perſons and times, as well as ſerve to give a light to ſome obſcure parts of the hiſtory of the period in which they were written, thought it would be inexcuſable to with-hold them from the publick, after they had been ſubmitted by a kind friend of his, to his judgment and diſpoſal.

It was once intended to publiſh the whole by ſubſcription, as ſo large a work muſt neceſſarily be attended with a very great expence: But the eſtabliſhment of the Society for the Encouragement of Learning, which is founded for the moſt beneficent and generous purpoſes, truly anſwerable to the title, opened a much more eligible and advantageous proſpect of introducing it into the world by their means. It was therefore tender'd to them, and that worthy body thought fit to accept the offer. And it is under their ſanction, and by their aſſiſtance, that this firſt volume now appears; with the approbation and conſent of the gentleman, to whoſe love of learning, and uſeful knowledge, the world ſtands indebted for the firſt communication of theſe papers.

When there were thoughts of publiſhing the whole work at once by ſubſcription, before the inſtitution of this laudable ſociety, it was deſigned to prefix to it the Life of Sir Thomas Roe, with his effigies from an original picture of Vandyke, and to give a general index at laſt. But as it is determined to publiſh at preſent the firſt volume only, which gives a complete hiſtory of the Turkiſh affairs, in the time of his ambaſſy to the Ottoman court, we found ourſelves obliged to defer the Life (to which it will be propereſt to prefix the effigies) till the whole be completed; which, with ſome curious detached pieces, that will naturally fall in with it, may make a volume of itſelf: And as to the Index, we apprehend it will be more commodious to continue our former deſign of placing it at the end of the whole work, than to ſubjoin a particular index to each volume; which will be the leſs needful, as we have prefixed to this, and ſhall do the like to thoſe following, ſo ample a table of contents, as in ſome meaſure may be deemed an epitome of the collection. For the ſubjects of the letters are ſo important, and the particulars ſo various and prolifick, that it was found no eaſy taſk to give the ſubſtance of them in a leſs compaſs: However, the matter is ſo managed, that the table of itſelf is not only a compendium of the work, but a key to the times, and may be of uſe to the underſtanding both of the one and the other, as it not only gives a ſuccinct view of the many extraordinary occurrences which then happen'd, but will alſo contribute to lay open the ſprings and motives of many actions, negotiations and attempts, which had no ſmall influence on the ſucceeding times of activity and diſtraction: And to the Engliſh reader it will be ſtill of farther ſervice, as we have given the ſubſtance of the Latin, French and Italian pieces in our own Language.

But tho' for the reaſons already given, we have thought it requiſite to ſuſpend our intention of prefixing the Life to this firſt volume, yet it may be very proper to give ſome ſhort and general account of Sir Thomas Roe for the ſatisfaction of the reader, who, no doubt, while he is peruſing the letters, relations, obſervations and reflections of this ſagacious miniſter, will be glad to know ſomething of the hiſtory of the perſon and his fortunes, whoſe labours contribute to his pleaſure and inſtruction. This, in a brief manner, is already done to our hand, by A. Wood, in his Athenæ Oxonienſes, from whom we ſhall tranſcribe it as follows.

" Thomas Roe, Son of Robert Roe of Low-Layton near Wanſtead in " Eſſex, a younger ſon of Sir Thomas Roe, knight, lord mayor of London, " an. 1568, by Mary his wife, daughter of Sir John Greſham, knight, was " born at Low-Layton; and when entering into his teens, became a com- " moner of Magdalen college, an. 1593, by the indulgent care of his " mother, then the wife of one Berkley of Rendcomb in Glouceſterſhire, of " the family of the lord Berkley. But before the time was come that he " could adorn, or be adorned with, an academical degree, he was taken " from the ſaid college; and after ſome time ſpent in one of the inns of " court, or in France, or both, he was made eſquire of the body to queen " Elizabeth, in the latter end of her reign. On the 23d of March 1604, " he receiv'd the honour of knighthood from his majeſty then at Greenwich, " and ſoon after was ſent by prince Henry, upon a diſcovery to the Weſt- " Indies. In 1614, he was ſent ambaſſador to the Great Mogul by king " James I. to whoſe honour he manag'd all things there with much pru- " dence and ſucceſs. In 1620, he was elected burgeſs for Cirenceſter in " Gloceſterſhire, to ſerve in that parliament that began the 30th of January; " and in 1621, he was ſent ambaſſador by the ſaid king James to the Grand " Signor, in the time of Oſman, Muſtapha, and Amurat. In whoſe coun- " try our nation of England enjoys the happy effects of his negotiations to " this day (for before his time the affairs of our merchants there were in " great diſorder, and little regard was had to the capitulations and privi- " leges accorded by the grand ſignor, either to our nation, or any other); " he having, to his immortal reputation, * recover'd the reſpect due to " ambaſſadors, which had been utterly loſt for ſeveral years before, by a " ſucceſſion of inſolent viziers: And that he deſerv'd moſt highly not only " of the Greek church, by his generous protection of it againſt thoſe who " endeavour'd (to their power) to deſtroy its very being, but of Chriſtendom " in general, and particularly of Poland, which king Sigiſmund acknow- " ledged, with great reſpect and thanks, in a letter written from Warſaw in " the month of September 1622."

" In the latter end of 1629, he was ſent ambaſſador to the king of " Poland and Swedeland; and ſoon after twice to the king of Denmark, " and divers princes in Germany. In 1640, Oct. 17. he was elected burgeſs " for the univerſity of Oxon, to ſerve in that parliament which began at " Weſtminſter on the 3d of November the ſame year; wherein he ſhew'd " himſelf a perſon of great reaſon and elocution. In the beginning of July " 1641, his majeſty king Charles I. acquainted his parliament with his " purpoſe to ſend the ſaid Sir Thomas Roe ambaſſador to the emperor, " to be preſent at the diet at Ratiſbone, and there to mediate on the behalf " of the prince elector; and his intent to publiſh a manifeſto in his own " name about this buſineſs: to which the parliament aſſenting, the ſaid

"Sir Thomas went to the ſaid emperor, and all the princes of Germany, "that then met at Ratiſbone. At which time the emperor, having received "experience of the great abilities of Sir Thomas, would ſeveral times ſay "in public, I have met with many gallant perſons of many nations; but I "ſcarce ever met with an ambaſſador till now."

"After his return, he was made by king Charles I. chancellor of the "* garter, and one of his majeſty's privy counſellors. In all which employ"ments, whether domeſtick or foreign, he did manifeſtly ſhew what emi"nence there was treaſured up in him, and what admirable parts he was "endow'd with. The truth is, thoſe that knew him well, have ſaid, that "there was nothing wanting in him towards the accompliſhment of a ſcho"lar, gentleman, or courtier; that alſo, as he was learned, ſo was he a "great encourager and promoter of learning and learned men. His ſpirit "was generous and public, and his heart faithful to his Prince. He was a "great Stateſman, as good a Common-wealth's man, and as ſound a Chri"ſtian as our nation hath had in many ages."

THE juſtneſs of every part of this amiable character will be ſeen in numberleſs inſtances in the following collection; as will his charity to the oppreſſed, evidenc'd in the liberal aſſiſtance he afforded to ſeveral Chriſtian ſlaves in Sicily, and to thoſe of Algiers and Tunis, &c. and in other charitable benefactions; for he made it a rule to ſhare his fortune with the poor, to whom he allotted a tenth of his ſubſtance. And what great reaſon had the families of the Engliſh mariners to bleſs him, of whom at one time he procured the redemption of upwards of eight hundred, who were compelled to do ſervice on board the Barbary rovers, and made the moſt conſiderable ſtrength of their fleets? This advantage he obtain'd for his country, and preſcribed laws to thoſe rapacious rovers, in ſpite of the utmoſt oppoſition they could make to the contrary at the Porte, when thoſe rovers were in the height of their power and inſolence, and ſcoured the ſeas at their pleaſure, not ſparing even the Ottomans themſelves; and at a time, when they were confeſſedly acknowledg'd by the Turkiſh miniſters to be the marine bulwarks and defence of their empire!

AND what is ſtill more wonderful, he found means to inforce and renew theſe laws, upon that ungovernable race of pyrates, in every change and revolution at the Porte, when no man ſtood in ſafety, and even the emperor himſelf, and his firſt miniſters, lay at the mercy of a lawleſs ſoldiery, which had murder'd one emperor, depoſed another, and deſtroyed their firſt miniſters at pleaſure. And in the midſt of all this confuſion it was that he likewiſe recovered the juſt rights and honour of ambaſſadors, who were ſlighted and deſpis'd there before his time, as has been obſerved; and that he procured ſtill new and greater privileges for his countrymen in their commerce; and reſiſted the arbitrary proceedings and extortions of the viſiers and other officers at the Porte, and of the ſoldiery likewiſe, which had got into their hands the management of the revenues of the empire, and extorted from every one what they pleaſed under that pretence. Theſe circumſtances, and this ſituation, muſt inevitably have involved miniſters of leſs prudence and fortitude than himſelf in inextricable difficulties, and ended perhaps fatally to their perſons: and it will be ſeen, that he himſelf was not always free from apprehenſions on this ſcore; but yet he was reſolved to do his duty, and ſhewed he was not to be deterr'd by any perſonal dangers, from aſſerting the privileges and dignity of an ambaſſador; and he performed his functions with ſo much intrepidity, that he not only preſerved himſelf unhurt, but the publick miniſters of other powers, the Poliſh in particular, ſat ſafe under the ſhadow of his wing, who otherwiſe, upon an invaſion of the Coſſacks, had fallen a victim to popular fury.

* It may be here obſerved, that while he held this honourable poſt, the then biſhop of Saliſbury put in his claim to it, in right of his ſee; and it may be ſeen in Aſhmole's hiſtory of the garter, that never any man had ſuch a generous adverſary as Sir Thomas Roe; for he contributed all the lights and aſſiſtance in his power to forward the biſhop's claim againſt himſelf. And the dignity has ſince been annex'd to the ſee of Sarum.

Nor ought his conduct to be forgotten in relation to the point of precedence claimed by the French ambaſſador at the Porte, over the Engliſh; a claim which had too tamely been comply'd with by his predeceſſors at Conſtantinople; but to which no art, perſuaſion, ſtratagem or bluſter, could make him yield. And yet there is no point in which his prudence and moderation were more conſpicuous, as it is the intereſt of all the ambaſſadors at the Porte to unite in order to ſtrengthen themſelves againſt the inſolences to which they are too often expoſed at that proud court. And indeed the ſuperiority of his talents, gave him ſo great advantage over that miniſter, that he always fruſtrated and diſappointed his deſigns: particularly in the affair of the Greek church, and the patriarch of Conſtantinople; both which Sir Thomas defended againſt the open and ſecret practices, not only of that ambaſſador, who acted alſo as legate of the pope in the Turkiſh dominions; but of the united cabals of the court of Rome, the then newly eſtabliſh'd congregation de propaganda fide, and the ſociety of Jeſuits, combin'd to the deſtruction of both. And, not contented to diſappoint their deep-laid and miſchievous projects, he actually procur'd the baniſhment of that turbulent order from thoſe dominions, and that in a manner the moſt mortifying that could be, to that arrogant and buſy ambaſſador, who, as he ſays in one of his letters, he was reſolved to keep under, during the time of his embaſſy. The account which he gives of this event, and of the cauſes which moved him to take this ſtep, will be found to be one of the moſt curious pieces of the hiſtory of that time.

He was equally vigilant and ſucceſsful in his oppoſition to the intrigues of the Imperial ambaſſadors, who, from time to time, endeavoured to bring about a treaty of peace and commerce between Turkey and Spain; which the latter ſought with the greateſt induſtry, in order to cut the Engliſh out of the Eaſtern commerce, and to be at liberty in the Mediterranean ſea to imploy her fleets againſt the Venetians, and other powers with whom ſhe was at variance: but he found means always to fruſtrate the applications of both thoſe powers as often as they attempted this deſign, and turn'd it to the diſgrace of both, and that in a moſt ſignal manner.

For the practical knowledge of the trade and commerce of England, we are not afraid to ſay, that he had no equal in his own time, nor hardly in any other. For he had not only a genius and inclination fitted to promote the natural advantages of his native country in that way; but ſuch opportunities of cultivating both, that hardly any other man ever had. For by the enterprize which that hopeful prince Henry ſon of king James I. put him upon to the Weſt-Indies, in the earlier part of his life, he gained an experimental knowledge of the intereſts and trade of thoſe parts. By his embaſſy to the Great Mogul, which gave him the protection and guardianſhip of the Eaſt-India company and its intereſts, he was maſter of all the ſecrets of commerce in thoſe extended countries, as well as in Perſia. By his legation to the Grand Signor, in which the care of the intereſts of the Levantine or Turkiſh company, fell naturally under his direction, nothing of the commercial affairs of the Mediterranean, the Levant, the Arches, the Euxine, and the Red-ſea, could eſcape him. And the ſucceeding parts of this work will ſhew, that by his other embaſſies to Denmark, Poland, Sweden, the princes of the Lower Saxony, and the Hanſe towns, he was profoundly ſkilled in the knowledge of the traffick carry'd on in the Sound, the Baltick, and Northern ſeas. No wonder then that he was conſulted as an oracle, on all occaſions of trade and commerce. And what he did for the merchants of England, and how he reſpected that uſeful body of men, (which in one of his letters he ſays, "is to the ſtate as the liver to "the body, which maintains the blood") may be ſeen in every letter and inſtance where he had an opportunity of ſhewing it. All which, with his other great qualities, manifeſt him to have been furniſh'd with the moſt extenſive abilities of any miniſter that ever appeared in theſe kingdoms; and fully juſtify the character given of him by the Emperor, as mentioned above by Mr. A. Wood.

CONSIDERING theſe advantages both natural and acquired, joined to the moſt conſummate prudence, and a foreſight that ſeems often almoſt prophetical, it is not ſurprizing that he was loaded with the praiſes of all the great miniſters of every court and nation, and that he met with the applauſes of his own ſovereigns king James I. and king Charles I. tho' not with the reward due to his ſervices, which we may preſume were intercepted by the times of trouble and confuſion. The ſenate of Venice in a very ſignal * manner, the prince of Tranſylvania, the king and queen of Bohemia, the kings of Denmark and Sweden, and other ſovereign princes and ſtates, beſides the king of Poland and the Emperor, mentioned above, all ſeparately did him the juſtice which his abilities and integrity deſerved. The firſt grandees of Poland, and the ambaſſadors of that crown at the Porte, were ordered to take his advice in all their tranſactions there. The Turkiſh miniſters, tho' ſo often changed in his time, almoſt conſtantly confided in him, and were frequently govern'd by his counſels, even in their own affairs: For they revered his wiſdom, and always found him above chicane or double-dealing. Nor was there in all his time but one prime viſier who inſulted him, and dared to avow himſelf his enemy; and he, in all probability, had been diſgraced thro' Sir Thomas's vigorous repreſentations againſt him, if his other acts of tyranny had not precipitated his fall, and ſaved him the labour. Cyrillus Lucaris, patriarch of Conſtantinople, a wiſe and good man, ow'd his preſervation to him both as to his life and dignity, more than once, and never undertook any thing of conſequence in his time, of a publick nature, without conſulting him. He was a ſtay and a balance to the Dutch ambaſſador at the Porte, whoſe ſordid temper and inconſideration had otherwiſe hurry'd him into inconveniencies unworthy of his publick character: He was a check, as we have obſerved, upon the French; and a ſupport to two Venetian bailo's of great gravity and wiſdom: ſo that when, for the common intereſt of all, he joined with the Chriſtian reſidents, they carry'd every thing; and when once, contrary to his advice and exhortations, they would proceed without him in repreſenting againſt the promotion of a baſſa of Tunis, they met with ſhame and repulſe, and were obliged to his wiſdom and moderation, to bring them off after their raſh and unadviſed proceedings, the ill conſequence of which he had foretold and warned them againſt.

* See Letter CDI.

To name but a few inſtances of the honours paid him by his cotemporary countrymen, Lord CARLETON, ambaſſador at the Hague, Sir ISAAC WAKE, ambaſſador at Venice, the Lord CAREW, Earl of Totneſs, Mr. Secretary CALVERT, and Mr. Secretary CONWAY, all men of great abilities, are full of encomiums of his dexterity, wiſdom, and good conduct. Lord CARLETON tells him, “ That the Dutch ambaſſador at the Porte “ gives good content; but that his diſpatches are unequal to His:” And in another place, “ That the queen of Bohemia waits for his diſpatches with “ impatience, and reads them with delight.” Sir ISAAC WAKE ſays, “ That his worth and virtues, accompany'd with a true zeal to the glory of “ God, and the good of his country, have ſo far captivated him, (tho' per- “ ſonally unknown to him) that he will both take and ever retain the title “ of his faithful ſervant:” And in another letter, “ That as he is a witneſs “ of his painful and wiſe dexterity, ſo he will be a faithful herald to blaze “ his worth and merits to all places where he has any credit.” Lord CAREW ſays, “ That his accounts of the Turkiſh affairs, for ſuccinctneſs “ and compoſition, are the beſt he had ever ſeen.” Lord CALVERT takes all occaſions to praiſe his proceedings in his embaſſy, his ſteadineſs in the dangers which environ'd him, in the frequent changes at the Porte, his intrepid behaviour in relation to the pyrates of Algier and Tunis, and his ſtanding up in the above-mentioned point of precedence for the honour of the Engliſh crown. And Lord CONWAY deems it “ a great misfortune to “ himſelf, that ſo worthy a perſon, of ſo great abilities, in whom he has ſo “ much intereſt, hath his employments ſo far off, and in things ſo far from “ their principal care, as it is not in his power to put the value on them “ which their ſufficiency and dexterity deſerve. But that he has always “ embraced the opportunity to repreſent to his Majeſty the advices and “ letters he has ſent, in that favourable light, which his diligence, and the “ judgment and grace of his relations, have merited.” In another letter, “ That his proceedings, and the wiſe and exact account he gives of his “ negotiations, have much improved him in his Majeſty's favour and good “ opinion, who obſerving his diſcreet and dextrous handling of the buſineſs “ [with Gabor], takes thereby knowledge of his great abilities, and fitneſs “ for the greateſt employments.” And ſtill further in another letter, he "lets him know how much his Majeſty is pleaſed with his conduct, and "taken with his relations."

All theſe paſſages appear to his advantage from what is contained in the preſent volume: but what is behind, ſtill further illuſtrates the abilities, integrity and wiſdom of this able miniſter. For ſoon after his return he was ſent ambaſſador into the North to mediate a peace between the kings of Sweden and Poland. He ſucceeded in his negotiation, and gained ſo much credit with the former of theſe princes, the great Guſtavus Adolphus, that he inſpired him with the deſign which he executed anno 1630, of making a deſcent into Germany to reſtore the freedom of the empire *. In his return from this embaſſy, he was charged with a negotiation at Copenhagen, in which he had the like ſucceſs, and in a few days finiſhed a treaty with the king of Denmark, which had been carrying on for ſeveral years by an eminent Engliſh miniſter.

All Germany in a manner had been over-run by the king of Sweden, before death put a ſtop to that hero's victories: The Swedes had loſt the battle of Nordlingen, which in ſome meaſure retrieved the emperor's affairs; but were recovering themſelves, and had gained ſeveral advantages over their enemies, ſo that the iſſue of the war was doubtful, and in the mean time the whole empire was miſerably haraſſed. This ſituation diſpoſed all parties to think of peace; and in order to it, a congreſs of the Imperial, French and Swediſh plenipotentiaries was fixed at Hamburgh. Sir Thomas Roe's admirable talents for negotiations, and his great affection to the Palatine family, made king Charles I. think him the fitteſt perſon he could ſend to that congreſs, to take care of his nephew's intereſts and reſtoration. The miniſters there aſſembled were determin'd not to admit him to their conferences, and to exclude him from all ſhare in the treaty; yet, notwithſtanding this combination, and all their united arts to prevent his admiſſion, he ſoon found means to work himſelf into the affair, and made a very conſiderable figure in the negotiation. The principal point he had in charge, was, to labour by all means for the reſtoration of the Palatinate, a matter attended with difficulties that ſeemed inſuperable: nor were the pretenſions of the different princes and ſtates of the empire eaſy to be adjuſted. Hence it was, that the treaty took up many years, and the ſcene of it was removed from Hamburgh to Ratiſbone, and afterwards to Vienna; in which places this perplexed affair kept him employed with very little intermiſſion till the year 1643, when the troubles of England left little leiſure for ſuch negotiations abroad, or room to hope for any good effect from the interpoſition of a prince, who being ſcarce able to make head againſt his own ſubjects at home, could have but very little influence on the meaſures of courts abroad. There certainly ſcarce ever was a negotiation clogg'd with greater difficulties, in which more different intereſts were to be reconciled, or more ſubtle artifices to be guarded againſt; and in which principally he was left to manage at his own diſcretion;

* Mr. Howell, in his familiar letters, p. 228. ſays, "Upon this victory (i. e. that of "Leipſick) the king ſent Sir Thomas Roe a preſent of 2000l. and in his letter calls him his "ſtrenuum conſultorem, he being one of the firſt who had adviſ'd him to this German war, after "he had made peace betwixt him and the Polander."

diſcretion; yet he paſſed through it with the reputation both of an able and an honeſt miniſter, a character which none ever deſerved better; and in every part of his conduct, notwithſtanding the melancholy ſituation of affairs in his own country, took care to ſupport his maſter's as well as his own dignity.

And at laſt, when the civil broils overwhelmed every thing, and abſorbed all other conſiderations, Sir Thomas Roe had almoſt the peculiar felicity to ſtand in an unexceptionable light with both parties, and was in a manner equally intruſted and confided in by both, till the publick diſtempers of the nation grew too violent and raging to be aſſuaged by his moderate counſels. Happy had it been for the king and the nation, if the wiſe and healing meaſures he ſo ardently ſought to inculcate, had been followed; as the event alſo too ſadly juſtified; and as the ſubſequent parts of this work will abundantly ſhew!

By theſe few hints we thought it neceſſary to appriſe the reader, in ſome degree, of what he may expect to meet with in the following parts of this work. And even from the preſent we may venture to pronounce, that conſidering the difficulty and danger of his employment, through the revolutions and diſtractions at the Ottoman court in his time; the variety of the affairs under his management; the active enemies who oppoſed him; the faithleſs and arrogant miniſters he had to treat with at the Porte, and their frequent changes, generally from bad to worſe; the profound policy and diſſimulation of the prince of Tranſylvania, who made himſelf of high importance to the moſt formidable princes of that time; and the diſtracted ſtate of the Engliſh affairs, by which the crown was weakened in its influence abroad, badly aſſiſted by its allies, ſuſpected, and unſupplied at home; whereby it was ſo diſabled to ſupport the vigorous and intrepid genius of its miniſter, that, as he often complains, he was left in the moſt important points to manage at his own diſcretion, and yet was never once reproved or diſavowed: theſe things being conſidered, we may, as has been ſaid, venture to pronounce, that Sir Thomas Roe was one of the ableſt, wiſeſt, moſt vigilant, and intrepid miniſters that ever appeared in that ſtation. And as he was an honour to the name of an ambaſſador, while living, ſo will his example be worthy of the imitation of all who ſhall be veſted with that important character in future times.

Nor is it the leaſt part of the excellency of this collection, that the characters of many very great men, at this time almoſt loſt to us, are by the advantageous light in which they will here appear from their own letters to Sir Thomas Roe, reſcued from oblivion, and made dear to their country: Such, in particular, are thoſe of Sir Iſaac Wake, Sir Robert Anſtruther, Sir Dudley, afterwards Lord Carleton, Sir Edward Calvert, afterwards Lord Baltimore, Sir Edward Conway, afterwards Lord Conway, and Viſcount Killultagh, Archbiſhop Abbot, General Vere, General Morgan, and others. To which we may alſo add the characters of the two greateſt men of their time, the one for his power, the other for his love and knowledge of antiquities, &c. the Duke of Buckingham, and the famous Earl of Arundel.

And with regard to Foreigners in the ſame Period, the characters and actions of the following princes and great men will be authentickly ſet forth; viz. the king of Bohemia, the brave duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick, the prince of Orange, prince Philibert of Savoy, the prince of Wallenſtein, Cyrillus Lucaris, patriarch of Conſtantinople, the count de la Torne or Tour, an heroick nobleman of Bohemia, who ſacrificed his fortunes in ſupport of the proteſtant cauſe, count Mansfelt, count Tilly, Abaſſa baſſa, an active Turkiſh rebel, who made himſelf very formidable to that empire; the emir of Sidon, another active rebel of that nation; and Janet Ogli, a Natolian rebel, who attempted Smyrna, and bore ſome reſemblance to Sari Bey Ogli, who lately gave ſo much diſturbance to the Turks in thoſe parts.

But, above all, the character of Bethlem Gabor, prince of Tranſylvania, who made a moſt conſiderable figure at that time, being courted and feared alternately by the Turks, Imperialiſts, and the other princes of Europe, ſeems to require the greateſt attention. And as that prince, and the treaties with him, take up a great part of this work, it may not be improper to give here ſome brief account of him, the better to enable the reader to underſtand what is ſaid of him in this collection.

This prince was born a private gentleman in Tranſylvania, and had but a ſmall eſtate there. But being a perſon of great art and addreſs, he inſinuated himſelf into high favour with Gabriel Bathorus prince of that country; whom at laſt, by the aſſiſtance of the Turks, he found means to get depoſed, and himſelf to be acknowledged prince of Tranſylvania in his ſtead. In the year 1619, two years before theſe negotiations commence, he taking advantage of the Bohemian troubles, conquered a great part of the kingdom of Hungary, and procured himſelf to be declared king of it. He had alſo deſigns upon the crown of Poland, in which kingdom he had made himſelf a conſiderable faction, and aſpired to marry a daughter of the houſe of Auſtria, and at laſt actually matched with that of Brandenburgh. For parts and politicks, he was one of the moſt conſiderable princes of his time; as will appear, in the following papers, by his being able to govern the Turkiſh counſels, as he did in many inſtances, though a ſubject and tributary prince; by his management of his own ſtates; by the apprehenſions he gave the emperor upon any of his motions; and by his impenetrable diſſimulation, whereby he impoſed upon and puzzled all the princes and miniſters of his time: which part (for we mention it not to his praiſe) he was in ſome meaſure obliged to act, from his ſituation between two powerful empires, to one of which he was tributary, and obnoxious to the chief of the other, who laid claim to all his poſſeſſions. And indeed it muſt be confeſs'd, that the delays and neglects he met with from the princes ally'd againſt the houſe of Auſtria, and the irreſolution of the Engliſh court for a conſiderable time at firſt, together with the levity of that of France, greatly contributed to juſtify as well as loſe him; as will be ſeen in the courſe of Sir Thomas Roe's letters to the Queen of Bohemia and Lord Carleton, and in his repreſentations to the Engliſh court and miniſters on that ſubject. This active and turbulent prince, who, as Sir Thomas obſerves, was never at reſt, but in a ſtorm, was at laſt, in the midſt of his projects, arreſted by death anno 1629, the year after theſe negotiations end.

The lovers of antiquities, ancient manuſcripts, coins and medals, will be greatly pleaſed with the letters on that ſubject, which paſſed between Sir Thomas Roe and the archbiſhop of Canterbury above-named, the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Arundel, and others; and his letter to the counteſs of Bedford, p. 583. is a noble diſſertation on the uſe and knowledge of medals, which cannot be enough admired, conſidering the brevity and ſuccinctneſs with which he treats the ſubject. Mr. A. Wood before-cited tells us, that he gave ſeveral choice books to the Bodleian library in his life-time, and among the ſucceeding papers is a letter from the Univerſity itſelf, and another from their publick orator, giving him the thanks of that learned body on that occaſion: And after his death, his relict, purſuant to his will, put into the hands of Dr. Gerard Langbaine two hundred and forty-two ſilver medals, which were delivered to the keeper of the ſaid library.

It will be proper further to mention, That the enſuing papers are far from being confined to the Turkiſh affairs: For in the letters of the publick miniſters before-named, and others, the intereſts, views, and policies of the reſpective courts in which they reſided, will appear from the moſt authentick memoirs; particularly thoſe of the Emperor, Spain, France, Sweden, Denmark, Poland, Brandenburgh, Saxony, Rome, Venice, Savoy, Genoa, and other parts of Italy; thoſe of Swiſſerland; Bavaria, the Palatine Electorate, Brunſwick, and other German courts; the affairs of Holland and the Low-countries, and the attempts of the Dutch in the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies: while the Engliſh affairs are communicated to Sir Thomas Roe, by no leſs hands, than thoſe of the Queen of Bohemia, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the two Secretaries of State, Lord Grandiſon, the Earl of Totneſs, Lord Carleton, Sir Iſaac Wake, and others. All which render this collection a complete hiſtory of the affairs of Europe, in that period.

One thing is further neceſſary to be obſerved, with regard to the conduct of the editors of this volume, as the ſame will be obſerved in the future.

There are generally found among the papers of perſons employed in a publick character abroad, abundance of letters relating to their private concerns; and others containing ſhorter relations of the ſame publick affairs, which are much more fully explained in the letters written to the miniſter or ſecretary of ſtate with whom each ambaſſador is obliged to correſpond. Thoſe of the firſt ſort of Sir Thomas Roe's, as the publick is not at all intereſted in them, are for that reaſon intirely left out in this collection; and ſo are alſo thoſe of the ſecond, unleſs ſuch parts thereof as contain ſome circumſtances, occurrences, or reflections not taken notice of in the larger letter to the ſecretaries; that ſo the work might not be ſwelled with papers of little importance to the publick, nor the reader tired with a repetition of the ſame facts.

We ſhall conclude this preface with the following tranſcript from Mr. A. Wood, which may ſerve to cloſe the ſhort account of the life of this great miniſter, till we come to give the ſame more at large, as we propoſe.

" At length, ſays he, this worthy perſon Sir Thomas Roe did, after all " his voyages and ramblings, take a little breath; but ſoon after, ſeeing " how untowardly things went between the king and his parliament, did “ willingly ſurrender it to Him that firſt gave it, on the 6th day of November “ ber 1644; and two days after that, his body was buried privately in the “ church of Woodford, near to Wanſtead in Eſſex.

“ I ſhall gratify the reader, continues A. Wood, with a moſt noble
“ epitaph made for him by the ſaid Dr. Langbaine; but for what reaſon
“ it was not put over his grave, I know not; and is as follows:”

I. SIR THOMAS ROE's Credential Letter to the GRAND SIGNOR. page 1.

II. His Inſtructions. Reciting the good opinion and experience his majeſty (K. James I.) had of his abilities: Directing him to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to divert the Sultan from proſecuting his warlike ſchemes: That for this end he is roundly to repreſent the obligation the king lies under to aſſiſt the potentates who profeſs the ſame chriſtian faith with him; but not in ſuch terms as to bear the conſtruction of a declaration of war or enmity: That much is referr'd to his own diſcretion as occaſion may offer; but that he is to do all the ſervice to the king of Poland and the emperor, that he poſſibly can, and give account of it from time to time. How he is to behave in caſe a ſum of 10,000 l. advanced by the king to the king of Poland, ſhall be conſtrued as an aſſiſtance of that prince againſt the Ottomans. The caſe of ſome Poliſh noblemen and others, priſoners at Conſtantinople, particularly recommended to him, in order to procure their releaſe, or better uſage. As alſo the caſe of the merchants in the Levant; referring him to the Levant company for further directions. Likewiſe the ſuppreſſion of the pyrates of Algiers and Tunis, often ineffectually complain'd againſt to the porte, &c. p. 2.

III. Sir THOMAS ROE's Letter to Mr. Secretary CALVERT, from MALAGA, in his way to CONSTANTINOPLE. Containing warm remonſtrances againſt the pyrates of Algiers and Tunis. Great diſtreſs and clamours of the Engliſh merchants trading to the Levant, from the ſwarms of Barbary rovers. Sir Thomas's opinion of the likelieſt means to ſucceed againſt them. p. 4.

IV. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT, from MESSINA in SICILY. Inforcing the ſubject of his former in relation to the Algerine pyrates. Great civilities and reſpects paid him by prince Philibert of Savoy, Vicario of the kingdom of Sicily. Procures the liberty of thirteen Engliſh captives, whom he purpoſes to diſpatch to England at his own expence. Particulars of his conference with prince Philibert. p. 7.

V. To the Marquiſs of BUCKINGHAM, lord admiral, from MESSINA. A brief recapitulation of the ſubject of his two former letters to Mr. ſecretary Calvert. Gives advice of the defeat of the Turks. p. 8.

VI. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT, from MESSINA. Sir Thomas takes leave of prince Philibert of Savoy. Nobly treated by the prince. The thirteen captives at his return, ſent him home in the moſt reſpectful manner. p. 9.

VII. To the ſame. From MESSINA. Prince Philibert requeſts Sir Thomas to hold a correſpondence with him, when at Conſtantinople. Sir Thomas deſires inſtructions on that head. His preſents to Sir Thomas at parting. p. 10.

VIII. To the ſame. From ZANT. Reminds the ſecretary of the great complaints in the Engliſh parliament of the decay of money. Acounts for thoſe complaints in one inſtance from the ſuperfluous trade drove with the two little barren iſlands of Zant and Zephalonia, in Currans, which, communibus annis, takes from the kingdom in ſpecie upwards of 50,000 l. ſterling. That this trade was formerly carry'd on with Engliſh manufactures; but now with ready money only. That the quantity we import of this traſh Berry, as he calls it, is ſo great, and ſo much more than all Europe beſides import, that it makes the iſlanders think we cannot live without it, while others believe we muſt needs feed our hogs with it. Recommends a reſtraint to be put on ſuch a ſuperfluous and unprofitable branch of commerce. A large carrick of Spain with 600 men on board, and richly laden, taken by the pyrates. A reaſon given to believe that theſe pyrates are protected by the grand ſignor. Exactions upon the Engliſh merchants at Marſeilles. Advices in relation to the Turkiſh affairs. p. 10.

IX. To the Lord Admiral. From MESSINA. A relation of the ſucceſs of the war between the Turks and the Polanders. The reaſons which induced ſultan Oſman to agree to a ceſſation of arms with the Poles, p. 11. The ſultan declares war againſt the emperor. The king of Poland's declaration to him on that occaſion. Advices relating to the proceedings of Bethlem Gabor prince of Tranſilvania, againſt the emperor. The Perſian ambaſſador ſent with a feigned meſſage of compliment to the grand ſignor. New troubles in Syria, raiſed by the Emir de Saida of Tripoli. p. 13.

X. To the ſame. From CONSTANTINOPLE. The cauſe of the merchants of England moſt warmly recommended. The bad ſituation of the Ottoman affairs. The ſultan repents his raſh declaration of war againſt the emperor. Some account of the behaviour of Sir John Eyre, Sir Thomas's predeceſſor, who was recalled in diſgrace. Sir Thomas's candour on that ſubject. He hopes himſelf to avoid complaints, but aims not at a paſſive glory. p. 14.

XI. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. From CONSTANTINOPLE. A further hint of the Dangers run by the Engliſh merchants in the Mediterranean and the Levant. The ſultan's diſgraceful entry into his capital, from the Poliſh expedition. Sir Thomas is diſguſted with the Turkiſh court, who hitherto had taken no notice of his arrival. A ſharp meſſage from him to the miniſters on that occaſion. Advices relating to Bethlem Gabor. Sir Thomas deſires inſtructions how to behave to him and his agents. Meditates to procure for his royal maſter, the honour of being umpire in the differences between the Ottomans and the Chriſtian princes. Hears nothing of the Poliſh priſoners of diſtinction, whoſe liberty or better uſage he is directed in his inſtructions to procure. Receives a meſſenger from prince Philibert, and repeats his deſire (See N°. vii.) of inſtructions how to behave with regard to the correſpondence deſired by his highneſs. Conſiders his embaſſy as a baniſhment. Poſtſcript in relation to Sir John Eyre his predeceſſor. p. 15.

XII. To the Earl of ARUNDEL, Earl-Marſhal. Sir Thomas's inclination leads him, tho' his employment be the other end of the circle, to look back upon antiquity. Arts and ſciences rather deſpiſed and neglected by the Turks, than worn out. Their falſe notion that learning and arts corrupt and enervate the mind. That, on the contrary, civility and knowledge confirm good and true ſpirits. That the Turkiſh power is not ſo formidable as ſome apprehend. That no great empire was ever ſo unarmed and eaſy to be deſtroy'd as this, if proper meaſures were taken. That the then time was moſt ſeaſonable for that purpoſe. Promiſes to uſe his care to fulfil his lordſhip's commands in relation to monuments of antiquity. The ſearch after old and good authors utterly vain; not ſo much as the footſteps of antient learning being left in any country ſubject to the grand ſignor. That the French ambaſſador had the laſt gleanings: That, however, an old Tertullian, and a piece of Chryſoſtome in MS. might be procured to be copied; but not the originals. Antiquities in marble where to be met with. Of whom coins might be had. He ſends two antient ones to his lordſhip. Alſo a ſtone belonging to king Priam's palace at Troy. Likewiſe divers rare pieces of white coral for his lordſhip's fountains. p. 16.

XIII. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. The ſuppreſſion of the Barbary pyrates again moſt ſtrongly recommended. Their increaſe of too much ſervice to the Turks to be neglected by Chriſtian potentates. Great preparations made by the grand ſignor againſt the emir de Saida. He is diſſuaded from going againſt that malecontent in perſon. The confidence of the Turks in the maritime aſſiſtance of the Algerines. The Poliſh agent promiſes to do nothing without him. The little reſpect paid at Conſtantinople to the ambaſſadors of Chriſtian princes. Sir Thomas reſolves to attempt a reformation in that point. His reſolution on this head attended with good effects already. The pride and weakneſs of the Turkiſh government. p. 17.

XIV. Relations from CONSTANTINOPLE. Containing particulars more at large concerning the grand ſignor's preparations and councils in relation to the emir de Saida. To the motions of the Perſians. To the proceedings of the diet of Poland, in relation to the articles of peace between the Poles and the Turks. Policies of the grand vizier. Sir Thomas reſolves to make a proper uſe of the ſituation of affairs between the two powers, for the honour of the king. Bethlem Gabor concludes a peace with the emperor. The grand ſignor diſguſts all his friends, by marrying a lady on the ſcore of her beauty only. This, with his extreme avarice, makes him odious to the ſoldiery: And his deſcending to other unprecedented meanneſſes, makes him alſo contemptible even in the city. p. 20.

XV. To Sir HENRY WOTTON, Lord Ambaſſador at VENICE. Complains of the difficulties he lies under with regard to his receiving or ſending his diſpatches, and the partiality of the bailo in favour of the Dutch ambaſſador. Gives him ſome account of the Poliſh affairs, and thoſe of Turkey. That the emir de Saida, had thought fit to ſend his tribute to the grand ſignor, who had accepted it. The bad ſituation of the Turkiſh affairs. Strange reports ſpread there in relation to England and Germany. Deſires a correſpondence with Sir Henry. p. 20.

XVI. To Sir GEORGE CALVERT. An account of his publick audience and reception. Rumours of the violent death of the emperor of Germany. The behaviour of the Turks upon it. Their hatred of the houſe of Auſtria. Sir Thomas wonders at it, becauſe he aſſerts that they have no ſuch friends in the world. Deſires inſtructions for his behaviour in relation to the affairs of Germany, where he expects the ſtorm will fall. The Turks threaten to invade the Spaniſh dominions, of which he has informed prince Philibert. The credit he is in at Conſtantinople, makes him be apply'd to both by Turks and Poles. Hopes to be preſerv'd in his majeſty's remembrance, that it may not be written on his tomb, THE BEST OF THIS MAN'S LIFE WAS BANISHMENTS. p. 21.

XVII. To his MAJESTY. Briefly recapitulates the Advices ſent in his former letters to his majeſty's miniſters. His majeſty's influence able to work great effects at the Porte. In what reſpects he had obeyed his majeſty's inſtructions, and in what he had been obliged to deviate from them on the change of affairs. That his majeſty has it in his power to extort juſtice to his ſubjects from the Turks, if they could be perſuaded of his majeſty's reſolution to break with them, in caſe they refuſed it. What he thinks he could be able to effect, if the continuance of amity, or a breach, were left to his own diſcretion. That he ſhould be very cautious how he uſed ſuch a power, which would hazard his own ſafety; but that neither the general nor particular profits of the trade to thoſe parts, were worthy to ſtand in competition with the honour of an Engliſh monarch. p. 22.

XVIII. Advices ſent to his MAJESTY with the above Letter. Sir Thomas's round declaration to the viſier in relation to the pyrates of Barbary, and to the five demands made by his majeſty. The viſier deſires thoſe demands in writing. His anſwers to them article by article: With Sir Thomas's remarks, replies, and obſervations. He is confident he could do wonders, if the Turks thought he had power. p. 24.

XIX. To the Lord ADMIRAL. In Cypher. In relation to a jewel of ineſtimable value, which exceeded all he had ſeen in India for beauty; which he commends to be purchaſed by the king: That 40,000 l. may be gained in purchaſing of it, at the price demanded. He adviſes alſo of other precious diamonds, &c. and injoins ſecrecy in theſe advices to all but his majeſty. p. 27.

XX. To the ſame, with the former Letter. Recapitulates the ſubſtance of what he had written, leſt it ſhould have miſcarry'd, about the pyrates. The Turkiſh admiral declares, that without the help of thoſe rovers, all the naval force of that empire would not enable him to keep the ſea. The great opportunity he has to oblige his lordſhip in the purchaſe of curioſities and jewels. p. 27.

XXI. From Mr. Secretary CALVERT, to Sir THOMAS. He acknowledges the receipt of his diſpatches from Malaga, Meſſina, Zant, and Conſtantinople. Congratulates his ſafe arrival. Informs him of his majeſty's pleaſure in anſwer to what he had deſired to be inſtructed in. He cautions ſir Thomas with regard to prince Philibert in reſpect to his own ſafety. Owns that Sir Thomas has very truly and wiſely ſet down the miſchiefs reſulting from the Barbary rovers, and withal propounded the ſureſt remedy. But that the multiplicity of other affairs, and the low ſtate of the exchequer, will not admit of a cure at preſent. That the merchants are earneſt ſuitors to come to ſome agreement with the Algerines, as the Dutch had done; but that his majeſty thought ſuch a ſtep diſhonourable to him. He concludes with an account of the principal affairs in England, ſince Sir Thomas went. p. 28.

XXII. From the ſame. With a copy of the former. And ſome further Engliſh advices. p. 30.

XXIII. To his MAJESTY. That he has brought every thing, even beyond his own hopes and belief, to a happy iſſue. Subſtance of the grand ſignor's letter to the king. The grand ſignor's obſtinate reſolution to take a progreſs to Mecha, which Sir Thomas thinks is a cover for ſome other deſigns. That he has obtained more in few days, than formerly in many years. That he has procured the ſultan to bind himſelf to the king for the ſecurity of the merchants from the Barbary pyrates, in a manner intirely conſiſtent with his majeſty's honour. That he has rendred himſelf acceptable both to the Poles and the Turkiſh miniſters, by taking upon him to endeavour to divert the grand ſignor from his reſolution to viſit Mahomet's tomb. He deſires fit conſuls may be elected, and goods ſent as formerly to the uſual ports. That being unwilling to burden the merchants without their conſent, he has proceeded thus far, not only of his own head, but at his own charge, depending that his majeſty will not let him be a ſufferer. Becomes an humble ſuitor for the liberties of divers unhappy Engliſh captives in Turkey; whoſe calamities he cannot bear. That he has done more than he was able out of his own purſe for them; and propoſes a collection to be ſet on foot for their redemption throughout London and Middleſex; intimating, that all other nations have a fund for this good purpoſe. p. 30.

XXIV. To the PRINCE. He give his royal highneſs a brief account of his proceedings in his embaſſy; and the news of Turkey, conformable to the above advices. Informs him of the decay of the Turkiſh empire, whoſe greatneſs has been owing to the diviſions among the Chriſtian princes. Hopes his highneſs will live to ſee, and contribute to effect, their downfal. That the Ottoman line is almoſt extinct: That the ſultan has made himſelf ſo cheap and deſpiſed, and perſiſts ſo obſtinately in his deſign of viſiting Mahomet's tomb, that a ſudden revolt or alteration may be expected. p. 32.

XXV. To the Lords of the Council. He declines the office of becoming an accuſer of Sir John Eyre, his predeceſſor. Gives a ſtill more particular account of his proceedings and ſucceſs in his negociations at the porte. Deſires their lordſhips to induce the Turkey and Southern merchants to ſend their goods as uſual, and that the king will ſettle conſuls for the government of the trading part of our nation. p. 34.

XXVI. To the Lord Keeper. (Dr. WILLIAMS, Biſhop of LINCOLN.) Sir Thomas gives an account of his proceedings in relation to the treaty about the Algerines, deſiring his lordſhip's furtherance of it on the Engliſh ſide. Alſo requeſts his aſſiſtance in relation to the collection he had propoſed for the Engliſh captives in Turkey. That he has always ſhared his own fortune with the poor, giving the tenth to them, and has redeemed fourteen at his own expence; but that he is not able to bear this burthen alone. Touches upon the Turkiſh affairs, and the viſible decay of that empire. That the then patriarch of the Greek church was a man of learning and wit, and in religion, tho' he durſt not publickly own it, a direct Calviniſt; whence he infers, that upon any alteration there, it were eaſy to ſettle that church in a right way. p. 35.

XXVII. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. That the Venetian reſident has fallen into trouble with the porte, and received high indignities and menaces from the grand viſier. Sir Thomas concludes that he ought to aſſiſt him on account of his publick character, if any violence ſhould be offer'd to him. p. 36.

XXVIII. To the Lord CAREW. A letter of intimacy and friendſhip. What he obſerv'd in his paſſage to Conſtantinople. The admirable ſituation of that famous capital. Polybius's propheſy in relation to its future grandeur: Preferr'd by the oracle to Chalcedon, tho' that had a moſt advantageous ſcite. Yet, thro' the fault of its inhabitants, and bad government, a ſink of ſluttiſhneſs. General parallels between the grand ſignor's court, and that of the great mogul. The latter how greatly preferable to the other, in all valuable reſpects. Account of the ſucceſsful iſſue of his endeavours in relation to the ſecurity and advantage of the Engliſh trade in the Levant, which before was in a moſt ruinous ſtate, and which he undertook of his own head. He gives his lordſhip the motives on which he acted, and briefly defends them. Further particulars of the weakneſs and decay of that emperor and empire. He foretels the ruin of the former, and believes the other has paſſed the meridian of its power and glory. Concludes that he is weary of the company of infidels, but knows not how to releaſe himſelf from this civil baniſhment, and has now no ambition but of chriſtian burial, &c. p. 37.

XXIX. From Sir FRANCIS NETHERSOLE, Secretary to the King of BOHEMIA. A relation of the king of Bohemia and count Mansfelt's ſucceſsful encounter with general Tilly. p. 39.

XXX. From the ſame. Farther particulars of the warlike proceedings between count Tilly and Mansfelt. The town of Lademburgh taken by the king of Bohemia. The marqueſs of Baden with 12,000 foot and 2000 horſe, intirely defeated by don Gonſalvo and Tilly. An account of the action and occaſion of the defeat. Overtures for an accommodation to be ſet on foot at Bruſſels. Endeavours uſed to diſſuade the duke of Bavaria from inſiſting on the electorate to be ſet up in his family. p. 40.

XXXI. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. Account of a great revolution in Turkey, and the depoſition of ſultan Oſman, with many curious particulars relating to that great event, wrote by Sir Thomas, three days after it happen'd. p. 42.

XXXII. To the ſame. Further particulars of the depoſition of ſultan Oſman, with a ſhort deduction of his actions, together with the character, deſigns, and enterprizes of that prince and his prime viſier, wrote nine days after the revolution there. With Sir Thomas's obſervations upon this grand event. The buſineſs of his embaſſy, ſo happily advanced before this revolution, not likely to ſuffer by it. p. 43.

XXXIII. A curious and very particular relation of the depoſition of the grand ſignor, the deſtruction of his wiſe and brave firſt miniſter, and other favourites; and of the cauſes thereof. The weak character of the new ſultan. The miſerable eſtate from which he was raiſed, to one of the greateſt monarchies in the world. How he received his exaltation. Oſman's behaviour in his diſtreſs. The aga of the janizaries unſeaſonably pleading for him, and ſharply treating the half-converted mutineers, occaſions his maſter's ruin and his own. Inſolent behaviour of a ſpahee to the depoſed prince. The new viſier Daout Baſſa, to make ſure work, goes himſelf to the priſon, in order to ſtrangle Oſman. He makes a ſhew of reſiſtance, but is miſerably knocked down with a battle-axe, and then ſtrangled. No ſooner dead, but lamented by the people. Sir Thomas obſerves, that the practices, reaſons, ſecrets, and counſels of all actions are the ſoul of hiſtory, and res geſtæ but the bare carcaſs. He therefore gives account of the great and ſecret deſigns of this monarch, which drew upon him this fatal blow. Further character of the grand viſier, who fell with him; and his mighty ſchemes to pull down the janizaries. The emir de Saida's defection made a feint only, to cover the deſigns of this prince and his miniſter. As was alſo the projected journey to Mecha. What adminiſtered firſt to the jealouſy of the janizaries. Sir Thomas's conjectures on what might have been the iſſue, had this great deſign ſucceeded. His obſervations on the inſurrection, and its cauſes, and certain remarkable preſages of this great revolution. Sir Thomas's friendly caution to the grand viſier a little before this cataſtrophe, and his behaviour upon it, and ominous anſwer. The conſequences likely to attend this great event. p. 45.

A deſign to ſtrangle the brothers of Oſman diſcover'd and prevented. The new grand ſignor's mother, (a ſecond Livia) and the new grand viſier, ſuſpected of the deſign, and the latter degraded, and Huzein Baſſa promoted in his room. His character, and probable views. p. 51.

XXXIV. From the Lords of the Council. Requiring Sir Thomas (not having yet received his letters on that ſubject (See N°. xxv.) in his majeſty's name, to repreſent to the grand ſignor the depredations of the Barbary rovers, who have above 1000 Engliſh captives in Algiers, Tunis, and Tetuan. That he is to inſiſt upon the reſtoration of their liberty forthwith, and that a ſtop be put to their further depredations; or that the king will recall Sir Thomas, and make repriſals upon the Turkiſh ſubjects. p. 52.

XXXV. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. Sir Thomas's caution and diligence in his diſpatches in thoſe times of confuſion in Turkey. Adviſes a congratulatory Letter from the king to the new ſultan, and another without name to a new viſier; and hopes by them to ſet on foot a new buſineſs for the merchants benefit. He renews every thing relating to the pyrates in the name of the new emperor, and has ſent away orders accordingly to Algiers and Tunis. Complains, in very pathetick terms, of a benefit he enjoy'd in right of his wife from the court of wards, being ſtopt payment. Expoſtulates on his ſervices, and the hard uſage he has received. Has ſpent more then 500 l. out of his own pocket, ſince his laſt departure, without hope of recompence. If ſome of his majeſty's good huſbands, as he calls them, thinks he gets much by his preſent employ, he proteſts, he will compound with them for 1000 l. for three years ſervice in perils and continual troubles; and doubts not that thoſe who grudge him this, get more while they are ſleeping. p. 53.

XXXVI. To the Lord ADMIRAL, (Marqueſs of BUCKS.) With the accounts of the tragical end of the late ſultan, in which his lordſhip will find, as he tells him, that God confounds the devices of the worldly wiſe. Forbears to write this tragedy to the king on purpoſe in a letter, being ſo ſad a matter. Touches upon the rich jewels he had mentioned N°. xix, xx. Deſires to be of ſervice to his lordſhip at home. p. 54.

XXXVII. To the Lord DONCASTER. That at Conſtantinople, barbariſm is philoſophy, and mutiny juſtice. The walls that defend the Turkiſh empire, only the diſſentions of the Chriſtian princes. It never had but two pillars, the janizaries and the gallies, and the one is rotten, and the other ſo totally depraved, that they are neither ſoldiers nor ſubjects. p. 54.

XXXVIII. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. Motives of his proceedings with the late grand viſier in relation to the affairs of Poland. His further negotiations on that ſubject. How the matters of his commiſſion, as to the peace with Poland and the Poliſh captives, ſtood at the death of Oſman. How they ſtand upon the change of affairs. Sir Thomas makes himſelf very neceſſary to the new viſier in relation to theſe matters. Thinks the ſtate of affairs at that court very unſtable, and their proſpects very bad. Hopes he ſhall not diſpleaſe for having given Sir Francis Netherſole advice of the ſtate of affairs in Turkey, and with regard to Bethlem Gabor, from whom the king of Bohemia ſeem'd to expect ſome diverſion to the emperor's forces. Sir Thomas's opinion, that the king of Bohemia can hope nothing from that quarter. Thanks the ſecretary for his advice with relation to the correſpondence deſired by prince Philibert (See N° xxi.) and promiſes warineſs in it. Defends himſelf as to the ſteps he had taken at the Turkiſh court with relation to the pyrates, and anſwers ſome objections made on that head in England. Engages that the good ſucceſs of the matter will plead for him, and his inſtructions warrant him. Is glad to hear of any probability of the reſtitution of the king of Bohemia; but fears that it will not be done by treating only. Procures the releaſe of William Fourbes a Scotſman, taken by the Tartars, recommended to be redeemed in his inſtructions. His intimation with regard to the trade of grograms intended to be prohibited. Caution with reſpect to the Indian fleet from England, ſailed into the Red Sea. Mentions, by way of poſtſcript, the barbarous ſtrangling of the prince Corresky, one of the Poliſh priſoners, whoſe liberty had been promiſed, which gives high diſguſt to the ambaſſadors of all the Chriſtian princes. Deſires order about the precedence claim'd by the French ambaſſador. p. 55.

XXXIX. To the Queen of BOHEMIA. With the tragical end of ſultan Oſman. How near and dear to him are the intereſts of her royal houſe. Rejoices that the king of Bohemia is at the head of his own people. Subjects, he ſays, take courage from the ſight of their own lord, as herbs and plants do from the influence of the ſun, and his abſence is their winter. That the greateſt and wiſeſt princes have given way to the times, and hopes his majeſty will live to ſee the unnatural duke of Bavaria compenſate for the diſhonours he has ſought to bring on the chief of his own blood. That the holy father makes the fire, and the jeſuits blow it. Nothing to be hoped for from Conſtantinople in favour of her majeſty's royal huſband. The miſerable eſtate of the Turkiſh empire. Gabor guided only by views of ſelf-intereſt. Inſtances of the extravagant ſimplicity of the new ſultan. Promiſes at leiſure, to ſend an account of his life. Profeſſes his zeal for the ſervice of the prince of Orange. Begs her majeſty to civilize one day in that barbarous country, by a few lines from her royal hand, which he ſhall regard as patents of honour. p. 59.

XL. From Mr. Secretary CALVERT. The king and council highly approve of Sir Thomas's proceedings and negotiations; which, he ſaith, have reſtored the honour of the king and nation. The French ambaſſador at the Engliſh court, moves for Sir Thomas to yield the precedence at Conſtantinople to the French ambaſſador there. To his, the ſecretary's, great grief, he has been an eye-witneſs of ſubmitting to this claim; but knows not by what warrant they did it: Blames Sir Paul Pindar for having done it, and, as he ſays, without warrant. The king reſolved to yield it no more, and therefore commends Sir Thomas for his conduct in this reſpect (See N°. xxxviii). Affairs of the Palatinate and England. p. 60.

XLI. To Sir FRANCIS NETHERSOLE. The Tartars again invade Poland, and the Coſſacks the Black ſea. The Turks force a preſent from Sir Thomas of two barrels of gunpowder, ſo deſtitute were they of ammunition. Sir Thomas ſuſpects that prince Corresky's death (See N°. xxxviii.) was owing to connivance from Poland. He has hopes to procure the enlargement of the other noblemen priſoners of that nation. Is poorly ſupported by the other Chriſtian ambaſſadors. p. 61.

XLII. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. A duty laid upon ſilk afrer it was ſhip'd at Conſtantinople, contrary to expreſs ſtipulation, warmly oppoſed by Sir Thomas. He is vilely treated by the viſier, and his ſecretary and interpreter threaten'd to be hang'd, if they ſpeak for him. Sir Thomas's intrepid behaviour hereupon. The janizaries riſe againſt the viſier, and cauſe him to fly for his life. The occaſion of the inſurrection. A new viſier choſen. His character. A faction between ſultan Muſtapha, and Moratt the brother of Oſman. Sir Thomas hopes to make good uſe of the injury he had received of the late viſier. The ſtate of affairs between the Turks and Poles. The weakneſs of the former. They court Gabor in an unuſual manner. p. 61.

XLIII. From Mr. ROWLAND WOODWARD, at WIMBLETON. He is concern'd for Sir Thomas's ſafety, on account of the confuſions in Turkey. The king of England has left nothing undone for procuring the peace of Chriſtendom, except taking arms; but that it is begun to be found, that what is loſt by the ſword is not to be won by treaty. The duke of Brunſwick defeated by count Tilly. Sir Richard Weſton at Bruſſels, the ambaſſadors at Madrid, the lord Doncaſter in France, all unſucceſsful in their negotiations. The French king's cruelty againſt the proteſtants of France. Domeſtick-occurrences. p. 63.

XLIV. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. Diviſions at Conſtantinople. A general neglect of their prophet's law. At the breaking up of the Ramadam, he apprehends new commotions. Salonica ſackt and plundered. That he has prevailed in open divan, as to the tax attempted to be laid upon the Engliſh merchants (See N°. xlii). He hopes to procure the Jew to be hang'd who gave occaſion to the attempt. All Chriſtians thank him for his vigour on this occaſion, and the beſt among the Turks he hopes to make wary how they differ with him another time. Proceedings of the Perſians againſt Ormus by help of the Engliſh. Poland not framed for an offenſive war, and therefore muſt have peace. p. 64.

XLV. To Sir Thomas FYNNETT. Containing ſerious reflections on the then ſtate of publick affairs, religious and civil, in Germany, France, Turkey, Poland, &c. The ſtrange depopulation by bad government in Greece and Natolia, the two beſt provinces of the Turkiſh empire, in ſixteen years paſt. p. 65.

XLVI. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. Further inſtances of the decay of the Turkiſh empire. Pr. Correſky's violent death (See N°. xxxviii.) deny'd ſolemnly by the viſier, who will have it that he dy'd of the plague. Gabor pretends to adhere to the Turks. But Sir Thomas ſtill of opinion, that the Turkiſh affairs are in ſo bad a ſituation, that he will not care to ſtir in their favour. Obſervations on the late quarrels between the Poles and the Turks. p. 67.

XLVII. To the Lords of COUNCIL. In anſwer to their lordſhips, N°. xxxiv. relating to the pyrates of Algier and Tunis. That he has done every thing in his power, and will continue ſo to do; but apprehends that the little power which the Turkiſh miniſtry have at home, will not make thoſe far off, regard them much, againſt their own intereſt. New changes daily expected. The Poliſh priſoners, at his majeſty's interceſſion, have better treatment, and are promis'd their liberty. p. 68.

XLVIII. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON, Ambaſſador at the HAGUE. The grievous mutability of fortune with regard to the affairs of the king and queen of Bohemia. That princeſs orders her picture, and that of her royal conſort, to be drawn for Sir Thomas, and ſent to him. That tho' monſ. Haga, miniſter of the prince of Orange at Conſtantinople, gives good content in his advices from thence, yet they are unequal to thoſe ſent by Sir Thomas. Wiſhes the Chriſtian princes would unite to take advantage of the miſerable ſtate of the Turkiſh affairs. The bad ſtate of matters in the Palatinate. While the French king is employed in inteſtine commotions, and the Engliſh court taken up with treaties, the Spaniards much diſtreſs the Hollanders. Particular account of their proceedings, and of the bloody ſiege of Bergen-op-zoom. Col. Hinderſon and many Engliſh and Scots killed there. Poor ſucceſs of the Engliſh court in the treaties ſet on foot by them. Lord Chicheſter's in the Palatinate a mere brutum fulmen. Domeſtick occurrences. Diſguſts given by a gaol-delivery of prieſts and jeſuits. Profeſſes to honour lady Roe for accompanying Sir Thomas in ſo long a peregrination. p. 69.

XLIX. Lord CHICHESTER*'s Letter to Sir* DUDLEY CARLETON, ſent incloſed in the former Letter. Account of the unfortunate proceedings of the king of Bohemia in the Palatinate. Marquis of Baden quits his cauſe. The duke of Brunſwick's repulſe. He joins count Mansfelt. Proceedings of the armies on both ſides. King of Bohemia retires to Sedan, for reaſons unknown to lord Chicheſter. Miſerable ſtate of the Palatinate. p. 72.

L. From the Queen of BOHEMIA. Her majeſty's kind aſſurance in his affection for her intereſts. She wiſhes his employment nearer to do her ſervice. But concludes, that whoever is her friend has ill luck. Her royal conſort conſtrained to leave his army. Reaſons for it, and for his retiring to Sedan. Is in trouble of what will become of duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick, who engaged for her ſake in their quarrel. Aſſures him of her unalterable good opinion of him. Commends herſelf to his wife, and concludes with a humorous poſtſcript. p. 74.

LI. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. His further proceedings in relation to the Barbary rovers. Inſurrection and murders at Bagdat. An ambaſſador arrives from Bethlem Gabor. The count de Torne, a Bohemian nobleman, late general there for the king of Bohemia, notifies his arrival to Sir Thomas. They are both order'd to communicate their inſtructions from Gabor to Sir Thomas. They threaten the houſe of Auſtria, and declare that Gabor never intended to keep the peace he had made with the emperor. p. 75.

LII. Advices in Cypher. Containing Gabor's excuſes for making a peace with the emperor. His deſigns againſt the king of Poland. That the Venetians propoſe a league to him. Aſſurance of the count de Torne, as procurator of the Proteſtants in the ſeven provinces, of their good affection to the Porte, and to renew the former confederacy made in their behalf. p. 76.

LIII. To his MAJESTY. He ſends a copy of a letter from Gabor to himſelf. That he gave no encouragement to that prince to hope any thing from his intereſt at the Porte. That he reſolves to keep within his inſtructions, which injoin him to prevent a breach between the emperor and the Turks. He excuſes the king of Bohemia from having any knowledge of either the count de Torne's or Gabor's practices. p. 78.

LIV. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. With advice of the treaty with the count de Torne, and the agent of Bethlem Gabor. His cautions to prevent ſuſpicions in caſe his letters are intercepted. Clears himſelf that he has given no encouragement to Gabor to apply to him. That he has done good ſervice, and could do more, had he ample inſtructions. As he had before given it as his opinion, that Gabor would not break with the emperor in favour of the Turks, (N°. xlvii.) he now gives the cauſes which he thinks have actuated that prince to a different conduct. Complains of neglects in correſponding with him. p. 80.

LV. An ample diſcourſe of all that paſſed in relation to the arrival, propoſals, and buſineſs of Gabor's ambaſſador and the count de Torne, referred to in the two preceding letters. The grand viſier, chancellor, mufti, &c. incline to a war. Their reaſons for it, and Sir Thomas's againſt it. He gives them great ſatisfaction. LXV. From Mr. Secretary CALVERT. He acquaints Sir Thomas with the high ſatisfaction he has given by his prudent negotiations in Turkey. A particular account of the negotiations at Bruſſels, in order to reſtore the king's ſon-in-law. By what means and pretences rendered ineffectual. Ravages of the plague there. Captives releaſed. The liberty of others detained, he will endeavour to procure. The naval ſtrength of the Tuniſians. The grand ſignor's orders controverted at Algier. They depute ten of their principal perſons to repreſent againſt thoſe orders at Conſtantinople. Numbers of captives at Algier. Ravages of the plague there. Algerines great naval ſtrength. He hopes to make advantage of their non-compliance with the grand ſignor's orders, and to bind them in faſter chains, than upon their own dunghill. Has prepared them a round admonition at their firſt audience. Yet from the manner of their ſubſiſtence by ſpoil and robbery, and their remoteneſs from Conſtantinople, cannot anſwer how long they will obſerve the terms he ſhall procure them to be ty'd down to. That the ſureſt way of dealing with them, therefore, was that of fire and ſword, which, but for the charge and diſtance, was not difficult. Precaution to avoid giving pretences to the rovers, to be obſerved by our own mariners. Reaſon for giving it. This the firſt time the Algerines were made to anſwer perſonally at the Porte. The negotiations at Conſtantinople have great influence upon the affairs of Chriſtendom. Complains of hardſhips and ſums advanced by him, which he begs to be reimburs'd; that otherwiſe, while he labours to feed others, he ſhall himſelf want bread. p. 117.

LXXII. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. How capable he was to give a great diverſion to the emperor, in caſe the rumours about the rupture of the treaty of Bruſſels ſhould prove true. That the opportunity is not wholly loſt, and might be guided ſo as to avoid both danger and ſcandal. Quarrels between the Turkiſh miniſtry and the Poliſh ambaſſador. Sir Thomas's mediation referred to on both ſides. Heads of accommodation between them agreed upon, with great honour to his majeſty. All broke to pieces again by the inſolent demands of the ſpahees. Gabor's conduct and intrigues at the Porte. Propoſals made to Sir Thomas by the Turks to engage his majeſty to ſtand by the elector Palatine, in whoſe cauſe they offer to ſend an army againſt the emperor. Sir Thomas's conduct on this occaſion. The ſubſtance of the letters brought by the nuntio of the emperor to the Porte. French ambaſſador again fruſtrated in attempting to gain upon Sir Thomas as to the point of precedence. Dutch agree to join their fleet with the Algerines againſt the Spaniards. Conditions of their treaty. p. 120.

LXXIII. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. Acknowledges the pleaſure and light he received from the diſpatches he had from him, which were the firſt he had received from any of his majeſty's miniſters abroad; tho', he ſays, it would have been of no ſmall advantage that a regular correſpondence had been kept up with him. He gives a ſummary but very curious detail of all his negotiations at the Porte, and how much it was in his power to work a ſtrange diverſion to the emperor, in return for his conduct at the treaty of Bruſſels. That the Turks, tho' greatly declined, are yet able to cut him out much work, and threaten to do it, with Gabor's aſſiſtance. Character and conduct of the count de Torne; and alſo of Bethlem Gabor. Miniſters ſent to different courts privately by the Turks to ſtir up a war againſt the emperor. Severe reflection on the duke of Bavaria. Proceedings of the Poliſh ambaſſador, who is ready to fling up his legation in diſguſt. Sir Thomas's ſucceſsful mediation. What he hath done for Gabor. Diſtracted ſtate of the Turkiſh affairs at Conſtantinople and in Aſia. The characters and ambitious views of the mothers of ſultan Muſtapha, and Oſman's brother Morat. The ſpahees ſtirr'd up by the viſier to demand juſtice upon Daout baſſa, the grand viſier, who murder'd Oſman (See N°. xxxiii). The ſultan and his mother forced to forſake him. Reſcued by the janizaries at the point of death. Contention upon it between the janizaries and ſpahees. The latter prevail. He is put into the ſame coach in which he had ſent Oſman to priſon; twice, thirſty with ſorrow, drinks at the ſame conduits where his maſter had begg'd drink; is convey'd into the ſame apartment where he had ſtrangled him; and the executioners diſpatch him, as he points at the very corner where he had ſtrangled Oſman, and deſiring to expiate that foul fact. That theſe ſtrange motions are fit objects for Ben Johnſon to work upon. From the intrails of theſe beaſts, as he writes, he augures the ruin of that empire; and wiſhes he could behold it at a greater diſtance. Rejoices in the honour of the pictures of the king and queen of Bohemia being to be ſent him (See N°. xlviii). Brief account and character of M. Haga, the Dutch embaſſador. Touches alſo upon the characters of the French and Venetian ambaſſadors there. Recommends himſelf to the prince of Orange and prince Henry. Alſo to Sir Horace Vere, and other noble friends in the war of the Palatinate, who, he ſays, have ſo honour'd themſelves, that they need no other. Reflection on the falſeneſs of the Spaniards. p. 122.

LXXIV. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. With the news of the Palatinate and Low-countries. p. 127.

LXXV. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. Another mutiny of the ſoldiers, who depoſe the viſier, and ſet up again Huſſein baſſa, whom Sir Thomas calls his old enemy (See N°. xlii). The probable occaſion of it. The new viſier runs oppoſite to all the deſigns of the old one; and concludes the peace with Poland, on the articles propoſed by Sir Thomas (See N°. lxxii). The Poliſh priſoners ſet at liberty at his majeſty's requeſt. Believes he ſhall be forced to advance money to the ambaſſador and his train, to enable them to quit Conſtantinople, ſo much have they been ſucked by the Turkiſh horſe-leeches. Intrigues of the imperial nuntio, and Gabor's agents, and a Florentine fryar, in cypher. Believes Gabor will procure licence to invade the emperor. The buſineſs of Algier yet in agitation, ſo defers an account till concluded. p. 128.

LXXVI. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. A conſpiracy to aſſaſſinate the prince of Orange at Riſwick, happily diſcovered. The circumſtances of it. Barnevelt's two ſons drawn into it. Some of the plotters taken, and others order'd to be apprehended.

Differences about the Eaſt India commerce between England and the States accommodated, tho' not to the ſatisfaction of our merchants. p. 130.

LXXVII. From the ſame. Further account of the plot againſt the prince of Orange, and executions thereupon. The eldeſt ſon of Barnevelt pleads his innocence. Three articles laid to his charge. The bad ſtate of Mansfelt's army. His proceedings and thoſe of the duke of Brunſwick. King of Denmark's journey to inſtall his ſecond ſon biſhop of Bremen. A ſecret armament fitted out for an expedition at the Goree, ſuppoſed for the Weſt Indies. p. 131.

LXXVIII. To the Archbiſhop of CANTERBURY. The diſtracted ſtate of the Ottoman empire. Concluſion of the Poliſh treaty. Intrigues of the Tranſylvanian agents. How well he could have repaid the rupture of the treaty of Bruſſels, had he not been ty'd up. The Turks pretend not to break with the emperor, but yet to aſſiſt Gabor, as he obſerves, alla Eſpagniola. Suſpicions on the arrival of a Florentine fryar at the porte. His pretended buſineſs. Offence taken by the jeſuits againſt the good patriarch of Conſtantinople, whom they plot to depoſe. The patriarch adviſes with Sir Thomas, and excommunicates a biſhop who was intended by the jeſuits to ſupplant him. The number of Chriſtian ſlaves he hopes to free from their Barbary bondage, &c. p. 133.

LXXXIX. To the Queen of BOHEMIA. He is ſtruck with wonder and grief at the bad news of her majeſty's affairs, and no more uſe being made of what he had adviſed from thence. Reſts ſatisfy'd in the king's unfathomable deſigns and wiſdom. Humbly exhorts her majeſty to be her own queen; and to remember the motto of the eternally glorious queen Elizabeth, as he calls her. A word or two of the count de Torne. There are things unfit for him to know; and as there is an over-buſy knowledge, ſo there is a diſcrete ignorance. Gabor's pretenſions to ſerve her cauſe. The count de Torne determin'd to run the fortune of that projected war. That he dare ſay no more; but that if his majeſty would not be offended, much more might be done. Imputes it to the ſincerity of the king's Chriſtian heart, and the care of his honour, that he will not heal with ſcorpions. That he has ſeen ſix viſiers in nine months, and this laſt was the worſt of all. That the ſultan's character is fallen ſo low, that it can hardly be given with decency. Expreſſes in the warmeſt terms his gratitude for the honour of her majeſty's and royal conſort's pictures, which, he ſays, make his houſe a court, and his chamber a preſence. Gives a facetious account of the oſtentatious entry of the new-married lady of the Dutch ambaſſador. That miniſter's ridiculous vanity. Concludes with a fervent prayer, that fire from heaven will conſume her enemies; and with his wife's concern for her majeſty. p. 135.

XC. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. The proceedings of Mansfelt. The emperor confers the electoral dignity, belonging to the Palatine houſe, on the duke of Bavaria. The electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh pretend to reſent it; but only inter pocula. No hopes but remote ones from the king of Denmark. Mansfelt's advice to the prince of Eaſt-Frizeland. Other advices relating to affairs in the Low-countries, Valteline, France, &c. More conſpirators againſt the prince of Orange apprehended. p. 137.

XCI. From the ſame. The elder Barnevelt's execution for the conſpiracy againſt the prince of Orange. His behaviour on that occaſion. The execution of other of the conſpirators. p. 139.

XCII. To the Lords of his MAJESTY's Council. The iſſue of the matters in diſpute between the deputies of Algier and Sir Thomas. (See N° lxxi.) He hopes he has finiſhed that buſineſs to his majeſty's honour, and the merchants benefit. Anſwers two ſcruples that may poſſibly be made in England on this occaſion. Adviſes to ſend a conſul and a ſhip, on whoſe arrival 800 Engliſh captives will be ſet at liberty, tho' they are the main ſupport of their ſhipping. Not above 40 of theirs claimed in return, which they muſt find out, and prove their being taken. He will not boaſt of his pains; but the iſſue has been beyond his own hopes. He begs the reimburſement of his expences, which he particularizes. p. 139.

XCIII. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. The viſier a friend to Gabor, and gives into his ſchemes: demands of Sir Thomas what his majeſty's intentions were with regard to the king of Bohemia. He is forced to bear ſome ſharp treatment from the viſier, who being his enemy, he has not the credit there he uſed to have. That this viſier cannot laſt, and the next may revoke all. The duke of Baraſky rather flies than retreats from Turky. He open'd not his capitulations till he came to Tergoviſta in Wallachia, and finds himſelf quite deceived by the Turks. The Tartars take his coaches, kill his ſervants, and lie in wait for him. The Coſſacks, in return, commit hoſtilities againſt the Turks. p. 141.

XCIV. From the Lord CAREW. The times require wiſe men to be wary, and letters to remote places run many hazards in their paſſage; therefore ſhall write only vulgar news. Gives him the occurrences of England. Frankendale (bravely defended by Capt. Burroughs) is deliver'd by the king's conſent to the archdutcheſs. The news of France. The Valteline to be put into the hands of the pope for a time. The news of Germany. Particulars of the prince's private journey to Spain. Other Engliſh occurrences. p. 143.

XCV. From the Queen of BOHEMIA. Reſolves, tho' ſhe has cauſe to be ſad, to be as merry as ſhe can in ſpite of her ill fortune. She can ſend no news, but what will make him ſadder, and he has no need of it. All grows worſe and worſe. Her brother loving to her. But that her father will never leave treating, tho' with it he has loſt them all. That he hath now delivered poor Frankendale to the Spaniard, and would make a truce for 15 months, to give the enemy time to ſettle in their country. Her opinion of the duke of Brunſwick and count Mansfelt. Is glad he likes their pictures. Tells him her royal conſort intreats him to reſt aſſured of his love. Wiſhes the Turks would beat the emperor ſoundly. p. 146.

XCVI. To the Archbiſhop of CANTERBURY. The jeſuitical plot (mentioned N° lxxviii.) againſt the patriarch of Conſtantinople, ſucceeds. The viſier, bribed by the promiſe of 40000 dollars, depoſes and impriſons him, and ſets up in his place the biſhop whom he had excommunicated. Wickedly ſlander'd. Dangerous deſigns of the Roman pontiff and his jeſuits. Hopes to be able, on change of a viſier, to reſtore him. p. 146.

XCVII. To Sir GEORGE CALVERT. Contents of two letters ſent by the grand ſignor to the prince elector, tending to encourage him to enter Bohemia with Mansfelt's army, &c. A very warm contention between himſelf and the French ambaſſador about precedence, in which the common cauſe of the Chriſtian ſtates ſuffers there. Deſires a complaint againſt that ambaſſador may be made at his court, for his inſufferable arrogance; which is cenſured by the other Chriſtian ambaſſadors. Deſires inſtructions on this head; for as 'tis poſſible they may meet, miſchiefs may enſue, which he will avoid, if poſſible; tho' he will not make himſelf a priſoner for a French army. p. 147.

XCVIII. Advices ſent with the preceding Letter. The Turks promiſe reparation and ſatisfaction to the Poles for the trick put upon the duke of Baraſky, and for the inſults received from the Tartars. (See N° xciii.) Inſolence of the Turkiſh ſoldiery, and the rebellions in Aſia continue. The Turks pretend in aſſiſting Gabor to reſtore the elector Palatine's affairs in Bohemia. The count de Torne engages in the ſame deſign. Gabor's plauſible pretences. Sir Thomas thinks this fire againſt the emperor will turn to ſmoke. p. 149.

XCIX. To the KING. Returns his humble thanks for his majeſty's gracious letter of approbation; (See N° lxiv.) and gives the ſtate of affairs at Conſtantinople, with regard to the Poles, the Tartars, the Coſſacks, Coſſacks, Bethlem Gabor, the emperor, the Turkiſh offers in relation to the prince Palatine and the count de Torne; and delivers his opinion of the true end both of the Turks and Gabor in their projected enterprize againſt Hungary. The good iſſue of his negotiations relating to the pyrates of Algier and Tunis. General ſtate of the Ottoman empire, and character of the ſultan. Some ſtrong hand only wanting to puſh this tottering wall. p. 151.

C. To the Earl of ARUNDEL. In relation to monuments of antiquity, coins, medals, marbles, &c. Expects an antique lion hourly. p. 154.

CI. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. With advices of the affairs of Chriſtendom. Of the Dutch fleet fitted out for a ſecret expedition. Treaty between Savoy, Venice, France, and Mansfelt. Mansfelt's quarrels with the prince of Eaſt Frizeland, &c. Duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick's reſentment of a pardon offered him by the emperor, and heroick anſwer in favour of the king and queen of Bohemia. Other articles of advice relating to the Low-countries, the court of the prince Palatine, the prince of Wales's match, &c. p. 155.

CII. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. The ſtrange rumours of wars, and confuſion every-where on foot, make him change his prophecy of the ruin of the Ottoman empire, and believe the whole frame of the univerſe ready to diſſolve. At Conſtantinople they live under a viſier, whoſe conſcience and guilt keep him awake. Sir Thomas's letters intercepted and ſold in the city to wrap up pepper. Tho' the Engliſh is a kind of character there, yet he ſends a cypher, for fear of the worſt, to Sir Dudley. Gabor's enterprizes and deſigns. Several caſes enumerated, which may bring this ſhew of hoſtility againſt the emperor, to nothing. The Tartar han, contrary to expectation, ſubmits to be depoſed. The Turks afraid of a war with Poland. Inſolences of the Turkiſh ſoldiery at ſeveral places. Aſiatick rebellions continue and increaſe. Mutiny of the Spahees againſt the aga of the Janizaries. The viſier ſacrifices the great treaſurer to it, whoſe only crimes were his great eſtate, and the hatred of the prime miniſter. Inſurrection of the Caddees againſt the viſier, in conjunction with the Spahees. The viſier by donations procures protection from the Janiſſaries. p. 157.

CIII. From Sir GEORGE CALVERT. His majeſty continually approves Sir Thomas's conduct. His proceedings in relation to the Algerines, &c. highly acceptable. Orders given for reimburſing his expences. Ill uſage of Sir Thomas's diſpatches at Venice, in their way to England, which is promis'd to be reformed. Expectations of a happy iſſue to the Spaniſh match, and preparations made to receive the bride at Southampton. The king's reaſon for cauſing Frankendale to be ſequeſter'd to the archdutcheſs, (See Nº xcv.) and for ſetting on foot new negotiations to reconcile the troubles of Germany. Domeſtick preferments. p. 160.

CIV. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. The king of Bohemia makes a difficulty of ſubſcribing the treaty which his father had made for him. The emperor makes great advantage of the king's treaty of ſuſpenſion, to keep the electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh from engaging, as they were about to do, in the Palatine cauſe. Mansfelt agrees to enter into the Valteline league with France, Savoy, and Venice. An action expected between duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick and the Imperialiſts. Other advices relating to the Dutch affairs. The town of Fluſhinge called young Algier. p. 161.

CIV. To Sir JOHN FYNNETT. Sir Thomas's obſervations on the ſtrange ebbing and flowing of the Thames. His great concern for the ſafety of the prince of Wales's perſon in Spain. Reflects upon what he could have done where he is, in return for the conduct of ſome powers at Bruſſels. Gabor again treats with the emperor. The formidable progreſs and pretenſions of the rebel baſſa of Arzerum. New commotions expected. p. 163.

CV. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. The ſtates of Tranſylvania refuſe to enter into a war with the emperor. Gabor hereupon propoſes a treaty with the emperor and king of Poland, and to marry the daughter of the latter. His double dealing. Sir Thomas gives a caution about the advices ſent by the Dutch ambaſſador at the porte. His reaſons for his jealouſy of Gabor's new intrigues. A nuntio arrived from Poland to notify the accepting of the treaty, on rectifying the fraud put upon the Poliſh embaſſador, (See Nº xciii.) and reſtraining the Tartars. p. 164.

CVI. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. Great uncertainty in the councils of the Porte. They declare war againſt the emperor, and preſently after, with joy, receive the news of an ambaſſador coming from that prince, to preſerve the peace. p. 166.

CVII. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. The general opinion at Conſtantinople now, that there will be no war with the emperor. The viſier's excuſe for his proclamation of war. The greateſt affairs there are governed by chance, and not by counſel. Dangerous ſituation of himſelf and the other Chriſtian ambaſſadors from the inſolent ſoldiery. p. 167.

CVIII. To his Couſin THOMAS ROE. Diſſuades him from his kind intention of undertaking a journey to him. Half the time of his embaſſy is already ſpent, and no conſideration ſhall keep him longer than the other half, in ſuch a baniſhment, which he takes to be a puniſhment for the ſins of his youth and prodigality. That there is no Learning there, nor uſe of any, and leaſt of all, Religion. He perſuades him to enter into the miniſtry; and anſwers his ſcruples on that head. Aſſures him of all his intereſt to do him ſervice. “ Law and “ phyſick, ſays Sir Thomas, you reject with mine own “ nature: I would not take phyſick but to purge away “ corruptions; nor uſe law but to keep mine own: “ But to do that for other men, is againſt my ſtomach.” The profeſſions, he owns, are honourable; but they have temptations on the right hand and the left.----- Travel is a preface to a ſtateſman; that, if he affects it, is worſt of all: That it is very hard to thrive, and be an honeſt man in that cauſe: He bids him then follow his own father's example, who, tho' his means were not much greater, thrived upon the dew of heaven, and provided for many of them, Marry then, ſays he, and live at Tring. Wealth hath no other meaſure than enough. If, ſays he, your thoughts ſoar higher, be ſure of good wings, and a good end. p. 167.

CIX. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. Duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick's proceedings. Obliged to retreat to the United Provinces. Other articles of news relating to the Dutch naval enterprizes, and the proceedings of the kings of Poland and Sweden at Dantzick, &c. p. 168.

CX. To Sir GEORGE CALVERT. New inſolences of the ſoldiery at Conſtantinople, on their ſetting out for Aſia. Baſſa of Arzerum increaſes in ſtrength. Baſſa of Siliſtria refuſes to obey the Porte. Other confuſions there. Peace or war with the emperor ſtill uncertain. A tribute demanded of that prince, and the reaſon of it. Gabor's views variouſly reaſon'd upon, with his pretences. He pretends at the Porte, that the French king, with the aſſiſtance of ſeveral proteſtant princes of Germany, and of Savoy, and Venice, intends to ſet up for the Imperial throne. Sir Thomas refers all thoſe uncertainties and improbabilities to the ſecretary's judgment. p. 170.

CXI. From the Archbiſhop of CANTERBURY. With reflections on the affairs of Turkey, the attempts of Gabor, the proceedings of the Emperor and Spain, and the league of the French, Savoyard, Venetians, and Hollanders, againſt them. The prince's continuance in Spain (an unprecedented enterprize) ties up the Engliſh hands. His concern and good wiſhes for the worthy patriarch. Informs him of the baſeneſs of the Greek Critophilus Metrophanes, whom he had maintained five years at Oxford. His folly, wickedneſs, ingratitude, and abuſe of the archbiſhop's kindneſs and favour. p. 171.

CXII. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. Count Tilly's proceedings after he had overthrown duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick. Proceedings of count Mansfelt. The king of Denmark's deſign in relation to Embden.

Gives umbrage to the States. Accounts of other affairs in thoſe countries. p. 172.

CXIII. To Sir GEORGE CALVERT. Gabor's report of the French king's deſign upon the Imperial dignity, (See N° cx.) lowers his intereſt with the Turks, who care not for ſo powerful a neighbour. Reported now that that monarch intends to ſet up his brother. The viſier Huſſein baſſa having given orders to ſtrangle his two predeceſſors George and Muſtapha, and the late baſſa of the ſea, the Spahees riſe againſt him, and, tho' protected by the Janiſſaries, he is depoſed, and Aly-baſſa put in his place. Great joy on this account. His wickedneſs and tyranny. Why ſupported by the Janiſſaries. Accuſations againſt him. What effects this change likely to be attended with. Gabor's reports to influence the new viſier. He believes the rumours of a war with the emperor will come to nothing. Gabor's views and deſigns not eaſily to be penetrated. p. 173.

CXIV. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. His pacquets are longer on the way by two poſts than thoſe of the merchants. Is apprehenſive that ſome of his letters are taken out, having never heard that his majeſty had received the letters he had ſent of the duke of Sbaraſs, and the Poliſh noblemen priſoners, whoſe liberty he had obtained at his majeſty's interceſſion. A truſty meſſenger ſent by Gabor to Sir Thomas, who intimated to him that prince's inclination to peace with the emperor, on certain conditions, which he gives. That Sir Thomas could change the ſcene either for peace or war, as he ſhall think acceptable to his majeſty. He preſumes, that tho' his honour has mentioned to him the violent proceedings of the emperor, the deſperate eſtate of the Palatinate, the ſtate of Germany, &c. without any direction about the uſes he had intimated he could make of Gabor, he is to pick out by that ſilence, a leſſon not to meddle any way; and therefore will continue to do ungrateful ſervice for thoſe (meaning the Auſtrians) who merit little: That he ſhould be glad to be informed more particularly what he was to do himſelf, rather than what others have done, to ſo little comfort or content, being very diffident of his diſcretion in thoſe times. p. 174.

CXV. To Sir GEORGE CALVERT. The revolt of the baſſa of Arzerum, and the rebellions in other parts, ſo much alarm the baſſa's and ſoldiers at Conſtantinople, that they reſolve to queſtion ſultan Muſtapha at the gate of the ſeraglio. He declines coming out to them, and deſires them to diſpoſe of his throne at their pleaſure. He abdicates with joy, and they proclaim Oſman's brother Moratt, ſultan; and, at the viſier's inſtance, give up their donative. A penſion allowed to the depoſed ſultan, whoſe weakneſs will be his perſonal ſecurity. Character of the new emperor. What the Turks hope from this change, and Sir Thomas's opinion thereupon. p. 175.

CXVI. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. Further particulars of the depoſing of ſultan Muſtapha, and raiſing ſultan Moratt, a youth of 14 years of age, to the throne. That orders were given 6 days before to ſtop all hoſtile proceedings in Hungary: And that he has been a true prophet in many particulars with regard to what has happened there. p. 176.

CXVII. To (his Uncle) Lord GRANDISON. He hears that his majeſty makes ſome difficulty to confirm the treaty with relation to Algier and Tunis; and that others think it detrimental to Spain. That theſe imputations are ſcandals taken, not given. He defends his proceedings, and ſays, he has been ſo wary, that even all the ten councils in Spain ſhall not be able to lay a ſpot upon him. That he is jealous of his reputation and loyalty, not for hope of preferment, but for love of honeſty. That emperors are made there with leſs noiſe than a proctor in Oxford. p. 177.

CXVIII. To Sir GEORGE CALVERT. Refers for the particulars of the laſt mutations at the Porte to a diſcourſe upon that ſubject, which he ſends to Mr. Branthwaite, under-ſecretary. The emperor's ambaſſador arrives at Belgrade. p. 178.

CXIX. Diſcourſe referred to by Sir THOMAS, in the two above letters. Containing theſe further particulars, beſides more amply, thoſe touched upon in N° cxv. cxvi. That in 15 months he has ſeen there 3 emperors, 7 great viſiers, 2 captain baſſa's, 5 aga's of the Janiſſaries, 3 treaſurers, 6 baſſa's of Cairo, and of other changes in proportion, ſo that the whole empire hath in a manner fined 4 or 5 times, every new viſier making uſe of his time to ſerve himſelf and his creatures, and puniſh thoſe of his predeceſſors. The laſt viſier Huſſein baſſa's vile conduct and character. His fall. Preludes which haſten'd the dethroning of Muſtapha. The manner of it. The Janiſſaries repent their giving up their donative. (See N° cxv.) Character of the new emperor. Reflexions upon the Aſian revolts; and of the effect theſe changes will have upon the affairs of Europe. The baſſa of Buda much rely'd upon by the Turks as to the German affairs, who is a penſioner of the emperor. Matters between Poland and Turkey accommodated. Janiſſaries inſiſt upon their waved donative. Porte ſo diſtreſs'd for money, that they ſeek to borrow of the Chriſtian ambaſſadors, whoſe neceſſities, thro' the tricks plaid with the coin in Turkey, are as great as theirs. Gabor's ſubtlety. Abaſſa baſſa of Arzerum ſtill victorious. p. 178.

CXX. Further Advices ſent at the ſame Time. Donative paid to the ſoldiery. Abaſement of the coin cuts off the ſtream of money at the ſpring, which is trade. The late baſſa of Cairo appointed baſſa of Buda, and offers 100000 chequins for the poſt of grand viſier. His offer ſeemingly accepted, part of the money paid, and he invited into the ſeraglio to receive his new dignity: but meets a hangman inſtead of the ſeals, on an old grudge, and his eſtate confiſcated. Baſſa of Siliſtria, who had revolted, confirm'd in his dignity, to the diſguſt of the Poles. Baſſa of Arzerum, after great ſucceſſes, retires to his own government, on advice of the changes. Conjectures upon his conduct. The emperor's ambaſſador well received at Sophia. Gabor advances into Hungary, but the emperor ſeems very eaſy about his deſigns. p. 181.

CXXI. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. A miniſter from the emperor privately arrives at the Hague, againſt the mind of the States, who had intended to ſtop him ſhort. His credentials refuſed for defect of ſtyle. Leaves his propoſitions and buſineſs with a clerk of the States General. The particulars thereof. Proceedings of Tilly. Deſign of the prince of Orange upon Goch diſappointed. Motions of Don Gonzales de Cordova. Mansfelt's ſituation and proceedings. Prince of Wales leaves Spain without concluding his match; but the treaty to be continued, which Sir Dudley ſays, will be drawn into length, and is peſſimum malorum. p. 184.

CXXII. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. Sir Thomas deplores the ill news of the duke of Brunſwick's overthrow by Tilly. He gives account of the reſtoration of Cyril the patriarch of Conſtantinople, (depoſed as mentioned N° xcvi.) and what happened upon it. Motives of the French to oppoſe Cyril, and the ſordid one of the Dutch ambaſſador to eſpouſe him. This diſpute betrays a ſecret, which is likely to be of bad conſequence to the patriarchs for the future. p. 184.

CXXIII. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. Abaſſa baſſa, pretending to retire to his government of Arzerum, (as in N° cxx.) ſuddenly attacks and takes the caſtle of Toccat, the mint of Aſia. The ſoldiery in Conſtantinople hereupon cry out to be led againſt him, and having forced the miniſtry to comply with them, of a ſudden make pretences to avoid going to the war. Gabor's miniſters vaunt of their maſter's progreſs in Hungary, while the defeat of the duke of Brunſwick is made advantage of by the Imperial ambaſſador. Gabor's policy to draw the negotiation between the emperor and Turks into his own hands. Sir Thomas is ſorry he dare not do what is in his power for the Palatine intereſt. p. 185.

CXXIV. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. Arrival of the emperor's ambaſſador at Conſtantinople. His name and character. Gabor's policy and views. The progreſs of Abaſſa baſſa in Aſia. His perſonal behaviour to his army. Sacrifices all the Janiſſaries he meets with to the ghoſt of his dead maſter Oſman. Various reports of his intentions and proceedings. Mean time the poor ſtrangers ſuffer all manner of injuries and exactions, and no capitulations are obſerved. The want of union among the ambaſſadors, occaſion'd by the French claim of precedence, a great cauſe of this. Complains, that he has had no anſwer on this ſubject, tho' 8 months ago he deſir'd inſtructions how to act in it. See N° xcvii. p. 187.

CXXV. From Mr. Branthwaite, Agent at Venice. The arrival of the prince of Wales in England from Spain. The pope treats with the republick in favour of the jeſuits, baniſhed that republick; to diſcard ſuch of their warlike commanders as are hereticks; to diſſolve their league with the States General, and not proceed with the monument they were building in honour of father Paul di Servis, author of the council of Trent. Is not much regarded by the Venetians, who ſacrifice to him, as ſome of the ancients to their gods, that he ſhould do them no harm. p. 189.

CXXVI. From Mr. Secretary Calvert. He applauds Sir Thomas's conſtancy in the many ſtorms he has met at the Turkiſh court. Letters of thanks from the Poliſh lords for their liberty, (See N° cxiv.) received by his majeſty. That the king has long expected from France ſome ſatisfactory anſwer about their ambaſſador's behaviour to Sir Thomas at Conſtantinople, (complain'd of by him N° xxxviii, xl, xcvii.) but to no purpoſe, and he believes they will give no directions but for that miniſter to inſiſt upon his unjuſt claim. He applauds Sir Thomas's diſcreet behaviour on this occaſion; deſires him to continue it; for tho' ſome inconvenience may attend it, the French ſuffer by it as well as he. Informs him of the prince's return from Spain, and that hopes are ſtill given of the match; on which depend all treaties and councils concerning the Palatinate, ſo as he cannot adviſe him how to behave with regard to the houſe of Auſtria at Conſtantinople, as deſir'd N° cxiv; but thinks the ſafeſt way will be to do as he has hitherto done, till orders to the contrary. Two Spaniſh ambaſſadors arrive with compliments, &c. p. 189.

CXXVII. To Mr. Secretary Calvert. The ſultan's mean condeſcention in a meſſage and honours paid to Abaſſa baſſa. No judgment to be made of that baſſa's intentions. The Janiſſaries deſperate reſolution; their inſufferable inſolence. Proceeding and buſineſs of the Imperial ambaſſador, who behaves very coldly to Sir Thomas. Great rumours at Conſtantinople of Gabor's ſucceſſes. His different profeſſions and pretences to the different powers to whom he addreſſes himſelf. His politick views. Sir Thomas's obſervations upon the ſtate of matters in relation to him. Sir Thomas hopes he has not done amiſs to remind Gabor, that if, as he believes he will be able to do, he draws the negotiation into his own hands, he will make the reſtoration of the prince Palatine a condition. Sir Thomas reconciles this ſtep with his inſtructions for promoting the peace of Chriſtendom: But ſays, he will not conceal any thing he does; for he had rather err and be chidden, than diſſemble any thing with his maſter. p. 190.

CXXVIII. From Sir Dudley Carleton. Advices from the Low-countries and Germany. Conflicts between the Embdeners and Mansfelt. Alienations of part of the Palatinate by the emperor give a poor proſpect of reſtitution to the prince elector. Bethlem Gabor's great progreſs in Hungary: He offers a treaty of confederation with the States General. Their anſwer. Vaſt progreſs in the eſtabliſhing of the new Weſt-India company in Holland. Other occurrences relating to the Dutch; and the emperor's private envoy, mention'd N° cxxi. The news from Turkey ſo ſtrange, that had not Sir Thomas prognoſticated what would probably be the event, it would ſeem like a romance. p. 193.

CXXIX. From Sir Edward Herbert, at Paris. Advices in relation to the feuds between the catholicks and proteſtants of France, the Valteline league, Bethlem Gabor, Mansfelt, duke of Brunſwick, the Low-countries, &c. p. 196.

CXXXI. Advices to the ſame. Imperial ambaſſador propoſes a treaty between the Porte and Spain. The viſier's ſhort anſwer to it. Gabor obtains, as Sir Thomas believ'd, (See N° cxxvii.) the treaty between the emperor and himſelf, and the Porte, for peace, to paſs into his own hands. Various opinions of Gabor's intentions. Sir Thomas believes a peace will enſue. Gabor pretends he will make none without the reſtitution of the prince Palatine. The emperor's miniſter at the porte referr'd to Buda, to Gabor, and to the baſſa of that place. An invaſion of Tranſylvania apprehended from the Poles. p. 197.

CXXXII. From Sir Dudley Carleton. Mansfelt ſeems reſolved to remove from Eaſt Frizeland on condition. Advices relating to Gabor's proceedings; difficulties of the emperor; affairs of Holland, &c. Queen of Bohemia aſſured from England of reſtitution, and no further delays. p. 198.

CXXXIII. From the Lord Carew. The times will not admit of a free correſpondence in ſtate matters, ſo deſires it may be declined on both ſides. Sir Thomas's account of the Turkiſh affairs for ſuccinctneſs and compoſition the beſt he had ever ſeen. Engliſh occurrences, among which the univerſal joy for the ſafe arrival of the prince, with a character of his royal highneſs. p. 200.

CXXXIV. From Mr. Branthwaite. Gabor's deſigns promoted by the Venetians. Emperor driven to difficulties by him. Room for hope, if the war were ſupported with equal vigour in other quarters, that ſomething might be done for the prince Palatine. p. 201.

CXXXV. To Sir George Calvert. * Emperor's ambaſſador offers to put a trick of ſtate upon him. Praiſes his majeſty's dealings with his maſter; informs him of his inſtructions in the preſent embaſſy; and what the Turks had declared to him in relation to Gabor. Deſires Sir Thomas to be aſſiſting to him, as (he ſaid) he knew he had orders, and acknowledges from the emperor his ſervices to him. He complains heartily againſt the States General to their ambaſſador for receiving the prince elector, and lays to that ambaſſador the ſtirring up of Gabor. Sir Thomas of opinion that Gabor will have the chief management of the treaty for peace to be held at Buda, and will not forget himſelf. Gabor's ſucceſſes againſt the Imperialiſts. Turkiſh empire ſtill in confuſion. Suppoſed deſigns of Abaſſa baſſa. Janiſſaries and Spahees jealous of one another. Manogli emir of Sidon takes Damaſcus, and other cities, and ſets up for himſelf. Unhappy effects of the difference between Sir Thomas and the French ambaſſador, about precedence. Two precedents inſiſted upon by the French, given in Sir John Eyre's time, Sir Thomas procures to be burnt. Sir Thomas's opinion to Sir Dudley Carleton of the pretended Imperial envoy to the States, (mentioned N° cxxviii.) who he thinks will prove a mere projector. p. 201.

CXXXVI. From the Lord Carew. With Engliſh occurrences, and the news of the Hague, France, &c. and the French king's infractions of the pacification he had concluded with his proteſtant ſubjects. p. 204.

* N. B. The ſame letter with this to Sir George Calvert was ſent by Sir Thomas to Sir Dudley Carleton at the Hague; but the paragraph relating what paſſed between the Imperial and Dutch ambaſſadors at Conſtantinople, p. 202. was alter'd thus:

> " To mee hee neuer mentioned the king of Bohemia;
> " butt what paſſed betweene him and the Dutch ambaſſador of
> " complaynt agaynſt his maſters for only receiuing him, and > " with ſuch other ſpleenes, I leaue to his owne relation, not
> " doubting hee wilbe lardge."

The concluſion, p. 203. was to Sir Dudley only. The letters to both gentlemen were in cypher.

CXXXVII. To his Majesty. With the ſubſequent advices and conjectures relating to Bethlem Gabor, and his deſigns and actions. p. 204.

CXXXVIII. Advices to Sir George Calvert, and to Sir Dudley Carleton, of the affairs of Turkey and Hungary. And,

I. Relations of the Turkiſh affairs.

The progreſs of the emir of Sidon, with his deſcent, character, brief hiſtory, &c. The lethargy of the Turks on this occaſion. Proceedings of Abaſſa baſſa ſhew he is not for peace or obedience to the Porte, as he had made them hope. French regiment and colonel in the Turkiſh ſervice. Curious reaſons why the Turks are formidable when they invade; and why they would be otherwiſe, if they were invaded, and the war carry'd into their own bowels: That nothing but the diſſentions of their neighbours can ſecure them. Baſſa of Babylon, who had revolted, ſeeks aid of ſhach Abas king of Perſia; which obliges the Turkiſh general, who had beſieged him, to pardon him in the grand ſignor's name, and leave him governor of that city and province. Perſians demand of Babylon and Ahiſka. p. 205.

II. Relations from Hungary.

Gabor reduces moſt part of Hungary. His ſtratagem at Tornavia, whereby he obliges a large body of troops ſent for its defence to ſurrender to him, and then takes the town. He ſurrounds and beſieges the imperial army, and greatly diſtreſſes it. The imperialiſts have nothing to hope for, but that the Turks would ſeparate from Gabor, as uſual, after St. Demetrius's day. This Gabor, being aware of, diſappoints: And when he had brought the whole army on the very brink of ſurrendering to him, agrees to a truce for ten months. Sir Thomas's large account of the reaſons which induced him to ſuch a conduct. His policy to bring the Turkiſh miniſtry to approve this ſtep. The reaſons he gave to his own diſſatisfy'd commanders. His agent procures a ratification of the truce from the Turkiſh miniſtry, with three hard conditions to be impoſed on the emperor: 1. To leave Hungary to Bethlem; 2. To reſtore the prince elector, and all who had made league with the Porte; and, 3. To pay a tribute of 40,000 dollars for Auſtria: But, in fine, the full power of peace, and the terms, left by the Turks to Gabor, as he had all along coveted. That theſe advices will furniſh a key how to judge of this prince, and his profeſſions and views, which hitherto have been ſo great a myſtery to all but himſelf. p. 206.

CXXXIX. From Mr. Branthwaite. The pope's demands (See N°. cxxv.) upon the Venetians, comply'd with, all but that relating to father Paul, who after being excommunicated at Rome is burnt in effigie for a heretick. His holineſs inſiſts, that his dead body be taken up, and thrown to the dogs; and menaces the Venetians, if they do not diſcontinue the monument begun to his honour. The Spaniſh miniſter at Rome makes loud complaint againſt the French for eſpouſing hereticks, as the Hollanders and Mansfelt, againſt his maſter. The pope ſtops his mouth with ſhewing him two letters of the catholick king, to the proteſtants of Mantaubon and Rochelle to hold out againſt the king of France, and promiſing them ſuccours. A ſtrange article relating to the Spaniſh match in a letter from Rome. p. 209.

CXL. From Sir Dudley Carleton. Great inundations in Holland. Unſucceſsful attempt of Mansfelt. This, and Gabor's truce, and the French deſerting him, ſo diſhearten him, that he determines to quit Eaſt-Frieſland, and licenſe or diſband his army. Engliſh occurrences. p. 210.

CXLI. To Sir Dudley Carleton: With relations from Conſtantinople. Gabor's pretences to the States of Holland for making a truce. Sir Thomas of opinion, that he ſeeks only his own intereſt, and that the truce will end in a peace. Sir Thomas reminds that prince of his promiſe in relation to the prince Palatine, when he took up arms. Apprehends that the queen of Bohemia is diſpleaſed with him, having not heard from her majeſty in eight months. Doubts the ill news his letters bring, make them not welcome. His zeal for her ſervice. p. 211.

Relations ſent with the above letter. Articles of Gabor's truce with the emperor, as communicated to the viſier. Sir Thomas doubts not there are others, which at preſent are not known. Reſolutions at Conſtantinople againſt Abaſſa baſſa. Perſians prepare for war. A new baſſa of Cairo refuſed by the inhabitants, this being their ſeventh in fifteen months. They inſiſt to have a new one but once in three years. The prince of Bugdania, degraded at the inſtances of the Poles formerly, reſtor'd for money. A late baſſa of Cairo, a viſier of the bench, being queſtion'd, out of malice only, flies, and leaves all his effects behind him, and this ſhort writing for the grand ſignor; "Naked I came hither, and naked I return: Take that I have, if that may help to preſerve your ſtate, which under ſuch governors, cannot long endure." The emir of Sidon ſubmits, and is honour'd with a ſword and veſt. The Turkiſh ſtate maintains itſelf, as Sir Thomas obſerves, like an old courtier, by bearing injuries, and giving thanks. The emir bolder upon it. p. 211.

CXLII. To the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. How the patriarch received the news of Metrophanes's ingratitude and baſeneſs. (See N°. cxi.) The good old man's value for that perſon. The jeſuits hatch freſh miſchiefs againſt him, which they wait opportunity to put in force by means of the French ambaſſador. That it is a matter of great conſequence to hinder the Romaniſts getting authority there. p. 213.

CXLIII. To Mr. Secretary Calvert: The ſame to Sir D. Carleton, and to Sir Ed. Conway; with Additions to the two latter. Prince of Bugdania outbid, (See the above Relations) and again depoſed. The viſier of the bench, mentioned in the preceding relations, again received by means of money and the mufti. The Turks reſolve to march againſt the king of Perſia, who invades the provinces about Babylon. Extraordinary tenor of the proclamation for this war. Debates between the miniſters and janiſſaries in relation to Abaſſa baſſa. They depoſe their aga. The mufti refuſes to declare Abaſſa baſſa a rebel. That if the Turks had not quiet friends on the Chriſtian ſide, their condition would be deſperate. The prince of Tranſylvania yet hopes to obtain a princeſs of the houſe of Auſtria in marriage. That Bethlem might be made to inſiſt on ſome benefit to the prince elector. Sir Thomas thinks it very incongruous, that the affairs of the emperor ſhould be nouriſhed againſt ourſelves, if there be no myſtery in it above his underſtanding. p. 214.

In the Addition to Sir Dudley Carleton; Sir Thomas obſerves that though Gabor has certainly his own intereſt principally in view, yet he has made, and continues to make, ſuch proteſtations of agreeing to no peace without the reſtitution of the Palatinate, that he might be held to ſome ſtiffneſs on that point, becauſe he would be loth to be diſcover'd to the Turks to have acted booty with both. That 'tis paſt his underſtanding, that we ſhould nouriſh the emperor to be more able to be obſtinate in treaty with us. Proteſts his zeal to the queen of Bohemia and her family. p. 215.

In the Addition to Sir Edward Conway; he takes notice ſtill to the ſame effect, that in the intended treaty at Buda, the emperor may obtain a peace that will harden him in any other treaty with us. That Gabor having made ſuch large profeſſions for the prince elector, he may be taken in his own nets, and held to his word. The Venetians have ſent a ſecretary to reſide with him; for they will loſe no opportunity for want of trial. That he, Sir Thomas, has no other end than his majeſty's ſervice, and only ſtrikes little fires which are ſoon quenched. p. 216.

CXLIV. From Mr. Branthwaite at Venice. He rejoices in the news he has from England of a parliament to be called. Wiſhes for a cypher to write more freely. A rich Engliſh ſhip, called, The Golden Phœnix, caſt away within two cables length of the port ſhe was bound to. The pope tir'd with the depoſite of the Valteline, put into his hands by the contending parties. p. 216.

CXLV. From the ſame. He acquaints him, that writs are iſſued for the parliament in England. Sir Edward Cooke, Sir Edward Sandes, and Sir William Jones, ſent commiſſioners into Ireland, that they might not oppoſe the court in parliament. He hopes, notwithſtanding, as good patriots may be found in the parliament to ſupply their places. He tells him, that the king is about ſending ambaſſadors to France, Denmark, and the Low-countries, and Sir Iſaac Wake to Venice, which gives ground to hope that his majeſty will go roundly to work about reſtoring his ſon-in-law, and will treat no more with Spain. p. 216.

CXLVI. From the ſame. The duke of Bavaria's reſolution never to reſign his title to the Palatinates. He amaſſes money, and fortifies his new acquiſitions. The pope labours to draw on a match between the prince of Wales and a lady of France, in order to maintain the hopes of the Papiſts in England. The French king makes great preparations for war. His proteſtant ſubjects apprehenſive thereupon. p. 217.

CXLVIII. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. Complains of neglect of correſpondence from England, tho' the intelligence he has given ought not to be treated ſo ſlightly. Preparations now making in earneſt againſt the Perſians and Aſiatick revolters. Janizaries implacable againſt Abaſſa baſſa. Sir Thomas defends the opinion he had had all along of Gabor's actions, which now is verify'd; and gives the reaſons for his ſurmiſes about him. His apprehenſions of the falſeneſs and ſelfiſhneſs of his promiſes in relation to the prince elector. If he had order, he ſays, he would put him to a fiery trial, as to his ſincerity, which ſhould make his cheeks burn. His double conduct and policy. That he is a prince of great parts, enterpriſing, and born either for ſome great general good or evil; and may be yet made of uſe: Begs pardon for his heat, but is ſorry to ſee good edged ſwords tryed upon an anvil, where, while their metal is ſhewed, it is loſt. Wiſhes for a good intelligence to be kept up in the treaty to be managed at Colen and that at Buda, ſo as both might be moved with one ſpirit. p. 220.

[CXLVIII.] From the Queen of BOHEMIA. Gives him thanks for all his letters; and ſees all he writes to Sir Dudley Carleton. Tells him, that ſince her dear brother's return to England, all is changed from being Spaniſh. That Buckingham doth nobly and faithfully for her. That worthy Southampton is much in favour. The ſudden death of the good duke of Richmond, as the queen calls him; how much ſhe loved him, and regrets his death. Has great hope of this parliament, becauſe it began upon the birth-day of her dear dead brother [prince Henry]. That her brother ſhews much love to her. That the good old count de Tour cannot ſpeak enough in Sir Thomas's praiſes. Bids him be ever aſſured of her love both to him and his wife. p. 222.

CXLIX. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. With Engliſh occurrences as to meeting of the parliament, the king's ſpeech, the duke of Richmond's ſudden death and character. Beginnings of the parliament. Count de la Tour. Manſfelt. Duke of Brunſwick. p. 222.

CL. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. While they remain irreſolute at Conſtantinople, the Perſian king makes great conqueſts. Turks apprehenſive that he will attack Aleppo, to open himſelf a trade for his ſubjects in the Mediterranean. Poles complain afreſh with menaces on the incurſions of the Tartars. Bravado of the imperial ambaſſador, that his maſter will not ſtand to the truce with Gabor. Treaty of Buda proceeds. Sir Thomas is afraid the emperor will treat there on high terms, if Gabor has no other ſupport than what he may hope for from the diſtracted ſtate of Turkey. Inſolence of the Barbary pyrates, who ſtop up even the ports of the grand ſignor. Sir Thomas hopes he ſhall be excuſed for taking advantage of theſe pyrates inſults, to act againſt them at the Porte. That the Dutch merchants are reſolved to give over this trade. The French proteſt againſt the pyrates of Algier and Tunis. The particulars of a noble deſign formed in France, to revenge the loſſes of that nation upon theſe pyrates. The pernicious conſequences of the diſ-union among the Chriſtian ambaſſadors, on account of the French ambaſſador's claim of precedence, which Sir Thomas has yet received no orders about. p. 223.

CLI. From Mr. BRANTHWAITE. With the news of England, the Low-countries, France, Venice, and Rome. p. 225.

CLII. From the ſame. The duke of Savoy's embaſſador diſguſted by the Venetians. An earthquake at Venice. The eſtabliſhment of the order, called, Congregatio de propaganda fide, at Rome. Jeſuits oppoſe it. Sellers of a Paſquinata upon the king of Bohemia puniſhed at Rome on complaint of the Venetian ambaſſador. p. 226.

CLIII. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. The French ambaſſador's round declaration againſt the pyrates of Algier and Tunis. The viſier's mild anſwer. As ſoon as the ambaſſador is gone, he breaks out in praiſe of the Algerines and Tuniſians. Sir Thomas's inference and opinion hereupon. He proceeds againſt the pyrates in his own way. What he hopes from the courſe he takes. The affairs in a very tickliſh ſtate between the Emperor and Gabor. The emperor refuſes to ſtand by the truce. Further conqueſts of the Perſians. Abaſſa baſſa ſtill ſtands out. p. 227.

CLIV. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. He writes the truth, tho' his advices may not be ſo pleaſing as thoſe of another, who, like the fly, think they raiſe a duſt by buzzing. The Dutch conſul at Algier acts a very ſcandalous part there againſt the Engliſh. He is loth to complain to England againſt him, as he is deſir'd, and therefore propoſes to Sir Dudley to give them notice of it at the Hague, knowing how unſeaſonable it would be at that time, when the Dutch were ſeeking the aid of England againſt Spain, to prejudice them at that court. p. 229.

CLV. To Sir GEORGE CALVERT. Sir Thomas thanks him for his advice in relation to the claim of precedence made by the French ambaſſador (See N°. xl.). That miniſter's imprudence and debts have brought him into many extremities. State of affairs between Gabor and the emperor. Gabor exaſperated by ill uſage, may be made of ſervice to his majeſty. p. 229.

CLVI. Advices ſent with the preceding. Ali baſſa the grand viſier depoſed and beheaded. The occaſion of his fall. Cerques Mahomet baſſa ſucceeds him. His character. Too good for his place. Abaſſa baſſa ſuppoſed to be aided privately by the emir of Sidon, and ſtill in arms. King of Perſia's further conqueſts. Georgi Mahomet baſſa, formerly grand viſier, declared chimacham, when the viſier is to go into the field. A great friend to Gabor. Emperor diſavows the truce at Goding with Gabor, and inſiſts upon the reſtoration of the places taken from him in Hungary. Gabor requires aids from the Turks. Why Sir Thomas thinks they will ſupport him. That Gabor might be eaſily encouraged, becauſe he finds himſelf, in deceiving, deceived. p. 230.

CLVII. From Mr. BRANTHWAITE. With relation to the character of Gabor; the monument to father Paul; the dutchy of Urbino, now pretended to by the pope and duke of Tuſcany, and the Engliſh parliament. p. 231.

CLVIII. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. The further progreſs of the Perſians. Abaſſa baſſa ſtill in revolt. The janizaries will not forgive, nor the ſpahees fight with him; ſo that it is not known whoſe friend or enemy he is. Little hope of peace in Hungary. Gabor demands aid of the Turks and Tartars; the emperor inſiſts upon having Hungary, and a neutrality from the Porte, between him and Gabor. The Coſſacks, to revenge the Tartar incurſions, ready to fall upon the Turkiſh dominions. A ſharp war likely to break out, in which Gabor will make good ſhift, if he have countenance from Germany. p. 233.

CLIX. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. The motions and attempts of the armies in the Low-countries. A brave naval engagement. Mansfelt goes to England. Other Low-country affairs. Affairs of the duke of Newburgh, duke of Brandenburgh, and kings of Poland, Sweden, and Denmark. Sir Robert Anſtruther to be ſent ambaſſador to the latter. Delay'd by the irreſolution of the Engliſh court. Propoſal made there to the States, to join twenty ſhips to the Engliſh fleet for the ſervice of the queen of Bohemia. The States favourable anſwer. England, notwithſtanding, ſtill led on by other hopes. And the Spaniards ſeek to draw the negotiation from Vienna to Madrid. If they ſucceed, he ſays, Sir Thomas may eaſily judge what a bait that will be to catch us with, who have been nibbling all this while at a bare hook; and when all is done, no more can be expected of treaties held at Madrid for the Palatinate, than hath been for the Valteline. Aſſures him of the queen of Bohemia's value and love for him. Agrees with Sir Thomas that Gabor is govern'd by private intereſt; but ſays, that even that hath great part in the publick; and that he has written often into England to make uſe of the occaſion, as he finds Sir Thomas has done; but imputes their neglect of the advice to irreſolution. p. 233.

CLX. Advices from CONSTANTINOPLE. Perſian ſtill prevails without oppoſition. Coſſacks keep in awe the Porte. Emperor's ambaſſador careſs'd and flatter'd there, in an unuſual manner. The Turks inſiſt upon the emperor's maintaining his truce with Gabor, whom 'tis likely they will defend to the hazard of all Aſia, rather than abandon him. The bad ſituation of the Ottoman affairs. p. 336.

CLXI. From Mr. BRANTHWAITE. With the occurrences at Venice. Diſpute about Urbino (See N°. clvii.) adjuſted. Archbiſhop of Spalato at Rome, (See N°. lxiii.) recants his writing againſt the pope, but in ſo faint a manner, that he is committed to the caſtle of St. Angelo. Obſervation, that he who is of one religion in his youth, and another in his middle age, will be of none before he dies. Valteline. Count Mansfelt. p. 237.

CLXII. From the ſame. The Pope prevailed upon by the jeſuits, &c. to write to the French king to procure favour to the Roman catholicks in England, in caſe of a match between the prince of Wales and a princeſs of France, tho' his holineſs ſuſpects it to be a Spaniſh policy to retard the match. p. 238.

CLXIII. To the Queen of BOHEMIA. Rejoices to find himſelf ſtill in her majeſty's graces. Gives advice how to make Gabor uſeful. His character. The neceſſity of his affairs, and ſituation between two formidable powers, make him deſirous to be freed from both yokes. Hints given upon this occaſion. Rejoices in the news of the parliament's good beginning. The merit of the count de la Tour. Profeſſions of ſervice and affection to her majeſty. A viſit paid him by the ambaſſadors of Gabor, who complain of the neglects their maſter has met with from the Proteſtant princes moſt concern'd to eſpouſe him. That he would ſhew his ſincerity to all the world, if he was properly encouraged by them; but muſt otherwiſe yield to neceſſity. Sir Thomas's inference from the whole. p. 238.

CLXIV. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. If Bethlem Gabor be to be built upon, it muſt be from a ſide he dare not name. Bad ſtate of his finances. He gives private intimation, that the diſpatch of the count de Tour to the Hague by Gabor was the effect of the imperialiſts expoſtulation againſt that nobleman's continuing with Gabor; who therefore, to make his way to the good graces of the emperor, contrived to ſend the count on this honourable ambaſſy to the Hague. p. 240.

CLXV. Advices ſent with the above Letters. Abaſſa baſſa retires eaſtward, as reported, in obedience to the grand ſignor. Which proves a fortunate and ſeaſonable event for the Turkiſh empire. Conjectures that his deſigns were to deſtroy the janizaries, if he could have drawn them from Conſtantinople. The Turks now in earneſt enter upon a war with Perſia. Prepare alſo againſt the Coſſacks. Reſolve to depoſe the Tartan han, and reſtore the han, whom they had before depoſed. The whole Turkiſh miniſtry behave very coolly to Gabor, and ſend away the emperor's ambaſſador well ſatisfy'd. The Turks demand of Gabor, in high terms, five years tribute for his province of Tranſylvania. The prince's ambaſſadors ill-treated at Vienna, and all his demands rejected with haughtineſs. What may be expected from him, if he could have ſuccours or aſſiſtance from thoſe whoſe intereſt is concerned to give it him. Five Turkiſh armies on foot or preparing. Pyrates of Algier and Tunis caſt off obedience to the Turkiſh empire. Inſtances of it at Rhodes, Alexandretta, Cyprus, &c. Cowardice and baſeneſs of the captains of a Venetian and two Flemiſh ſhips. Scanderoon burnt and plunder'd by thoſe pyrates. p. 241.

CLXVI. From Mr. Secretary CALVERT. His majeſty reſolves not to yield a tittle of the precedence claimed by the French ambaſſador at Conſtantinople. That when Sir Thomas was firſt ſent to the grand ſignor, he had inſtructions to do the beſt offices he could for the emperor at the Porte, which his majeſty hoped would have been requited again by good offices on that prince's part to him and his children: But that the ingratitude the king has met with, and the advantage taken by the emperor and his party to ſeize, during a treaty, upon the whole inheritance of his majeſty's grandchildren, together with the delays his highneſs found in Spain, have raiſed ſuch a reſentment, that his majeſty by advice of parliament has broke off all treaties with regard to both articles, and is reſolved to recover the loſt patrimony, by ſuch means as God ſhall afford him: Therefore his majeſty now thinks fit, that Sir Thomas do his endeavour to keep Gabor in heart, and to ſtir up his friends to aſſiſt him, in order to weaken the emperor's party, with whom it is likely he is to have a war. The parliament's ſubſidies for this purpoſe. The earl of Middleſex, lord treaſurer, diſgraced, and fined 50,000 l. That Sir Thomas will have inſtructions relating to his proteſt againſt the Algerines, &c. p. 244.

CLXVII. To Sir GEORGE CALVERT. Abaſſa baſſa ſtill ſuſpected, as is the emir of Sidon. The new Tartar han ſent to depoſe the han in poſſeſſion, recalled, on account of the other's reſiſtance. Gabor's ambaſſador's conferences, excuſes and pretences to Sir Thomas, with regard to his paſt conduct, and future deſigns. p. 245.

CLXIX. From the ſame. In relation to the Valteline, the archbiſhop of Spalato, (See N°. lxiii. and clxi.) and the French match. p. 246.

CLXX. To Mr. Secretary CALVERT. New troubles in Tartary, between the contending hans. King of Poland writes a very civil letter to Sir Thomas; but he had rather have the money he lent his captives in their diſtreſs, upon his promiſe of repayment. Indifferent opinion of the profeſſions of that prince in favour of the prince Palatine. Different reports of Gabor's negociations with the emperor. Letter from his majeſty to the grand ſignor received with marks of high reſpect, and will be of great ſervice to the merchants, &c. the grand ſignor having given expreſs order under his own hand, in favour of Sir Thomas and them. His majeſty's name of great authority there. p. 247.

CLXXI. Relations from CONSTANTINOPLE. The han

han Mehmet Gheray, refuſing to be depoſed, the grand ſignor ſends to ſuſpend that reſolution to avoid troubles: But thoſe orders not reaching Jehan Gheray, who was deſigned to be reinſtated in his place, time enough, they both come to extremities. This engages the grand ſignor to ſtand upon his authority, and to ſupport Jehan. Much hope, Sir Thomas pleaſantly obſerves, of the valour of the Turkiſh army deſigned for Aſia; for they begin to fight with their general and themſelves. Abaſſa baſſa ſtill holds them in great ſuſpence. The janizaries particularly apprehenſive of him. Different rumours about Gabor's ſucceſs and treaty with the emperor: If he could have timely countenance elſewhere, he is more affected to the war than ever. Further violences of the pyrates. The king of Poland ſends to renew the treaties, &c. with Turkey. p. 247.

CLXXII. From the Lord CAREW. With a curious account of the proceedings of parliament, and the affairs of the Engliſh court and kingdom. Spaniſh ambaſſador's intrigues to ſow diſcord between the king and prince, and the prince and Buckingham, end in his own diſgrace. Other particulars in relation to naval enterprizes between the Spaniards and Hollanders. In relation to the earl of Briſtol. The embaſſy to France for a match there. The affairs of Amboyna. CLXXIII. From the Archbiſhop of CANTERBURY. With an account of the good proceedings of the parliament. Of the treatment which the prince received in Spain, which had, of apprehended bad effects, produced good conſequences. Alliance with the Dutch, and other vigorous deſigns on foot. Excellent laws paſſed againſt monopolies, certioraries, &c. and proclamations againſt prieſts and jeſuits. His grace's obſervations about Bethlem Gabor. Further account of the ingrateful Greek Metrophanes (See N°. cxi). p. 251.

CLXXIV. From the Lords of the COUNCIL. A direction to Sir Thomas in relation to abuſes in clandeſtinely exporting of tin in ſlabbs, &c. and carried to Conſtantinople, Aleppo, and Smyrna. p. 253.

CLXXV. To the Queen of BOHEMIA. His conference with the ambaſſadors of Gabor, whom he adviſes not to be precipitate in his treaty. Their candour and openneſs. They declare that their maſter will ſpin out the time in treating, till he can hear what he may expect from the rumours of the king's reſolution of attempting to recover the Palatinate by arms. But if he had no ſuccour from thence or Germany, they concluded he muſt be forced to do as well as he could for himſelf. Sir Thomas obſerves upon it, that if it be not too late, and the prince not too much neglected, he may be a noble inſtrument in her majeſty's ſervice, and for the general peace of Germany. p. 254.

CLXXVI. Advices with the preceding Letter. Rumours of the proceedings of the Turkiſh army. The Tartar han Mehmet Gheray repulſes his competitor Jehan, and makes himſelf very formidable. Gabor's ambaſſadors take leave of the Porte. The pyrates of Algiers and Tunis ſwarm in the Mediterranean; and ſo ſhut up all the grand ſignor's ports, that there is no ſecurity in the trade to thoſe parts. p. 254.

CLXXVII. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. The new alliances and aids the States contract and receive from England, France, and Venice, give great confidence to the Hollanders. Commiſſion of Sir Robert Anſtruther to Denmark, Saxony, and Brandenburgh, and of Sir John Spenſe to Sweden. Prince of Orange pleaſed with his forbearance to complain of the States conſul at Algier (See N°. cliv.) who is to be recalled for his bad behaviour, and the States make at preſent the cauſe of the Engliſh their own at Algier. p. 255.

CLXXVIII. Relations from CONSTANTINOPLE. The king of Perſia lays ſiege to a ſtrong caſtle in the province of Arzerum. A peace made between the great viſier and Abaſſa baſſa, who marches to its relief. The baſſa procures his own terms, and great honours, and the government of Arzerum for life; yet ſome jealouſies remain between him and the viſier. Mehmet han ſtill victorious againſt Jehan han. The Turks ill policy in their low circumſtances to offer to depoſe a young and well-beloved prince of the Tartars, for an old decrepit one, whom they had before depoſed. The Tartars inſult them in an unprecedented manner hereupon. Sir Thomas of opinion, that the Turks will withdraw their order of depoſing Mehmet ſhamefully. The gallies of Malta and Meſſina gain a notable advantage over the pyrates of Barbary. The Coſſacks, with between ſeventy and eighty boats, enter the Boſphorus, and ſack, burn and plunder many Turkiſh villages and pleaſure houſes on both ſhores, even within four miles of Conſtantinople. The great conſternation of the Turks hereupon. Sir Thomas's remarks upon this extraordinary event. p. 256.

CLXXIX. From Mr. BRANTHWAITE. He gives a relation of the naval fight between the gallies of Malta and Sicily, as mentioned in the preceding relations: And of a ſucceſsful deſcent of the pyrates at Peraſto in Dalmatia, ſubject to Venice, where they commit cruel ravages, &c. p. 258.

CLXXX. From the ſame. With the news of Venice and Rome. The Papiſts now not ſo inſolent as they uſed to be, ſince the turn of affairs in England; for before, he obſerves, no man could ſhake his head without a comment from them; but now men begin to write and ſpeak freely. p. 258.

CLXXXI. Letter of the Archbiſhop of SPALATO, to his Kinſman at VENICE, ſent with the above. p. 259.

CLXXXII. To the KING. He ſends to his majeſty, a letter (truly Eaſtern) from the grand ſignor, in anſwer to his majeſty's letter of congratulation on his acceſſion, confirming the capitulations, and promiſing favour, protection and free trade to all the Engliſh ſubjects. Alſo one from Georgi Mehmet baſſa the chimacham, to the ſame purpoſe. The good effects thereof to the merchants: That he has received as much ſatisfaction as he can require, except only in the puniſhment of the baſſas, who have money to fine for their heads, and he none but to maintain his own. p. 260.

CLXXXV. To Sir GEORGE CALVERT. That a letter from him, Mr. ſecretary, for which he had exceedingly long'd, as he underſtands it contained inſtructions for his conduct on the changes of affairs both at home and in Hungary, (See N°. clxvi.) has ſome how miſcarry'd, and not come to his hands. Forced to mingle ſome part of his letters with cypher, having had his letters ſeized, and threaten'd to be open'd in publick divan, while the city was under apprehenſion from the late inſults of the Coſſacks (See N°. clxxviii). He fears Gabor is gone over to the emperor, being trained up with the hope of an Auſtrian princeſs in marriage, which at laſt will probably end with the offer of a waiting gentlewoman. That he, Sir Thomas, is not wiſe enough to know why Gabor hath been ſo much neglected. If he join with the imperialiſts, he will prove a worſe enemy, than he was a friend, and all the force of the emperor will be at liberty. That 'tis not impoſſible to recover him, if it be thought fit. The danger in which he writes. p. 264.

CLXXXVI. Relations ſent with the above Letter. Huſſein baſſa the tyrannical great viſier, who on his being depoſed (See N°. cxiii). made his eſcape the preceding year, being now taken, is, notwithſtanding the promiſes made him, on diſcovery of his wealth, ſtrangled in the ſeraglio. Turks forced, as Sir Thomas foreſaw, (N°. clxxviii). to recall Jehan Gheray han, and to confirm Mehmet han. Cantemir Emirze routed in his excurſions into Poland. Coſſacks make another incurſion up the Boſphorus, and after ſtriking a great conſternation into the Conſtantinopolitans, retire with great booty. Some of the ſtragglers taken priſoners, confeſs that Mehmet han was confederate in their attempts in revenge for the grand ſignor's endeavouring to depoſe him. Bethlem Gabor, as he feared, (N° clxxxv.) makes peace with the emperor. The articles kept ſecret; but much boaſted of by the Imperial ambaſſador at Conſtantinople. The chimacham diſſatisfy'd with it, and demands Sir Thomas's opinion of the match into the Imperial family, which Gabor was made to hope for. His anſwer. The viſier's opinion of Gabor's inconſtancy, and of his capacity to deceive, rather than be deceived. That if Gabor were put upon a ſpit, before he could be turn'd twice about, he would change three times; but that he ſo well knew his hatred to the houſe of Auſtria, beſides the difference of religion, that he would undertake to fetch him back at his pleaſure. Emperor renews his peace with the Turks, and has now his hands at liberty for worſe employment. Of opinion that it would have been much more eaſy to have kept up Gabor, while, like a rolling ſtone, he was moving, than to raiſe him again from his reſt. Character of the caſlari-aga, who governs all within the ſeraglio. He ſets on foot a treaty with Spain, which is kept a ſecret from the mufti and chimacham (to the latter of whom, ſee N° cxxxi. it was propoſed and rejected): the private manner of beginning it, and carrying it on. Sir Thomas is jealous of the Spaniſh intentions againſt other Chriſtian powers, by this ſtep, which otherwiſe would be uſeleſs to them, tho' of ſervice to the Turks. p. 265.

CLXXXVII. To the Queen of Bohemia. That the bad news of Gabor's peace with the emperor, makes him approach her majeſty with more unwillingneſs than ever. Imperial ambaſſador's behaviour upon it. That there is but one counſel left to recover him, which is to make him diſcern the ſcorn the Auſtrians hold him in, and their deſign not to give him a daughter of that houſe to wife. Times dangerous to write freely in: but if his majeſty would give him leave, he could ſend Gabor ſuch advice, as would move him either by fear or ſhame. His zeal for her majeſty's ſervice, and the little good he was likely to do, made him apprehenſive of loſing her good opinion; has not a drop of blood in his heart, which he would not ſhed for her. p. 267.

CLXXXVIII. To Sir Dudley Carleton. Thanks him for removing his fears of any miſapprehenſion taken of his actions by the queen of Bohemia. Dutch ambaſſador at Conſtantinople gave ground to that apprehenſion, by ſome words, or rather vaunts he gave out. That ambaſſador the oracle of the Dutch; but their mountebank at Conſtantinople. He gives his thoughts of the Spaniſh treaty newly propoſed there. (See N° clxxxvi.) Of Gabor's peace; and believes the viſier is deceived in his opinion (N° clxxxvi.) that he can reclaim him. Perhaps, he ſays, his majeſty's authority might; but all his advices relating to that prince having never been anſwered, and intirely neglected, he dare not preſs it. p. 267.

CLXXXIX. Relations ſent with the two preceding Letters, and to England. Turks diſſatisfied with Gabor's peace. Some articles of it. Greatly advantageous to the emperor. The treaty of Zitwa between the Turks and Imperialiſts renew'd, very much alſo to the emperor's advantage. Baſſa of Buda, an imperial penſioner, blam'd for it. Great apprehenſions ſtill of the Tartars, who continue in arms againſt the Turks. Motion for a peace with Spain begun by the emperor's ambaſſador, but then rejected, (See N° cxxxi, clxxxvi.) now again refuſed. p. 268.

CXC. From Mr. Branthwaite. With the news of Venice, and other parts of Italy; the Valteline affair, &c. p. 269.

CXCI. To Sir George Calvert. Receives the letter from the ſecretary, which he believes (See N° clxxxv.) had miſcarry'd, containing directions in regard to the article of precedence, and for his conduct on the change of affairs at home and in Hungary, as alſo to the pyrates. (See N° clxvi.) Gives him an account of his contrivance to maintain the common cauſe of ambaſſadors at Conſtantinople, and yet preſerve his majeſty's honour with regard to that conteſted point with the French ambaſſador, by which he rather gains than loſes ground. Unwonted civilities of that ambaſſador to him. That the ſcene of affairs as to Gabor is entirely alter'd, by reaſon of his peace with the emperor; the wiſh'd-for advantage twice loſt, and by what means the Turks were drawn in to renew their treaties with the Imperialiſts. That he will do all he can to put Gabor in heart again, and have an eye upon any occaſion that may offer: But deſires more particular orders how far he is to go with Gabor as to writing, ſending, or treating with him; for tho' he can promiſe nothing, he doubts not, that before the ſpring, he may be moved to new actions, if he can be countenanced effectually, and taken into alliance, and if his majeſty be actually engaged. That with regard to the pyrates, he has more hope than ever; and will give ſpeedy account thereof to the lords of the council. p. 269.

CXCII. To Sir Edward Conway. Excuſes himſelf for not writing to him ſo frequently as to the other ſecretary, Sir George Calvert. Deſires him to join in procuring more particular orders for his conduct with Gabor. Gabor's pretences for a peace with the emperor very plauſible: How he muſt be treated, and what will probably engage him to alter his conduct: The Turks not pleaſed with being over-reached by the emperor's ambaſſador in the renewal of the peace between the two empires, but obliged by their own wars with the Perſians and Tartars to diſſemble. That if he ſhall receive the directions he hopes for, he will effect more than he will promiſe. Deſires a ſpeedy anſwer to ſerve him as a ſtar of direction to ſail by. p. 271.

CXCIII. Relations ſent with the two preceding Letters. Further particulars of the total overthrow of the captain baſſa in his attempt to reinſtate Jehan han; and of the confirmation of Mahomet han in his dignity. Other advices relating to the pacification between the grand viſier and Abaſſa baſſa; as alſo to the ſtate of affairs between the grand ſignor, Gabor, and the emperor. He doubts not that Gabor will ſoon ſee his error in believing that the emperor will match his daughter to him; and then, if he ſee any other prince actually engaged in the war for the Palatinate, it will have proper influence upon him. p. 273.

CXCIV. From Sir Dudley Carleton. With the news of the Low-countries, and the Spaniards inveſting Breda. French boaſts in favour of the liberties of Germany: Exploits of the fleets ſent into Braſil and the South-ſea by the Dutch Weſt-India company. p. 274.

CXCV. To the King. The good effects of Sir Thomas's endeavours againſt the pyrates, and his majeſty's letter to the grand ſignor, which occaſion the recalling of the old baſſa of Algier, and placing a new one in his room, with the ſtricteſt injunctions of favouring the Engliſh, on pain of loſing his head. He ſends a rude draught of the articles of peace between Gabor and the emperor. That the peace, tho' paſt prevention, thro' too much neglect of Gabor, he hopes not paſt recal, if proper means be taken. The nature of the war Gabor can carry on greatly advantageous for a diverſion, yet cannot endanger any part of Chriſtendom to the Turk. The general bad condition of the Ottoman empire. p. 276.

CXCVI. To Sir George Calvert. Gives the contents of his letters to the king and to Sir Edward Conway, as above inſerted, with ſome account of the articles of Gabor's peace, and his opinion of what is to be done to ſet Gabor again in motion, and ſecure his ſincerity. Another incurſion of the Coſſacks up the Boſphorus. Gives notice of a ſuſpicious practice whereby the Spaniard increaſes his navy out of England, clandeſtinely, by means of the Genoeſe. p. 277.

CXCVII. To the Lords of the Council. Giving a curious and more particular account of his proceedings with regard to the Barbary pyrates, and the good effects likely to accrue from them. Repreſents, that as the baſſas of Algier are tempted to break the peace, by the ſhares they receive in the prizes, that 1000 dollars a year might be put into his hands, to preſent to the baſſa at the end of every year in which he had given no cauſe of complaint. The matter not great, and eaſily raiſed, and not diſhonourable to England, being a free gift from himſelf, as it were. That this will be the life and root of all their endeavours. Propoſes to their lordſhips to ſend for the Levant company, and propound to them how this little ſum may be raiſed, which ſhall not be given unleſs peace be kept; and then it may be computed how many hundred thouſand dollars will be ſaved by it every year to the commonwealth. That he has propoſed this to the merchants. p. 280.

CXCVIII. To the Queen of BOHEMIA. He ſhall preſume to trouble her majeſty oftener with his letters, now he has more liberty to do her ſervice. That tho' the beſt opportunity be loſt, yet the cauſe, if rightly undertaken, is not deſperate. Some ſtrange conditions in Gabor's treaty with the Emperor. Adviſes the king of Bohemia to ſend an ambaſſador to Gabor, and what offers to make him; and what methods will be propereſt to engage him to move effectually. That the Tranſylvanians are weary of the war; but the Hungarians are to be chiefly depended upon, who want to ſhake off the Auſtrian yoke, and Gabor's hope of that crown will give life to his ambition. Refers to the count de Torne, who, he ſays, will aſſuredly be of his mind. Hopes to live to ſee her majeſty the glory of Chriſtendom. p. 280.

CXCIX. From Mr. BRANTHWAITE. The death of prince Philibert of Savoy, vicario of Sicily: Suſpected to be brought about by ſiniſter means. The queen mother of France writes to the pope, that ſhe will hinder the French arms from entering Italy. p. 281.

CC. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. With a letter from the queen of Bohemia to Sir Thomas, and the news of the Low-countries, &c. p. 282.

CCI. To the Duke of SBARAS. The danger his correſpondence with his lordſhip is attended with at Conſtantinople: acknowledges the favour of the copies of the two treaties he had ſent him, that of the Valteline, and that made by Gabor. Deſires a more perfect one of the latter. Thanks him for his advices of the preparations of the Emperor and Spain againſt the Lower-Germany and Holland; but that he fears their treaties more than their ſwords. Cenſures the perfidy of the interpreter of the Poliſh agent, whom the duke cautions him about, and ſays he is at the ſame time a traitor to his country. Men who build their own reputations on the ſlander of others, are not worth the anger. His ſervice to the Poliſh nuntio in the invaſion of the Coſſacks, tho' unasked, and before ſlighted. The news of the Porte in relation to the confirmation of the reſiſting Tartar han. Gives him advice of the incurſions of the Tartars on the Poles, and the Coſſacks on the Turks. That Abaſſa baſſa had ſent the heads of his principal adherents to the viſier, to ſecure his own peace. Underſtands that his lordſhip intends to go to the baths of Acon in Germany: That his journey thither, it being the ſeat of the war, will be attended with hazard; but that the Engliſh baths are more wholſome and renowned, and more quiet and ſafe, and his lordſhip will be honoured there. p. 282.

CCII. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. Enterprizes of the prince of Orange; of the Dutch fleets in the Weſt-Indies. Three propoſitions of the French ambaſſador at the Hague, in relation to Algier, and trade in the Eaſt-Indies. French match ſaid to be concluded. p. 284.

CCIII. From Mr. BRANTHWAITE. With the news of Italy, France, Savoy, the Low-countries, &c. The death of the archbiſhop of Spalato in the caſtle of St. Angelo, prevents ſome greater diſgrace to him. His corpſe how diſpoſed of for the preſent. Commends to Sir Thomas's protection one Petty, a Clergyman, belonging to Lord Arundel, who is travelling into Turkey. p. 285.

CCIV. To the Prince of WALES. A curious and larger account of the means and ways neceſſary to be uſed to induce Gabor to contribute his aſſiſtance for the recovery of the Palatinate, and the nature and efficacy of that aſſiſtance. p. 286.

CCV. To Sir EDWARD CONWAY. Excuſing and inforcing what he has wrote to the prince more largely. Refers to the ſubſequent relations. Amplifies upon the advices he ſent Nº cxcvi. of the clandeſtine method taken by the Spaniards, by means of the Genoeſe, for the increaſe of the Spaniſh navy out of England: A practice not new, but attempted and prevented once before. p. 288.

CCVI. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. Advices relating to the proceedings of Abaſſa baſſa, and the hoſtilities of the han of Tartary, mention'd more fully in the following relations. An excellent maxim among the Mahometans, ONE LAW, ONE LOVE, which he wiſhes followed by Chriſtians, and which always reconciles them in their moſt dangerous civil diſſenſions. The propoſitions he had made to the king, prince, and miniſtry, of what was proper to be done to influence and attach Bethlem Gabor. Procures the Dutch conſulſhip at Aleppo for the Engliſh, to the great diſguſt of the French. Anticipates any complaints that nation may make in other courts on this proceeding of his; and ſhews the ill conduct of the French at the Porte to their own ſubjects. p. 289.

The Janizaries twice inſult the viſier, and wound him once with ſtaves, for not ſuffering them to fall treacherouſly on Abaſſa baſſa. The viſier forced to take the protection of the Spahees againſt their outrages. Prevails by their interpoſition on the Janizaries to conclude a peace with Abaſſa baſſa. Articles of the agreement between them, ſolemnly ſworn to on both ſides. One of Abaſſa's chief followers, diſcontented with it, ſeeks to betray him; but being diſcover'd, is ſlain by Abaſſa. He refuſes to go againſt the Perſian in Babylon. Some of Abaſſa's followers being deſtroy'd by the Janizaries, contrary to the viſier's will, Abaſſa falls upon the Janizaries in their quarters, and many are killed on both ſides. The viſier forced to ſide with the Janizaries, tho' the aggreſſors, Abaſſa retires, and is purſued by the viſier's order. Abaſſa hereupon marches away to Arzerum, with great threatenings; the viſier to his winter quarters in Diarbeck. The Janizaries highly diſguſted at the Spahees for protecting him againſt their reſentments. Freſh irruptions of the Tartars into Poland. The han of Tartary barbarouſly cuts off the heads of a Muſcovite ambaſſador going to Conſtantinople, and of two chiaus of the grand ſignor, who accompany'd him. He afterwards ravages Bugdania, and beſieges the ſon of the prince thereof in his caſtle of Tergoviſta, tho' ſubjects of the grand ſignor. Inſtead of reſtoring the cannon he had taken from the captain baſſa in the late action between them, enters Caffa, and carries off from thence all the cannon and ammunition therein to his chief town of Bachchiſeray. That they are very ill ſigns of ſubmiſſion; yet, when they come to the point of blows, the common name of Muſſulmans, and the maxim ONE LAW, ONE LOVE, (See ccvi.) eaſily reconciles them. p. 290.

CCVII. From Sir GEORGE CALVERT. Is amazed and concerned that his letter of May 18. (See Nº clxvi.) whereof he ſent a duplicate a week after, had not come to his hands*. All advices concur with thoſe of Sir Thomas, that Gabor is gone off to the emperor: but to fetch him back would be a great ſervice. He then in cypher intimates the thanks of the court for the advice of the ſecret treaty attempted to be negociated between the Turk and king of Spain. His majeſty orders that he will do all he can to prevent it in general. That he has ſent orders to acquaint the Venetian ambaſſador in England with it; as he may do the ſame to their ambaſſador there, that, if not too late, ſome courſe may be taken to intercept the CCVIII. To Sir Edward Conway. An ambaſſador or agent at laſt arrives from Gabor at Conſtantinople. That prince's proceedings in his peace, and his future deſigns ſtill doubtful. Muſt be influenced by way of Chriſtendom. p. 293.

CCIX. To Sir Dudley Carleton. Buſineſs of the new agent of Gabor; viz. to get his tribute for Tranſylvania remitted, and give account of his treaty, and demand confirmation of it. That prince's double conduct to amuſe all ſides. That he is certainly among nettles, and can never be ſettled unleſs he can be aſſured from the ſide of Chriſtendom. Sir Thomas would preſerve him in credit there, but it ſhall be to make a proper uſe of him: otherwiſe his diſſimulation will fall upon himſelf. p. 294.

CCX. Relations ſent with the preceding Letters. Further advices relating to Abaſſa baſſa; to another irruption of the Coſſacks near the mouth of the Boſphorus, and their proceedings, and thoſe of the Tartars. p. 295.

CCXI. To the Queen of Bohemia. Further and fuller particulars of the contents of the two preceding letters and relations. Aſſures her majeſty, that Gabor ſhall diſſemble no further than he will give him leave; becauſe he knows all their ſecrets. That if he be wholly loſt, he ſhall be able to croſs all his deſigns every-where; tho' his endeavour ſhall be to preſerve his credit, if he care for it himſelf. That her majeſty may expect more than is fit to promiſe; for there are many ways open, if the beſt be not neglected, which is to begin with him from Chriſtendom, as he has long and often preſſed. Deſires the opinions of the king of Bohemia, and other princes of the union, of Gabor, what hopes they have of him, and which way they will direct their hopes; and then promiſes a good account of his ſervices. Mean time Gabor ſhall not eaſily obtain the Turks conſent to his treaty, and he cannot keep it, nor will the emperor confide in it, without their confirmation. That he has done ſomewhat unfit to venture to paper, and begs this letter may be burnt. p. 295.

CCXIV. To the Queen of Bohemia. Gabor's double dealing with the Turks, and their groſs credulity and ignorance in their own affairs. Sir Thomas ſets the viſier right in the matter; and a quarrel having happen'd between the Imperialiſts and their old friend the baſſa of Buda, ſomewhat may come of it. That he can promiſe nothing from a buſineſs wherein, on many accounts, he muſt proceed warily; but the Dutch ambaſſador he has brought into a right way of thinking in this matter, and he being more at liberty, he refers her majeſty to his diſpatches to the States, being well content that he take the credit of the whole. It is not convenient for him to ſay any more. The king of Bohemia muſt ſecond it, and Gabor be aſſured from Chriſtendom, from whence one ambaſſador will have more influence upon him, than 20 commands from Turkey. Gabor's great views as to Poland, which he muſt give up if he hold his attachment to the emperor. p. 301.

CCXVI. To Sir Dudley Carleton. Further account of the diſſimulation of Gabor; of the diſpute between the baſſa of Buda, and the Imperialiſts; of the proper method to be taken in the then ſituation. p. 302.

CCXVII. To Sir George Calvert. Further particulars of the conduct of Gabor, and the propereſt means to reclaim him. Sir Thomas's conference with the viſier on that ſubject, who promiſes to follow the courſe preſcribed by him, in diſavowing Gabor's peace, and to inſiſt upon a treaty to be held at Buda, with the participation of the Turks. Sir Thomas's hopes and inferences from this beginning. He is not ſure that Gabor will ſuddenly change: but thinks he cannot forget the title of Hungary, and ſhall marry ſcorn and repentance for a wife. The moſt aſſured way to move him, would be by an alliance in Germany. The elector of Brandenburgh, he ſays, has ſiſters, and other princes daughters. He is rich in gold, and hath no ambition which he purſues ſo earneſtly, as an honourable match to lay the foundation of his family. Neither his ſpirit nor fortunes to be contemned. p. 303.

CCVIII. Sir Thomas*'s Reaſons to the Viſier*, to ſhew that the peace between the emperor and Gabor was neither ſafe nor profitable to the Ottoman empire. p. 304.

CCXIX. To Sir George Calvert. Gabor's agent leaves Conſtantinople without taking leave of Sir Thomas, which he imputes to ſhame. He carries with him a letter from the grand ſignor to Gabor, (the effect of Sir Thomas's negotiations) ordering him to proceed no further in any treaty, nor in the execution of any already paſt, without the conſent of the begler-beghs upon the frontiers, who have command to aſſemble at Buda, and to be ready with all their forces, if the firſt treaty deſigned at Buda proceed not; utterly diſavowing the laſt as made without counſel. Sir Thomas ſays, he knows not what will follow; but that now buſineſs is in a right way, and no danger to one foot of Chriſtian ground. All they can do, he ſays, is but to chaſe the bull, while others muſt wound him. When the Engliſh begin, there will be many followers. As he receives larger inſtructions, he will do his duty. Matters, he ſays, will not go ſo ſmooth as the Imperialiſts expected, tho' they think they have Gabor ſure. p. 306.

CCXX. From Mr. Branthwaite. With the occurrences relating to the republick of Venice. p. 307.

CCXXI. From Sir Dudley Carleton. With account of the ſiege of Breda. Levies for a new army for Mansfelt. Proceedings of the Brandenburgh general againſt the Auſtrians. Negotiations of Sir Robert Anſtruther to Denmark and Lower-Saxony. Mansfelt's danger in his paſſage from England to Holland, by the ignorance of a Dutch pilot. Prince of Orange fails in another attempt upon the citadel of Antwerp. p. 307.

CCXXII. From Sir Edward Conway. Excuſes his not writing to him. Gives the reaſons of it. Promiſes a conſtant correſpondence for the future. Tho' he has not written, yet he has always embraced the opportunity his office of ſecretary, and attendance on the king's perſon, have given him, to repreſent to his majeſty the advices and letters he has directed to others, in that favourable light which his diligence, and the judgment and grace of his relations, have deſerved. Particularly, as to the buſineſs of Algier, that he prized it, defended it, and promoted it to the utmoſt of his power: and proteſts that he never loſt an opportunity to make him and his actions acceptable. And now, ſince he has addreſs'd his original letters to him, will give the beſt account he can, and deems it a great misfortune to him, that ſo worthy a perſon, of ſo great abilities, in whom he has ſo much intereſt, hath his employments ſo far off, and in things ſo far from their principal care, as it is not in his power to put the value on them which their ſufficiency and dexterity deſerve. He then ſignifies to him the good acceptation of his offices in favour of his majeſty's glorious children, tho' they ſit yet in the ſhadow: and encourages the continuance of them

Promiſes next conveyance to ſend a cypher, and mean time deſires one from him, that ſo the intelligence may be driven with either that comes firſt. That no more treaties are carry'd on about the Palatinate; which, he tells him, is divided between the emperor, the king of Spain, the duke of Bavaria, the biſhop of Mentz and Triers, the duke of Newburgh, and others. He then gives him advices in relation to the Engliſh aids ſent to the Dutch; to the ſiege of Breda; to the practices of the fugitive Iriſh at Madrid, and means uſed for defence of that kingdom; to the French match, with a ſhort character of the prince of Wales; to the league between his majeſty, the French king, Venice, and Savoy; levies for count Manſfelt; and money to be advanced him, as if lent to the prince Palatine, and which are ſo to be employ'd, as to make no breach between England and Spain. Ends with profeſſions of affection and duty to his lady, and ſincere reſpects to himſelf. p. 309.

CCXXIII. To the Lords of COUNCIL. In anſwer to their lordſhips directions about the clandeſtine exportation of tin. (See clxxiv.) A curious account of what he had done in relation to that affair before; of what he will now do; how efficacious his candour and kindneſs to the tranſgreſſors has been to remedy the practice; and propoſes what ſhall be done in England, to ſtrengthen his hands in that reſpect, and prevent the bad effects otherwiſe likely to attend that affair; for he obſerves, that the people concern'd in this clandeſtine traffick, are ſtout, and the beſt ſeamen in England; and extremity, he knows by experience, will not work well upon them. p. 311.

CCXXIV. To the Queen of BOHEMIA. Rejoices in the aſſurances of her majeſty's favour. Cenſures and excuſes his doubts on that head. That tho' affairs as to Gabor are not yet actively right, yet they are in a good way. That his peace with the emperor is not confirm'd by the Turks; and that the Imperial ambaſſador is detain'd at Buda, till the treaty to be held there was to be begun; in which he expected ſo many difficulties would ariſe, as would make the ſucceſs doubtful. That the Turks having accommodated with the Tartars and Aſiatick rebels, their inſolence would return with their proſperity. That mean time Gabor pretends to be ready to lay hold of any occaſion that ſhall be properly given him. That the diſappointment of his views in regard to the emperor, will ſharpen him; that no man is ſo fit and able as Gabor to retrieve the affairs of Germany: that his preſent fortune, and future expectations, make him too conſiderable to be ſlighted. That he has ſent to Sir Dudley Carleton, and into England, ſuch advices in relation to his views on Poland, and abilities to do ſervice, as may convince them how fit he is to be encouraged. Hopes, as his letters are only fit for the fire, and are ſubject to future conſtructions, that they will end there. How greatly he is delighted with her majeſty's commands, tho' but to pick ſtraws: But that when ſhe promiſes to pay him money, ſhe diminiſhes him, and holds him at a low price. Wiſhes he was as able to preſent her majeſty with all the wealth of the Indies, as a few bezoars (which the queen had deſired to buy by his means): That they are rarely to be procur'd in Turkey, but in time of peace and trade with Perſia; but that he has ſome of his own, which he thinks the fineſt in the world, and may be eſteemed jewels: Begs her acceptance of them. That they are Eaſt-India commodities, and till his can be ſent with ſafety, he has given order that her majeſty ſhall receive ſome for preſent uſe from England. Sir Thomas Smyth, he ſays, has great ſtore of them, yet they will not cure his gout. He has written to him to ſend ſome of his choiceſt; and deſires her acceptance as a poor new-years gift. Prays that her majeſty may live with more glory to wear out, or add to, the laſt moſt glorious name of queen Elizabeth. p. 312.

CCXXV. Relations ſent with the preceding Letter, and to Sir DUDLEY CARLETON, &c. The prince of Poland diſcontented with the Poliſh court, and the intrigues of the queen his mother-in-law, in favour of her own ſon, quits Poland. Bethlem Gabor makes advantage of theſe diſſentions, and procures a ſtrong party in that kingdom. His intrigues and policies to obtain the ſucceſſion to that crown. Reaſons why his pretenſions and hopes are not merely chimerical, and whereby the Poles may find it their intereſt to eſpouſe him, eſpecially ſince the death of prince Philibert of Savoy, who was thought of (perhaps fatally for him, See Nº. cxcix.) by ſome Poliſh grandees. The emperor's double dealing with regard to Gabor, in order to provoke the Ottomans againſt him, and to ſtimulate him to rebel againſt them. The Tartars reconciled and ſubmit; but on high conditions. Shahin Gheray, brother of the han, makes peace with the Poliſh general Koneſpolſky, and they agree to join Coſſacks and Tartars to make war with the Muſcovite. Harſh treatment of the French conſul at Jeruſalem, and the occaſion of it. Abaſſa baſſa receives as a garriſon into Arzerum 1000 janizaries, in token of ſubmiſſion; but ſurrenders not the place, marching thither with his whole army, to keep it, as he pretends, againſt the Perſian. The king of Perſia beſieges Orfa, the grand viſier's army having left him all but to 10,000 men; but promiſe to return in the ſpring. A vigorous reſolution of the chimacham for retrieving the bad ſtate of the Turkiſh money, boldly put in execution, and acquieſced in by the ſoldiery, contrary to expectation, and to the great ſatisfaction of the people, and good of the empire; which by this ſtep, if not ſhaken by the Perſian, is likely to retrieve itſelf. p. 313.

CCXXVI. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON, with the preceding Relations. That Sir Dudley's account of the taking of Braſil by the Dutch from the Spaniards, is welcome on account of thoſe who loſt it: But that for the winners, the Engliſh muſt expect no good from it; witneſs their barbarous Eaſt-India proceedings (at Amboyna). It is all one, he ſays, who has it, the devil or his dam, intereſt only makes him not angry. Sir Dudley, he tells him, lives among the Dutch, and ſees their beſt ſide; but he has try'd them eaſt and weſt, and knows their beaſtiality and ingratitude. He conſiders the propoſitions made by the French ambaſſador to the States (See Nº. ccii. p. 284.) in relation, 1. To the French and Dutch joining together either to make peace or war with the Algerines; 2. To the allowance of paſſports for the French ſhips, to iſſue freely from the ports of Flanders; and, 3dly, For the French to have a free trade to the Eaſt-Indies. And makes moſt curious obſervations on them. That it a little concerns the Engliſh to leave the French for a prey: Cormorants and wolves, ſays he, muſt have ſome food, elſe they will ſeize on any thing; for that people will never be friends to all at once. As to free trade in Eaſt-India, that may be granted them: He ſays, he knows India as well as any man living. The king of Denmark hath the ſame deſire, but all theſe nations will fall upon the error of our own Eaſt-India company, to over-lay trade. That the gain of India is by a little ſtock: that it may be fit for the Dutch, for reaſon of ſtate, to enter into the great charge; but it will undo us, that are mere merchants there. Let the French adds he, trade their pleaſure; they will come home not by the cape of Hope, but Deſperation. That Gabor is more worthy of conſideration than ſome people think: That he will not be quiet till he be dead, and there is no man ſo fit to ſerve our occaſions in Germany as he. That the Poliſh deſign, which he has entertain'd, will utterly divide him from the emperor; that the Turks will aſſiſt him, and they begin already to revive their ancient talk of the tribute, which they pretend to from the emperor (See Nº. cxxxviii. p. 209.); the peace with the Aſiatick rebels and Tartars gives them ſpirit; Gabor's peace is not confirm'd; ſomething is working; there only wants a declaration from the Engliſh, who have the greateſt and juſteſt cauſe to make it. p. 317.

That the poſt is of more conſequence than they ſeem to imagine in England. The importance of the merchants of England, and how much they deſerve conſideration. He gives an account to his lordſhip of the ſtate of the Turkiſh affairs; and ſays, that tho' the air there ſeem'd at that time clear, for the moſt part, yet that there was a great cloud whiffling about with the wind, that muſt fall. He ſhews the importance of Gabor; and complains how little he has been attended to on that head, by thoſe whoſe intereſt Gabor was moſt able to ſerve. CCXXXIV. To Sir GEORGE CALVERT, in Anſwer to his N°. ccvii. Sir Thomas gives account of his proceedings and motions, agreeable to his late inſtructions in relation to Gabor: That there only wants a plain authority to uſe his majeſty's name to that prince: If his majeſty will not deſcend to permit this, that the king of Bohemia may. If he had leave, he doubts not he could procure Gabor to ſend an ambaſſador to England with offers from himſelf. His advices in relation to the Jew imploy'd privately between the Turks and Spaniards, whom the ſecretary had wiſh'd (See N°. ccvii) might be intercepted, with his inſtructions. p. 324.

CCXXXV. From the Queen of BOHEMIA. Her majeſty and her royal conſort quite kept in the dark as to the certainty of what is to be done with the 13000 levies making for Mansfelt, tho' ſaid to be done for their ſervice. The king of Bohemia thanks him for his zeal in his cauſe, as by his letter he will ſee. That his majeſty is of Sir Thomas's opinion (See cxcviii, &c.) as to Gabor and his peace, and will ſee what can be done to encourage him: But as to his marriage with a German princeſs, propoſed by Sir Thomas (N°. ccxvii.) that motion muſt come from him, not them. That all the petty princes of the Lower Saxony are forward enough, if they had a head; that the king of Sweden offers as much as can be deſired: Wiſhes her uncle (the king of Denmark) would do ſo too. Has no hope of the elector of Saxony: Laments the death of the earl of Southampton and his ſon; which loſs has been aggravated by the death of her youngeſt ſon but one, called Louis, the prettieſt child ſhe had, and the firſt ſhe had loſt. CCXLI. To the Earl of ARUNDEL. Acknowleges the receipt of three letters from his lordſhip in recommendation of Mr. Petty, ſent by the earl in ſearch of antiquities. Doubts he will find little worthy his pains in thoſe rude parts, where barbariſm hath troden out all worthy relicks of antiquity. Some few medals or coins he may find rarely; but books have been ſo often viſited, that Duck-lane is better furniſhed than the Greek church. For ſtatues, columns or antique works in ſtone, Mr. Marſham, by his aſſiſtance, ranſacked the country. Has lately fallen into a way of meeting with antient things by means of the patriarch of Alexandria, particularly of a negro of black marble, a piece not to be match'd. That the ſaid patriarch hath given him for his majeſty, with expreſs promiſe to deliver it, an autographal bible intire, written by the hand of Tecla the protomartyr of Greece, who lived in St. Paul's time, the greateſt antiquity of the Greek church. Other matters relating to the ſearch of antiquities in the Turks dominions, and of the danger of attempting to dig for them, which no viſier dare grant, eſpecially at that time, and why. Short ſtate of affairs with the Perſians, Tartars, Gabor, &c. p. 334.

CCXLII. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. Sir Thomas gives account of the great ſucceſs of his repreſentations and advice to the Turkiſh miniſtry in relation to Gabor; and his treaty with the emperor; and the happy effects that may follow, if rightly uſed. That to keep Gabor in heart, a letter is ſent him from the ſultan, promiſing him conſtant protection; and that his intereſts ſhall not be affected by any change of miniſters at the Porte. That the Dutch ambaſſador will amplify upon this matter, he makes no doubt; but has behaved better than formerly: That the Venetian ambaſſador concurs with him, and hath done as much as can be expected: But that the French ambaſſador was piqued, that Sir Thomas had the conduct and preference in all this affair. The ill offices of the Dutch conſul at Algier, in thwarting Sir Thomas's labours with thoſe people (See cliv.). That, notwithſtanding, he has made it a perfect work. That the peace is proclaimed there; the articles impoſed upon them by Sir Thomas (See N°. xcii.) ſigned by the baſſa, divan, mufti, caddees and captains of that city; the inſtrument ſealed, and ſent to his majeſty; great numbers of Engliſhmen ſet at liberty. He begs that a ſpeedy caſtigation be ſent to that ill ſpirit, (the Dutch conſul) leſt he blaſt by his malice, a good fruit, while the bloſſom is tender. p. 336.

CCXLIII. To Sir GEORGE CALVERT. That tho' he hardly knew how far he was at liberty, or to what reſtrained, and walked for want of inſtructions in the ſame fear, that a blind man would upon a narrow bridge; yet judging that ſomething was left to his diſcretion, he had purſued ſuch meaſures with reſpect to Gabor, as he thought would withdraw him from the neceſſity of falling into the party of the emperor, or into his mercy. He then gives the reaſon of his proceedings, and the ſucceſs of them, together with the conference between him and the chimacham, relating to the affairs of Gabor and the emperor, in which he is primarily conſulted, and his advice followed; with further particulars of all that he had mentioned in the preceding letter to Sir Dudley Carleton. Anſwers the only ſcruple that can be made to the conſequence of his proceedings; to wit, the ſcandal of making uſe of Turkiſh aid, and that tender point of Gabor uſurping the crown of Hungary; and gives an account of what Gabor can, and what he cannot do. That he has found an opportunity to daſh and confound the project of a treaty of peace between the Ottoman Porte and Spain. p. 337.

CCXLIV. A curious Diſcourſe between Sir THOMAS and the CHIMACHAM, and DIACHMET BASSA, about the Affairs of GABOR, and the Treaty of BUDA; Wherein the ſeveral articles relating to thoſe important points, are more fully ſet forth, with the arguments uſed by Sir Thomas to influence the Turks, to encourage Gabor againſt the emperor. (See N°. ccxlii.) The dextrous manner in which Sir Thomas at the ſame time keeps within his own limited and dark inſtructions. The mean and envious part which the French ambaſſador acts, in hopes to find ſomething to cenſure Sir Thomas's conduct, brings ſhame to himſelf. p. 339.

CCXLV. Sir Thomas's reaſons for the advice he gave the Turks in the preceding letters, as drawn up by deſire of the Turkiſh miniſters, and given them as a rule to proceed by, with relation to Gabor and the Emperor: And which the French ambaſſador procur'd a copy of, in hopes to pick faults with Sir Thomas; but to the confuſion of his own malice, as above. p. 342.

CCXLVI. To the Duke of BUCKINGHAM. In relation to antiquities in ſtone, books, coins, and medals, which that nobleman had wrote to him to procure for him. That in a ſmall deſpiſed uninhabited iſland in the Arches, the burial-place of the ancient Greeks, as yet unbroken up, are like to be found many great rarities, which may be ſearch'd without trouble or prohibition. That Alexandria, the retreat and delight of the Romans, abounds with theſe things more than any place in the Levant ſeas. The famous ſtatue of a negro in black marble (See N°. ccxli.). That the patriarch of Alexandria will write thither to procure that which is one of the moſt beautiful figures and ſtones in the whole world, and to recover what elſe can be gotten. The famous Greek MS. (See N°. ccxli.) [of the Septuagint] given him to preſent to the king. Deſires further inſtructions to be ſpeedily ſent him in relation to Gabor and the Emperor. p. 343.

CCXLVII. From Sir ISAAC WAKE. Enterprizes and ſucceſs of the French in the Valteline. The French complain, with high aggravations, that the Proteſtants of France, under M. Soubize, take the opportunity of the remoteneſs of the king's troops imploy'd in the cauſe of liberty in Italy and the Valteline, to attempt innovations. Sir Iſaac's warm reſentments againſt the Proteſtants hereupon, for the unſeaſonable ſcandal given to the reformed religion. Terms on which the count de Torne ſerves the Venetians. p. 345.

CCXLVIII. To the KING. Notifying the concluſion of the affair with the Barbary corſairs, releaſe of priſoners, &c. (See ccxlii.) He believes the peace will be preſerved by them, becauſe they have refuſed to make terms with the French. What is to be done on our part to contribute to its being maintained; (See alſo N°. cxcvii.) That tho' he has been doubtful how to rely on the ſincerity of Gabor, yet now he has received advices from Vienna, (See N°. ccxxxii, ccxxxiii) of the Auſtrians jealouſies of Gabor and others there, he is confirmed, that he may confide in the ſucceſs of his negotiations on that ſubject. That he attends the inlargement of his majeſty's commands. p. 346.

CCXLIX. To Sir GEORGE CALVERT. The death of the grand viſier abroad with the army, occaſions ſome delay in the letters or orders (See N°. ccxlii, & ſeq.) to be ſent to Gabor in relation to his treaty with the Emperor. That theſe letters are at laſt brought to Sir Thomas; but with ſome alterations, which he did not expect, ſhewing their backwardneſs to make a breach with the emperor, and limiting Gabor in this reſpect; but yet ſo, that the whole is remitted in a manner to Gabor's power, which is all, his agent pretends, that he wants. That he is loth to ſend theſe letters, if he can get them alter'd; but yet, if they cannot, that good ground is gained, and the treaty with the emperor delay'd. That now the power reſts wholly in Gabor, the beſt way will be to aſſure him from Chriſtendom, and to admit him into the league: Nor can there be any ſcruple on this head, when the Emperor and Spain are courting him into their alliance. Refers to the advices he receives from Vienna (See ccxxxii, ccxxxiii.) for a confirmation of the jealouſies ſown between that court and Gabor. Venetians promiſed aid from the Turks, in caſe the Auſtrians fall upon their territories in Carinthia or Friuli. If his majeſty will make uſe of theſe beginnings, he doubts not in few weeks to adviſe, that the emperor has been forced to withdraw 15,000 men from Germany, to defend his own ſuburbs. p. 347.

CCL. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. With the like advices as thoſe ſent to Sir G. Calvert, in the precedeing letter; but with fuller particulars, and freer obſervations. p. 348.

CCLI. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. With advices relating to count Mansfelt's new army. The great preparations of the catholick powers, who exert their whole ſtrength againſt their enemies in the Lower Germany. Preparations of the prince of Orange againſt them, and to relieve Breda, notwithſtanding the ill ſtate of his health. Other occurrences of thoſe parts. Thanks him for the judgment he gives of the Eaſt-India trade (See N°. ccxxvi.) which confirms what he had collected in his ſtudy relating thereto. Count de Torne turns Papiſt. French demand aid by ſea of the Dutch. (See N°. ccxlvii.) againſt M. Soubize and the Proteſtants. They furniſh twenty ſhips. p. 349.

CCLII. To Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Transylvania. Repreſents his proceedings in his affairs at the Turkiſh court, in conjunction with the other Chriſtian ambaſſadors, (See ccxliv, ccxlv.) in order to obviate the deſigns of the imperial court againſt his highneſs. Of what the chimacham had promiſed to do in this reſpect. Suſpects that the alteration made in the meaſures of the Turkiſh miniſters, on this ſubject, are owing to underhand practices; and ſays, that Dollars are more weighty there than Reaſons. Encourages his highneſs with the reſolutions and preparations of the princes of the union againſt the Auſtrians, to adhere to his ancient leagues and allies, of the ſame religion with himſelf. That it is not his deſign to puſh his highneſs into a war; but to open a way to his greater ſecurity, by joining in with the preſent opportunity. That his highneſs would do well to apply by his miniſters to the princes of the union. That the Imperialiſts are jealous of him, and underhand endeavour'd to incenſe the Turks againſt him, at the very time he had made his treaty with him, and even pleaded that very treaty, made for their benefit, againſt him at the Porte (See N°. ccxxv). That what is done at Vienna, comes to their knowledge at the Porte. Their preſent reports of his proceedings with the emperor, in order to prejudice him with the Turks. Deſires to receive from his highneſs's own hand a ſpeedy and certain account of his reſolutions, that the Chriſtian ambaſſadors there may conform their actions accordingly. p. 350.

CCLIII. To the Queen of Bohemia. His deſire to do her majeſty ſervice, but not to deceive her. Suſpects the fidelity of Gabor's agent. That therefore he has taken another courſe, and written to Gabor himſelf, and hopes for a reſolution in forty days. If all be not made up of falſhood, a happy concluſion may yet be expected. Laments in the moſt emphatick manner, the death of the good earl of Southampton, and his ſon. Good men are ſometimes taken away in mercy, he ſays, to prevent their evil. Verſes on that occaſion. That his wife ſends her majeſty as an earneſt of a further proviſion a few bezoars (See ccxxiv.): That there are not better in their nature or uſe, being of the ſtag of Coraſon in Perſia. That all things are ſo dead and dull there, being winter, that he cannot relate to her majeſty one ridiculous tale of that wiſe ſtate, which being govern'd by an eunuch, all things are as tame as he. p. 353.

CCLIV. To Sir Dudley Carleton. The uncertainty he is in, whether to lay the fault of the late change in the Ottoman councils with regard to the emperor, (See N°. ccxlix, ccl, ccliii.) to Gabor or his agent: That he is ſure the latter holds correſpondence with the emperor's reſident, who perhaps has bought him. That this had determin'd him and the other ambaſſadors to apply directly to Gabor himſelf. His caution and ſuſpicions with regard to that prince; but that he has puſh'd the matter ſo far, that he is ſure he muſt fall upon a rock one way or the other. Intimates that he has no help, no inſtructions, that he lives out of the world, is fed with ſcraps and ſtale ends of advices, and is forced to proceed altogether upon his own meditations. Rumours of new troubles. The Tartars and Poles ſuſpected to unite; but is ſure, if they do, they cannot long agree. The emir of Sidon impunely diſpeoples Tripoli. The Perſian war will be renew'd: Every great man in Aſia is bold; that this makes the Porte willing to avoid a breach with the emperor, and diſcourages Gabor; and if ſomething offer not from Chriſtendom, matters may be carry'd another way. Deplores the earl of Southampton's death: That he is the protomartyr of the queen of Bohemia; for that his affection to her cauſe drew him out of his way into the way of death. p. 354.

CCLV. To Sir Edward Conway. A detail of the proceedings mentioned in the preceding letters, N°. ccxlix, cclii, ccliii, ccliv. more at large. That his honour's encouragement to him (See N°. ccxxii.) is too cold and general, when he ſays, he doubts not of good acceptation; and that his actions would then merit moſt, when they produced the greateſt effects: This, Sir Thomas obſerves, is a cautelous and ſtate language; and, under favour, it is very requiſite, where an honeſt man doth induſtriate himſelf for the publick ſervice, that his rules and orders ſhould be plain and direct, and not captious, and convertible into various ſenſes; That ſuch only he deſires to receive, and build upon; that then he knows the duty of obedience as well as any man. That he deſires not his diſcretion ſhould be truſted, knowing his own zeal liable to tranſport him. Lukewarm affections, he ſays, may be ſafe, but are ever unſound. He concludes with the ſtate of affairs in Turkey, as in the preceding N°. ccliv. p. 357.

CCLVI. From Sir Isaac Wake. A curious account of the warlike proceedings and ſucceſſes of the confederated French, Savoyards, and Venetians in the Valteline, and other parts of Italy, againſt the Auſtrians. p. 357.

Propoſitions of the king of Poland to the ſtates of that kingdom, to make war for his recovery of Sweden or Livonia, and to contract a perpetual offenſive and defenſive alliance with the houſe of Auſtria, rejected by the ſaid ſtates. p. 359.

The intrigues of the pope to accommodate matters between thoſe two crowns; And thoſe of the famous capuchin Padre Giacinto Natta, who for ſome years had endeavour'd to negotiate a league among the catholick powers for the univerſal extirpation of hereticks. The weakneſs and ill ſituation of the Spaniſh affairs, every day more and more apparent. Vigorous preparations and reſolutions of the duke of Savoy, the conſtable d'Eſdiguieres, and the Venetians. Proteſtant cantons in Switzerland reſolve to arm, and ſtand on their guard againſt the Auſtrians and the catholick cantons in their party. Smart converſation between the duke of Savoy and the Spaniſh ambaſſador. Duke of Mantua's difficult ſituation between both parties. Prince of Poland arrives incognito at Venice. His reception and behaviour there. Caſtle of Chiavenna ſurrenders to the confederates. p. 364.

Prince of Orange's health declines, yet heads his army in a litter. Great movements of the Imperialiſts to ſupport Spinola in that ſiege. The war in Italy. Dutch ſucceſſes in the South-ſea. Monſieur Soubize and his brother the duke of Rohan reconciled to the French king. Great preparations in Germany againſt the Auſtrians. A magnificent ambaſſy of the duke of Buckingham, who goes proxy of the prince to marry the princeſs of France. Dover caſtle repaired for her reception, and that of the king and prince. A great naval armament equipping in England. Hollanders offer to join it with thirty or forty of their ſhips of war. Sir George Calvert created baron Baltimore, and Sir Albert Moreton ſworn ſecretary in his place.

Other domeſtick occurrences. The king has had nine fits of a tertian ague, and is very weak, at Theobalds. p. 369.

CCLXII. From the Archbiſhop of CANTERBURY. Concluſion of the French marriage. Hopes that the king and prince are more cautious with regard to religion than is reported. Great expences to the nation on the duke of Buckingham's ambaſſy. The ſiege of Breda. Count Mansfelt. Great naval armament of England. Valteline freed. Engliſh agent in Poland comes purpoſely to England to propoſe to draw Gabor againſt the Emperor, and hinder the Pole from ſending Coſſacks to the aid of his imperial majeſty. Not reliſhed at court, but knows not for what reaſon. Sir Robert Anſtruther's ſervices with the Dane, and princes of Saxe. King of Sweden favourable. Quarrel between the duke of Buckingham and the earl of Briſtol. Mr. ſecretary Calvert thought to be much intereſted in the Spaniſh affairs. Removed from his imployments. Diſcontented at it, turns papiſt, being the third time he was faulty this way, as the archbiſhop ſays. Received 3000 l. conſideration from his ſucceſſor on his diſmiſſion, and the king hath made him lord Baltimore, and he is ſetting out to his colony in the Weſt-Indies. King of France proceeds againſt Rochel. Actions of Soubize diſclaimed by the French proteſtants. Intended ſiege of Genoa. His opinion of the Greek Metrophanes. Deaths of three of his majeſty's kinſmen; viz. duke of Richmond, duke of Lenox, and marquis of Hamilton. Alſo of the earls of Nottingham, Dorſet, Thomond and lord Chicheſter, who leave worſe behind them. That when his grace had written thus far, he had notice of the king's illneſs at Theobalds, and went to attend him. That his majeſty departed this life there, March 27, 1625, having made a moſt chriſtian exit. King Charles proclaimed. p. 371.

CCLXIII. To Sir EDWARD CONWAY. Treaty between the Emperor and Gabor broken off. The indifference of the imperial agent thereupon, leaves ſome room of ſuſpicion to Sir Thomas, ſo as to make him ſuſpend his judgment as to the deſigns of that prince. Count Torne propoſes to try to influence Gabor againſt the emperor. Good underſtanding between himſelf and the new Venetian ambaſſador, and the preference he gives to Sir Thomas, diſguſts the French ambaſſador. p. 375.

CCLXIV. To Sir ISAAC WAKE. Some particulars which occaſioned the breach of treaty between Gabor and the Emperor. Reaſons why Gabor ſhould be encouraged by the princes of the union; and wonders at the diſeſteem that he is in with thoſe who might be obliged by his ſervice. Thinks the alliance with ſome houſe of Germany no great prize, in return for the ſervice he could do. That he has thought ſo well of himſelf as to dare under the wings of love to gaze upon one of the eagles of the houſe of Auſtria; and was not ſcratched, but dally'd with, until he became almoſt their prey; and he is perſuaded the emperor will find a kinſwoman to caſt away, if none nearer, to be aſſured thereby to undo him. He underſtands not what this ceremony of greatneſs is, but as there is neither Eaſt nor Weſt, but in reſpect of ſome ſtation. He hath made himſelf a prince; by what arts, ſays he, I think few originals will abide the examination. That the count of Torne is a very fit inſtrument to make ſome overture. That the prince hath declared a good inclination to the alliance of Brandenburgh, and their territories invite ſome ſtricter obligation. That Sir Thomas dare not meddle in the buſineſs; but his lordſhip, Sir Iſaac Wake, may let fall ſome paſſages that may be apprehended, and he thinks it indiſputable that the winning of no prince can be of more uſe in the then conſtitution of the affairs of Germany, than Gabor. He mourns for the raſhneſs and brainſick zeal of the French Proteſtants, (See ccxlvii.) and imputes it to Spaniſh gold, and ſays, that, however, it is no more ſhame for the Proteſtant laicks to be ſubject to that idol, than the head of the Roman hereſy (the pope); and that is his conſolation. p. 374.

CCLXV. To the Lords of COUNCIL. The good fruits of his labours in relation to the Barbary pyrates. Thanks their lordſhips, that by their recommendation he has obtained a promiſe of the money he had required (See N° cxcvii.) for keeping the baſſa of Algier in his government. The French and Dutch ambaſſadors, thro' envy, and becauſe he is ſo attached to the Engliſh, endeavour to procure the fall of that baſſa, and place in his ſtead a creature of their own: But he doubts not to keep him faſt in his ſeat, if he be true to him, till all things requiſite for maintaining the peace with the Engliſh are perfected. That with regard to the motion their lordſhips were pleaſed to make him of longer ſtay in that imployment, ſeeing their lordſhips give him leave to conſider himſelf, he repreſents, that he has lived already eleven years among infidels there and in both Indies, and cannot boaſt of the harveſt. Something elſe he preſumes he is good for; if not, the white hairs, which have ſuddenly over-run him, warn him, that it is time to retire. That he has ſettled for the Levant company their affairs in full order, augmented their privileges, and defended them in all; and finally taken ſuch a particular care of their eſtates, that there is not a man can complain of loſs by debts or bargains in his time; and the way is ſo direct for any other to follow, that he hopes they will not deſire to reward him with a diſcontented life. Such, he profeſſes to lead there, where he lives at continual guard to prevent diſgraces; and when they fall, the remedies for them are baſe, and ſuch as are contrary to an ingenuous nature. That he is perſuaded every day will grow worſe: That juſtice is not to be found where there is no law, or no obedience to that little like it: That his covenant for four years expires in eight months: and tho' he would not tie the company down to a few months, he makes it his humble ſuit to his majeſty and their lordſhips, that he may return with the beſt convenience of the company. p. 376.

CCLXVI. To Sir EDWARD CONWAY. Gabor's doubtful conduct and anſwers. His great warineſs and circumſpection. Ready to take arms upon conditions not wholly unreaſonable. That he has brought the prince to make ſome offer, and open'd a door almoſt ſhut: But that the emperor has procur'd the commiſſioners for peace with him to meet anew. Sir Thomas repeats his conſtant advice with relation to the importance of attaching him to the German league. Is ſorry he has no authority nor inſtructions to come to any concluſion with him, but that he is forced to hold him in play by arts and delays. An obſervation on which he grounds his apprehenſion, that if the opportunity be not now taken, he will be loſt. New effort talked of for a peace between Spain and the Turks. p. 377.

CCLXVII. Letter from Captain QUADT. Written by order of Bethlem Gabor to the Dutch ambaſſador, in direct anſwer to Sir Thomas's (cclii.) with order to ſhew it: that prince being unwilling to make a perſonal anſwer. Containing among other matters, the conditions on which he inſiſts, if he break with the emperor. p. 379.

CCLXVIII. To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. That Gabor's conduct verifies all that Sir Thomas had written: That he might be engaged by the princes of the union, but that it muſt be by effects, on their ſide, and not by words. That now is the time he may be won or loſt for ever. That if he prevaricates, Sir Thomas reſolves to unmask him at Conſtantinople. p. 380.

CCLXIX. From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON. That before the king's death, he had expected a revocation to England; but now returns to his wonted duty of correſponding with him. Gives the death and character of the prince of Orange, which was haſtened by a Jew empirick. The prince's behaviour in his laſt moments. His ſaying of what were the two pillars of Holland. Succeeded by his brother; who was long ſuſpected to be of a different diſpoſition from him. The wretched condition and appearance of the Engliſh ſoldiers in count Mansfelt's army. Treaty with the kings of Denmark and Sweden ſucceſsful.

ceſsful. The States conſul at Algier, complain'd of by Sir Thomas, N° cliv, and ccxlii. proved to be an errant knave in other reſpects, his actions diſavowed, and another to be ſent in his place. p. 380.

CCLXX. From Sir Isaac Wake. A very particular account of the war in the Valteline, againſt Genoa, and other places in Italy belonging to Spain, which is carried on with great ſucceſs by the French, Savoyards, and Venetian confederates; intermingled with curious remarks and comments. p. 382.

CCLXXI. To the Duke of Buckingham. Conſtantinople ſearched for antiquities by himſelf and Mr. Petty, agent for lord Arundel. Deſcription of ſeveral fine pieces on the Porta Aurea, &c. and his deſign'd ſtratagem to procure them. Agrees with Mr. Petty (that they may not interfere with one another) to put all they can jointly get into one ſtock, to be divided, when they arrive in England, between his grace and the earl-marſhal. The black ſtatue from Alexandria, (See N° ccxli, ccxlvi.) and others, he hopes to procure alone, and deſires his grace to accept from himſelf. Preſſes his return; and to grant ſuch a ſucceſſor to the merchants (who are unwilling to part with him) as ſhall be agreeable to them, &c. p. 386.

CCLXXII. To Sir Dudley Carleton, and Sir Isaac Wake, mutatis mutandis. Arrival of Gabor's ambaſſador. The dark and intricate proceedings of that prince make his deſigns and intentions hardly fathomable. Sir Thomas's obſervations and conjectures on the ſubject. p. 387.

CCLXXIII. From Sir Isaac Wake. Further ſucceſſes of the confederate arms in Italy. The Genoeſe ſue for peace, and offer to renounce the friendſhip of Spain, and pay the whole expences of the army againſt them. Mr. ſecretary Conway made a peer. p. 389.

CCLXXIV. To Sir Edward Conway. Further account of the proceedings of the ambaſſador of Gabor at the Porte, and with the reſident ambaſſadors. The ſubtle conduct of that prince. A new rebel near Smyrna. p. 390.

CCLXXV. More ample Particulars of the Conferences between the Ambaſſador of Gabor and Sir Thomas Roe, and the other Reſidents, ſent with the preceding Letters, N° cclxxii, cclxxiv. Shewing the ambiguous warineſs and ſubtlety both of that ambaſſador and his maſter. Sir Thomas's ſuſpicions of Gabor's ſincerity, and the grounds of them. The conduct of the Porte on this occaſion. Emperor's agent uſes his purſe liberally there. Conferences renew'd between the Emperor and Gabor. The latter ſeeks delay, in order to make better advantage on both ſides. Newly diſguſted by the emperor, who, contrary to compact, gives from him the dukedoms of Opolia and Ratibor in Sileſia, fallen to him by the death of the archduke Charles. p. 391.

CCLXXVI. To Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Tranſylvania. With regard to the propoſitions of his ambaſſador, and their conferences mentioned in the preceding account. Endeavours to perſuade him, as there is a correſpondence begun between his highneſs and the French king, to direct himſelf to the fountain-head, the kings of England and France; from whence his highneſs will receive anſwers conformable to his majeſty's greatneſs and wiſdom, and for his own better aſſurance. That in the interim, he will prepare his majeſty by a true and fervent relation of his highneſs's ſincerity. And deſires his highneſs to proportion his demands to equality and poſſibility; but refers the moderation of them to his wiſdom, and the good affection he formerly expreſſed to the liberty of Germany, and the Proteſtant religion oppreſſed there. p. 396.

CCLXXVII. From the Queen of Bohemia. Her affliction for the deaths of her father and the prince of Orange. Her royal brother's profeſſions of kindneſs to her. Her hopes from Denmark and Sweden. A diſcourſe of what he has ſo often wiſhed, a wife for Gabor out of the Brandenburgh Family. Her fears for the town of Breda. New prince of Orange marries the counteſs of Solms, one of her majeſty's women. Thanks his wife, by letter, for her bezoars, ſee ccliii. and him for the fine ones ſhe had received from Sir Thomas Smith (See ccxxiv.) Her good wiſhes for his preferment. Will do him all the good ſhe can with her brother. Thanks him for his verſes on the earl of Southampton's death. (See ccliii) Of an action at Terheydon near Breda, in which the Engliſh got much honour under general Vere and the earl of Oxford. Engliſh Officers killed there. p. 397.

CCLXXVIII. From Sir Isaac Wake. With the proceedings in the war in Italy. p. 398.

CCLXXIX. From Sir Dudley Carleton. Particulars of the action at Terheydon, (mentioned by the queen of Bohemia N° cclxxvii.) undertaken for the relief of Breda. A Dutch man of war taken by ſtratagem by the Dunkirkers. Fears his next letter will give the loſs of Buda. p. 399.

CCLXXX. To Sir Edward Conway. Continuation of the proceedings of Gabor's ambaſſador at the Porte. He gives Sir Thomas reaſon to ſuſpect him; who deals ſo roundly with him, that he thinks fit to render him ſome ſatisfactory account of his proceedings. Gabor's demands of the princes of the union, as written to the French king. Methods uſed by Sir Thomas to penetrate into the truth of Gabor's deſigns, and to prove his ſincerity. The old agent of Tranſylvania runs directly counter to the negotiations of the new, and abates the ſucceſs of his proceedings with the Porte. His comments and obſervations upon the proceedings of Gabor, who, after all, he concludes, will certainly chuſe to ſerve the union, if he can be fitly encouraged from Chriſtendom. The Imperial and Turkiſh commiſſioners agree upon articles of peace. Gabor refuſes them; and, on the chiaus being bribed to delay their diſpatch to Conſtantinople, ſends a copy of them to the Porte, with comments upon the articles, tending to prevail on the grand ſignor to reject them as contrary to his honour and intereſts. Sir Thomas wonders at the emperor's reaſon for carrying himſelf ſo high at that juncture; and believes that if Gabor can be aſſur'd from Chriſtendom, he may be won, having ſo openly oppos'd the emperor in relation to theſe articles; and as he already draws together his forces. p. 400.

CCLXXXI. From Sir Dudley Carleton. With the proceedings in the Low-countries; preparations relating to the great Engliſh fleet fitting out, &c. p. 405.

CCLXXXII. From Sir Isaac Wake. With a continuation of the ſucceſſes of the confederated princes againſt Genoa, and other proceedings in Italy. p. 405.

CCLXXXIII. From Sir Dudley Carleton. Breda taken by the marquis Spinola. Death of the earl of Oxford at the Hague of the camp fever. Motions of the armies in thoſe parts. p. 407.

CCLXXXIV. To the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Sir Thomas is troubled, that his grace doubts how his operations with Gabor may be interpreted, when a fair overture to the ſame effect from Poland (as the archbiſhop informs him N° cclxii.) has been rejected. Is ſatisfy'd in the warrant he has; and anſwers, in a full and convincing manner, all that can be objected by thoſe who are ſcrupulous of making uſe of Gabor. That the Turkiſh commiſſioners for peace with the emperor have been bullied by that prince; and tho' the viſier pretends to be diſguſted with the articles, he is perſuaded they will be accepted, according to an old maxim of the Turkiſh empire, That whenſoever they have wars with the Perſian, they are content to make up all their breaches with Chriſtendom, becauſe they can open them at pleaſure. That, notwithſtanding, there remains ſome hope of Gabor, whoſe diſſimulations, he ſays, are deeper than the ſea, if he be not ſincere. Sir Thomas ſets forth the conſequences of ſlighting that prince at this time, which will be to make him, inſtead of a friend to the union, a dangerous enemy; and the emperor in that caſe will be wholly at liberty to proſecute his deſigns in Lower Germany. Refers his grace to his letters to the ſecretary, and to Gabor, for further ſatisfaction, N° cclxiii, cclxvi, cclxvii, cclxxiv, cclxxv, cclxxvi, cclxxx. p. 408.

CCLXXXV. Relations of Turkiſh Affairs. Diſpoſitions for the Perſian war. Abaſſa's ſtratagem againſt the Perſians, 1000 of whoſe heads he ſends as preſents to Conſtantinople. His conduct, notwithſtanding, ſuſpicious. Tartars make peace with the Poles. Incurſions and ravages of the Coſſacks. Alliance between thoſe two nations apprehended againſt the Turks; who, to watch them, leave the Mediterranean defenceleſs, while, as he obſerves thoſe armadas of Spain, Naples and Sicily, that can offend them, are buſied in preſerving the idol gold of Genoa, which hath drawn the French cannon to ſacrifice before it. Proceedings of a new rebel Janet Ogli, (mentioned N° cclxxiv.) at Smyrna, connived at. He retires, having executed his purpoſes. p. 410.

CCLXXXVI. From Sir Isaac Wake. Prince of Piedmont's deſign upon Savona. Enterprize upon Genoa ſuſpended. The reaſons for it. News of the Valteline. Sir Iſaac is providing at Venice to ſecond Sir Thomas by means of the count de Torne, in his negotiations with Gabor. p. 411.

CCLXXXVII. To Sir Edward Conway. His concern for the death of the king. How the news was received at Conſtantinople by the other Chriſtian ambaſſadors, to whom, at his own expence, he preſented mourning. Compliments never practiſed before by the Turks on the like occaſion, ſent him. Advices in relation to the articles of peace, ſent as concluded by the commiſſioners between the Turks and Imperialiſts. Of Gabor's oppoſition to them, and proteſt againſt them. The viſier blames the baſſa of Buda, as miſunderſtanding his orders. Gives orders that the baſſas on the Imperial confines ſhall draw their forces together; and that Gabor renounce all intelligence with the emperor, and uſe every occaſion for the help of his friends, and the general good. Sir Thomas comments upon theſe myſterious proceedings, and believes Gabor will be let looſe upon the emperor; and offers reaſons why their warineſs at the Porte to give open offence to the Imperialiſts will turn to better account, than if they had declared againſt them. The importance of countenancing Gabor at this juncture. p. 412.

CCLXXXVIII. To the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. The plague at Conſtantinople makes him retire to a monaſtery lent him by the patriarch. Begs his grace to write to that prelate, in acknowledgment of thoſe written to his grace by him, and of his many favours and courteſies to Sir Thomas. That this will give him great advantage in collecting Greek authors, which are loſt to us; and to which that prelate can richly contribute. An old manuſcript of the ſeven firſt councils, which the patriarch has lent him to compare with the edition of Bynius, who pretends to have taken his from that very copy in Arabick. Great defects in Bynius's edition. Sir Thomas's repreſentation to the patriarch, that his ample collections of old books rot and ruſt by him, among ignorant Greeks, who will never make uſe of them, nor underſtand them: That, in right, they belong to the church of God, that will publiſh them, and are weapons fit for champions, not for colloyres: and propoſes to furniſh him, by way of exchange for them, with a complete library of all claſſic authors, and bodies of learning, which the Greek church have not, and which will be of uſe to him, and his ſucceſſors in the patriarchal ſee. He hopes for ſucceſs in this rich traffick, and begs his grace will procure him fit encouragement from his majeſty, or ſome able means, and doubts not to make a good return: That his grace's chaplain will ſend him a catalogue of ſuch authors as are mentioned in any bibliotheque, and not extant. He knows Dr. Goade is able to inſtruct him in two hours for his ſearch for many months. p. 414.

CCLXXXIX. To Sir Edw. Conway. New intrigues ſet on foot by the Spaniards to procure a peace with the Turks. An agent for this purpoſe expected armed with gold, the force of which Sir Thomas fears. The benefit the Spaniards will receive if they can effect this point. That he adviſed his majeſty a year ago of this intention; (See N° cxxxi.) but the true method of prevention was then omitted. Makes ſuit for continuance of a penſion in right of his wife, (See N° xxxv.) which he is jealous will be taken from him. That he has ſpent in this embaſſy of his own money above 1000l. and in former ſervices more than he is now worth, and never received a penny from his majeſty's coffers: That he ſerves his majeſty there with honour, and doubts not, if commanded, but he might with profit alſo; therefore hopes, that inſtead of a recompence, he ſhall not loſe the little he has left. p. 414.

CCXC. From Sir Isaac Wake. The friends of Spain and the emperor reſume courage in Italy. Reflexions upon the conſtable of France for remiſsneſs. He narrowly eſcapes an ambuſcade. Proceedings of the prince of Piedmont againſt the Genoeſe. Other advices from thoſe parts. p. 416.

CCXCI. To Sir Edward Conway. Further particulars in relation to the Spaniſh agent arrived at Conſtantinople. Falls in his reputation. The emperor's agent preſſes the viſier to give him audience. The viſier's ſharp anſwer on that occaſion. The Turks and Spaniards join in one maxim, To regulate their faith by their profit. Suſpicious conjunctures, at that time, which make it neceſſary to watch this agent. Complains of neglect, having received but one letter from any of his majeſty's miniſters in 9 months. Regrets that his letters, written with zeal to his majeſty's ſervice, are not eſteemed, and that his poſt is too far out of the way for their attention. p. 418.

CCXCII. Relations ſent with the above. Janet-Ogli the Natolian rebel (mentioned N° cclxxxv.) again in arms. A ſharp action between the Janizaries and Gebegies, an inferior order of the Turkiſh ſoldiers. The captain baſſa endeavouring to appeaſe them enrages the latter, and at the ſame time diſſatisfies the former. Advices from Aſia, and from Abaſſa baſſa. Conſtantinople afflicted with the plague, earthquakes, ſtorms of hail of prodigious magnitude, thunder and lightning. The ſickneſs grown to that height, that the Turks proclaim their publick proceſſion and prayers uſual when 1000 a day die of it. p. 419.

CCXCIII. To the Dutch Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople. From Halchys, in the Gulph of Nicomedia, the Place of his Retirement on account of the Plague. In anſwer to a letter from that ambaſſador, communicating the draught of one ſent by Gabor, to the four reſidents, to ſign in their maſters names for procuring him liberty from the Porte to unite with other Chriſtian princes againſt the emperor. Sir Thomas finds in this draught two faults; one of exceſs, the other of defect; which he particularizes, and gives very cogent reaſons on the heads they write to him about, which, however, he ſubmits to their judgments. p. 420.

CCXCIV. To Sir Edward Conway. He diſcovers and deſcribes the Spaniſh agent, and his buſineſs and inſtructions. Gabor, at the viſier's deſire, gives his reaſons againſt the Turks approving of the new treaty of Buda. That prince's ſound advice to the Ottomans on the part it is their intereſt to act, in relation to the Imperialiſts. His propoſals in favour of the Palatine family, and princes of the union. Sir Thomas's obſervations thereupon, and his concluſion in favour of the propoſals of Gabor, which he ſays, will ſhorten the recovery of the Palatinate, without prejudice or ſcandal. p. 422.

CCXCV. The articles of peace treated at Buda, as publiſhed by authority at Vienna. p. 425.

CCXCVI. Relations ſent with the preceding Letter. The princes of Georgia deſert the Perſians, and put themſelves under protection of the Turks. The occaſion of it, and ſome account of thoſe princes and that country. They elect, contrary to their laws, a woman for their ſovereign. A great overthrow of part of the Turkiſh fleete by the Coſſacks. The captain baſſa himſelf, with the reſt of the fleet, attacked and in danger from the Coſſacks. CCXCIX. To Sir Edward Conway. Is grieved that he can obtain no anſwer or inſtruction from England, in relation to his conduct with Gabor, who is now almoſt loſt again. That Sir Thomas doubts not he will be deceived again in his hopes of an Auſtrian wife; and if ſo, that he will aſſuredly break all contracts with the emperor, and riſe againſt him. The treaty with Spain advances at the Porte, on the large promiſes and undertakings of the Spaniards, who offer to furniſh Turkey with all European commodities, at eaſier rates than they have them from any other Frank nation, and undertake to pay 75000 dollars yearly for cuſtoms inward, and, if admitted to trade to the ports of Mocha, Judde, and Cairo in the Red-ſea, will ſupply all Eaſt-Indian commodities, and return the current of the Eaſtern trades by thoſe ports, to the great advantage of Turkey. That tho' they may not be able to effect thoſe things, yet ſomewhat ſhould be done in oppoſition, for the ſake of our Eaſt-India and Levant merchants, &c. p. 430.

CCC. Relations of Turkiſh Affairs ſent with the above Letter. Janet-Ogli the Natolian rebel, (See Nº cclxxxv. and ccxcii.) defeats ſome troops ſent againſt him from Smyrna, and marches for that city, pretending authority from the grand ſignor. Abaſſa baſſa ſaid to have ranſacked the rich caravan returning from Perſia, which till then was always unmoleſted, tho' in time of war, by both parties. CCCIII. To the Duke of Buckingham. The fine black ſtatue mentioned Nº ccxli, ccxlvi, and cclxxi. to his great ſhame and vexation, ſold 18 months before, to the French conſul for 30 dollars; yet hopes his grace may recover it without much charge. Account of his diligence with regard to procuring other pieces of antiquity. That ſeveral he had mentioned before (on Porta Aurea, Nº cclxxi.) cannot be removed, nor ſtolen; but hopes that by art they may be made to drop, and then he may gather them up privately. Proceedings of Mr. Petty in ſearch of antiquities; that gentleman a cloſe and ſubtle borderer, who brags not of his acquiſitions; but ſhall not outbuy him in caſe of competition. That he has walked there, with reſpect to his embaſſy, in Egyptian darkneſs, without anſwer or inſtructions, or any other guide but his own zeal, and hopes he ſhall not err where he would merit. Begs directions for his conduct. p. 433.

CCCIV. To the Lord Conway. With a brief of the grand ſignor's licence for Gabor to unite with the Chriſtian princes againſt the emperor; procured by Gabor's agent, aſſiſted by the ambaſſadors. (See Nº ccxciii, ccxciv.) That it has been brought about with much labour, and if it ſerve no other turn, it will at leaſt ſtartle the emperor; but is a fair gate opened, if his majeſty have uſe of ſuch an help. p. 434.

CCCVII. To the Lord Conway. He ſends a copy at length of the grand ſignor's letter licenſing Gabor's union with the Chriſtian princes, tranſlated verbatim. (See Nº ccciv.) That Gabor by this proceeding has expoſed himſelf to the emperor's reſentment; but yet that he will not break with him, unleſs he has ſome encouragement from the kings of England and France. That from the 1ſt of Auguſt to the 3d. 8900 perſons have dy'd of the plague in Conſtantinople. That ſince June to September 15. 140,000 have dy'd there beſides thoſe in the out-towns on the Boſphorus, whither many fled. That this has been followed by a ſtorm the like of which he never knew. Janet-Ogli (See Nº cclxxxv, ccxcii, and ccc.) defeated. p. 437.

CCCVIII. From Mr. Wilkinson. Relating to the ſiege of Verrue, &c. The French ambaſſador in Rome reſents the pope's partiality for Spain, and makes the pontiff more wary. p. 438.

CCCIX. To the Lord Conway. Extracts from the letter of Gabor's agent to Sir Thomas in relation to the grand ſignor's licence to his maſter. (Nº ccciv, and cccvi.) His acknowledgment of the ſervice done him by money advanced by Sir Thomas, which he hopes his majeſty will allow. The captain baſſa's triumphant entry for an advantage gained over the Coſſacks, who had like to have ruined the whole Turkiſh fleet. The heads of above 1000 of Janet-Ogli's followers brought to Conſtantinople, and himſelf reported to be taken. The grand viſier marches to beſiege Babylon. The tefterdar, or great treaſurer, ſtrangled in the ſeraglio. That the ſickneſs is ſo much abated, that he thinks of returning to his houſe to watch the Spaniſh treaty, which, if it ſucceed, will deſtroy all our Southern and Eaſtern trades. p. 439.

Manſfelt's army imbarks to join the king of Denmark. Proceedings of Tilly and Walleſtien. The princes of Lower-Saxony begin to ſtir. The Rochellers defeated both by ſea and land, by the aid of the Hollanders. The pulpits ring there againſt this aid; and La Baya in Braſil being loſt as well as Breda, they are cenſured for being ſo faint and improvident againſt their enemies, when they employ both coſt and courage againſt their friends. That Sir Robert Killigrew is nominated to ſucceed him, Sir Dudley, at the Hague; and if the queen of Bohemia's wiſhes could take place, Sir Thomas might be ſeen in the tranſplantation of foreign miniſters. Death of Mr. ſecretary Morton; who is ſucceeded by Sir John Cooke. p. 441.

CCCXIII. To the Patriarch of Conſtantinople. With father Paul's hiſtory of the council of Trent. Sir Thomas gives a fine encomium of that performance. Its advantageous recommendation to the patronage of king James I. That the book is of ſtill greater value, as it ſets in its proper light the council of Trent, in which the Papiſts do ſo greatly glory. Exhorts the patriarch to bring to light invaluable works, which now hid in cheſts, might be of uſe to the church of God, and aſſiſt to clear up divers controverted points. p. 442.

CCCXV. To the Earl of Arundel. That he has been forced to retire from Conſtantinople on account of the plague, which had carry'd off near 200,000 people. Account of the proceedings of Mr. Petty, his lordſhip's agent, in ſearch of antiquities. Complains of his unfair practices, after they had agreed to divide the curioſities they could procure (See N°. cclxxi.) How ſerviceable he has been to Mr. Petty. Sir Thomas's free and open conduct with his lordſhip, as to what he had undertaken for the duke of Buckingham, and of the agreement between him and Mr. Petty, who could do nothing without him. His endeavours in relation to the ſix relievo's at the Porta Aurea of Conſtantinople (See N°. cclxxi.). Mr. Petty's dealing with him in relation to them. The almoſt inſuperable difficulties in procuring them. Yet if he does not do it, he will pronounce that no man nor ambaſſador ſhall ever be able to do it. That Mr. Petty, after all this, having loſt his letters procured by Sir Thomas, and his collections, in a ſhipwreck, (which he was endeavouring to fiſh up) writes to Sir Thomas to procure him other commands from the Porte to their governors to ſerve him, or he could proceed no further. That this, tho' the third time he had got them renew'd for him in little more than a year, to the jealouſy of the Turks, he had obtained by a bribe, and will ſend him, as ſoon as he hears where he is, as alſo an invitation for him to come and winter with him at his houſe. Engages that he will do ſomewhat in thoſe ſearches on his own ſingle foot, that ſhall ſhew his lordſhip how fairly he intended to deal by him. A great injury done to the Levant company by the Venetian conſul, which he ſhall appeal to his majeſty and council, and deſires his lordſhip's intereſt there on that occaſion. p. 444.

CCCXVI. To the Lords of the Council. An appeal to their lordſhips in relation to a publick injury done to the Levant company by the Venetian conſul at Aleppo (See the ſtate of this controverſy in the ſucceeding number). The ſteps Sir Thomas takes to procure its redreſs, before he appeals. That it is eaſy for him to repay them in their own coin; but, for wiſe reaſons, which he gives, he has forborn it. That his majeſty will be pleaſed to give ſentence in favour of his ſubjects, by means of Sir Iſaac Wake at Venice; and if the Venetians refuſe to do juſtice, and he may have licence, he will take it at Conſtantinople upon them, and make them know the odds of the weapons he has declined to uſe for Chriſtian reſpects. Propoſal to remedy this abuſe for the future, and reaſons for it. Begs, as the injury is of ſo premeditated and fraudulent a nature, that their lordſhips will be more ſevere in reſenting it. Inconveniences and miſchiefs attending the practice of the Genoeſe, to procure ſhips out of the Thames for the Spaniards, of which he had complain'd to lords Baltimore and Conway a year ago, (See N°. cxcvi.) and now repeats. That the liberty taken in this inſtance for his majeſty's ſubjects, to trade under the colours of other princes, will deſtroy all our trade in the Levant. p. 446.

Proofs of the right and cuſtom of conſulage. p. 449.

Reaſons of equity why they ſhould pay conſulage. ibid.

General reaſons why no Engliſhman ſhould preſume to wear the colours of another nation; eſpecially where his majeſty's miniſters are maintained to protect them. p. 450.

Particular reaſons in this controverſy to puniſh the contumacy of Nathanael Goodlade, the maſter of the ſhip treſpaſſing. p. 451.

CCCXVII. To the Lord Conway. That the Spaniſh agent had got many powerful friends in and out of the ſeraglio; but that the chimacham would not admit him to an audience. Sir Thomas opens the eyes of the mufti and other great miniſters on this occaſion, by a curious diſcourſe in anſwer to the propoſal of the Spaniard, mentioned N°. ccxcix. That agent of a ſudden diſappears without gaining his point, and full of indignation and threats againſt Sir Thomas. His vanity and inſolence much help to deſtroy the ends for which he came. That while he was at Conſtantinople, ſeeking to procure a treaty for Spain with the Porte, he treacherouſly endeavours to excite the Coſſacks againſt the Turks, in order to hinder their appearing in the Mediterranean, to interrupt the Spaniſh fleet in their deſigns on the other Chriſtian princes. That tho' this implement is gone away in deſperation, yet there is the more danger of the deſign ſucceeding, becauſe it is put into the hands of the imperial agent, who will have more intereſt at the porte to bring it about. That if his majeſty would have this treaty oppoſed, he, Sir Thomas, muſt have ſome order and direction for that purpoſe; having in this, and the affairs of Hungary, written forty letters, and expected for two years inſtructions, in vain. That much money is conſumed in many attempts, which he cenſures not; but is able to make appear, that a little this way, eſpecially upon Gabor, would induce a more ſerviceable diverſion than that ſlow and long-expected one from the princes of Lower Saxony. Gabor greatly courted by the emperor. That, notwithſtanding, he makes ſuch motions with his troops, as give the imperialiſts great apprehenſions. The aſſaſſination of Petrus Zechius, the chief baron of Hungary, as he was going to confer with Gabor, ſuppoſed to be perpetrated by an emiſſary of the emperor imploy'd as a ſpy in that lord's train. The emperor refuſes his daughter to Gabor on pretence of his religion; and ſeeks to divert him from his deſign of procuring the elector of Brandenburgh's ſiſter for a wife, by propoſing a match with the daughter of the duke of Nevers in France. Gabor orders his agent at Conſtantinople to inquire about the quality and eſtate of that duke, of Sir Thomas; who ſhews the deep deſign of the Auſtrians to amuſe and deceive him, and at the ſame time injure him with the Turks. p. 452.

CCCXVIII. Sir Thomas's diſcourſe about the projected Spaniſh treaty, given to the chimacham, &c. ſetting forth in a very curious manner, the deluſions, deſigns and impracticable pretenſions of the Spaniards; in reſpect to their offers to the Turkiſh Court: viz. 1. To ſet free all the Turkiſh ſlaves; 2dly, To keep the ſea from all damage to be done the grand ſignor's ſubjects, or elſe make good their loſs; 3dly, To ſerve the Turks by the Red ſea or Ormus, cheaper than any others, with the commodities of India, and pay the grand ſignor great impoſts; 4thly, To pay a great ſum for cuſtoms to the grand ſignor, and ſupply more goods of the European markets, and at better rates, than now is done by the Engliſh, French, and Venetians; 5thly, To procure the king of Poland to keep in the Coſſacks (See N° ccxcix.). He ſhews, in a convinceing manner, the abſurdity of theſe propoſals, and infers that they can mean only to temporize and deceive; and that the uſe they at preſent make of this attempt, is only to publiſh thro' Chriſtendom, that the grand ſignor has ſent to beg a peace of them. That if this treaty proceed, the Auſtrians will join all their forces to oppreſs the princes of Germany; poſſeſs the paſſages of Italy; and expel Gabor from Hungary and Tranſylvania; and then they will be at liberty to ſhew what friendſhip they have purpoſed for the grand ſignor; and will moreover precipitate the princes of Germany into a peace with Spain upon the beſt terms they can get. p. 456.

CCCXIX. To Sir Dudley Carleton. King of Poland ſends an army againſt the Coſſacks, to the pleaſure of the Turks, but to the diſpleaſure of others. The Turks gain ſome advantages over the Perſians. King of Perſia reported to be taken ill; an uſual policy in him when he has ſome great deſign in view. p. 457.

CCCXX. To the Queen of Bohemia. Complains very heavily of the neglect his endeavours meet with at the Engliſh court. When the clock ſtrikes, he ſays, tho' it hath but one tale every twenty-four hours repeated, yet ſomebody vouchſafes to tell it; but he knows not whether he be heard or not. He thinks her majeſty may find ſome way or other to procure ſome anſwer, or that the ſtate take all omiſſion and ſilence for better ſervice. He then adviſes that Gabor has again taken arms, and that the propoſal of the emperor for giving him a wife, is full of fraud and deep deceit (See N°. cccxvii.); that the king of Bohemia will ſet about counterworking the project, and effecting the match with the ſiſter of the elector of Brandenburgh. He is worn out with Turkiſh injuſtice and oppreſſions; but hopes the time of his redemption draws near. p. 458.

CCCXXI. From Mr. Wilkinson. With the affairs of Italy. p. 459.

CCCXXII. From the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Account of the great plague in London. The parliament adjourned to Oxford, not with their liking. It falls upon the duke of Buckingham, and is diſſolved with ill blood. League with Holland offenſive and defenſive. Repriſals to the value of 200,000 l. upon the Spaniſh ſhips. Mansfelt newly ſupply'd. King of Denmark gains a great advantage over Tilly. Why he muſt not wonder he has not circumſtantial directions in relation to Gabor. That many of the French miniſters are in the Spaniſh intereſt, and he is afraid they will deſert the duke of Savoy. Fears there will be little hopes from that quarter of aſſiſtance; which the king of Denmark foreſaw, wiſhing that we ſhould confide on none but thoſe of the reformed religion. The French not to be prevailed on by the Engliſh court to forbear oppreſſing the Proteſtants of that country, which takes up all their attention. Wonders not at the Spaniards endeavouring to conclude a treaty with the Ottomans; they making conſcience of nothing to gain their ends. That they hate us perfectly, and by the credulity of king James have gained much upon us in Germany. Prays to God for ſound counſel now againſt them. He now writes to the patriarch, as Sir Thomas deſir'd N°. cclxxxviii, and marvellouſly approves of his trafficking with him for his Greek copies. That it will be unfit to trouble the king on that ſubject; but he will ſtrain ſome other way, and deſires to know what ſatisfaction may be expected for them. That his noble friend the lord Carew had had the palſey, and was forced to go to Bath for it; but he thanks God is well return'd to Noneſuch. Duke of Bucks gone into Holland. That Mansfelt and the duke of Brunſwick have join'd with the Danes. That one Sir Thomas Philips preſſes hard to be his ſucceſſor in the Turkiſh embaſſy: That a great man, who formerly ſent Sir John Eyre thither, will have it ſo. p. 459.

CCCXXIII. From the Lord Conway. Signifying the king's conſtancy in his reſolutions for recovery of the Palatinate: That beſides ſetting up count Mansfelt by a contribution of 30,000 l. a month, ſetting forth a royal fleet, concluding with Holland a league offenſive and defenſive againſt Spain, his majeſty hath now ſent the duke of Buckingham and the earl of Holland to the Hague, as ambaſſadors extraordinary to meet with thoſe of France, Denmark, Sweden, Brandenburgh, &c. to treat of an union and league offenſive and defenſive for reſtoring the liberty of Germany, &c. That from theſe generalities he will eaſily collect how well and uſefully he has employ'd himſelf to keep up Bethlem Gabor, and to incline him to action; of which by his ſeveral letters and diſpatches, he has given a moſt exact and wiſe account. That he muſt aſſure him not only of his majeſty's gracious acceptation and approbation of his whole negotiation therein; but alſo that it hath much improved him in his majeſty's favour and good opinion, who obſerving his diſcreet and dextrous handling of this buſineſs, takes thereby knowledge of his great abilities and fitneſs for the greateſt employments. That he may confidently proceed, and take all occaſions, which ſhall reaſonably and fairly preſent, to foment that diverſion by Bethlem Gabor, the importance whereof he has wiſely obſerved. That conſidering Gabor's own intereſts and ambitions, the good ſatisfaction which they hear his agent returns with from France, and the ſtrong attempts which will be made both by ſea and land, in ſeveral places, upon the Auſtrians, (of which he, Sir Thomas, may aſſure him) it is conceived he will be eaſily perſuaded to enter into the quarrel, and not expect much invitations, or aſſiſtance in money; ſeeing, as he ſays, the armies at land, and fleets at ſea, will take up whatſoever can be found, and that by them great advantages will be offer'd him, and himſelf ſecured againſt his enemies. The ſecretary then in cypher tells him, that what he has advertiſed them of, relating to the Spaniſh overtures at Conſtantinople, (See N°. ccxcix, cccix, and cccxvii.) has been well weighed, and the conſequence thereof; and as his majeſty expects that he ſhould with the utmoſt art and induſtry oppoſe the ſame; ſo he doubts not, that all the ambaſſadors reſident there, will effectually concur with him in it, eſpecially the Venetian, whoſe maſters intereſts are neareſt and greateſt; and that to this they ſhall be quickened. He then gives Sir Thomas a brief account of the ſtate of affairs as they then ſtood in England and abroad, in relation to the fleet; to their apprehenſions of Spaniſh attempts upon the Engliſh coaſts or Ireland; to the deſtruction made by the Dunkirkers among the Holland buſſes, to the damage of two millions of florins; He acquaints him with ſevere proclamations iſſued againſt popiſh prieſts and jeſuits: That orders have been iſſued to diſarm recuſants, and for all others to furniſh themſelves with arms, according to their conditions, for the publick defence. Of the diſſolution of the Oxford parliament, without giving requiſite ſupplies; whereby his majeſty had been obliged to get in money by way of loans and privy ſeals. Of monſieur de Soubize then in England. Of the king's endeavours in France for the return of his ſhip and the ſeven merchants ſhips lent that king the preceding ſummer, there being no intention that they ſhould be uſed for blocking up of Rochel; and alſo to diſpoſe him to a peace with his proteſtant ſubjects. He informs him of the king of Denmark's ſucceſſes againſt Tilly; and proceedings of other princes in thoſe parts. And then tells him, that with regard to Sir Thomas's private affair, he has at his requeſt, and by command of his noble lady, moved his majeſty touching the penſion (See N°. xxxv, and cclxxxix.) who had graciouſly and chearfully anſwer'd, that tho' his occaſions might preſs him to make ſtop of ſome, yet his purpoſe was, that that ſhould be paid. That upon this aſſurance, he had ſpoke to the lord treaſurer, who aſſur'd him of his good will and readineſs to give him ſatisfaction. That he had likewiſe repreſented to the king the honour Sir Thomas had done him, in ſending mourning to the ambaſſadors reſident at Conſtantinople (See N°. cclxxxvii.) on occaſion of his royal father's demiſe. That his majeſty hath been pleaſed to give him a privy ſeal for 200 l. on that conſideration: no other ambaſſador having had more than 150 l. p. 461.

CCCXXIV. His majeſty's inſtructions to the duke of Buckingham and earl of Holland for their conduct at the Hague, in the congreſs to be held there with the ambaſſadors of the other princes for forming a league againſt the houſe of Auſtria. p. 463.

Hague, betwixt England, Denmark, and Holland. p. 464.

CCCXXVI. Ratifications of the ſaid three powers to the treaty. p. 467.

CCCXXVII. Secret articles relating to the ſame. p. 468.

CCCXXVIII. Inſtructions given by cardinal Bandini, to ſignor Canacchio Roſſi *, viz. that the church of Rome had long deſired an union with the Eaſtern church: That it is reported the preſent patriarch denies the invocation of ſaints, the worſhip of the images and relicks of ſaints, the real preſence, authority of councils, and traditions, and the fathers, likewiſe the neceſſity of auricular confeſſions; that he has introduced a publick and general confeſſion inſtead of it: That he ſends the youth to the univerſities of England and Germany, where this doctrine is taught, in order to propagate it in the Levant. That to this end he has diſtributed among the biſhops a catechiſm full of theſe and ſuch-like errors, contrary to his own profeſſion of faith, &c. That at the inſtance of Hugonot ambaſſadors, with whom he freely communicates, he has taken away the ſynod, and pays no reverence to the euchariſt. That the cardinal wiſhes this charge may be proved groundleſs; but if there be no foundation for it, it is deſir'd that he would clear himſelf before the French or Imperial ambaſſador, and by their means tranſmit to Rome a confeſſion of his faith, and if he approved of the council of Florence, and with that council condemned, as his predeceſſors had done, the errors of the Calviniſts and Lutherans: In which caſe they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to re-eſtabliſh the church of Conſtantinople, and all the reſt that depend upon him. p. 470.

CCCXXIX. † To the Patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE. That the Dutch embaſſador was of opinion, that to avoid the conſequences of the ſnare laid by the Papiſts, the patriarch ſhould procure a letter from the Venetian ambaſſador of his intire attachment to the rites of the Greek church: Sir Thomas's opinion and advice upon the matter. He tells him, That the confeſſion required of him to be made before the Imperial and French miniſters, might greatly incommode him. That the Romaniſts never ſcruple to diſavow their own demands, when they find them unſucceſsful: That the cardinal's letter is not directed to the patriarch, but to a notary by a third perſon; wherefore any anſwer the patriarch can make, will be deemed inſufficient: That it is eaſier to tell what is not to be done, than what is. That the errand of the youth (Canacchio Roſſi) ſhould be either protracted, or entirely deſpiſed: That his own faith ſhould be inquir'd into, and whether he was of the Greek or Roman church, and ſo that he might be intangled. That the Chriſtian princes ſhould have information of this plot; for that every ambaſſador who promotes the intereſts of the Pope and Spain, is wanting in his duty to his own maſter and his allies. That he would endeavour to procure letters from his majeſty in his favour, and omit nothing which may ſhew his affection to the patriarch, &c. p. 469.

CCCXXX. To the Lord CONWAY. Conference between the new ambaſſador of Tranſylvania and Sir Thomas; in relation to the little notice taken of his majeſty's propoſals for the ſervice of the princes of the union; which Sir Thomas excuſes in as good a manner as poſſible, adviſing Gabor to apply himſelf to the fountain-head for a reſolution of thoſe matters. The ambaſſador acquaints him with Gabor's ſteadineſs. Concluſion of his marriage with the princeſs of Brandenburgh, and other affairs relating to Germany, &c. Sir Thomas wonders, upon the whole, to lord Conway, that he has received no directions in relation to overtures ſo beneficial to the common cauſe; and deſires to have ſo much credit as to be intruſted, and to be able to give ſome anſwer; in which only he ſinks, and is of leſs value than all the other reſidents, whoſe maſters eſteem them ſerviceable, and afford them the comfort of their commands, &c. p. 471.

Excuſing (conformably to N°. cccxxx.) the delays that have been made in anſwering his propoſitions; encouraging his application directly to the Engliſh court. Touching with great delicacy on the ſuppos'd treachery of his agent at the porte: (See N°. cccxxxii.) Congratulating his intended marriage with a Proteſtant princeſs, &c. p. 478.

CCCXXXVII. To the Lord CONWAY. Gabor augments his forces, on a jealouſy that the emperor will endeavour to hinder the paſſage of the princeſs of Brandenburgh to him. That the French ambaſſador has received an anſwer from his court in relation to Gabor's propoſitions made thereto; but Sir Thomas having received no orders from his court on that ſubject, that ambaſſador feigns indiſpoſition to excuſe himſelf from communicating it to him and the Venetian bailo; tho' he owns he has orders for ſuch communication. Sir Thomas, from the neglects he meets with from his own court, concludes that he is not a fit inſtrument to be imploy'd on this occaſion, and will trouble his lordſhip no further with this matter, till he receives command or encouragement. p. 479.

CCCXXXVIII. Relations of the Turkiſh Affairs. The Turks beſiege Babylon. The Perſians cut to pieces a great number of them. The Arab princes ſubject to the grand ſignor, ſuſpend their aſſiſtance till they ſee the iſſue of this ſiege, and rob and plunder all caravans. King of Poland makes ſome ſhew of puniſhing the Coſſacks who had invaded the Turkiſh territories. p. 480.

* For the better underſtanding of this piece, and the important affair on which it was grounded, it may be proper to obſerve, that the Papiſts (and Jeſuits particularly) who were implacable enemies of the patriarch, and had once procur'd his diſgrace and depoſition, (See No. lxxviii. and xcvi.) were continually at work to ruin him: And now they ſend a young Greek, to inſnare him, to whom they gave the above inſtructions for that purpoſe. Sir Thomas explains this matter, by the following indorſement on the piece which we have printed, p. 470. viz. "Inſtructions given to Canacchio Roſſi, "a Greek, brought up in the Greek college in Rome; a forward ſpirit, undertaking to reconcile the Greek church "to the pope: Sent to Conſtantinople by the cardinal Bandini, protector of the Eaſt, by the council of the college "de propaganda fide, to intrap the patriarch. Whereupon, "ſays Sir Thomas, he came to my houſe, Octob. 26, 1625, "and gave me the writing, deſiring it might be regiſter'd "in my cancellaria; and to ask my opinion how to proceed: In both which I gave the advice that was convenient." (See N°. cccxxix. p. 469.)

† N. B. This is placed, p. 469. before the above inſtructions; but will be beſt underſtood, if read after them, as in theſe contents.

CCCXXXIX. To the Lord CONWAY. The boaſts of the imperial agent of the archduke being elected king of Hungary. The miniſters of Gabor lay the fault, if it be true, and their maſter has connived at it, upon the want of countenance from the princes of the union: That this buſineſs is an abyſs; and that his majeſty, he doubts not, has long ſince reſolved what to do in it, tho' he is unworthy to know it. p. 480.

CCCXLI. To Mr. WILKINSON. Sir Thomas further ſtates the controverſy in relation to Goodlade, and the Engliſh and Venetian conſuls, mention'd above; on occaſion of its being referr'd to Mr. Wilkinſon's negotiation at Venice: That if he cannot procure juſtice, he will retaliate upon them their unjuſt and injurious treatment at Conſtantinople. p. 481.

CCCXLII. From Sir ISAAC WAKE. Further account of Goodlade's conduct. That he muſt expect no juſtice in Venice; on the contrary, that they have complain'd to his majeſty, as if they were ſufferers, where they are the aggreſſors, in hopes, that thro' the multiplicity of buſineſs at the Engliſh court, it may be bury'd in oblivion; and therefore thinks it beſt for Sir Thomas to right himſelf upon them at Conſtantinople. He expects no juſtice himſelf at Venice, in relation to Goodlade's injurious reports about him; but hopes for it in England, when Goodlade ſhall arrive there. That Sir Thomas's advices in relation to Gabor are very important, and that at Venice they ground much upon the diverſion he is able to make. Refers him for the news of Italy to his nephew Wilkinſon. p. 482.

CCCXLIV. From the ſame. An agent from Gabor arrives at Venice: The news of Italy, and in relation to Goodlade's affair. p. 484.

CCCXLV. To the KING. That what he has ſucceſsfully negotiated in relation to Gabor, and in oppoſition to the Spaniſh intrigues at the Porte, he hopes has been for his majeſty's ſervice: But knows he is unworthy of his majeſty's commands, and rather expects to be called home as an unprofitable ſervant, than imploy'd; yet having begun, it ſhall be his honour to finiſh any thing in his majeſty's ſervice; and whatſoever ſhall be his royal pleaſure, ſhall nouriſh his obedience, and be his content, &c. p. 485.

CCCXLVI. To the Lord CONWAY; ſent with the above to the KING. The French ambaſſador, after a month's delay, to ſerve his own ends (See cccxxxvii.) demands of Sir Thomas, if he has yet received any directions about Gabor's propoſals; and Sir Thomas anſwering, No, he wonders at it: Then communicates to him, That his court had approved of Gabor's propoſitions, &c. and had impower'd him to perfect the treaty on the French part, and to engage for payment of their proportion of money; but that if Sir Thomas had not the like authority from England, he could not proceed. And that he had alſo orders to unite with Sir Thomas in oppoſing the Spaniſh treaty at the Porte, &c. Sir Thomas anſwers, That having received no directions, he believed his majeſty would reſolve upon ſome nearer way, and knew him unworthy or unfit for ſo great affairs; but till prohibited, he would conform to him and the bailo, in every thing relating to thoſe affairs, which he thought promotive of his maſter's ſervice. He takes notice to the ſecretary, how happy the French ambaſſador is to have credit with his maſter, and receives honour by this negotiation, tho' he came into the vineyard only at the eleventh hour; that he is the more ſenſible of his own ſhame, becauſe, he ſays, it proceeds from his own demerit; but yet ſhall have comfort in his own labour, tho' others have the honour of it; for that it is wholly owing to him, if ſucceſs attend this negotiation. That the Turkiſh miniſtry begin to murmur, that no letter is yet come from England, on the acceſſion of the king, for renewing the amity between the two nations. That he knows not on what terms he ſtands, as to his own return: That he hears his ſucceſſor is ready to depart from England; but that he ſhould have held it an honour to have deliver'd the compliment for the concluſion of affairs of trade there, by him reſtored, and brought into order. That doubt is the worſt of conditions; and he has been alſo held in that ſtate by the merchants.---He then gives the publick occurrences in thoſe parts; with relation to the ſiege of Babylon; the inſolencies of the ſoldiery in Conſtantinople; to a quarrel between the Algerines and the Tuniſians; that the Tartars have again made an irruption into Poland: The bad conduct of his Poliſh majeſty, to puniſh the Coſſacks, his old friends, for the ſake of the Tartars his inveterate enemies. (See N°. cccxxxviii.) The Coſſacks hereupon join with the Tartars againſt Poland, to purchaſe the han's connivance of their new-intended attempts in the Black-ſea againſt the Turks. That this imploys the captain baſſa, and leaves the Spaniards at liberty to do what they pleaſe in the Mediterranean. Death of Radula, prince of Bugdania. A new prince made in his room, a ſtranger to the blood and race, contrary to the uſual law and practice, which may probably produce commotions. p. 485.

CCCXLVII. To the Archbiſhop of CANTERBURY. He gives his grace the full particulars of the Romiſh deſigns againſt the patriarch of Conſtantinople, (See N°. cccxxviii, cccxxix.) and of his own counſels to, and proceedings with, that prelate on the occaſion. The artful and baſe part of ſignor Canacchio Roſſi, to ruin the patriarch, when he found he could not ſucceed. The patriarch's danger thereupon. Sir Thomas interpoſes with the grand viſier in his favour, and diſcovers to him the deep and dangerous deſigns of the Romaniſts in this attempt; which for the preſent fruſtrates their machinations againſt the patriarch, and (by the help of money) reſtores him. The Porte afraid to puniſh them, or aſſert its own authority violated by them in their own territories. p. 489.

CCCLI. To the ſame. The reſidents at Conſtantinople chuſe Sir Thomas to manage the affair of oppoſing the new movements for the Spaniſh treaty at the Porte; tho', he ſays, he is the moſt unprovided for it, having no expreſs warrant for ſuch oppoſition, nor orders to diſburſe money on the occaſion. The method he falls upon moſt effectually to diſappoint the Spaniards intrigues, and to countermine them, by the men of the law, or clergy, at the Porte; and the reaſons for it. That he has not heard from England in five months, nor from the king in a whole year, ſo that he is utterly diſabled, and fears to loſe a fair harveſt. CCCLIII. From Lord CONWAY. Repeats the ſatisfaction taken in England on his conduct with Gabor, &c. (See N°. cccxxiii.) That Gabor's principal demand being money, and the king at great expence to maintain Mansfelt, aſſiſt the Dane, and to ſet out a fleet, there was no means left to anſwer that demand: That, beſides, his majeſty held not the Porte a place proper to carry on ſuch a negotiation, as Sir Thomas had wiſely obſerved, and moreover expected a particular meſſenger from Gabor, as he had ſent one to France: Yet that his majeſty never undervalued his diligence, or abilities to manage this, or any other great affair, in places and times fit and ſeaſonable. That Gabor had been invited to ſend an ambaſſador to the Hague to meet with thoſe of the other princes: That notwithſtanding the ill ſucceſs of the Engliſh fleet, his majeſty perſiſted in his reſolution to act offenſively as well as defenſively againſt Spain and the houſe of Auſtria: That he expected liberal aids on this occaſion from parliament. That whatever he (Sir Thomas) can fitly do to keep Gabor ſteady, and to break the Spaniſh treaty with the Porte, will be well taken, and anſwer the king's intentions, as he ſhall ſoon particularly underſtand, by letters ſent to him over land. That there hath been much diſpute about his continuance at the Porte, or his revocation: That if he had deſired it, his majeſty would have continued him; but that the contrary appearing, the king, at the inſtance of the duke of Bucks, had named Sir Thomas Phillips to ſucceed him: That his return, he doubts not, will be for his advantage, anſwerable to his merit; and promiſes to contribute to it all in his power, &c. That he ſhould have wrote ſooner, had he not for ſix weeks been confined to his chamber by a fever. p. 492.

CCCLVI. To Sir ISAAC WAKE. New cauſe of quarrel between the Turks and Venetians; owing to two Engliſh ſhips which were compell'd by the governor of Zant to fetch corn from the Arches, and committed inſults on the Turks; who pretend great damage upon it. That the Venetians act very extraordinarily not only to force the Engliſh ſhipping, but to employ them in unlawful actions, that may embroil the Engliſh nation with the Turks: They uſe our ſhips, ſays Sir Thomas, with St. Mark in the top, to deceive us of our right; but commit diſorders under St. George; as a ſoldier better able, they think, to bear it out. p. 494.

CCCLVIII. To Sir ISAAC WAKE. His honourable opinion of Sir Iſaac in the affair of Goodlade; tho' a ſtranger to his perſon, he is not to his life and actions, and loves and honours him without adulation. That he did not expect more juſtice from the Venetian ſenate, than he found he ſhould meet with by his letters, (See N°. cccxlii.) and thoſe of his nephew Mr. Wilkinſon. That he could requite them at Conſtantinople; but is an Engliſhman, and ſcorns to ſtrike any behind his back; but that having committed the matter to England, he expects ſome anſwer from thence. That he does not find what he has done either in relation to Gabor or the Spaniſh treaty, is ſo well accepted there, as with Sir Iſaac (N° cccxlii.); ſo that tho' he is reſolved to ſpare his pen, till he has a reply, yet he will omit no part of his ſervice, which may perhaps be juſtify'd by the effects. That the emperor has reſolv'd, as ſoon as he is able, to drive Gabor out of thoſe parts of Hungary, which he poſſeſſes by the laſt peace; and therefore, Gabor knowing this, will be aforehand with him. p. 496.

CCCLIX. To the Duke of BUCKINGHAM. He ſtates and explains the matter of his deſir'd return, to avoid miſunderſtanding. His intire acquieſcence and ſubmiſſion to his grace's pleaſure, in this reſpect, and as to his ſucceſſor. That the marbles on Porta Aurea (N°. cclxxi, cccxv, and ccclvii.) are promiſed him: That he has three of his ſervants in Greece to ſearch for antiquities: That he has procur'd the overſeer of the grand ſignor's works, to go purpoſely into Aſia to ſerve him: That, by means of the patriarch, he hath ſent a colloyre to Athens and Thebes; and has given orders to the conſuls in Aleppo, Smyrna, and Morea, on the ſame occaſion: That ſomewhat new is diſcover'd to him, which having its difficulties, he will endeavour to ſurmount. That Mr. Petty has gotten many things from the iſlands; but he knows not what they are. That having received no commands in relation to Gabor and the Spaniſh treaties, he will trouble his grace no more on thoſe ſubjects, apprehending that what he has done is unacceptable in England. That the government of the Turkiſh empire hath many paroxyſms. Inſtances of the ungovern'd inſolence of the janizaries. Defiance of the grand ſignor's orders, who is forced to yield to them, and diſgrace the Buſtangi baſſa, tho' he had acted by the ſultan's direction. p. 496.

CCCLX. To the Queen of BOHEMIA. That the expectation which the other ambaſſadors have of Sir Thomas's orders from England in relation to Gabor, (to which the orders from their reſpective courts refer them) have put an entire ſtop to all negotiations with that prince. Gabor's ſtrange conduct in congratulating the election of the emperor's ſon to the crown of Hungary, to the reverſion of which he had ſuch ſtrong pretenſions. The emperor's reſolution to deprive him at the firſt opportunity of that part of Hungary which he enjoys by the laſt treaty: That he hath 20,000 men in arms, and rumour ſays he will prevent all news of him by action; but thoſe reports have prov'd ſo often falſe, that he will not truſt them, till that prince is rouſed by injuries, and ſeconded from Chriſtendom: And that if that back-door be neglected, it will be an overſight irreparable. That the Spaniſh faction purſue their treaty; and the active part being left to him by the other ambaſſadors (See N°. cccli.) he will watch them narrowly: That he had long ſince begg'd her majeſty to ſound the opinion which his majeſty had of him; and doubts not that ſhe has taken the opportunity for that purpoſe which the duke of Buckingham's preſence at the Hague had afforded. Rejoices in the remove of Sir Dudley Carleton, as he hopes it is for his good, and as her majeſty's affairs will not ſuffer from his worthy ſucceſſor's zeal and abilities for her cauſe. p. 498.

CCCLXI. To the Archbiſhop of CANTERBURY. Thanks him for his letter, (N°. cccxxii.) and that which he ſent him for the patriarch, which he will deliver to that prelate as ſoon as poſſible. That the charge of books, which his grace deſires to know, will not exceed 2 or 300l. becauſe he foreſees there is no great number; which is the rule they form their judgment by, being ignorant of the value of many authors, and ſometimes the beſt may be procured eaſieſt for that reaſon. That he will ſtrain all his forces and wits to do ſome ſervice this way, finding he has been unprofitable in others. But ſuppoſes he has already the jewel of his library (See alſo N°.

N° cclxxxviii.) in his poſſeſſion, but not yet his own, an old large MS. in Arabick, antiently belonging to the patriarch of Alexandria, and brought away by Cyril. A curious account of the excellency, uſe, and value of this MS. in relation to the univerſal church, and to that of Africk in particular; beſides rare matters, beyond his capacity and expreſſion. That it is a plain canon dividing the Chriſtian world to four patriarchs; in matters of their own churches independent, and equals to the biſhop of Rome. He hopes to inſure the book, and that then his grace will cauſe it to be digged in England, as in a rich mine. That it may be called Corpus Canonum, & Theſaurus Hiſtoriarum Eccleſiaſticarum. p. 499.

CCCLXII. To Dr. GOADE, Chaplain to his Grace the Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury. [Referred to for his skill in oriental MSS. N° cclxxxviii.] The patriarch a great collector of old books; but faſt-handed. The MS. of antient canons mentioned in the preceding letter, the jewel of the Eaſt. Mr. Petty, by his means, admitted to the beſt library of Greece, and by the help of Sir Thomas's ſervants, convey'd away 22, which he thinks very valuable. That Sir Thomas had hoped for his ſhare; but that Mr. Petty (of whom, however, he gives a good character) was for himſelf. That Sir Thomas meant to get a review of that library; but that Mr. Petty had given it ſuch a blow, under his truſt, that it had been ſince locked up under two keys, one kept by the townſmen; ſo he could not come at it. That he holds himſelf to have good title to ſome of Mr. Petty's, tho' in his hands he eſteems them ſafe for the ſame uſe. That the baron of Sanſy, now attending her majeſty in England, with a ſtrong purſe, and great induſtry, robbed all Greece, and carried away two books borrowed of the patriarch, which he highly eſteemed, and the loſs of which he much laments. That among Mr. Petty's 22, are Ephraim and Manaſſeh, two Greek fathers, Phocion, Euſebius, &c. That he himſelf has Tecla's bible with notes, (See N° ccxli, ccxlvi.) which Mr. Petty thinks not ſo antient as the patriarch (who gave it, and eſteems it a relick) imagines. And then he gives a liſt of other books which he has procur'd. That he aims at ſtill higher matters that way, and eſteems the councils, above mentioned, worth a library. That he will ſearch for Chryſippus, recommended by the doctor, and if he may receive farther directions from him, he will do his beſt; but otherwiſe ſhall commit great errors thro' ignorance. p. 500.

CCCLXIII. From Lord CONWAY. That he lately wrote to Sir Thomas, being then upon recovery from a fever, (See N° cccliii.) and now writes to clear up two points wherein he ſeems to be much diſſatiſfy'd; the firſt is, What acceptation his negotiations there have found with his majeſty. 2dly, What the cauſes have been that he has received no ſpeedier nor more punctual directions how to proceed. For the firſt, he aſſures him that his majeſty hath always ſet a due value upon his negotiations and advertiſements, obſerving thro' the whole cauſe of his proceedings, the characters of a ſober and ſolid judgment: attributing chiefly to his wiſdom and judgment that Gabor hath been kept ſo long ſteady to the publick cauſe: That if he conſiders how chearfully his majeſty has continued his penſion (See N° cccxxiii.) as in the late king's time; his extraordinary allowance for black cloth, (See the ſame N°.) and how willing his majeſty would be to continue him in his embaſſy, if he deſir'd it, as a thing good for him; he conceives he will rejoice in his majeſty's favour, and in the eſtimation he hath of his abilities to ſerve him. In regard to the ſecond point, he enumerates ſeveral unforeſeen accidents, and urgent occaſions, which have contibuted to the delay he complains of; and moreover gives 7 reaſons why his majeſty could not anſwer, as Sir Thomas expected, to the points in queſtion. That he had inlarged on theſe points, that Sir Thomas may not only ſatiſfy himſelf, but others, as he ſhall ſee cauſe: For that his majeſty had always a right eſtimation of the uſefulneſs of a diverſion by Gabor; and no ſooner was the occaſion fitted to his deſires, by the congreſs at the Hague, but it was taken hold of, and intimation given Sir Thomas of the ſame, that he might ſhew the prince the way to enter into the treaty. And that the king could not at that time do more, not knowing how far the French king, and his allies the Venetians and Savoyards had entertained his offers. He then proceeds to acquaint Sir Thomas with the ſteps that had been taken at the Hague with Gabor's meſſenger, who came thither from Denmark, and of the concluſion of the treaty between his majeſty, Denmark and Holland; the French ambaſſador withdrawing on pretence that he had no commiſſion, and the Swediſh ambaſſador dying juſt before; and of the article in that treaty which invited Gabor to enter into the league. He gives him briefly the ſubſtance of that treaty, (See N° cccxxv, cccxxvi.) and in cypher the private article made for reſtitution of the king of Bohemia, and for giving 40000 rixdollars a month to Gabor to procure him to make a diverſion. That with theſe reſolutions, &c. the meſſenger return'd to Gabor; that thus, he ſees, from thenceforth, with whom and where this buſineſs was to be handled; and if his own ſickneſs had not entirely diverted him from buſineſs, he would have acquainted him with it before. He then gives him in cypher, what ſteps Gabor has taken in conſequence of the above; and what he undertakes to do. That tho' no reſolution is yet taken upon Gabor's new propoſitions, yet all due care and ſpeed will be uſed to ſatiſfy him, and alſo the king of Denmark, who is very deſirous to bring that prince into the field. That it now remains to acquaint Sir Thomas, that as his majeſty well approves all his proceedings for ſtirring up Gabor, ſo upon all proper occaſions he ſhould keep him conſtant, and ſerve him in all his intereſts at Conſtantinople, where the publick good may be procured; ſaving only in that point of ſcandal, if he ſhall ſeek it, of drawing the Turk to invade Chriſtendom. That for the Spaniſh treaty at the Porte, it is his majeſty's pleaſure, he tells him in cypher, that he do every thing in his power to deſtroy that project, and to move the other ambaſſadors effectually to join with him for that purpoſe; and he conceives, that if money be required for that purpoſe, and the ſum not great, he will be thankfully reimburſed. That the buſineſs of his revocation and continuance has been attended with trouble: That the merchants have been earneſt for his ſtay, and by petitions to the king, to the council, and laſtly to the parliament, have oppoſed the ſending Sir John Phillips. But that the king holding the nomination of ambaſſadors to be his prerogative, and having promiſed that gentleman, he hath received his commiſſion and credentials; but when he will ſet out, is unknown to him.

To a Duplicate of the above Letter, a Poſtſcript is added; which acquaints him, That his letter (N° cccxlvi) came to his hands even when the original of this duplicate was ready to be diſpatched to him: That, as to Gabor, his majeſty will purſue the treaty with him in the courſe he is in, jointly with his allies; and ſhall be glad to hear, that the French king will do any thing apart. Re-aſſures him of the approbation of all his meaſures, and that his conſtancy in the ſame way will meet with a gracious acceptation. He tells him that the affairs in England are ſomewhat embroiled; but hopes a good iſſue: That his own ill health, and great buſineſs, makes him leſs particular than he would otherwiſe be: But hopes ſhortly to be able to give a better face of buſineſs than he now can. He tells him, that Sir John Phillips, his deſigned ſucceſſor, is lately dead; that he knows not yet what reſolutions will be taken upon it; but ſhall be ready to do all things in his power for his ſervice and ſatiſfaction: That the privy-ſeal for payment of his penſion out of the court of wards (See N° cccxxiii.) is ſigned by the king. p. 501.

CCCLXVII. To the Lord CONWAY. A new agent from Spain arrives at Raguſa in his way to Conſtantinople, to promote the projected treaty between Spain and the Porte. Reaſons from an anſwer of count Olivarez, to conclude that the Spaniards will vigorouſly purſue this ſtep; and of the ill conſequences that would attend the ſucceſs of it. That it was reſolved among the four reſident ambaſſadors rather to prevent his coming, than to leave it to combat him when come, as his promiſes might make him then acceptable. He accordingly obtains an order by dint of reaſon, and ſome money, to fetch that agent's feigned letters, and to conduct him out of the Turkiſh territories; and another to Raguſa, requiring them not to aſſiſt hereafter the paſſage of any Spaniſh miniſter; and ſo he hopes the project is at an end for ſome time, if not for ever. Hopes the king will approve of what he has done in this reſpect, without order. CCCLXVIII. To the Lord CONWAY. The French ambaſſador acquaints Sir Thomas with the ſubſtance of his negotiation with Gabor, which he had before affected to keep private (N° cccxxxvii, cccxlvi.). Gabor's declaration and further propoſals thereupon. Is content to begin operations of war, even if the ſums cannot at preſent be advanc'd, ſo he might be aſſur'd of ſatisfaction in time, having intelligence with count Manſfelt, whom he expected in Sileſia, and with many principal lords in that province, and aſſurance from Denmark of further ſupport, on occaſion, when he had begun; deſiring, however, 100,000 dollars at preſent in part of the ſtipulated ſums. Sir Thomas's reaſons why Gabor ſhould be ſincere; the conſequence and importance of the diverſion he is able to make: And he infers, that if his majeſty pay 30,000 l. per month to Denmark and Manſfelt, what is 2000 l. a month to raiſe a powerful and courageous prince with an army of 25000 men upon the back of the enemy. CCCLXIX. To the Duke of BUCKINGHAM. His further proceedings in ſearch of antiquities in marble, &c. Some account of what he has got. His great induſtry in this ſearch, at different places. That he had been forced to deſiſt from his attempts to procure thoſe on Porta Aurea, (See N° cclxxi, cccxv, ccclvii, ccclix.) tho' he had engaged by a depoſit 500 dollars to obtain them of the great treaſurer at the Porte, (See N° ccclix.) the attempt having well-nigh raiſed an inſurrection. p. 511.

CCCLXX. To Sir ISAAC WAKE. Makes requeſt of Sir Iſaac for a private favour in order to promote a publick good, viz. To procure the duke of Savoy to recommend a worthy perſon to the coadjutorſhip of the biſhoprick of Scio; who, tho' the titular Roman-catholick archbiſhop of Smyrna, is without a church, and a great friend to Sir Thomas, and the Engliſh nation. The qualifications of that prelate for the office. p. 512.

CCCLXXI. To the ſame. In further recommendation of the ſame ſubject, ſetting forth the eaſe with which it may be effected; and his deſire of making ſo good a friend to the Engliſh nation, biſhop of Scio, who may do ſervice to us, when he has left his embaſſy. That this prelate aſſiſts him in collecting marbles for the duke of Buckingham. p. 513.

CCCLXXIII. To Lord CONWAY. In relation to two of his diſpatches being intercepted: To what he hears of his ſucceſſor's being ſet out, without warning to him: To further proceedings in relation to what he had done to ſtop the agent from Spain, (See N° ccclxvii.) who by a fall had broke three bones, and had been carried back to Raguſa: To an offer made him by the agent of Gabor to continue to confer with him on the publick cauſe, if Sir Thomas had power to conclude: In what manner he is forced to deport himſelf, (having yet received no orders) to keep the prince's hopes alive. That he has received a diſpatch from the duke of Sbaraſs, firſt peer of Poland, requeſting in that king's name, Sir Thomas's aſſiſtance to make up matters between the Porte and the Poles. That the Turks apply to him on the ſame occaſion. His reaſons on the ſubject, and his prudent reſolutions what to purſue. Arrival at Venice, in his way to Conſtantinople, of M. Hayes, with a great retinue, from the French king. Conjectures and reports upon it. Sir Thomas thinks he will ſet out for Perſia, to treat for the ſilk trade, and to mediate between the Turks and Perſians: That when he arrives, he ſhall diſcover his deſigns. He complains of the difficulties he is drove to for want of proper proviſion, and the dangerous ways of paſſage and travel for his return. Further notice, by way of P. S. relating to the Spaniſh agent; (See N° ccclxvii.) and to the ſtate of the affair with Gabor. p. 514.

CCCLXXIV. To the Queen of BOHEMIA. With pathetick complaints on the ſlights and neglects he has met with from England in relation to his negotiations with Gabor, &c. What a moderate ſum that prince inſiſted on, compar'd with what was paid for leſs ſervice. That he is ready to march towards Vienna, directly, if he can have aſſurance; but that Sir Thomas, having no orders, is obliged to give dilatory anſwers, which will no longer paſs. The difficulties and great diſcouragements he labours under, inſtead of the reward of his long, faithful and dangerous ſervices. p. 515.

CCCLXXV. To the Prince of TRANSYLVANIA. A letter written to keep up his expectations, and to hold him ſteady. Notifies his ſpeedy return; and hopes to be more uſeful to his highneſs when in England, than at Conſtantinople. p. 516.

CCCLXXVI. From Lord CONWAY. He inlarges (according to his promiſe in the poſtſcript to his letter, N° ccclxiii.) on the ſatisfaction his majeſty had received from the great wiſdom, fidelity and judgment, with which he had conducted himſelf in his negotiations with Gabor, and with regard to the Spaniſh treaty, and all other things concerning his ſervice. That his majeſty withal expreſſed a gracious ſenſe of his merit, acceptation of his endeavours, and confidence in his perſon with honour and dexterity to begin and finiſh matters of the greateſt weight, having never had thought to do any thing that might ſeem to caſt any reflection or diſgrace upon him, whom he eſteems ſo able and faithful a miniſter. That his deſigned ſucceſſor dying (See N° ccclxiii.) his majeſty hath looked exactly into the ſtate of his negotiations, and the merchants affairs, and as well for his own ſervice, as to ſhew his eſtimation of him, and to ſatisfy the merchants, hath reſolved not to make any new choice, but to continue him his ambaſſador there for one year longer, and requires him to diſpoſe of himſelf and his affairs to attend the ſervice accordingly. He then gives him ſome new inſtructions in relation to the Algerines and Tuniſians, of whom he is to deſire that his majeſty's ſhips may be allowed the conveniencies of their ports for their money, in caſe they ſhould be obliged to put in there. He ſignifies to him in cypher, his majeſty's pleaſure with regard to the propoſitions of Gabor, which being in another courſe, he did not think fit to alter it; and the rather, becauſe the French court have not made any overtures to his majeſty or his miniſters on this ſubject, tho' they pretend to be ſo forward at the Porte with Gabor's agents (See N° ccclxviii.); which, however, his majeſty would be glad a good uſe might be made of for the common good (tho' being in another courſe, he cannot join in the treaty). That peradventure, if Sir Thomas, by ſome miniſter of Gabor, gave occaſion to the French ambaſſador to repreſent the ſame, it would be moſt ſucceſsful. That his majeſty is well pleaſed with what is done in oppoſition to the Spaniſh treaty, and with his being choſen by common conſent of the reſident miniſters, (See N° cccli, ccclxi.) for the manager of that affair; and as to the matter of expence attending it, he is to concur with the others, his majeſty relying upon his diſcretion and moderation. He then acquaints him, that the ſlow proceedings of the parliament as to ſupplies, have ſuſpended his majeſty's deſigns. Gives the ſtate of the armies of the king of Denmark and count Mansfelt; and the check the latter had met with. (See N° ccclxxii.) p. 517.

CCCLXXVII. To GEORGE Duke of Sbaraſs, Caſtellan of Cracovia. In anſwer to the deſire of that nobleman (mentioned N° ccclxxiii.) to mediate a reconciliation of the differences between the Poles and Turks. His conference on that head with the chimacham. The extraordinary adjuration of that miniſter to clear himſelf of the charge of licenſing the Tartars to invade Poland. Sir Thomas's advice to the duke in relation to the diſpoſition of the Turks on that head, and for putting a ſtop to the invaſions both of the Coſſacks and Tartars. p. 519.

CCCLXXVIII. From Mr. WILKINSON. The concluſion of a ſeparate peace between France and Spain in Italy, ſubjects the French to great cenſure. The conſequences of it. Other advices relating to the Italian affairs. That he perceives his letter has miſcarried, which notify'd the recal of Sir Dudley Carleton from the Hague, and the appointment of Sir Robert Killigrew to ſucceed him there. p. 520.

CCCLXXIX. From the ſame. With the news of Italy, &c. p. 521.

CCCLXXX. From the ſame. That notwithſtanding the ſeparate peace of the French, the affairs of Italy remain in an uncertain ſtate. The pope ſlightly uſed in the ſaid peace, and Venice and Savoy quite neglected. p. 521.

CCCLXXXI. To Lord CONWAY. His great diſtreſs, on new advices and propoſitions from Gabor, for want of orders from England. A curious account of his prudent conduct in this dilemma, when Gabor aſſures him on one hand, that his majeſty has given him (Sir Thomas) command to unite with his (Gabor's) miniſter to procure the Porte to authorize his league with the princes of the union at the Hague; and on the other, when he has received no direction thereupon from England. He asks advice what to do in this uncertainty, of the bailo, leſt Gabor be diſcouraged, if he know the truth. His grief and complaints on this head moſt emphatically ſet forth; having in the beginning of this letter enumerated the dates of the many letters he had ſent, to which he had not been graced with any anſwer. p. 522.

CCCLXXXII. To the ſame. The old chimacham depoſed by the Spahees, and inhumanly ſtrangled, to the regret of the grand ſignor. His great age, merit and ſervices. Pretences againſt him. Sir Thomas regrets him, as his only friend and refuge ever ſince his reſidence there, the chief ſupport of the prince of Tranſylvania, and a conſtant enemy of the Auſtrians. He fears that his ſudden death will occaſion ſome diſadvantageous alterations, the new chimacham being a great favourer of the Spaniſh treaty. But hopes ſo much has been done againſt it, that it will be irrecoverable for that year. p. 524.

CCCLXXXIII. From Mr. WILKINSON. With the news of Italy. The Jeſuits raiſe falſe reports at Rome of the cruel treatment of the Roman-catholicks in England. p. 525.

CCCLXXXIV. To the KING. Having received lord Conway's letters (N° ccclxiii, ccclxxvi.) ſignifying his majeſty's approbation of all his negotiations and endeavours at the Porte, he is overwhelmed with joy and gratitude; and declares, that having now aſſurance added to his zeal, his majeſty ſhall ſee the effects and fruits of both. That he had given ample accounts to lord Conway (in the ſubſequent letter) of what was then doing there, and had neceſſarily fallen upon ſome diſcourſes, which his experience of thoſe parts, and the manner of proceeding in that buſineſs, have aſſured him will be ſome light to his majeſty's deſigns. p. 526.

CCCLXXXV. To Lord CONWAY. Accounts for his paſt doubts and deſpair, and expreſſes his preſent joy and gratitude for the opportune arrival of his lordſhip's letters, (N° ccclxiii, ccclxxvi.) which inform him of the approval of his proceedings at the Porte. Motives and reaſons which directed him in his negotiations with Gabor, and which had kept that prince in heart two years before the French ambaſſador had any intereſt in him, notwithſtanding the late king's inflexible reſolution not to join with a prince who was a dependent upon the Turks, and acted under their banners. That he had been the firſt mover of his marriage with the princeſs of Brandenburgh, with a view ſtill further to aſſure him to the cauſe of the Proteſtant religion. He anſwers in a very convincing manner his lordſhip's reaſons (See N° ccclxiii.) why Gabor's offers were no ſooner taken into conſideration, and defends him from the objection his lordſhip had made, particularly in relation to that prince's not applying to his majeſty as well as to the king of France, which he ſays, he was driven to by diſcouragement on the Engliſh ſide, and invitation from the French. Sir Thomas ſays, he had well conſidered the difficulties under which his majeſty muſt labour in money matters, to ſupply ſo many iſſues; but that when it was conſidered, that what was required of his majeſty by that prince, would ariſe in one year but to fourteen days pay of what his majeſty contributed to Denmark and Mansfelt, and the ſervice Gabor could do, he thought it ill husbandry to ſpare this penny, which Sir Thomas could have furniſh'd there upon his own credit; and that if this ſmall ſum was refuſ'd, Gabor would have very little reliance on larger promiſes. He then ſets forth the conſequence of the diverſion Gabor was able to make; and ventures his opinion, that if the king of Denmark had ſpent the paſt time in the emperor's own countries, which were ripe for revolt, Gabor had long ſince joined him, and had brought all other princes to a reſolution: But that the emperor feels not the war made in the countries of poor neutral princes, as he would a fire at his own doors. He ſhews, that the cool and wary counſels of not provoking openly the emperor, will ſubject them to the ſame revenge as if they pulled off the mask at once, if the Auſtrians ſucceeded; and that there is no ſecurity but in paring the eagle's claws, who, unlike to Achilles, is not to be killed with a wound in the heel, but in the head. He then gives the ſtate of matters as they then ſtood. That Gabor has drawn off the baſſa of Buda from the Imperial intereſt: and that he has reaſons to think them both ſincere. His obſervations on Gabor's propoſals, as mentioned in cypher by his lordſhip (N° ccclxiii.): with what he had alter'd in ſuch of them as requir'd it, to render them practicable. That the enabling of Mansfelt to enter Sileſia, which province was ready to receive him, and the payment of the ſmall ſum abovementioned, were the life and ſoul of the buſineſs, and will enable Gabor to do great things. That the death of the old chimacham (See N° ccclxxxii.) had retarded matters; but that he hopes he has found means, by his vigorous repreſentations to the new one, to engage him in the ſame cauſe as to licenſing Gabor to confederate with the princes of the union, and to obtain a command for the baſſa of Buda with others, to make a camp on the frontiers, to watch the ſafety of the borders, and to be ready to attend occaſions. The readineſs of the baſſas, even without licence, to be in arms, of which good uſe may be made. He procures the delay of pacquets ſent from Vienna to the emperor's agent, till he ſhall get all concluded. Hopes the treaty with Spain has received a deadly wound. Intends to write to Gabor for his aſſurance and encouragement. p. 526.

CCCLXXXVI. To the Queen of BOHEMIA. With a ſtill more circumſtantial account of the principal particulars contained in the preceding letters; and recommending himſelf to her majeſty's favour, by his conſtant affection to her ſervice, and what he will attempt to do, now he has power put into his hands. p. 530.

CCCLXXXVII. Relation of the laſt Troubles in CONSTANTINOPLE. More ample particulars of the Spahees inſurrection, and the depoſition and death of the old chimacham. (mentioned Nº ccclxxxii.). His character, age, and ſervices. Pretence of the Spahees for this violence. How he behav'd himſelf at the time of his death. The Janizaries pretend to reſent his death, and riſe to demand ſatisfaction and juſtice upon it, in ſuch manner, as fills the ſultan and the whole city with apprehenſions. Curious particulars of the audience they compel the ſultan to give them, and of the juſtice and executions they exacted from him, to the terror of the inſolent Spahees, and their leaders in the late commotion. The executions and confiſcations, on this occaſion, of great uſe to the grand ſignor. Bad ſtate of the Turkiſh army before Babylon. p. 532.

CCCLXXXVIII. From the Duke of BUCKINGHAM. That the good opinion conceived of Sir Thomas's imployment at Conſtantinople, and of his abilities and knowledge of thoſe parts, make it neceſſary to continue him there till the latter end of the year. Mean time he promiſes to think of ſomewhat for him, that may both haſten and encourage his return. That he will endeavour to deſerve the pains he has taken to oblige him (See his letters to that nobleman) in relation to antiquities: Only cautions him againſt purchaſing alabaſter pieces, except figures of exquiſite curioſity. That, as Sir Thomas rightly obſerves, he is not ſo fond of antiquity, as to court it in a mis-ſhapen ſtone; but where beauty and antiquity meet together in a ſtatue, he ſhall not ſtand upon any coſt his judgment ſhall value it at. That ſince he cannot procure the pieces on the Porta Aurea, without difficulty and danger, he is ſatisfy'd with his induſtry on that occaſion, and hopes for other rarities that may be purchaſed with leſs trouble, as well as for a good occaſion to ſhew his gratitude to him. p. 534.

CCCLXXXIX. From Mr. WILKINSON. Warm diſputes between the pope and Spaniards about the Valteline. p. 535.

CCCXC. To BETHLEM GABOR. Encouraging him to proceed in his enterprizes, notwithſtanding the violent death of the old chimacham. The ſteps he has taken with the new; and the hopes he may receive from Huſſein Affende, caddee-leskar of Greece, a wiſe and conſtant man, and of abſolute credit and authority with the ſultan, who voluntarily offers himſelf to the protection of all his highneſs's affairs. That having received full orders and commands, he will give a good account of the ſucceſs of them for his ſervice. p. 535.

CCCXCI. To Lord CONWAY. Upon the receipt of ill news from Babylon, the Turks call a general council of all orders to the number of 1000, to conſult on thoſe affairs. In this council the new chimacham ignorantly or maliciouſly hazards all Gabor's buſineſs, by expoſing it to publick knowledge, and thereby to the oppoſition of the Poles and Imperialiſts. Sir Thomas complains to the chimacham of this raſh miſtake, and procures letters and inſtructions to Gabor, and the baſſa of Buda, the firſt to unite with the princes of the union; the ſecond, to maintain the prince's dominions, if they ſhould be attacked; and to ſtay any miniſter at Buda, whom the emperor ſhould ſend to negotiate a new peace. That when copies of theſe letters were brought to Sir Thomas, he finds them ſo cold and ambiguous, that he utterly rejects them, and procures ſtronger to be written, tho' not ſo full and expreſſive as he wiſhes; which, however, he will make as ſtrong to the prince by inferences as he can (See Nº cccxciii.). The reſult of the buſineſs in relation to the Spaniſh agent at Raguſa (See Nº ccclxvii, ccclxxiii.). That he beſeeches his majeſty to releaſe him of this dry and ſterile imployment, and that his ſucceſſor may ſet out the beginning of next year; and begs his lordſhip's intereſt on this occaſion. p. 536.

CCCXCII. From Mr. WILKINSON. Arrival at Venice of the French ambaſſador ſent to palliate his maſter's ſeparate peace with Spain. The pope willing to leave the Valteline in the hands of the Venetians and the Griſons, in order to diſappoint Spain. p. 538.

CCCXCIII. To BETHLEM GABOR. He gives his highneſs a more particular account (than in Nº cccxc.) of the orders and inſtructions he has at laſt received from England to act with his highneſs: Of the treaty of alliance with the king of Denmark, the States of Holland, &c. for the reſtoration of the Palatinate, and humbling of the Auſtrians, and of the further ſteps taken to promote the deſired ends. And refers to captain Quadt his highneſs's agent at the Hague, for the particulars relating to the reception of his own propoſitions there. He excuſes the delay of theſe reſolutions of the Engliſh court, on this head, 'till then. Gives him account of the letters and orders of the Porte juſt diſpatched to his highneſs, and the baſſa of Buda: And by ſtrong inferences (as he had wrote to lord Conway, Nº cccxci.) makes up for the want of the deſired force and vigor, which he wiſhes thoſe letters and inſtructions had more plainly expreſſed: By powerful reaſons he puſhes him on to action; and having heard that he has already paſſed the Rubicon, he concludes with mentioning the reſolution of Cæſar, and wiſhes him his ſucceſs, ut veniat, videat, & vincat, &c. p. 539.

CCCXCIV. From Lord GRANDISON. Adviſes him of the duke of Buckingham's letter to him (Nº ccclxxxviii.). That the king being juſtly offended with the inſolence of the French attendants of the queen, who had faſhioned a kind of commonwealth among themſelves, under her protection, had, to their great regret, diſmiſſed them (all but 3 or 4) to the number of above 400; an act well pleaſing to his own ſubjects, tho' he doubts it will be ill taken in France. Domeſtick occurrences. King of Sweden's hoſtilities with Poland. Is ſorry he ſhall be ſo long before he ſees him and his niece, &c. p. 541.

CCCXCV. To Lord CONWAY. Subſtance of the letters and inſtructions ſent to Gabor, and the baſſa of Buda (See Nº cccxci.). He incloſes copies of his letter to that prince, (See Nº cccxciii.) and of all other letters and orders relating to thoſe affairs. He gives his opinion of the effects of theſe negotiations, and the conſequence of Gabor's undertakings in Hungary, &c. if he ſhall be joined with the forces of any other power, and receive the contributions agreed upon. The ſteps that prince has already taken: but that he will not go beyond the poſſibility of a ſafe retreat, if he find himſelf unſupported. His artful views upon the Turks: That they have appointed five baſſas to go to the camp, and as ſome of them go in hope of booty, if they once arrive upon the frontier, it will be very difficult to keep thieves from ſtealing, and the open country will be left at diſcretion. That the fear of this ſtorm has made the emperor diſpatch the ratification of the laſt peace in all haſte to Conſtantinople, which ſhould have been ſent two years before: But that, as it is not ſent by an ambaſſador in form, nor accompany'd with the ſtipulated preſents, he (Sir Thomas) will find means to render it ineffectual. p. 542.

CCCXCVI. From Mr. WILKINSON. The proceedings between the new French ambaſſador at Venice, and that republick: With other advices of Italy, and in relation to the Valteline. p. 543.

CCCXCVII. To Lord CONWAY. Acknowledges his majeſty's bounties, and his lordſhip's favours: Preſſes his return at the end of the year. Touches upon the choice of his ſucceſſor, and the importance of that embaſſy. Juſt names his kinſman William Roe. Adviſes the death of the baſſa of Buda, who was juſt reconciled to Gabor. The character and genius of his ſucceſſor give room to hope, that this alteration will be for the better: But ſtill Sir Thomas inſiſts upon the abſolute neceſſity of furniſhing the contribution-money to Gabor. He procures the acceptation of the emperor's ratification to be delay'd (See cccxcv.). p. 544.

CCCXCIX. From the ſame. The French ambaſſador's boaſts of ſucceſs in his negotiations, without grounds. The Venetians anſwer but three articles out of twenty; and thoſe not at all to his ſatisfaction. p. 546.

CD. To Sir ISAAC WAKE. In thankful acknowledgment of his kindneſs in procuring the deſired recommendation of the archbiſhop of Smyrna, to the biſhoprick of Scio (See N°. ccclxx, ccclxxi). Further reaſons for his making that requeſt, and the good conſequences that will attend the obtaining it, to the Engliſh nation. The active and miſchievous zeal of the jeſuits in their deſigns upon the Greek church. p. 546.

CDI. To Lord CONWAY. He begs he may not be commanded to ſtay at Conſtantinople longer than to the end of the year; for that if he begins the new year there, he ſhall be taken in a net, for a little further time. Touches upon the nature and importance of the imployment, and the choice of his ſucceſſor. Begs that an honour which he receiv'd from the ſenate of Venice, who offer'd him, in his purpoſed return, one of their gallies to attend him at Zant for that purpoſe, may be acknowledg'd to the Venetian ambaſſador in England. What he has done in relation to lord Conway's inſtruction (N°. ccclxxvi.) to demand the liberty of the ports of Barbary. That the city of Algier has rebell'd againſt their baſſa, (who therefore poiſoned himſelf) and is reported to erect it ſelf into a commonwealth, and to refuſe governors from the Porte. Turks forced to connive at its proceedings. That the liberty of thoſe ports will be a happy thing for the merchants, if any deſign ſhall bring his majeſty's fleets into thoſe ſeas. The coldneſs of the French ambaſſador with relation both to Gabor and Sir Thomas. That their ſeparate peace with Spain, and this conduct, have ſprung from one root. But that if there be no diſgrace on the ſide of Germany and Denmark, and the contribution be furniſhed to Gabor, he believes the falling off of the French will not affect that prince's reſolutions. Further advice in relation to the Spaniſh treaty. Gabor adviſes the Porte and Sir Thomas, that Mansfelt has penetrated into Sileſia as far as Breſlaw. That prince notifies to the Porte, that in caſe of his death the ſtates of his principality have elected his princeſs to ſucceed him, and requires the confirmation of the grand ſignor, and gives reaſons why it ſhould be granted him. He alſo demands very ſtrenuouſly of the Porte, a plain approbation of his proceedings againſt the emperor, which are deſigned, he ſays, by conquering Hungary, to confine him for ever within Germany. His agent obtains a plauſible anſwer; but in colder terms than he wiſhed; and preſſes the two points with great warmth: But juſt at the time, news arriving of the diſſipation and ruin of the army before Babylon, the Turks find themſelves in no condition to take meaſures which might bring them into new wars. Sir Thomas's advice thereupon to the agent, to take the letter they will ſend, in their own manner, and make the beſt of it for the preſent; and doubts not, as the Turks recover their ſpirits, to bring about every thing to ſatisfaction. Sir Thomas's judgment upon what the Turks will do in this bad criſis of their affairs. He concludes with preſſing his revocation at the end of the year. p. 547.

CDII. Lord CONWAY's Letter to Sir ISAAC WAKE. Directing him to cloſe with the offer of the marquis of Baden to furniſh troops for a diverſion in Germany; to be paid by England, Savoy and Venice, in equal proportions; to which the two latter powers have conſented. The conditions on which he is to conclude, or refuſe: That his majeſty is well pleaſed with Sir Iſaac's ſervice herein, and further inſtructs him to ſtir up the Proteſtant Swiſs to refuſe to enter into the treaty of peace made between Spain and France, and to join in promoting the common liberty. p. 551.

CDIII. From Lord CONWAY to Sir THOMAS ROE. His lordſhip greatly concern'd that his letters were ſo long upon the way, as to augment his grief and uncertainty, as he ſees by two of his letters, (See N°. ccclxxxi. p. 522. N°. ccclxxxii. p. 524.). That he ſhould have been aſham'd of his own defaults, if his heart did not bear him witneſs of his affection and reſpects to Sir Thomas, and if he was not convinc'd that the arrival of his letters would fully ſatisfy him in all points. He inforces in cypher, what he had before written (N°. ccclxiii, ccclxxvi.) as to the Spaniſh treaty at the Porte, and the repayment of his expences on that head: And that his conduct with Gabor is intirely conformable to his majeſty's wiſhes and intentions. His lordſhip gives him account of ſteps taken by the king of Denmark to furniſh the contribution in money to Gabor. Alſo of count Mansfelt's proceedings: Of what he may aſſure the prince of Tranſylvania on his majeſty's part. To whom he may alſo expatiate on the heavy burthens which his majeſty has taken upon him in this publick work, which his lordſhip enumerates, as well with regard to the expences abroad, as to thoſe at home, which his majeſty is put to in the defence of his own dominions threatened to be invaded; and his fleets both of offence and defence; which tho' not ſucceſsful, have cauſed a great diverſion to Spain; and obliged them to ſtand upon the defenſive, when they would otherwiſe have been able to act offenſively; beſides ſhips which his majeſty imploys in the river Elb, which have hinder'd for divers months above forty ſhips going to Spain from thoſe parts with warlike ſtores. His lordſhip then gives Sir Thomas an account of the diſmiſſion of the queen's French ſervants, which, he ſays, the French take ſo ill, that Sir Dudley Carleton (now lord Carleton) was ſent ambaſſador to France to aſſign reaſons for that ſtep. That lord Carleton is ill uſed at Paris both by the court and populace on this occaſion. p. 552.

CDV. To the Prince of TRANSYLVANIA. He acquaints his highneſs that he receives inſtructions from his majeſty by every ordinary poſt, to correſpond with and ſerve his highneſs, and to aſſure him of his firm reſolution to proſecute the wars of Germany. That his majeſty hath lately ſent alſo his part of the contribution for payment of the Daniſh army, and that of Mansfelt, &c. He accounts, from the diſtractions of the Porte upon their ill news from Aſia, (See N°. CDI.) for the letters ſent from thence (in anſwer to his highneſs's two propoſitions there mention'd) wanting ſo much force and vigour as he might wiſh; and encourages that prince, by what he [Sir Thomas] ſhall be able to effect in joining his efforts to thoſe of his agents, as ſoon as their preſent apprehenſions ſhall be allay'd. Informs him of the death of the Imbrahor baſſa, the beſt friend the Auſtrians had left at the Porte; and concludes with aſſurance that all the authority of his majeſty, and his own endeavours, ſhall be uſed to ſerve him; and that when he is once engaged, the proſperity of his arms will draw on the Turks, who dare not give his highneſs any diſcontent. p. 555.

CDVI. From Mr. WILKINSON. The defeat of the king of Denmark's army by count Tilly. Rejoicings of the Spaniards at Rome, and in other parts of Italy, thereupon. That the affair is not ſo bad as the enemy gives out. p. 556.

CDVII. Lord Conway to Sir Isaac Wake. The diſaſter of the king of Denmark, and his majeſty's vigorous meaſures taken to ſupport him. That this puts his majeſty upon an extraordinary way to raiſe money by commiſſion to ſome ſelected perſons in each county, who are to perſuade and conſtrain all ſubſidy men, according to the rates they ſtand charged in the ſubſidy books, to lend ſuch a portion as may raiſe the money wanted. Lord Carleton recalled from France in reſentment; the reaſons of it: And that the iſſue may poſſibly be a prohibition of trade between the two kingdoms, till his majeſty can obtain juſtice for his trading ſubjects, as had been promiſed. p. 557.

CDVIII. To the Queen of Bohemia. That Sir Thomas has procured that ſatisfaction to Gabor at the Porte, which his agent could not obtain, and which had held that prince in ſuſpenſe as to his entrance upon action; to wit, That he has procur'd for him the promiſe of the inveſtiture of the principality of Tranſylvania to his princeſs. That the Turkiſh frontier army is commanded to keep a guard on the territories of Gabor, and to ſtrike fear into the emperor, and to uſe the occaſion: That if the emperor ſeek by any new ambaſſador or treaty to aſſure the peace, no ſuch ſhall be permitted to come to Conſtantinople; but be obliged to deliver his meſſage to Gabor and the baſſa of Buda, to whom full power is delegated: And that no peace ſhall be concluded without the conſent of the prince and his allies, the approbation of Sir Thomas, and the knowledge of the other reſidents there. The importance of the election of the princeſs of Tranſylvania, to the common cauſe, and for defeating the intrigues and views of the Auſtrians with regard to that principality. That now he hopes for ſome good effects of Gabor's actions, &c. for her majeſty's honour and ſervice, and for the reward of her heroick patience, &c. p. 558.

CDIX. To the Lord Conway. With an ample and very curious relation of all he has briefly mentioned in the preceding letter to the queen of Bohemia. His conference with the Dutch and Venetian reſidents on the eight articles propoſed by Gabor for the conſent of the Porte, and which of them Sir Thomas approves, and which rejects, and for what reaſons. His conference with the chimacham in purſuance of the reſolutions the reſidents had jointly taken. His ſucceſs in that conference, and his regard to the inſtruction he had from his majeſty, (N°. ccclxiii.) to avoid the ſcandal of bringing the Turk into Chriſtendom; though, as he ſays, if examples are good arguments, a pope, a king of Arragon, a French and all catholicks have taught us, that it is not a mortal ſin to uſe one enemy of God againſt another: That Gabor may attribute all the ſucceſs of his propoſitions, and particularly of his inveſtiture granted to his princeſs, to his majeſty's authority, under which Sir Thomas has effected theſe things; and may reaſonably challenge returns both from him and the elector of Brandenburgh, brother of the princeſs. That he has deliver'd his majeſty's letters of congratulation, &c. to the grand ſignor into the viſier's hands, as well as that to himſelf: And that he has all the ſatisfactory aſſurances given him of complying with all his deſires in relation to the Barbary pyrates, which he can expect, or deſire, from the nature of the caſe, and from the uncertain obedience of thoſe of Algier (mentioned N°. cdi.) That thus having concluded happily all the matters committed to him in this embaſſy, he hopes his majeſty will graciouſly releaſe him from it. p. 558.

[CDIX.] The laſt Demands of Gabor. Being the eight articles propoſed by him to be complied with by the grand ſignor, and ſome of which Sir Thomas diſapprov'd, and others ſeconded, and obtain'd, as mentioned in the preceding letter. p. 561.

CDX. From Mr. Wilkinson. The unſettled ſtate of the late peace in Italy, and the Valteline. The pope's nephew returns from his legation to Spain ſo unſucceſsfully, that his holineſs reſolves to croſs the Spaniards in all their deſigns. The news of Venice and other parts of Italy. p. 562.

CDXI. To Lord Conway. The arrival of Manſfelt and count Weimar in Sileſia (See N°. cdi.) confirmed; and that Gabor was riſen to join with them; and the new baſſa of Buda was marched to confer with Gabor in his paſſage. The emperor's agent hereupon makes ſuch a clamour as has ſome influence upon the weak and timorous chimacham, and cauſes ſome ſtop to the diſpatches of the inveſtiture, and other negotiations of the prince, as mention'd N°. cdix. The imperial agent exclaims vehemently againſt the inveſtiture; but Sir Thomas finds means to ſet that matter right, and hopes ſoon to ſee the meſſenger diſpatch'd with the grant of it. That in all probability letters procur'd by the imperial agent to warn the baſſa of Buda againſt a breach with the emperor, will come too late to prevent blows. An internuntio from Poland arrives at the Porte, to ſet all matters right between thoſe two powers, and recommended to Sir Thomas by the letters of that king, and the general of the crown; to whom he will do all civil and chriſtian offices; but the face of affairs being now changed, and the Polander in the Emperor's intereſt, and againſt Gabor, and the king of Sweden, his majeſty's friend, he thinks it adviſeable to throw ſome difficulties in the way, and to keep the balance as it ſtands; but not to make an open breach, nor yet to ſet him free from all apprehenſions of the Tartars. Double-dealing of the French ambaſſador. p. 563.

CDXII. To Bethlem Gabor. Encouraging his highneſs to perſevere in his reſolutions, by the aſſurance that all his demands will be comply'd with at the Porte, notwithſtanding the ſecret arts, or open efforts of enemies: The ſucceſs of which he attributes to his majeſty's authority uſed by himſelf, in ſupport of his highneſs's agent, and hopes he will acknowledge it accordingly to England. That he knows of the letters diſpatched to the new baſſa of Buda. (See preced.). No imperial ambaſſador to be admitted to come to Conſtantinople, but referred to his highneſs and that baſſa. The demand of the imperial agent, that an ambaſſador be ſent to Vienna by the Turks, according to articles, in their turn, utterly refuſed. Arrival of an ambaſſador from Poland, whoſe errand Sir Thomas believes will be fruitleſs: That if his buſineſs proceed to treaty, his agent, as they have agreed together, will provide a ſtrong article in it for his highneſs's ſecurity. Preſents his highneſs with father Paul's hiſtory of the council of Trent in Italian, with high encomiums of it. p. 564.

CDXIII. From Mr. Wilkinson. With the news of Rome, Venice, and other parts of Italy. p. 565.

CDXIV. To the Lord Conway. An account of an action between the Imperialiſts and Gabor. Progreſs of count Manſfelt in Sileſia. The Turks, as Sir Thomas foreſaw, engaged in the quarrel, and Gabor procures orders for their wintering with him, contrary to their uſual cuſtom, which was to retire on St. Demetrius's day. Menaces and rants of the imperial agent at Conſtantinople on this occaſion. Obviated by Sir Thomas. Morteſa, baſſa of Buda, fond of engaging in this war for ſelfiſh and political views. That now all things being in action, and ſucceſs attending his negotiations beyond what he could have promiſed, he ſhall take it as an infinite grace, if his lordſhip will procure three words under his majeſty's own hand in approbation of his zeal; an honour which he had thrice received from his late majeſty. His efforts, and the motives on which he proceeded, in procuring the ſultan's approbation of the inveſtiture to Gabor's lady: That he has written to the prince (cdxii.) to prevent the effects of his doubting on the delay it had met with. The Poliſh ambaſſador's demands, and reception. How he intends to comport himſelf towards him; being aſſured, that if he can proceed ſo far as to ſet the grand ſignor's fleet at liberty, which is employ'd to defend the Black-ſea from the incurſions of the Coſſacks, that it may enter the Mediterranean, it will be of greater conſequence for diverting the forces of Spain, than the invaſion of the Tartars to buſy the king of Poland. The emir of Sidon breaks out for the third time into hoſtilities againſt the Porte. p. 565.

CDXV. From Lord CONWAY. Captain Quadt, agent of the prince of Tranſylvania, arrives in England; has audience of the king, and commiſſioners are appointed to treat with him. His majeſty's efforts to ſupply the king of Denmark with troops on his late defeat. His majeſty falls upon the method of raiſing money by way of commiſſion throughout the kingdom (See N° CDVII.) after the rate of five ſubſidies, under the name of loan; to raiſe 400,000 l. and methods alſo taken to ſettle a conſtant revenue for his majeſty, by ſale of the king's lands, by doubling the rents, &c. Notifies his majeſty's acceptance of the marquis of Baden's propoſal, in conjunction with Venice and Savoy, to maintain 20000 foot and 4000 horſe, for recovery of the German liberty (See N°. CDII.). That he has preſented his letters and relation ſent to him, to his majeſty; and muſt truly ſay, his majeſty doth not only graciouſly vouchſafe his endeavours, but reads them with pleaſure and delight. p. 567.

CDXVI. To Lord KONESPOLSKY, General of the POLES. Sir Thomas ſets forth his ſervices and negotiations in behalf of the Poles, at the deſire of his Poliſh majeſty. That tho' the Turks have given the Poliſh ambaſſador fair words, and promiſe of peace, yet (as he dextrouſly inſinuates, for reaſons given to lord Conway, N°. CDXI, CDXIV.) the Tartar han pays them no obedience but for his own ſake; and therefore it will be beſt to rely more upon their own ſtrength, than on the Ottoman promiſes. Receives with due gratitude the invitation of his Poliſh majeſty, and of his lordſhip, to paſs thro' Poland in his way to England; but that the ſudden death of the perſon appointed to ſucceed him at the Porte, has engaged his ſtay beyond his expectation; and aſſures his majeſty and his lordſhip of ſuch ſervices during his ſtay, as may befit the friendſhip between the kings of England and Poland, and, for his own part, a good Chriſtian. p. 568.

CDXVIII. To the Duke of BUCKINGHAM. Deplores the miſcarriage of a letter, afterwards received, (See N°. CCCLXXXVIII.) which lord Grandiſon inform'd him, his grace had written to him. That he has now brought all things entruſted to his negotiation, to a happy iſſue, which he enumerates, and begs his revocation. His difficulties in the matter of marbles. Mr. Petty's proceedings. Gives his grace a further account of his diligence and induſtry in this ſearch. p. 570.

CDXIX. To Lord CONWAY. Junction of Gabor with count Mansfelt. Their ſucceſsful progreſs. The Poliſh ambaſſador diſpatched home, with very little ſatisfaction, none of his demands being comply'd with, tho' ſupported by the French ambaſſador, on Sir Thomas's declining to do it. What thoſe demands were. What he has obtained. That the Poles will be obliged to keep up their forces on the Turkiſh ſide, (as he had projected, N°. CDXI, CDXIV.) and ſo will not be at liberty to uſe them againſt the king of Sweden, as they had intended That a declaration is procured from the Porte, that if the Poles make any attempt upon Gabor's territories, in his abſence from them, it will be looked upon as an infraction of their peace with the Porte. That Ludovicus Camerarius, the king of Sweden's reſident at the Hague, being willing to correſpond with him; he deſires to know ſpeedily his majeſty's pleaſure how far he may inlarge himſelf to him. Loſs of the Turks before Babylon (See N° CDI.) greater than reported at firſt. Renews his ſuit for a revocation, God having bleſſed all his negotiations there with ſucceſs, leſt he ſhould ſee an ebb-tide. p. 577.

CDXX. Relation of a great advantage obtain'd by Gabor and count Mansfelt over the imperialiſts, under count Wallenſtein. Letters of encouragement ſent to Gabor from the Porte, with three veſts of honour; one for him, one for Morteſa baſſa of Buda, the other for Muchemet baſſa of Agria, who purſu'd Wallenſtein in his retreat. p. 572.

CDXXI To the Lords of his Majeſty's Council. On occaſion of a controverſy between Mr. Leate and the Levant company, about the charges of the negotiation and maintenance of the peace with the Algerines and Tuniſians, concerning which both ſides requeſt him to inform their lordſhips what he knows; he briefly ſtates the affair of his negotiation in relation to thoſe Moors, and the progreſs thereof from the beginning of his embaſſy to the preſent time; and notifies what he has done for the renewal of the treaties with thoſe ports of Barbary, with further conditions to the advantage of the Engliſh. That tho' he has borne his part above his ability, and has redeemed more ſlaves out of his poor means, than concurs with thrift or worldly providence, yet he will omit his own caſe, and become a petitioner for Mr. Leate, that he may not be made a ſad example to warn others not to ſerve the publick to their own ruin. Hopes for his ſpeedy revocation and return, when he ſhall make all particulars clear, and ſhew both the profit and poſſibility of their trade and peace in relation to the Engliſh commerce. p 572.

CDXXII. From Sir ISAAC WAKE at VENICE Being juſt returned to his reſidence there, he ſends Sir Thomas the firſt-fruits of his pen. Gives him ſome brief intimations of the league he has been negotiating between the marquis of Baden, Venice, and Savoy, (See N°. CDII, CDXV.) which when fully perfected by the concurrence of the two latter, he will be more particular in. Cardinal of Savoy promiſes to promote vigorouſly the intereſt of the archbiſhop of Smyrna, recommended by Sir Thomas (See N°. CCCLXX, CCCLXXI). p. 575.

CDXXIII. To Mr. WILKINSON. Sir Thomas apprehends freſh troubles at Conſtantinople from the ſoldiers, who, he ſays, are return'd from the Aſian war, as inſolent as cowards. Impudent anſwer of a ſpahee to the grand viſier, who had refuſed him a place unfit for him. p. 576.

CDXXIV. From Sir ISAAC WAKE to Lord CONWAY. His audience of the doge and ſenate of Venice. He moves them in behalf of the Griſons, and adviſes them of a dangerous intrigue of the Spaniards with that people. Communicates to them his majeſty's zealous efforts for the common cauſe, and preſſes them to co-operate with his majeſty and him in relation to Gabor, and to the treaty ſet on foot with the marquis of Baden. Their favourable anſwer to all his propoſitions; and the conduct he deſigns to obſerve. That he intends to make good uſe of their declaration, that the treaty of peace in Italy, was concluded without their participation or conſent, contrary to what the French every-where gave out. p. 576.

CDXXV. From Sir ISAAC WAKE to Sir THOMAS ROE. He ſends copies of ſeveral letters and diſpatches, and among them, a copy of the above; and will conſtantly ſend what other advices may be neceſſary, that Sir Thomas may be punctually informed of all that paſſes at Venice, in regard of the notable uſe he makes of it for the publick benefit. Tho' they have news of the good ſucceſs of Gabor, yet from Vienna, they give ſuch news as makes his deſigns doubtful. Deſires to govern himſelf as to the ſervice of this prince at Venice, by the advices he ſhall receive from Sir Thomas of Gabor's conduct. That the king of Denmark has made ſuch good uſe of his misfortune, that he holds Tilly at bay; and in the ſpring, he hopes, will have the better of him. The uncertain ſtate of affairs in Piedmont. That as to France, it is like Galilee; no good thing is expected from it: But that there is ſome hope in their natural inconſtancy; for if they vary, it muſt be for the better; ſince 'tis impoſſible they can do worſe than they have done of late. p. 578.

CDXXVI. To the Lord CONWAY. That a new courier arrived at Conſtantinople, brings fire in one hand, and water in the other: Being, firſt, the news of a ſignal victory obtained by Bethlem Gabor and count Mansfelt over the Imperialiſts; and, next, that he hath made a truce, and conſented to ſend two commiſſioners to treat. Sir Thomas's repreſentations and expoſtulations hereupon to the prince's agents; and their excuſes of their maſter's conduct. Sir Thomas thinks theſe excuſes plauſible, for reaſons which he gives; but, on the other hand, thinks that the Turks will not avow the forwardneſs of the baſſa of Buda in this war, becauſe of the deſperate ſtate of their affairs in Aſia; and therefore that Gabor will be diſcouraged from going on, if he be not well hearten'd from Chriſtendom. That he wiſhes count Mansfelt had received directions to correſpond with him; for now he knows nothing but what Gabor and his agents think proper, for their own ends, to communicate to him; and that he could then have counter-worked him at the Porte, if there had been occaſion. How he intends to proceed in this doubtful ſituation, which he hopes will be well interpreted. p. 579.

CDXXVII. From the Lord CONWAY. With advice to Sir Thomas of the propoſitions of Bethlem Gabor to his majeſty by his agent captain Quadt, and what has been concluded thereupon, as it is not doubted, to the full ſatisfaction of that prince. That he has, as Sir Thomas deſired, (N° CDI.) acknowledged the civilities of the ſenate of Venice intended to Sir Thomas on his return. That as to his ſucceſſor, three perſons are to be elected by the company, and preſented to his majeſty; one of which he will chuſe: That the choice will probably fall upon Mr. Wyche, who ſhould have been agent in Spain: So that he need not doubt his revocation; which he will take care ſhall be ſo timely, that he ſhall not loſe the fit ſeaſon for his return. p. 580.

CDXXVIII. To the Counteſs of BEDFORD. After a very courtly and polite addreſs to her ladyſhip, he preſents her with a catalogue of antient coins and medals, which he has collected in his pilgrimage, as he calls it; among which there are ſome ſo rare, he ſays, that he believes the cabinets of Paris, which muſter 12000, cannot match them. He enters beautifully into the uſefulneſs as well as the delight, which this ſtudy produces. That four things are required in medals, truth, antiquity, beauty, ſtory, or poetry. For theſe the metal is one of the beſt witneſſes. That copper is ſeldom a counterfeit. What is to be diſcerned in antiquities of this kind; and which are moſt, and which leaſt eſteemed. His thoughts of thoſe which are truly medals, and of their firſt original. He deſcribes the Roman braſs coins: Shews when ſilver were beaten, and when gold were ſtamped: when medals: when conſular monies. That the tribunes and cenſors alſo coined; but he reckons theſe three in one order; but cannot be beaten off from valuing them, having three of the four requiſite qualities, as above. Of the plain monies: Among theſe he mentions many that were not coins, but pure medals, as he inſtances in ſeveral ſtruck on remarkable occaſions. That we muſt take heed not to condemn all thoſe for falſe which we find inſcribed with elder names or actions than our rule will juſtify, nor to deem them made by thoſe men, and in thoſe times, whoſe memory they carry; they being ſtamped or ſtruck by their poſterity, deſirous to revive the glory of their anceſtors, and inſinuate their own. Several inſtances of this kind. When medals began to be neceſſary and uſual, and of what metal. When the honour they were deſigned to confer, began to be debaſed, and why: when the art was at the higheſt. Curious ones of the more modern empire, in his poſſeſſion, which are very ſcarce. When barbariſm and ignorance prevailed, and arts were forgotten and diſgraced, all the ſtamps, as he obſerves, are brute; but ſuch as they are, he will endeavour to follow the ſucceſſion as low as he can, becauſe they are not ſeen in the Weſt. He ſpeaks then of Greek medals, and enumerates ſome rare pieces of them; and doubts not, when he returns, her ladyſhip will teach him more than he can find out without help. p. 583.

CDXXIX. To Lord CONWAY. General rumour at Conſtantinople of Gabor's truce, and a treaty begun, of great uſe to the emperor's affairs at the Porte. That Gabor's miniſters, at leaſt in appearance, ſolicit contrary effects; but there is ſo little ground on either ſide, that he knows not what to rely upon. That it would have been of great ſervice for counterbalancing Gabor's deſigns at the Porte, had count Mansfelt correſponded with him; but, he doubts not, that his majeſty hath, from that general, an account of the motives to this change. That the Dutch ambaſſador hath received bills for 30,000 dollars to be paid Gabor, which makes him aſham'd, that when he has raiſed and upheld this negotiation, all the honour and grace of it ſhould paſs over his head to others; whereby he, Sir Thomas, is diſabled and diminiſhed with all the miniſters. That he wanted neither credit nor affection, yet was ambitious of nothing but to have known and marched pari gradu, with others, the better to have ſerved his maſter. Halil-baſſa, the only ſoldier of the old breed of that empire, is made grand viſier; and with him a new aga of the Janizaries, and all officers of war: That, contrary to their cuſtom, they are order'd to ſet out in ten days from their advancement, though in extreme winter, for Aſia. He hopes his majeſty has long ſince diſcharged him of this diſgraceful employment, in which he lives with more diſcontent, than, being unguilty, he could do in any priſon of England. p. 584.

CDXXX. From Sir ISAAC WAKE. That the agent of the marquis of Baden at Venice has not yet been able to procure that republick's concurrence with his majeſty and Savoy to his maſter's propoſitions (See N° CDII, CDXV, CDXXII). Count Mansfelt dies in his journey from Hungary to Venice, on whoſe valour, and other qualities, the Venetians ſo much depended, that they thought it needleſs to agree with the marquis of Baden, and poſtpon'd his agent in expectation of the general's arrival at Venice. Dr. Joachim Kratz arrives opportunely on the death of Mansfelt, from the king of Denmark, which he hopes may confirm the Venetians. The Dutch ambaſſador order'd to join both with Sir Iſaac Wake and Dr. Kratz, in negotiation. News in relation to the Valteline, France, &c. p. 585.

CDXXXI. From Lord CONWAY. That the Venetian ambaſſador in England moved his majeſty ſtrongly to order Sir Thomas to oppoſe the newly nominated baſſa of Tunis going thither; and mentions it, as a reſolution taken by all the ambaſſadors reſident at Conſtantinople, on account of the known character of that baſſa for pyratical acts, and the protection he will probably give to pyrates: But that his majeſty having no advices from him (Sir Thomas) of ſuch an oppoſition, or the neceſſity for it, has ſuſpended complying with the ambaſſador's requeſt, till he hears from him. The great encomiums that ambaſſador gives Sir Thomas, who ſays, that not only his quality as ambaſſador, but his perſonal virtues, had won him ſingular reſpect and eſtimation with his maſters. That his lordſhip took the firſt opportunity to acquaint his majeſty with it, that he might ſee he had received both honour and ſervice by Sir Thomas's employment, as acknowledged by a ſtate which had both opportunity and cauſe to obſerve his proceedings. Mentions with honour, Sir Iſaac Wake, who he ſays likewiſe much eſteems Sir Thomas; and doubts not the good and neceſſary correſpondence between them. He fears that the marquis of Baden's propoſition (See N° CDII, CDXV, CDXXII, CDXXX.) will be rendered fruitleſs by the refuſal of the Venetians to join in it; who ſtill hope the French will ſee their late errors, and return; and ſo care not to ſeparate from them: In which caſe they think they ſhall not want the marquis; being alſo in expectation of a diverſion by Mansfelt in Styria and Carinthia, of greater importance to them, if it can be effected. But, however, ever, that his majeſty muſt have the honour, not to have neglected the marquis's offer, if the reſt would have concurred That he will ſhortly receive order for his return, Sir Peter Wyche being choſen to ſucceed him. But that, to deal plainly with him, he has always conceived, that the neceſſity of his majeſty's ſervice would have required his continuance another year; but that he would never hint ſo much to his majeſty becauſe of his and his lady's earneſt deſire to return. That his majeſty well approves of the aſſiſtance he has given (See N° CDXI, CDXIV.) to Gabor's agent, and particularly in the point of inveſtiture to his lady. That his refuſal of ſome of Gabor's propoſitions, and alteration of others, (See N° CDIX.) with his reſolution how to govern himſelf in the buſineſs concerning Poland, (See CDXI, CDXIV.) are agreeable to his majeſty's intention. That he knows not what orders the French ambaſſador at the Porte may have received, whoſe actions Sir Thomas cenſures (See N° CDXI. and elſewhere); but that their proceedings with England are contrary to amity and treaty. That on no other pretence than that thoſe goods of Spain which have been found in French ſhips, have been detained, and confiſcated, a practice juſtify'd by all nations; they have arreſted throughout France, contrary to expreſs treaty, all the merchants ſhips and goods of the Engliſh: That this, at the ſuit of the merchants, has brought on the like orders of arreſt of the French ſhips by way of reprizal; which are to be ſold to make good the merchants loſſes, if they can obtain no other ſatisfaction: For his majeſty, the ſecretary ſays, will not deny his ſubjects protection, in caſe he cannot procure timely juſtice. But yet he hopes things will be accommodated. p. 586.

CDXXXII. To the Lord Conway. That he incloſes two copies of letters, one ſent by him (See ſubſeq. N°.) to Gabor, and the other to count Mansfelt. (See N° CDXXXIV). That the emperor's agent at Conſtantinople had lately received a great diſgrace there; but that the French ambaſſador, reſpecting more the puncto of outward honour, than the then exigence of affairs, had unſeaſonably repaired it. Obſervations on Gabor's conduct, and on his inſiſting now, which he did not at firſt, that the Turks continue their aids to him, which their fears will not eaſily ſuffer them to comply with. Hopes to be better illuminated by count Mansfelt; but begs inſtructions for his conduct in the preſent ſituation of affairs, that he may not ſwerve from his majeſty's intentions. p. 589.

CDXXXIII To Bethlem Gabor. He joyfully congratulates his ſucceſſes: Doubts not that his complaints of neglect from his majeſty are before now ſatisfy'd. That the principal one is anſwer'd by count Mansfelt's joining his highneſs; and that to the other, a large part of the contribution in money is remitted by the king of Denmark, in which his royal maſter is greatly intereſted; and there can be no difficulty but in the exchanges, and that he ſhall be able to remove as ſoon as commanded. He encourages him with ſtrong aſſurances of his majeſty's ſtedfaſtneſs, and that of his allies. The great advantage which the Imperial agent makes of the rumours of a truce and treaty ſet on foot by his highneſs, and the jealouſy it may give his allies. He intimates that his league did not depend upon the Turkiſh aids he now inſiſts upon. Repreſents to him the ſtate of that empire; that the cure of all their fears is in his own power. Sets forth the reaſons why Morteſa, baſſa of buda, ſhould in intereſt follow the cauſe he had begun, notwithſtanding a letter ſent him, diſavowing his engagement in the war. (See N° CDXI, CDXII). That, indeed, the new grand viſier could not be prevailed upon to countenance openly the rupture, becauſe he was obliged to ſet out for Aſia ſoon after his promotion: That the chimacham's fears and ſelfiſhneſs in this particular, are not to be heeded, and why. That the beſt and wiſeſt men, and thoſe likelieſt to be advanced, are of favourable ſentiments. Intimates the advice which his highneſs may give to the Porte on this occaſion. Promiſes to do all in his power, and dare engage, when it comes to the point of debate, that a peace with the emperor will not be accepted. p 589.

CDXXXIV. To Count Mansfelt. That his excellency's offers of a correſpondence with him, have prevented him, being determined to invite his excellency to it, on the firſt occaſion That his excellency's propoſition of procuring a free paſſage thro' the grand ſignor's territories, for ſuch forces as he ſhall land in Dalmatia, will be hard of digeſtion at the Porte; for that, tho' they hate ſome Chriſtians more than others, yet are they jealous of all. That, however, he will do his endeavour, if, firſt, the inclination which the Turks ſhew at preſent to a peace with the emperor, be renounced, and a reſolution if not to aſſiſt in the war, yet to let the treaties remain as they are, be obtained; which is now the chief object of his negotiation That, for this purpoſe, he has written to prince Gabor, and open'd to him the true condition of that empire, and the way to keep them engaged, which muſt come from the borders; no argument being able to prevail with them againſt their ignorance, fears, and a general maxim, not to embrace two wars at the ſame time. That from Gabor therefore, and Morteſa baſſa of Buda, muſt come the means that ſhall induce them; for the one is actually a ſubject, and the other they look upon as theirs. His apprehenſions of the bad conſequence of inſiſting, as Gabor now ſeems to do, on the Turks aiding him openly in the war, eſpecially now a truce is enter'd into, and his excellency departed from the army, of which the emperor's agent makes no ſmall advantage. In fine, that it will reſt with Gabor to bring the Turks either into peace or war, who is able to guide and deceive them both ways. Therefore he deſires his excellency to obſerve the purpoſes of that prince, that he may know how to conform his negotiations there accordingly, in which he may be able to do his excellency better ſervice than he can otherwiſe pretend to. p. 591.

CDXXXV. From Sir Francis Nethersole. Proceedings of count Tilly againſt the king of Denmark. The ſuccours deſigned him from the Low-countries unavoidably delay'd. A Daniſh ambaſſador to France ſeized by the Spaniards. Is apprehenſive of the diſcovery that may be made from his papers. M. Quadt, agent of Gabor, returns reaſonably well ſatisfy'd from England. Other proceedings in Holland and the Low-countries. A Dutch ſkipper ſeizes a great ſum of money deſigned to pay the Spaniſh gariſons in thoſe parts. p. 592.

CDXXXVI. From Sir Isaac Wake. The retinue of count Mansfelt, after his death, (See N° CDXXX.) arrive at Venice, and apply to Sir Iſaac, as one who beſt knew that general's intentions and deſigns. Gabor's demands of money and foot ſoldiers to the number of 10,000, to enable him to beſiege and keep towns, his troops being principally cavalry. He promiſes if his aſſignations be duly paid, never to make peace without general conſent. Mansfelt's army left in his hands. The troops of the duke of Weimar alſo take their winter quarters in Hungary, under his protection: He pretends, that he has treated for a ſuſpenſion of arms, only to gain time. A meſſenger from him at Venice, privately, who is to carry him back ſuch anſwers as will determine him for peace or war. The Engliſh, Daniſh, and Dutch ambaſſadors join to ſatisfy him; but are troubled with the French ambaſſador, who ſays, he has no orders. That Sir Iſaac will aſſure this meſſenger of his majeſty's concurrence and zeal for the common ſervice. The marquis of Baden's propoſitions (See N° CDXXXI, &c.) rejected at Venice. That Gabor complains ſharply of the ambaſſador of France at Conſtantinople, who eſtranges himſelf from him now he is in the field, after he had inſtigated him to commence hoſtilities, and avowed he had money in his hands from his king to pay his highneſs. Sir Iſaac is deſirous to know how that ambaſſador, and thoſe of Venice and Holland act towards that prince, and if, as he is made believe, they have really orders to ſupply him with money. p. 593.

CDXXXVII. To Lord CONWAY. In the great uncertainty he is in of Gabor's deſigns, knowing nothing of them but what his own agents think fit to communicate, he eſteems it his duty to inform his majeſty of every thing that comes to his hand, and to leave the judgment to his wiſdom. Gabor's excuſes to the court of Vienna for breaking the former peace with them. Anſwer of that court, and what they inſiſt upon from him. His proceedings. Sir Thomas's obſervations upon, and opinion of the preſent ſtate of matters in regard to that prince, and the inclination and views of the Turks in relation to him. That he complains vehemently of the non-performance of the contributions, the Dutch ambaſſador with-holding them on a punctilio. His opinion of count Manſfelt's project to procure a body of foot ſoldiers from Venice. (See N° CDXXXIV). p. 594.

CDXXXVIII. Abſtract of Advices from VIENNA: ſent with the preceding Letter. Articles propoſed to Gabor by the court of Vienna. Motions of the Imperial army, affairs of Sileſia, &c. Gabor anſwers and rejects thoſe articles. p. 595.

CDXXXIX. To Lord CONWAY. The news of count Manſfelt's death being brought to the duke of Weimar, who had been 14 days ill of a fever, he falls into an apoplexy, and dies. Diſpoſitions of the army he commanded on that occaſion, as alſo of that commanded by count Manſfelt. Tranſylvanian agent excuſes his maſter's proceedings, in relation to the truce. Sir Thomas's expoſtulations thereupon: His reply, giving the reaſon for that ſtep, and that it was done in concert with count Manſfelt, the duke of Weimar, the king of Denmark, &c. and declares, that the next ſummer the prince would again take the field, and march directly into Auſtria, where it was promiſed the king of Denmark would meet him, unite their armies, and put an end to the miſeries of chriſtendom; moſt ſolemnly aſſerting, that his maſter had no thought of peace, if he was not abandon'd of all ſides. The prince in a letter moves Sir Thomas to procure Morteſa, baſſa of Buda, to be recalled to Conſtantinople, in order to ſatisfy the Porte as to his proceedings, as well as to thoſe of the prince; and to do all he could to induce the Turks to continue their aids to Gabor. Sir Thomas, in anſwer ſhews, firſt, that the neceſſity the prince inſiſted upon of the Turkiſh aids was intirely new; that it was next to impoſſible to effect it, as things then ſtood; and could only be effected, if at all, by himſelf: That the prince had entered into a league with the ſovereigns of Chriſtendom, as ſui juris, and without ſuppoſing thoſe aids ſo abſolutely neceſſary, as he ſeemed now to think them. That it was his opinion, and that of many others, that ſuch an open aid from the Turks would do the emperor more ſervice than otherwiſe, by uniting all the princes of his communion in his behalf, and inducing them to make contributions for him as in a war againſt the Turks. That as to the recalling of Morteſa, if it was done at this time, when the Turks out of fear blamed and diſavow'd his engaging in hoſtilities, it would be certainly to deſtroy him; and that as he was an active man, and an enemy to the emperor, all fineſſe ſhould be rather uſed to keep him in, and at, his poſt. The agent owns himſelf convinced in relation to the propoſed recalling of Morteſa, and agrees to ſuſpend the application deſired for that purpoſe. Sir Thomas's opinion that Gabor is not ſincerely diſpoſed to peace with the emperor, and his reaſons in ſupport of it: That, however, the countenance of the Turks is neceſſary to Gabor; and therefore Sir Thomas finds out an excellent medium, which in any light may at laſt produce the deſired end both for Gabor and his allies: This is, to procure the grand ſignor to ſuſpend all treaty with the emperor, and to declare that he will obſerve a neutrality in the war. The good uſes that may be made of this project. That the emperor is not ſo fond of preſerving peace with Turkey, as was apprehended; and believes he ſhould have more advantage, in their preſent ſituation, if they ſhould enter into the war. That Wallenſtein was diſgraced at Vienna, becauſe he did not invade the Turkiſh dominions, and recalled on that account, p. 597.

CDXL. To Lord CONWAY. A curious account of other proceedings of Gabor with the Turkiſh miniſters, which ſhew, as Sir Thomas thinks, his ſincerity to purſue the war. They encourage Gabor, and continue Morteſa in the baſſaſhip of Buda. Sir Thomas's conference with the viſier, whom he influences beyond his hopes, and brings into his projected neutrality (See preced.); and who impowers him to write to the court of England of the grand ſignor's favourable reſolutions. Sir Thomas encouraged to hope, that Manſfelt's project (See N° CDXXXIV, CDXXXVII) to obtain a free paſſage for new forces thro' the territories of the Porte, from Venice, &c. (which he had deſpair'd of ſucceeding in) would be conſented to, for the reinforcing of Gabor. Reaſons from all theſe proceedings, to be aſſur'd of Gabor's ſincerity to the league. That as that prince deſires a nobleman of diſtinction to ſucceed count Manſfelt with him, Sir Thomas gives his opinion why the old count de Torne is the propereſt man that can be pitched upon. That ſeeing the ſucceſs of his endeavours, and alteration in the Ottoman councils, are ſo much above his hopes, he thinks himſelf obliged to give the reaſons that have induced this favourable turn; and accordingly ſets forth in a very curious manner thoſe reaſons, and the then ſtate, views and policies of the Turks; which in ſo many reſpects will be favourable to his majeſty's deſigns. But that, as they cannot build upon faith at the Porte, he ſubmits all to his majeſty's wiſdom. A warm diſpute between the Tranſylvanian agent and the French ambaſſador in relation to his paſt fervor and preſent coolneſs in his maſter's affairs. Sends to the king a tranſlation of the grand ſignor's letter to his majeſty congratulating his acceſſion, and promiſing redreſs of grievances to the Engliſh merchants by the exactions of the Turkiſh cuſtom-houſe officers, &c. and ſignifying that he has got an addition to the capitulations in favour of England. That in this letter the grand ſignor makes a ſtrong repreſentation againſt depredations committed on his ſubjects in the Red-ſea. Sir Thomas gives the cauſe and foundation of thoſe complaints; and alleges that they are owing to the Dutch, who revenge on the Turks, under the Engliſh flag, injuſtice done to their merchants. Sir Thomas adviſes what is to be done in this caſe, for preventing greater evils, and leſt the innocent ſhould ſuffer; and repreſents how much the Turks are affected by the cauſe of the complaint, and the neceſſity to the Engliſh commerce to ſet the matter right. That he has wrote on this occaſion to the Levant company, &c. p. 599.

CDXLI. The SULTAN's Letter to his MAJESTY. Containing, as above-mentioned, congratulations on his majeſty's acceſſion: Aſſurances of amity: Matters relating to the peace and commerce with the Barbary ſtates: To the Engliſh merchants complaints againſt the officers of the Turkiſh cuſtoms, and to the behaviour of the late viceroy of Algier againſt the Engliſh, for all which he promiſes reparation. And inſiſts upon the ſame for injuries received, as he ſays, by his ſubjects in the Red-ſea from the Engliſh. p. 603.

CDXLII. From Sir ISAAC WAKE. The meaſures he takes on occaſion of Manſfelt's death, to give Gabor no pretence of deſerting the common cauſe. Meaſures taken by the ambaſſadors of Venice, Holland, and Sir Iſaac, with that prince. Daniſh ambaſſador quits Venice well ſatisfy'd, and leaves his commiſſion with Sir Iſaac. Treaty with the marquis of Baden (mentioned to be rejected by the Venetians, N° CDXXXVI.) likely to be perfected; that prince offering to procure ſome other power to ſupply the place of the Venetians. p. 606.

CDXLIII. Sir ISAAC WAKE's Letter to the Prince of TRANSYLVANIA, in the name of himſelf, the Venetian, and Dutch miniſters, in order to encourage that prince, and to repreſent the affairs of Chriſtendom in as favourable a light as the truth would bear. This letter is written in Latin, and ſo fully diſplays the great qualities of the writer, that we refer to it, as it contains many beau-ties, of which no abſtract can give an adequate idea. p. 607.

CDXLIV. To Sir Isaac Wake. Sir Thomas rejoices in the diſcourſes and copies he has received from Sir Iſaac, by which, he ſays, the ſun hath riſen again to him from the other hemiſphere, he having lived more than ſix months in Cimmerian darkneſs. Is glad to hear of a new league forming with the marquis of Baden (See N° cdxlii.) Sends him copies of Gabor's letters, thoſe of count Mansfelt, his anſwers, and his account to lord Conway ſince the rumour of the truce; from all which, he tells him he will know as much as he, and diſpoſe it better. He then touches upon Mansfelt's project of procuring troops to paſs to Gabor thro' the Turkiſh territories; which he thinks he could bring to effect (See N° cdxl): Upon his opinion of count de Torne's fitneſs to ſucceed Mansfelt, whoſe character he gives: Upon the backwardneſs of the Venetians to ſupply Gabor with money; and the conduct and anſwers of their ambaſſador at the Porte, when urged home on this ſubject: Upon the complaints of Gabor; and the neceſſity of punctuality in furniſhing him with money, if it be deſir'd to keep him ſtedfaſt: Upon the orders he has received from lord Conway on this occaſion, to delay the prince's expectations in money-matters, which he regrets: Upon what he had done upon his own credit, and could further do, if he could be aſſur'd of any good aſſignations to preſerve it: That if Gabor be not dealt with more efficaciouſly, he can make his peace eaſier than his war for nothing. The conduct of the French ambaſſador at the Porte. Thanks Sir Iſaac for his favours to the archbiſhop of Smyrna, (See N° ccclxx, ccclxxi.) who hopes thereby to end his life quietly in his own country, and to do ſome ſervice to the Engliſh nation. p. 608.

CDXLV. To the ſame. That ſince his laſt letters he had had ſome conference with the Venetian ambaſſador, to diſcover whether the Venetians aſſiſted or countenanc'd Gabor privately, as Sir Iſaac (N° cdxxxvi.) ſays they made him believe at Venice. Sir Thomas inquires of the ſaid ambaſſador whether any aſſiſtance to Gabor was likely to be procured by his mediation with the ſenate; ſetting forth to him the great efforts made by his majeſty. That ambaſſador's ingenuous anſwers to both points, giving little hopes of the ſenate's entering into new charges. So that, as Sir Thomas obſerves, Sir Iſaac may govern himſelf at Venice, on this occaſion, according to the then favourable conjunctures, to urge them to encourage a diverſion ſo much for their own benefit, as well as that of the common cauſe. p. 610.

CDXLVI. To Bethlem Gabor. He ſets before him the ſecret diſpoſition of the Turks in favour of a war againſt the emperor, of the like tenor with what he had written to lord Conway, (N° cdxxxix, cdxl.) from which his highneſs may look upon his hoſtile proceedings as ſufficiently countenanc'd at the Porte, which was the thing he aimed at. Repreſents what his majeſty had done in relation to the contributions, and had determined further to do. That he had by his ambaſſador at Venice ſolemnly recommended it to the ſenate to aſſiſt his highneſs in ſome proportion, and had received an encouraging anſwer. He repreſents to his highneſs the great efforts and zeal of his majeſty in the common cauſe, by his armies, his fleets, his contributions to his allies, &c. That new leagues with other German princes are entering into for the ſame purpoſe. That the treaty about the Valteline is broken, and that the Griſons had united with the Swiſs, the Venetians and duke of Savoy, not to accept of that treaty made between the French and Spaniards. That if it be neceſſary, he doubts not he can procure paſſage of the Turks for reinforcements: From all which he encourages the prince to make uſe of the happy conjuncture then offering to proſecute his engagements. p. 611.

CDXLVII To Lord Conway. Obſervations on the ſtyle of the grand ſignor's letter (See cdxli). That the part promiſed in it by the ſultan in favour of the Engliſh is perform'd, and Sir Thomas earneſtly deſires, for fear of bad conſequences, that the point complained of therein by the Turks, may be looked into, and put right. Arrival at Raguſa of an agent ſuſpected to be Spaniſh, but pretending to come from the emperor: Conferences among the ambaſſadors reſident thereupon, who give reaſons for not ſtopping him there, as they had done a Spaniſh agent before (See N° ccclxvii). Conduct of the French ambaſſador on this occaſion. Sir Thomas acquaints the chimacham with that perſon's arrival. That miniſter's aſſurances to him, and his promiſe, that if a Spaniard, he wou'd ſend him back unheard; if an Imperial agent, that he ſhould be told he came in by a wrong and ſuſpicious door, to wit, that of Naples and Raguſa; and either way ſhould be diſmiſſed with diſgrace. That agent's arrival at Conſtantinople: He is guarded, and all his papers ſeized. Strong rumours of a peace concluded with the emperor. Sir Thomas's earneſt expoſtulations hereupon with the agent of Gabor, and afterwards with the chimacham. That miniſter ſolemnly ſwears to let him into the truth of the report, and gives him an account of the ſecret motives for the rumours, which were to quiet the mufti and others, who were againſt two wars at once; and lets him into the deſigns and policies of the Porte on this occaſion, to gain time only. And injoins him to ſecrecy, but that he may acquaint his court of the reliance they may have upon his former aſſurances, (N° cdxl.) and upon his preſent declarations; tho' for a colour Morteſa has inſtructions to treat upon four articles with the emperor, which he knows will not be granted. He alſo aſſures him, that Gabor had no purpoſes of peace; and promiſes, that as ſoon as the commiſſions to Morteſa ſhall be finiſhed, Sir Thomas himſelf ſhall read them for his intire ſatiſfaction. Sir Thomas's perplexity what to believe in a place where is no faith; yet inclines, for reaſons which he gives, to credit the chimacham and Gabor's agent. That, however, he is convinced, that all depends upon Gabor, and refers it to his majeſty's wiſdom to encourage him to perſeverance and ſtedfaſtneſs. Further account of the treatment of the ſuppoſed Spaniſh agent conformable to what the viſier had promiſed above. Reſolutions of the Turkiſh miniſtry what to do with him, and that they will refer him to Morteſa baſſa of Buda. That this is a further ſign of the truth of the chimacham's aſſeverations. p. 613.

CDXLVIII. To the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. In relation to antient Greek MSS. The patriarch ſends to Sir Thomas for the king the old bible, (mentioned N° ccxli, cccxxxiv, ccclxii.) which he values as the greateſt antiquity of the Greek church. Some accounts of it, and of St Tecla the ſuppoſed writer. That the councils (See N° ccclxi, ccclxii.) are yet in his hand, and he hopes to keep them, which alone, he ſays, are worth a library. The patriarch promiſes, that Sir Thomas, before he goes, ſhall ſee what he has, and freely take his choice. That another buſineſs is mentioned to him by the patriarch, which he dare not mention, for his ſake, without cypher, which may bring a treaſure of books into his majeſty's protection, and which other ſtates have ſought in vain, which he will take ſome ſafe way to mention to his grace. p. 618.

CDXLIX. To the Duke of Buckingham. Rejoices in the favour of his grace's letter to him, (N° ccclxxxviii). which (N° cdxviii.) he feared was loſt; and in the proſpect of his return. Some further account of his diligence in the ſearch after marbles, &c. That he has furniſhed a capable ſervant of his own, with a command, the captain baſſa's letter, the patriarch's recommendation, and ſufficient credit, and expects good fruits from his ſkill and induſtry. Account of two fine marble gates which he has got from an old temple in the iſlands. p. 619.

CDL. From Sir Isaac Wake. With the news of Venice, the new treaty, the Valteline affairs; the entrance into it of the pope's troops by connivance of the Venetians; the reſentments and appeals to heaven of the poor Griſons: A cenſure on the Venetians on this occaſion. The diſlike of the Proteſtant cantons to the proceedings hereupon, &c. p. 619.

CDLI. From the KING. In approbation of Sir Thomas's wiſdom, zeal, and ſucceſs in all his negotiations at the Porte; taking notice alſo of the eſtimation he is in with the other ambaſſadors reſident there, and with all, whom he has negotiated with. Promiſing ſpecial remembrance of his ſervices, whereof, for his comfort and encouragement, his majeſty gives him this aſſurance and teſtimony under his own royal hand; and withal to let him know, that tho' his majeſty might have found it for his ſervice to continue him there longer, yet he had ſuffered his reiterated earneſt ſuits to prevail for his revocation. Refers him to lord Conway for the reſt. p. 620.

CDLII. From Lord CONWAY. In cypher, he acquaints him with the hopes they have of Gabor's ſincerity, notwithſtanding his truce, the rather for the confidence Sir Thomas had of it: That the cauſe needs him; and that leſt the deaths of Mansfelt and Weimar ſhould make him faulter, Sir Thomas would do well to quicken and confirm him. [N. B. This Sir Thomas had done before, ſee N° CDXLVI]. That Sir Iſaac Wake and the other ambaſſadors at Venice, have done the like (See N° CDXLIII). That he doubts not Sir Iſaac Wake, (who does him in his letters that right and honour which he deſerves) acquaints him with what paſſes at Venice: That the reſt is referred to his own wiſdom, as he ſhall judge moſt convenient for the king's ſervice. That as to what he had written (N° CDXI, CDXIV.) in relation to the ſtate of affairs between Turkey and Poland; to the king of Sweden's diverſion of the aids the Poliſh king might give to the emperor, if he was at liberty from apprehenſions of the Turks, and the ſetting at liberty the grand ſignor's gallies for the Mediterranean, all intimated by him, (N° CDXI, CDXIV. as above) his majeſty approves his providence and judgment, and preſumes that both the king of Sweden and Gabor will be encouraged thereby, and their conſtancy ſecured: And as he had deſired to know (N° CDXXIX.) if he might correſpond with Dr. Camerarius, miniſter of the king of Sweden at the Hague, his majeſty well approves of it, and that he may inlarge himſelf to him (he being a diſcreet and well-affected perſon) in all affairs and occurrences concerning the publick, which may be any way uſeful to the king of Sweden, and the publick ſervice, and whereof the ſpecial knowledge ought not in his own judgment to be reſerv'd to his majeſty. Reinforcements preparing for the king of Denmark. Sir Peter Wyche, his ſucceſſor, prepares for his journey. p. 620.

CDLIII. From Sir ISAAC WAKE. With the affairs of the Valteline, the conduct of the Venetians, Spaniards, Griſons, and other Italian affairs. p. 622.

CDLIV. To Lord CONWAY. Further account of the treatment of the ſuppoſed new Spaniſh agent (See N° CDXLVII). That agent is forced to decypher his own inſtructions. The contents of them. Sir Thomas is in great uncertainty upon the conduct of Gabor. Doubts not that his lordſhip has a ſhorter and more certain way of coming at his deſigns; ſince he can know nothing of him but from himſelf and his miniſters; and if he means ill, will not accuſe himſelf. That he will write all he knows and hears, that by laying facts together, a better judgment may be made of him and his views. p. 623.

CDLV. From Mr. WILKINSON, at Venice. With the intrigues of the pope, &c. in relation to the Valteline. p. 624.

CDLVI. To the Lords of the COUNCIL. He again renews his complaints in relation to the diſpute about the duties of conſulage between the Engliſh and Venetians in Aleppo (See N° CCCXVI, [CCCXVI], CDLXV, CDLXVI). The importance of this controverſy to the Levant company, whoſe ruin it muſt prove, if not redreſs'd; and the very great benefit and conſequence which that trade is of to the nation. The uſe which the ſenate of Venice has made of the remiſsneſs and delay at the Engliſh court, to whom this matter ſtood referr'd: A curious letter which ſets forth the nature of trade in general, the practice of the Venetians in particular on this head, the ſufferings of the Engliſh merchants by it, and the views and deſigns of that republick in it. Further obſervations on the curran trade (mentioned N° viii.) Gives advice about redreſſing the evil, anticipates objections on that ſcore, and ſhews the pernicious effects that will attend the letting this matter lie longer unnoticed, and unredreſſed. p. 625.

CDLVII. To Sir ISAAC WAKE. Sir Iſaac having (N° CDXXXVI.) deſired an account of the conduct of the reſidents of France, Holland, and Venice, at the Porte, in relation to Gabor, Sir Thomas gives the character and behaviour of each of thoſe miniſters. Gabor's diſcontent at receiving only 30,000 dollars for infinite hazards and expence. Rumours of Gabor's having made peace with the emperor. Sir Thomas applies to the viſier and to Gabor's agent hereupon. The latter denies it not categorically; but laments the cauſe, which he imputes to the French, and the Turkiſh miniſters; but pretends his maſter only ſeeks to gain time, and uſe arts of advantage. Sir Thomas for his own part, confounded, and reſolves to ſend to the prince, and do all he is able. Arrival of a new bailo at Conſtantinople. p. 626.

CDLVIII. To Lord CONWAY. That he had anticipated his lordſhip's inſtructions (N° CDLII.) in writing to confirm Gabor (See N° CDXLVI). That he is ſince confounded in the change of counſels, or uncertainty of rumours, being ty'd to the reports of the enemy, the credulity of ignorant Turks, or to believe Gabor's agents, who may be artfully firſt deceived: Yet will he neither hide ſhame nor ſorrow, becauſe, tho' his lordſhip may know a nearer way, ſome circumſtances may be of uſe. He then gives the particulars of what he hears, in relation to Gabor's new treaty of peace, and the articles of it, which are ſo impracticable and diſgraceful to him, that he cannot give them credit. He arraigns Gabor's conduct to his agent; who, tho' he denies to know any thing of it, or to credit the articles publiſhed, intimates that if he ſhould conclude a peace, he might be influenced by the delays of the inveſtiture to his lady, and other indignities of the Turks, together with the news which he had received of a peace treating in Germany by conſent of the Emperor and king of Denmark. Sir Thomas's warm expoſtulations on this diſcourſe, in defence of the princes of the alliance, and of his majeſty in particular, who could not expect to have the prince make ſuch a ſeparate and excluſive ſtep. Sir Thomas's reaſonings and opinion on the then critical ſtate of matters; and what uſe he had always propoſed to make of Gabor and his forces, which would have been of more ſervice, (by reaſon of his ſituation ſo near to Auſtria, and his flying horſe) in ravaging an enemy's country, than a much greater force employ'd in a formal war, in neutral countries. He hints at the courſe he ſhall take, if Gabor has concluded a peace, to ſpread a jealouſy in the Turks that may be of uſe to the common cauſe. Recites that prince's complaints of being neglected and deſerted by the Chriſtian princes, and his diſcontent at receiving only 30,000 dollars, for his great expence and dangers, caſting all the blame on France. That he (Sir Thomas) will not omit any thing in his power; but if nothing more can be done with Gabor, the cauſe has been no loſer by him, he having, while in arms, detained Wallenſtein's army in Hungary, which hath conſumed it; which, if it had been at liberty on the king of Denmark's diſaſter, might have been of fatal conſequence. p. 628.

CDLIX. The articles of peace referred to in the above letter, between the Emperor and the prince of Tranſylvania; in which the prince engages never to take up arms againſt the emperor or his ſucceſſors; not to aſſiſt his enemies, nor to plot againſt Hungary; nor to encourage the Turks, Tartars, or other invaders of the kingdom: To depart inſtantly from the emperor's dominions, and to reſtore all the effects belonging to his Imperial majeſty or his ſubjects: To renounce Mansfelt, and all his adherents, &c. That the prince's ſubjects in diet aſſembled, ſhall have the prince's conſent to ſwear to the obſervations of theſe articles, and do homage to the emperor: That the prince ſhall take care to procure the reſtoration of all the places taken by the Turks ſince the laſt rupture; and to procure the liberty of the captives in Turkey: That all the effects of the emperor's ſubjects ſeized on ſince the year 1619, to the preſent time, ſhall be reſtor'd, &c. p. 630.

CDLX. To Lord CONWAY. That he has infuſed a jealouſy in the Turkiſh miniſters in relation to the peace between Gabor and the Emperor (as he had deſigned N° cdlviii). They diſapprove of it, and declare that the prince cannot ratify it without defection or treaſon; they diſpatch the inveſtiture to him for his lady; ſend new orders to Morteſa baſſa of Buda for ſecurity of the frontiers, and an expoſtulatory letter to Gabor, to cenſure his haſte, and diſapprove ſome articles of his treaty. That what theſe letters will produce, he knows not; but if he prove falſe, Sir Thomas (who had conceived a better opinion of him, as by ſeveral of his letters to lord Conway) ſays, he will never hide his head for his ſhame; and doubts not ſo to muddy the waters, and to draw ab edente edulium, that Gabor ſhall not ſleep quiet in his ſubrepted ſecurity. He will not promiſe much, but his genius inſinuates, that the enemy's peace ſhall not be ſo ſafe as they would make the world believe. He hints, that if Gabor prove better than 'tis ſuſpected, his lordſhip will be pleaſed to remember non arma ſine ſtipendiis, and the firſt of June, (the time of paying him a large ſum) that he may find no more ſtarting holes. p. 631.

CDLXI. From Sir ISAAC WAKE. Severe cenſure upon the French court. The Venetians conduct in relation to Gabor, and their reſolution not to encourage him by contribution, &c. warmly deſcanted on. Complains, in his turn, of neglects in England in anſwering his letters, &c. England, to him, he ſays, is on a parallel with China, for any thing he can hear from the court; from whence, ſays he, if two diſpatches come in three years, we may make account they deal liberally with us. That he had deſired an order from his majeſty to the republick, to lend him the count de Torne for a time. But having no anſwer, and being required by the king of Denmark to procure the count for this purpoſe, he is reſolved to require him of the ſenate without warrant; for now, if he ſtays for an anſwer, the ſeaſon will be paſt, and 'twill be phyſick after death. That he has privately engaged the ableſt men in the Venetian diſbanded army to accompany that lord. Refers him for German advices to the papers he ſends herewith. Invites him and his lady, in their way home, to make his houſe their own. p. 632.

CDLXV. To the Lords of COUNCIL. On the diſputed claim of conſulage (See N° cccxvi, [cccxvi], cdlvi). After ſix years ſervice, he ſays, he is unwilling to loſe the Levant company any privilege whereof he found them in poſſeſſion. That the bread and ſalt he ate, would corrupt, if he did prevaricate, and not take to heart their affairs: But above all other reſpects, the honour of the Engliſh nation inforces him to continue their lordſhips trouble, whoſe information to his majeſty is only able to reſtore them to that equality of trade which has hitherto been maintained. He then gives a very curious ſtate of the caſe: What bad conſequences newly attend this diſpute, and how extenſive the evil grows. What he had done to compromiſe the affair, at leaſt till his majeſty's pleaſure were known: The Venetians reſolute refuſal to come into any qualification: Their artifices, and ſubdolent practices. The probability of the thing growing worſe: All which oblige him to make a declaration (See the ſubſequent N°.) of a contrary effect to the Venetian edict complained of, which he has ſent to Sir Iſaac Wake, to admoniſh his majeſty's trading ſubjects to beware how they intangle themſelves by any contract to prejudice the right of the Levant company; and to juſtify that the demand is lawful, and was paid by all nations, till thoſe began to remit the claim, when they had no ſhipping of their own to yield them benefit, in order to prejudice thoſe whoſe ſhips they uſed for their own profit and ſecurity. He begs that this ſtep may be verify'd by their lordſhips authority, and that his majeſty may avow him. He ſays, that there need be no diſpute with the Venetians as his majeſty's good allies, nor can any exception lie, as all that is propoſed is to give law only to Engliſh ſubjects. He tells how eaſily this may effected: How reaſonable it is to be done: The benefits ariſing from the conſulage, and what neceſſary expences are defrayed by it; as well as the benefit thoſe receive by it, from whom it is exacted; and the miſchiefs that will attend the giving it up. p. 636.

CDLXVI. Sir THOMAS's DECLARATION concerning the right of conſulage upon the goods of ſtrangers laden in Engliſh ſhips, to be tranſported to or from any port in the grand ſignor's dominion: Referred to above. p. 637.

Directions by way of P. S. to the Levant company, ſent with a copy of this declaration to inſtruct them how to proceed for redreſs. p. 638.

CDLXVII. To the Lord CONWAY. In anſwer to his lordſhip's letter (See N° cdxxxi.) acquainting him with the motion made by the Venetian ambaſſador in England, that Sir Thomas might join to oppoſe the nomination of the new baſſa of Tunis, on account of his being a known favourer of pyrates: And expreſſing that his majeſty would do nothing in it, 'till he heard how the matter ſtood from Sir Thomas. On this occaſion Sir Thomas gives an ample and very curious relation of the matter, greatly redounding to the reputation of his wiſdom and foreſight, as he had exactly foretold to the other three reſidents what would follow from their oppoſition; as alſo to his credit with the grand ſignor and the principal miniſters of his court, and no leſs to the diſhonour of the other three; to whom, however, he gave honourable inſtances of his moderation and deſire of uniteing with them; but was happily excluded by the old artifices of the French ambaſſador, who hoped to get (in their common ſigning) an advantage over him, with reſpect to the long conteſted claim of precedence. What advantages Sir Thomas made of the favourable diſpoſition of the Turkiſh miniſters, which his conduct had inſpired, for the good of the Engliſh commerce. That this application to his majeſty by the Venetian ambaſſador in England, is not now ſo much levell'd againſt the baſſa's perſon, as to recover the wounds the three reſidents had ſuffered by their indiſcretion, which had brought upon them ſo grievous and diſreputable a repulſe. That in anſwer to his lordſhip's intimation of the encomiums given of him by the ſenate of Venice, (N° cdxlii.) as mentioned by their ambaſſador in England, he is thankful to them, and their miniſters: That they are full of private courteſies; but he wiſhes they would really ſerve his majeſty and the publick. He repreſents their ſelfiſhneſs; and ſays, that tho' their contribution to Gabor is but a trifle, not two good banquets, yet he could never procure any hope of it: tho' now they are eaſed of the Valteline affair, he thinks they might be drawn into ſome private proportion; and hopes the old bailo, who is well-affected, will be able to influence them on his return. Of this he will advertiſe Sir Iſaac Wake, with whom, to his own profit, he keeps a conſtant and ample correſpondence. Sir Thomas then enters into the affairs of Gabor and his peace; and ſays, that if he has concluded it, he keeps it from the Porte and his own reſident, yet that 'tis certain he aſſiſts in a treaty between the Emperor and the Turk; but to what end, whether to break or promote it, cannot be penetrated; for there are forcible reaſons both ways. Yet 'tis certain that the Turks are deſirous of peace in the preſent ſituation of their affairs: but that Gabor has yet all that point in his own power, and can turn it as he pleaſes. He ſays, that if his majeſty will give him order for paying the ſtipulated money due to Gabor in June, he will try what can be done with him, and not pay it, but upon good grounds; for that, tho' his conduct gives jealouſy to his friends as much as his enemies, yet if he be true, and can be ſecured, he is worth the price agreed for. The ſuppoſed Spaniſh agent (See Nº CDXLVII, CDLIV) ſent away to Buda, at the requeſt of Morteſa baſſa of that place, and his propoſitions ſubmitted to that governor and Gabor. An Arabian ayman or prieſt, at the inſtigation of the king of Perſia, revolts, and endangers the holy country, as the Turks call that about Mecca, Medina, &c. Ill ſtate of the Turkiſh Aſiatick army, and of the affairs of that empire. He thanks his lordſhip for his favour in procuring his return: Says his majeſty will find no want of his ſervice; for he muſt think that the ſufficiency of his ſucceſſor hath preferred him before others of great and approved merit. p. 638.

CDLXVIII. To Sir Isaac Wake. Sir Thomas gives his opinion on the ſtate of the Valteline affair. Account of the audience of the new bailo, and his character. Again recommends the affair of the archbiſhop of Smyrna, (See Nº CCCLXX, CCCLXXI, CDXLIV.) which has met with difficulties that make that prelate deſpair of ſucceſs. After giving the ſtate of the affair about Gabor to the ſame effect as he had done to lord Conway in the preceding letter, he hopes, that the ſenate of Venice may be prevailed on, now they are eaſed of the Valteline affair, to contribute to Gabor, if he be faithful: That he has ſeriouſly negotiated this point with both bailoes, as they ſeem very fond of the diverſion Gabor is able to make: And Sir Iſaac may freely challenge the old one, on his return, with his promiſe to do all he can to promote that counſel. That he is a ſtiff and firm man in his opinions, but very ſolid in judgment, and hath paſſed friendly with him, which he deſires Sir Iſaac to acknowledge to him in his name, and doubts not he will confeſs that he, Sir Thomas, has done him and the ſenate particular ſervice. He then opens to Sir Iſaac, the whole affair of the conſulage, as repreſented by him to the lords of council, (Nº CDLVI, CDLXV.) and ſends him copies of thoſe letters, and of his own declaration (Nº CDLXVI.) and other papers; and deſires his aſſiſtance in it at Venice, in ſuch manner as ſhall appear moſt proper to his own wiſdom. p. 642.

CDLXIX. From Sir Isaac Wake. His difficulties in procuring the diſcharge of the count de Torne, of the ſenate (See Nº CDLXIV). That the marquis of Baden has join'd the king of Denmark. The adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh, uncle of the princeſs of Brandenburgh, appointed by his Daniſh majeſty (with a view to oblige Gabor) general of the army in Sileſia, inſtead of the late duke of Weimar. That king's opinion of Gabor makes Sir Iſaac hope the beſt of him ſtill, tho' Sir Thomas's two laſt letters have been to his diſcredit. The ſtate of the Daniſh army, and Engliſh and Scots auxiliaries, &c. Sir Iſaac receives credential letters from the king of Denmark, to act as his ambaſſador at Venice, and is received as ſuch. A rupture with France inevitable. p. 143.

CDLXX. To Lord Conway. That he miſtruſts Gabor more from his ſilence to his friends, to his agent, and to the Porte, than from the reports of the enemy. He greatly ſuſpects the French ambaſſador in this, who acting as a nuncio from the pope, as well as ambaſſador of France, is governed by the counſels of the pope and cardinals, and, he finds, has deceived and diſcontented Gabor, who grounds his preſent proceedings upon the French conduct to him. Sir Thomas diſcovers this by court intelligence on an attempt made by that miniſter, in his capacity of pope's nuncio, to oppreſs and injure the Greek church. p. 644.

CDLXXI. To Lord Conway. His grateful ſentiments on receiving his majeſty's letter (Nº CDLI). That Gabor's agent has plainly written to his maſter, how his honour was queſtioned at Conſtantinople: Sir Thomas Roe's ſentiments of him, and intention to reveal to the Porte all that he knew in relation to his conduct: And gives him thoſe of the Turkiſh miniſters, who complain of him as acting like a rebel to the Porte; and intimates that money may be expected in June from the king of England. Sir Thomas regrets that he has not been graced with letters of credit (as he propoſed Nº CDLXVII); and intimates how ineffectual any meaſures or arguments will be to Gabor, except thoſe which bring money with them. He then deſcribes the genius and conduct of the Venetians, and their miniſters, and their reſerves in money caſes, and ſays, that one word from his majeſty's own mouth to the Venetian ambaſſador in England, and a ſound declaration, would awaken them; and, be it as it would, it would be better to know the worſt, than by deferring it, to draw it upon us. That he dare not conjecture on Gabor; but that he will renew his exhortations to that prince to regard his own honour, &c. p. 645.

CDLXXII. To the Duke of Buckingham. The hopes he has of ſerving his grace in marbles and antiquities, by the care of his ſervant (mentioned Nº CDXLIX). His attempts at old Corinth, Athens, Zea, Lacedemon, the antient Sparta, Andros, Pruſia in Bythinia, Sinope in the Black-ſea, and many other places: With particulars of curioſities already obtained, or in hope of obtaining. That the old Chriſtians had bury'd their antiquities, for fear of the Turks; and that all which remained above ground, had been carry'd off by the Venetians; but time and diligence will diſcover thoſe that were hid. He deſires further directions on this head; and recommends his ſervant, whoſe ſkill and pains he praiſes, to his grace's favour, &c. That he ſhall acknowledge this as a high favour, ſince he cannot reward him himſelf as he deſerves, and ſhall then have it to ſay, that he has been able to do one man good. That the ſearch he is upon, being a work of time and patience, he will leave, as his grace deſires, to his ſucceſſor, having now gotten into the right way. p. 647.

CDLXXIII. To Sir Maurice Berkeley. A letter of open familiarity, tending, to perſuade Sir Maurice not to engage in the cauſe of the malecontents againſt the court. He (Sir Thomas) well knows, that his thoughts are honeſtly grounded with reſpect of right, and the antient laws of the kingdom, to give by parliament. But yet, ſays he, take counſel of me; nouriſh not a ſpirit of contradiction, but rather curb it. We are by nature prone enough to liberty, and every ſuggeſtion of that ſhould be ſuſpected to us. He concurs with him, that new courſes ſhould not be taken; but that when we ſee the old, by ſome ill genius, or darnel and tares ſowed by the enemy, have not taken wiſhed and neceſſary effects, we muſt not too ſtrictly bind ourſelves to rules; but obey occaſion, and uſe the preſent with moderation. He gives reaſon and example for what he urges, and an aſſurance, that he is not moved by any court reaſons, but the love of truth only. [But we muſt refer to the letter itſelf; which will give the reader a beautiful foretaſte of the honeſt part this able miniſter acted in the following times of confuſion; as will be ſeen in the future volumes of this work] p. 648.

CDLXXIV. To the Lord Conway. That the viſier, who formerly was uſed to deny, now ſeeks to excuſe the peace with the emperor. A conference with him thereupon, and arguments uſed by Sir Thomas on that head. Gabor's profeſſions to him, and to his agent, give ſome hope ſtill, as to himſelf; but Sir Thomas doubtful of his ſincerity. Another meſſenger from the emperor with letters, whoſe admittance is now eaſy. His buſineſs, and contents of his letters, againſt Gabor and Morteſa. That if his faith were not ſtronger than his judgment, he ſhould deſpair of him. That the flaſhes, fumes, and falſe fires of the French ambaſſador, and the wary coldneſs of the Venetians, have diſcouraged him. News of the affairs of the Porte in the Euxine-ſea; with regard to Poland, Sweden, &c. p. 648.

CDLXXV. From Sir ISAAC WAKE. That he will comply with Sir Thomas's deſire in relation to the conſulage, (See Nº CDLXV, CDLXVI, CDLXVII, CDLXVIII.) and has written to lord Conway for warrant to proceed therein. That he will proſecute, as he deſires, (Nº CDLXVIII.) the affair of the archbiſhop of Smyrna. That he ſtill entertains a charitable opinion of Gabor; the king of Denmark aſſuring him of his conſtancy; and the army in Sileſia and Moravia increaſing, and getting ground, which could not be, he thinks, without Gabor's aſſiſtance. That, however, ſeeing Sir Thomas is diffident, and the letters from Vienna always ſpeaking of his peace, he will promiſe nothing for him. That be he true or falſe, Sir Iſaac is ſure the Venetians will do nothing (tho' Sir Thomas fancy'd they would, either directly or indirectly) to encourage him, having ſince the French falſhood and deſertion caſt themſelves into the arms of the Pope and Auſtrians. That what Sir Thomas writes of the behaviour of the French ambaſſador at the Porte, does not ſeem ſtrange to him; for that ſince the cardinal Richelieu has made himſelf his maſter's maſter, all the miniſters of that crown, in all places, behave more like the pope's nuncio's, than French ambaſſadors. That what he writes in regard to challenging the intereſt of ſignor Juſtinian on his return from his embaſſy at the Porte (See Nº CDLXVIII.) will avail little, the reſervedneſs of that ſtate making all ambaſſadors impracticable. He concludes with informing him, that the duke of Buckingham is putting to ſea with a fleet againſt the French. p. 650.

CDLXXVI. To Lord CONWAY from Sir THOMAS ROE. A long and very curious letter ſetting the conduct of Gabor and his peace, and the behaviour of the Turks, in a full and clear light. Gabor demands the ſtipulated money, in order to throw his conduct as to the peace, on the failure in that reſpect. Sir Thomas anſwers and confutes all the fallacies advanced by his agent. Double-dealing of the Turks, and Sir Thomas's activity on that occaſion, and round dealing with them. Their ambiguous anſwer: Sir Thomas's unanſwerable reply. His arguments have ſome effect upon them, as to words; but he hopes nothing, and believes leſs, from them, the treaty being begun, and order ſent to finiſh it upon any conditions. He gives the ſubſtance of the unanſwerable arguments he uſed againſt the preſent conduct of that prince, to his agents; and they, in the concluſion, demand, whether, if Gabor ſent 15000 men to the army in Sileſia, according to the treaty, Sir Thomas were ready to pay the monthly ſubſidy promiſed in the articles? inſiſting on a categorical anſwer to this point, and whether he had actual order for the 40000 dollars, or not? Sir Thomas's dextrous management on this head, undertaking that he would actually pay the money when the 15000 troops had ſerved a month; and that if they doubted it, he would depoſit it in the hands of the Venetian bailo; and be anſwerable for the future ſums, as they became due on his majeſty's part, and be a ſolicitor for the king of Denmark's quota. The Dutch ambaſſador brought in, againſt his will, to anſwer for his maſters, in ſuch a degree as they had undertaken to perform. That hereupon the agents gave good hopes of their maſter's actions; but Sir Thomas ſays, he is ſtill a Didymus to any thing for want of the ſight of money; and becauſe he has found Gabor and his miniſters, in this laſt act, like reprobate ſinners, firſt to caſt the fault upon others; then to ſave themſelves by excuſes; and at laſt to ſay any thing to defer the day of judgment. That, indeed, if it were not GABOR, who had thrice broke with the emperor, there would be no hope; and if it were poſſible, he would engage him; if not, he thought it wiſdom to put him to trial, and to turn the point inward. That he has carry'd this ſo confidently, that he has confounded them, and is now deeply intangled: If he had done leſs, all had been deſperate: He knows he has time, and it will be three months before the money can be challenged: If they perform, they merit it; if not, there is no loſs in giving him credit; and he has thus kept the upper ground. That his hopes are very weak; yet the emperor's agent appears much diſturbed at Sir Thomas's conferences with the agents, and has declared, that he has not ſo much confidence in all Gabor's contracts, as he has in the hopes, that we ſhall fail to ſupply him with money, which only is able to over-rule him. He then apologizes for proceeding thus far without warrant. Says there are ſome hopes left in the adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh's entering upon the command of the army lately commanded by count Mansfelt; for that Gabor feared that it would be deſerted after that general's death; that it was indeed miſerably poor: That Gabor's ambaſſador Quadt diſcover'd in England great difficulties about money, and he fears, tho' Gabor hath abuſed his faith, that our ſlackneſs has contributed to it. He ſends incloſed the diſcourſe of a Turk, with whom he has kept ſtrict intelligence (See the ſubſequent Nº.): He ſays, the ſaid Turk ſpeaks as he believes, and there is too much truth in it; yet makes ſome allowance for his fervor, being provoked by the peace, againſt which he had labour'd ſix years: The prince, he ſays, may poſſibly deceive him the better way; and the neceſſity of engaging that army, requires to try the laſt caſt; for that neither Gabor's malice to the emperor, nor his ambition, are extinct. That Gabor's agent had letters to the French ambaſſador, which he was to deliver or not, as Sir Thomas ſhould direct. That Sir Thomas adviſed their delivery; but that they had ſince reſolved not, at the perſuaſion of the viſier, who told them, that the French ambaſſador was an Imperialiſt, and ill-affected to the general cauſe. p. 651.

CDLXXVII. The Diſcourſe referred to in the above Letter; ſetting forth, in bitter terms, the perfidy, covetouſneſs, and mercenary proceedings of Gabor. p. 655.

CDLXXVIII. To Captain QUADT, the Prince of TRANSYLVANIA*'s Miniſter, who negotiated the Treaty with the Princes of the League.* Anſwering the pretences of Gabor for his late peace, and proving, that that prince has been treated with by the princes of the union as an independent ſovereign; that therefore his pretences of the Turkiſh conſent are not to be regarded. He urges to a performance of former contracts on his ſide; declaring that he is enabled to perform thoſe made by his majeſty on his part, as to the money agreed for, &c. He tells the captain, that his own honour, having negotiated the treaties with his majeſty and his allies, will ſuffer, as well as his maſter's, by this breach. He preſſes that the prince will ſend his general, (as his agents had propoſed Nº CDLXXVI.) with the contracted body of Hungarians, to join the army in Sileſia, and that himſelf go to Caſſovia, in order to watch over the borders; and this, he ſays, the Porte will warrant him in, and the princes will take it for a compliance with the terms of his confederacy, which ſhall intitle him to the performance of the conditions on their part: But he gives it as his opinion, that if by delays and pretences of another year, the allied princes are left to themſelves to carry on the war, then at the ſharpeſt, little credit will be given to his maſter's future motions. p. 658.

CDLXXIX. To Lord CONWAY. He gives ſome hope, but with great caution and reſerve, that Gabor will ſtill deceive the emperor, and maintain his alliance by his general, tho' not in his own perſon: His opinion, that the adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh, uncle to the the princeſs of Tranſylvania, may have ſome influence upon him. The viſier declares he never did conſent to Gabor's treaty; but durſt not refuſe entering into a negotiation with the emperor, becauſe of the ſtrong faction there was for it at the Porte: But proteſts that the commiſſion for the treaty abſolutely includes the condition of comprehending in it the intereſts of the princes who are their friends; and that nothing ſhall be ratify'd without the conſent of Sir Thomas, and the Venetian and Dutch reſidents. That they will draw it on by delays ſo, that nothing ſhall be concluded that year; and in the mean time they declare that Gabor is at liberty if he will apprehend the occaſion. He offers ſome circumſtances in behalf of Gabor, revealed to him under ſecrecy by the wiſeſt man of that empire, as an extenuation of his proceedings. And begs that he may be furniſhed with the money he has engaged to pay, (See N° CDLXXVI.) if Gabor, after all, ſhould once more turn about. His opinion and reaſonings upon this perplexed matter. p. 659.

CDLXXX. From Sir Isaac Wake. Sir Iſaac's charitable opinion ſtill of Gabor on the ſcore of the king of Denmark's truſting him, and in hope of the adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh's power to influence him; as alſo on the great parts and wit of that prince, which he thinks will not permit him to ſell himſelf to his profeſſed enemies. What moſt concerns him, is, that wiſe men, as Gabor is, ſeldom commit ſmall errors; but when they do miſtake, precipitate themſelves much more dangerouſly than weaker perſons. He ſuppoſes that this Janus carries one face towards Turkey, and another towards Chriſtendom: And as he has queſtionleſs vaſt deſigns, he imagines that his views on Poland occaſion in ſome meaſure his temporizing. He acquaints Sir Thomas, that the differences between England and France increaſe, and cannot be reconciled but by a war. The affairs of Germany, and the enterprizes of the king of Denmark ſucceſsful. He reſts infinitely comforted with the hope of ſeeing Sir Thomas in his return; aſſures him, that he has not a friend or ſervant in the world, who will more truly and unfeignedly rejoice in ſerving him; whoſe abilities, worth, and virtues, he ſays, accompany'd with a true zeal to the glory of God, and the good of our ſtate, have intirely captivated him. p. 661.

CDLXXXI. To Sir Isaac Wake. Sir Thomas gives ſome new hopes and new doubts of Gabor; for, he ſays, there is nothing that he may not equally hope and deſpair of him. That prince's letter to the Porte, owning his peace, and laying the blame of it upon the Turks. Orders diſpatched to Buda, to conclude no peace without juſtice to the friends of the Porte, and the liberty of Germany ſecured. He knows not what effects this may work, but ſeeing it ariſes from the letters of Gabor, whom he thought loſt, he cannot more groſly abuſe himſelf than to procure a liberty which he will not uſe. Gabor's uſual motto, That if he thought his ſhirt knew his counſels, he would tear it off. The diſgraceful execution of a Venetian before the great church in Galata. p. 662.

CDLXXXII. To Dr. Goad. Suppoſes his letter (N° ccclxii.) has miſcarried, he having had no anſwer to it, as from its ſubject, he expected: So, as marks rather of his civility, than now of uſe, he ſends copies of that, and others. That he ſhall ſoon try the patriarch, who promiſed him that on his departure, he would ſhew ſignal favours to him in preſents of books (See N° CDXLVIII). The character of that prelate. Two Dutchmen and a colloyre arrive at Conſtantinople privately with printing types: He fears this will be a detriment to him in regard to the patriarch's purpoſes, whoſe chief inducement to preſent him with books was, that they might be printed; that art being to that time not allowed of in Turkey. He hears, that a Jew convert (See N° CCXXIX.) to whom he had given a travelling paſſport, had abuſed it in England. That it was the only one he ever gave, and that at the patriarch's inſtance; and yet that it was expreſs'd ſo coldly, that it was like Sir Walter Raleigh's Buck-warrants, never deny'd, and never ſerved. And that he had refus'd and diſcouraged hundreds. p. 669.

CDLXXXIII. From Sir Isaac Wake. The prince adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh arrives incognito at Sir Iſaac's houſe at Venice, in his way to Sileſia. Sir Iſaac cauſes Sir Thomas's declaration (See N° CDLXVI.) to be put in force to prevent a contract between a Venetian merchant and an Engliſh captain. p. 664.

CDLXXXIV. To Lord Conway. Gabor moved (as he pretends) by the aſſiſtance he is diſpoſed to give to his brother-in-law the elector of Brandenburgh againſt the emperor, ſends to the Porte, to induce them to diſſolve or protract the treaty with the emperor; and to Sir Thomas to demand the 40000 dollars he had owned to have in his power for him (See N° CDLXXVI.) or that Sir Thomas would, in caſe the ſum was not ready, make a proteſt that the failing of the covenants had not been owing to Gabor. Sir Thomas greatly perplexed on this occaſion. His dextrous management, and plauſible arguments. He pretends that the money is come as far as Venice, as he has ground to think, to the Engliſh ambaſſador there; but upon Gabor's tergiverſations ſtopt there till further orders from England. Sir Thomas further preſs'd on this anſwer, artfully gives hopes of the payment on conditions in their own power; and with this anſwer, and favourable inſtructions for the common cauſe from the Porte, the courier is diſpatched back to Gabor. That he will no more pretend to auſpicate what will be the reſults of theſe matters; but believes, for ſeveral reaſons which he gives, that that prince might be again prevailed upon to commence hoſtilities, if the money was ready. He begs that his credit may be preſerved on this occaſion, and ſhews the good conſequence that will flow to the affairs of Germany, if Gabor can be induced to take arms again, tho' but for a month. p. 665.

CDLXXXV. To Sir Isaac Wake. In relation to the caſe of one Mr. Hyde made priſoner and oppreſſed by a Turkiſh ſpahee, recommended to him by Sir Iſaac for redreſs. He ſhews how chearfully he will endeavour to act in every thing he deſires of him; and what he had already done in this very affair. The notorious injuſtice and oppreſſions of the Turkiſh government, and the little hope of obtaining juſtice, againſt any of the Spahees or Janiſſaries particularly. But that he will renew his endeavours on this occaſion. He ſends him copies of his preceding letter to lord Conway, in relation to Gabor's new proceedings therein mentioned, and of that prince's purpoſed proteſt, and his own anſwers to it; and ſays, he can meddle no more with him: That he is incomprehenſible; but that moſt men would believe by his negotiations then carrying on at the Porte, that he had new purpoſes: “If I had had the money, ſays he, I had taken him: now, I pray God, I be not taken myſelf”; for he fears he is forgotten in England. Asks excuſe for uſing his (Sir Iſaac's) name to an honeſt purpoſe as to the money he pretended (See preced.) to Gabor's agents, was come to Sir Iſaac at Venice: That he mentioned this but as a ſuppoſition: Believe me, ſays he, I knew not what to ſay. p. 666.

CDLXXXVI. Extract of a Letter of the Prince of Transylvania to his Reſident Thomas Bursos at Conſtantinople. That the reaſon of that prince's not joining with the Sileſian army, and the remains of that of count Mansfelt, was becauſe he had not yet received the remittances promiſed him from England; and that unleſs they could engage the Porte to break with the Emperor, and licenſe him to march to their aſſiſtance, they would fail in their deſigns, &c. p. 667.

CDLXXXVII. From Sir Isaac Wake. He gives his opinion, at Sir Thomas Roe's requeſt, of the proceedings of Gabor's miniſters with him, and his conduct to them, in relation to the 40000 dollars engaged for by Sir Thomas, and with regard to the letter of his Turkiſh intelligencer (N° CDLXXVII.) againſt Gabor; and concludes, that 'tis better to loſe that ſum, than that the princes of the union ſhould be kept in uncertainty by the prince, and thereby hinder'd from engagements engagements with others on whom they might more certainly rely. That the adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh is ſet out to the army he is to command, and will probably inſpire Gabor with more vigorous reſolves. p. 668.

CDLXXXVIII. To Sir Isaac Wake. With advices relating to the affair of the conſulage between the Engliſh and Venetians, and the impoſitions of the latter on the commerce of England. Good character of the new bailo. The ſervile rules the Engliſh are ty'd to in that trade; and Sir Thomas's reſolution on that head. That the archbiſhop of Smyrna (See N° cdlxviii.) is perſecuted by the French ambaſſador. Great importance of his ſucceeding to the ſee of Scio, in order to diſappoint the hopes of the French and Jeſuits. Gabor ſtill a paradox to Sir Thomas. p. 669.

CDLXXXIX. To the ſame. Conjectures in relation to the unactive conduct of Gabor. Laments that the 10000 l. to be advanced him in June, and which he (Sir Thomas) had engaged for, was not paid, or put into his power. That nothing but money will prevail upon that prince. That the troubles with France divert his return by the way of Venice. He acknowledges the kindneſs of Sir Iſaac's invitation, &c. (See N° cdlxxx). p. 670.

CDXC. From Lord Carleton at the Hague. Excuſes his long ſilence. That he holds himſelf to have been in a dream for ſome time paſt, being, after a great variety of accidents and buſineſs, come again to his old ſtation; but is awakened on one ſide by the good ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms in the skirts of France, and thoſe of the Dutch; and on the other with Tilly's paſſing the Elb, which, he ſays, is a dead blow to the king of Denmark. For the particulars of all which he refers him to the advices he ſends to Sir Iſaac Wake. That as long as there is hope of Gabor's ſtirring, he wiſhes Sir Thomas may not ſtir: but when that fails, and nothing but merchants affairs remain to handle, he ſhall be glad they may meet at home. That his diligent and diſcrete endeavours have their deſerved acceptance both from his majeſty and from his royal ſiſter at the Hague. Some account of domeſtick affairs, &c. p. 671.

CDXCII. To Sir Isaac Wake. Gabor under-hand aſſiſts the Sileſian army, and preſſes Sir Thomas for the money he had engaged for. Sir Thomas's opinion of his deſigns. Diſputes between the commiſſioners of the Turks and Imperialiſts at Komoran, the place of treaty. Morteſa baſſa of Buda, bribed by the Imperialiſts, (See N° cdxcvii.) undertakes to diſcover the deſigns of Gabor, and to croſs his deſigns at the Porte: which Sir Thomas will endeavour to prevent. That he has written to England, that they would not expect any effects from Gabor without money; that this is one of the caſes wherein too much thrift and caution is loſs; becauſe the dependence of the adventure is infinitely greater, than if the ſum to be paid were caſt into the ſea. That he did not purpoſe to deceive even Gabor, when he promiſed him payment; becauſe he expected before Auguſt a performance of what was to be done in the preceding June: But hopes his remove ſhall eaſe him of thoſe intricacies. The great viſier, doubting his own age and health, in his expedition againſt the Perſians, names a ſucceſſor, one Muſtapha baſſa, and recommends him to the grand ſignor. p. 673.

CDXCIII. From Sir Isaac Wake. Reaſons for publiſhing at Venice a letter of the Tranſylvanian agent to Sir Thomas and the Dutch ambaſſador. That he has news from Vienna and Prague, that Gabor and the Turks do make incurſions in Hungary; from whence (being encouraged to hope the beſt, tho' it proved not true) he is perſuaded, that the adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh will find Gabor in the field: That he, Sir Thomas, will receive immortal honour for having managed that buſineſs with ſuch admirable zeal, wiſdom, and dexterity: He gives him the news of the taking of Groll by the prince of Orange; of Dantzick by the Swedes; and communicates to him the abſtract of a propoſition he lately made to the ſenate of Venice in relation to the miſunderſtandings between England and the French; and the anſwer returned by the ſenate p. 674.

CDXCIV. Abſtract of the ſaid Propoſition made to the Venetian Senate by Sir Isaac Wake. Setting forth the indirect and perfidious proceedings of the miniſtry in France. A curious piece, giving the grounds and occaſions of the war then commenced between the two nations. p. 675.

CDXCV. The Anſwer of the Senate to the above Propoſition of Sir Isaac Wake; earneſtly wiſhing for an accommodation between England and France, and offering their good offices towards it. p. 676.

CDXCVI. To Lord Conway. That for five months he has not ſeen one letter from England. He expects another complaint from the grand ſignor to his majeſty, on the ſubject of the hoſtilities pretended to be committed by the Engliſh in the Perſian gulph (See N° cdxli, cdxlvii). The conſequences that may attend this affair. p. 676.

CDXCVII. To Sir Isaac Wake. The corruption attributed to Morteſa baſſa of Buda (N° cdxcii.) turned truly on the baſſa of Boſnia, who is diſgraced for it: That this makes him hope the treaty of Komora may be broken. Further account of the injurious proceedings of the Venetians in relation to the conſulage-affair (See N° cdlxxxviii). Proceedings of the Turks and Perſians in Aſia. p. 677.

CDXCVIII. From Lord Conway. Reaſons why he has deferr'd writing to Sir Thomas. His majeſty approves all his proceedings; but judges it too late to think of ſending money for Gabor, becauſe of his tergiverſation and uncertainty; eſpecially as money was ſo much wanted in England; and his (Sir Thomas's) wiſdom being rely'd on, that if any hopes ſhould appear, he would not ſuffer them to be loſt; of which, in the laſt occaſion, he had given ſuch ſufficient proof; but that if Sir Thomas's deſign to engage Gabor had ſucceeded, and he had fallen upon any actual engagement, his majeſty would have taken order for his full ſatisfaction. The duke of Buckingham's attempt upon the iſle of Rhe, and his majeſty's reaſons for making it. That his (Sir Thomas's) ſucceſſor is now ſetting forward, having pretended to wait all the ſummer for convenience of ſhipping. That his majeſty has juſt cauſe of offence with Camerarius the Swediſh envoy at the Hague; and Sir Thomas, who was allowed to correſpond with him, (See N° cdlii) is deſired to forbear to do ſo, for the future. ibid.

CDXCIX. From Sir Isaac Wake. Thanks him for his protection to Mr. Hide (See N° cdlxxxv). He does not quite deſpair of Gabor; that prince could not, however, have taken a worſe pretext for a new quarrel with the emperor, than the invaſion of Brandenburgh (See N° cdlxxxiv); that elector having called the Imperialiſts into his country, and wholly given himſelf up to the emperor. He wiſhes Sir Thomas had the money ſtipulated, to put Gabor to a trial; being perſuaded, that ſuch a cordial would revive him. That he, Sir Iſaac, expects ſhortly to hear from Gabor, and will hold the ſame language with him, that Sir Thomas has done (See N° cdlxxxv); and make him believe that the bill of exchange for the ſtipulated 40000 dollars did arrive at Venice; but, upon the news of his apoſtaſy, and ſight of the articles of his treaty with the emperor, was returned again; and ſo will refer him back again to Sir Thomas, with aſſurance that he will pay him that ſum, when he has been a month in the field. Lord Conway created Viſcount Killultagh. p. 678.

D. From the Adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh, to Sir Thomas Roe. That on his arrival to take on him the command of the army of the allies in Sileſia, he is inform'd by the prince of Tranſylvania of the utter diſperſion of it; that the horſe was gone to the king of Denmark, the foot reduced under the enemy's power. That he had heard with great concern, that the ſaid prince had made a pepretual peace with the emperor; and of his pretences for that ſtep; and tho' he made ſtill large proteſtations of his affection to the common cauſe, yet he knows not what is proper to hope for, or promiſe themſelves, from ſuch a ſudden change. He repreſents to Sir Thomas the ſlippery condition in which he finds himſelf, after great hazards, perils, and inconveniencies; and has no other way but to retire to the king of Denmark; but is ready to ſacrifice his life, if he could be of ſervice to the cauſe. He deſires Sir Thomas to uſe all his intereſt at the Porte to obſtruct the peace with the emperor, and thereby to retain the Germans on that ſide, who will otherwiſe overpower the king of Denmark with a third army. He deſires alſo, that he would contribute for the ſame end all he could do, to make a truce between the Perſians and Turks, that the latter might be at leiſure to purſue their deſigns in Hungary: That he would alſo uſe his intereſt with the king of Great Britain to continue thoſe pecuniary ſubſidies which had been granted to the marquis of Baden, as likewiſe that part of the money depoſited by his majeſty at Conſtantinople, to forward a new diverſion. Refers for the reſt to Sir Iſaac Wake's letters, and hopes to hear from Sir Thomas what he may depend upon. p. 679.

DI. To the Lord Conway. That the emperor's agent confidently affirms that a peace for twenty-five years is concluded between the emperor and grand ſignor. Sir Thomas believes it to be too true, obſerving the joy of the Turkiſh miniſters at the Porte upon the news, and the concurrence of ill ſucceſs to them from Aſia. p. 680.

DII. Relations of the Proceedings of the Army in Aſia, ſent with the above Letter. The great viſier reſolving to enter Perſia, endeavours to engage Abaſſa baſſa to do the like from Arzerum; who gives good words in return. The Perſians beſiege Achiska, a city of great importance near Arzerum; on which the viſier requires Abaſſa to join him with all his forces, and ſends 3000 Janiſſaries with his letters. Abaſſa orders them to incamp till he could be ready to obey the viſier, then ſets upon them in the night, cuts moſt of them in pieces, and ſends the captains he took alive to the Perſian. Achiska hereupon reported to ſurrender. The viſier, inraged at this treachery, lays aſide his deſign upon Perſia, and marches directly to Arzerum, reſolved to puniſh Abaſſa, or loſe his life. p. 681.

DIII. From Bethlem Gabor. Containing a large and particular defence of his proceedings, cenſuring with aſperity the liberty taken with him by Sir Thomas, and the queſtion made of his honour, hitherto, as he ſays, unblemiſh'd. p. 681.

DIV. From Sir Isaac Wake: He gives his further opinion (See N° CDLXXXVII.) of the conduct of the prince of Tranſylvania, and highly approves of Sir Thomas's behaviour to him and his agents, in relation to the ſum he wanted to get into his poſſeſſion. Several miſtakes and falſhoods in the papers delivered by Gabor's order to Sir Thomas. The diſperſion of the Sileſian army, and the ill conduct of the elector of Brandenburgh (See N° CDLXXXIV, CDXCIX.) by the example and inducement of Gabor. That, however, till he hears from the adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh, he will not deſpair of him: And if he prove falſe, he ſhews how he may be made to repent it. p. 684.

DV. From the ſame. The kind acceptance which Sir Thomas expreſſes upon Sir Iſaac's conforming to his inſtructions in relation to the diſputes between the Engliſh and Venetians, encourage him to ſecond any other act of his, and to ſerve him faithfully in whatſoever he ſhall command either for the publick or his own private ſervice; beſeeching him to believe, that tho' he has not the honour to be known to him, yet he has not in the world a friend that more truly honours his well-known virtues and merit. He prays to God he may find at his return ſuch a reward as his pains, diligence, and care, have deſerved. That he, Sir Iſaac, is at preſent imbroiled with diſputes of the ſame kind; that having his majeſty's command to regard the intereſts of the merchants of England, too much neglected beforetime, he is reſolved, tho' England has ſo many irons at preſent in the fire, that no connivance, or want of vigour on his part, ſhall make the merchants ſuffer in their rights or privileges. His activity and orders in a particular caſe on this head. Asks Sir Thomas's advice in relation to a project he had been driving ſome years to eſtabliſh a free trade at Villa-Franca and Nizza, to the detriment of Leghorn. His reaſons for it, and ſteps towards it. He reſolves, if the Venetians do not give ſatisfaction to the Engliſh merchants, to move his majeſty to prohibit the curran trade of Zant or Cephalonia, (See N° viii, and CDLVI.) which may be ſafely done, he ſays, without prejudice to the nation, or to the revenue. That being got upon a ſubject out of his element, he deſires to be illuminated and directed by Sir Thomas, whoſe inſtructions he will not fail to follow. p. 685.

DVI. To Sir Isaac Wake. He gives a ſummary of his conduct in his dealing with Gabor's agents as to the money-affair, when he out-braved them; and regrets that he was not enabled to anſwer for it to Gabor, if he proved honeſt, as he had ſignify'd, (N° CDLXVII.) that he would never part with it, 'till he had good proof. His conjectures of the reaſons for this conduct in the Engliſh court. That he is glad that he eſcaped engaging for the ſum on his own credit, which might have quite undone him: That for the good of his country he ſhould not value his own ruin; but when his zeal might be counted folly, his portion might be ſcorn inſtead of pity. He again regrets (as he had like occaſion to do once before, ſee N° CDXXIX.) the preference given the Dutch ambaſſador of having money paſs thro' his hands for Gabor, which diminiſhes him, (Sir Thomas) and his ſervices, and makes Gabor's miniſters ſlight him. That he has had no faith in Gabor for eight months paſt, tho' he was unwilling to diſcredit him; and he believ'd the agents had hope to receive no money, to find ſome excuſe for their maſter. That the Turkiſh intelligence (See N° CDLXXVII.) had too much truth in it; and 'twas now certain that Gabor firſt forſook Morteſa, and tamper'd about peace, before the Turks gave into a treaty, who had left all to him, and at laſt, urged by his example, and their Aſian misfortunes, were glad to conclude a peace. That tho' he, Sir Thomas, knew all this, yet Gabor ſo mudded the waters with new propoſitions, proteſtations, and negotiations, that he ſtill hoped, tho' for no other reaſon, but becauſe it was Gabor. He knows not what now to ſay of him, nor what the Dutch ambaſſador will do with his money. For the fact is, that the peace is abſolutely concluded between the two empires, with Gabor's aſſiſtance, for twenty-five years; and an Imperial internuntio is ſet out for Conſtantinople with great preſents, and a train of fifty perſons; being preceded by an extraordinary agent of Gabor with new practices, his pockets ſtuffed with commiſſions like Gondomar, equal in falſhood, and only differing in wit to uſe it. That he ſhall now act only a paſſive part, hear all, and anſwer nothing; for without money he ſhall bluſh to promiſe it; or to truſt in them, if he had it. He hopes for a peace, that there may be no need to truſt to theſe broken reeds; and then it may be found, that, as our contentions have been the ſecurity of theſe deſerters of our cauſe, the emperor's attempts upon them, when fully diſengaged, may make them ſenſible of the ill part they have acted. That the captain baſſa has been forced to make a peace with the Poles and Coſſacks, which may be of no good iſſue to the allied powers, or their friends the Swedes. Bad ſtate of the Turkiſh affairs on the ſide of Aſia. The Tartars contumacious; other Turkiſh affairs. p. 686.

DVII. From Lord Grandison. That Sir Peter Wyche is ſetting out to relieve him; but he underſtands that he (Sir Thomas) is to continue ſome time extraordinary ambaſſador to conclude the affairs in hand. That he ſtands high in his majeſty's good opinion, (as he had deſired to know Nº ccxxx.) as well as in that of the lords of council; and his ſervices are ſo much valued, that he doubts not he will find in them a ready diſpoſition for his advancement at his return, if the way be happily traced out. Particulars of the attempt upon Rhe, and advantages gained over the French by ſea. p. 688.

DVIII. To BETHLEM GABOR (wrote at the Inſtance of a Gentleman going to that Prince, ſee Nº DXIII.) That he is greatly perplex'd what to write, and how to be ſilent, having not heard from his highneſs himſelf, and not underſtanding his intention of peace or war. That nothing has been wanting on the part of the kings ſince the chimacham's promiſe in the ſultan's name, and his highneſs's contract with their majeſties. That the allies may make a peace when they pleaſe, which may change the ſeat of war; and then thoſe who now indolently put off their armour, may be oblig'd to reſume it to their coſt. He intreats his highneſs to think timely, that tho' private undertakings may be taken up and laid down at pleaſure, yet to thoſe who contend for empire, there is no medium between a ſummit and a precipice. That the Imperialiſts have often with ſhame and terror felt the force of his highneſs's arms, and that no power is ever eſteem'd faithful, where it is thought too great: And 'tis a rule with the too powerful to puniſh, when they have opportunity, thoſe who have at other times offended them. That he need not write more to a prince of his generoſity, prudence, and conſummate knowledge, to whom he devoutly wiſhes long life to his glory. p. 689.

DIX. From Sir ISAAC WAKE. He now, for ſeveral reaſons which he gives, begins to deſpair of Gabor, but will not abſolutely determine about him, 'till he hears and ſees more, which the arrival of a perſon from him to Sir Iſaac Wake, now ſoon expected, may perhaps give him ſome light to judge by. p. 689.

DX. The KING's Letter to the STATES GENERAL (ſent by Sir ISAAC WAKE to Sir THOMAS, with the above Letter). His majeſty juſtifies his conduct in relation to his rupture with France. Reſolves to do juſtice to ſuch of the Dutch ſubjects as may ſuffer by it, and who ſhall not be engaged in a contraband trade, to furniſh his enemy with ſuch weapons as are prohibited by all nations in war with others. His majeſty anſwers to their offer of a mediation between him and France, that the French being the aggreſſor, his majeſty cannot make the firſt propoſition for accommodation; but if the French king would make known his good intention for that purpoſe, he ſhould be always ready to teſtify his zeal for the publick good, and the ſafety of Germany; and to give them (the States) marks of his eſteem, and of the influence they have over him. p. 690.

DXI. Lord CARLETON's Propoſition to the STATES GENERAL accompanying his MAJESTY's Letter, as above. He defends his majeſty's conduct, as to the rupture with France; and particularizes the injuries received by the Engliſh nation from the premeditated violences of the French. Repreſents againſt a treaty then on foot between France and the States-General, by virtue of which that crown will ſerve itſelf againſt the king by means of their ſhipping, and to proſecute their deſigns againſt Rochelle, and the reformed religion, as they had done once before (See Nº ccxcviii, cccxii). He prays them to weigh well the conſequences of this ſtep, and ſays, that he who twice ſplits upon the ſame rock, accuſes Neptune wrongfully. He alſo ſtrongly expoſtulates againſt the great naval preparations made in their ports, at the expence of France; and ſays, 'tis a very unfair recompence that their provinces ſhould ſerve as a magazine of war againſt his majeſty, when England is open to the Dutch, and furniſhes them with iron ordnance, and other ſupplies to be turned againſt itſelf; and ſays, that Rochelle, as the nurſery of the reform'd religion, deſerves better from the republick, than that ſhe ſhould be a cruel ſtep-mother to it. That his majeſty being well aſſur'd, that France is entering into a league with Spain, by which ſhe ſeeks to introduce by means of her ports, the Spaniſh fleets into the Engliſh ſeas, he conjures them by virtue of their alliance with England, to join their ſhips with the king's in order to obviate the common evil. p. 691.

DXII. To the Duke of BUCKINGHAM. Particulars of his ſucceſs in his diligent ſearch after marbles, &c. What he cannot perform in his own time, he will ſet in ſuch order, that what ſhall be found ſhall be preſerved for his grace. Recommends himſelf to his grace's patronage and protection. p. 692.

DXIII. To Sir ISAAC WAKE. Gabor's reſident at laſt owns the peace concluded. He expects a large anſwer from that prince in relation to his conduct (which ſee Nº DVIII, p. 681). The king of Denmark retired, and on the defenſive: Germany brought under the Auſtrian yoke. The Sileſian army broken and diſſolved. He has nothing to do but exclaim, and that, he doubts, ineffectually. He has only to hope to exclude the Spaniards from the treaty. The letter to Gabor (Nº DVIII.) he wrote on the preſſure of a Tranſylvanian gentleman going to that prince, who would not depart without a few lines from him. That the Tranſylvanian agent, he finds, has open'd all his letters heretofore, as he fears, to ſend and condemn what pleaſed or diſpleaſed him; and that he has adviſed the prince of this, and ſent him a catalogue of his letters. This, he ſays, is the third agent of that prince in his time of three ſeveral religions; a Papiſt, a Calviniſt, and an Arian; all three knaves. p. 693.

DXIV. From Sir ISAAC WAKE. With his letter to lord Conway incloſed, ſignifying the arrival of Cornitz a captain of horſe of Gabor's, ſent by that prince to him. He fears now, that Gabor has deſerted the cauſe; but ſuſpends his judgment till he hears from the adminiſtrator of Magdeburg. p. 694.

DXV. From Sir ISAAC WAKE to Lord CONWAY (a Copy of which was ſent with the above to Sir THOMAS). Containing particulars of the conferences between Sir Iſaac and captain Cornitz mentioned above. In which Sir Iſaac wonders at Gabor's neglect of the publick cauſe, and his own private intereſt, having had for ſome months, as he pretends, the ſum promis'd by Sir Thomas Roe, in his hands, for Gabor's uſe; but that hitherto no one appearing to demand it, and that prince not having given any aſſurance of his conſtancy, he muſt ſend the money back again to England. The captain, caught by this artifice, ſaid, his maſter had been abuſed by his miniſters, who kept the truth from him; proteſted, that peace was not concluded, and that his maſter was reſolved to ſerve his majeſty; and begg'd Sir Iſaac would not return the money, for that he ſhould ſhortly hear from his maſter to ſatisfaction. Sir Iſaac, finding the bait take, pretends that he would keep the money in his hands 'till further orders, which he expected ſhortly; his maſter's conduct having given ſuch ſuſpicions, as he muſt wipe away before he could pay it. Sir Iſaac begs that lord Conway will juſtify what he has thus declar'd, if an ambaſſador come from Gabor to England, as Cornitz ſaid was deſign'd, in regard that what he had ſaid, was only to juſtify Sir Thomas Roe, (See Nº CDLXXVI, CDLXXXIV, CDLXXXV.) who had very dextrouſly qualify'd the importunity of Gabor's agents for money, by referring to him. That if, after all, Gabor act ſincerely, he will deſerve this hire; but if he juggle, time will be gained to diſcover his obliquity, and at the ſame time, he will have no room to lay the fault of his deſertion upon the allies. He deſires his lordſhip not to be moved by Mr. Montague to expect money or men from the Proteſtant Swiſs cantons, as he tenders the honour of the king, becauſe he is ſure his majeſty will be expoſed to a denial. That Dr. Mayerne can inform his majeſty better than any man in England of the diſpoſition of thoſe people; and he deſires that his not following the fancies of Mr. Montague's correſpondent in Geneva, may not be imputed to faintneſs in his majeſty's ſervice. p. 644.

DXVI. To Sir ISAAC WAKE. Contemplates the perfidiouſneſs of Gabor; and now he looks back at one view on all his deceits, he wonders he could have faith in ſuch a Proteus: whoſe conduct may in time, he ſays, afford a good moral to the world, to take heed of thoſe who have built their greatneſs upon wicked foundations. Formal compliments to Sir Thomas from his extraordinary ambaſſador juſt arrived. He courts the Dutch, to Sir Thomas's ſcorn and ſhame, as he ſays, (See N° DVI.) in hopes to finger 27000 dollars which that miniſter has received for him: which payment is ſuſpended till further order; and he hopes, by that golden bait, that prince's agents may be drawn into conference and openneſs. That a German gentleman in the ambaſſador's train, has letters for Sir Thomas; but will not, or dares not, deliver them yet. That all he can learn is the departure of the adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh, fruitleſs, to Venice. Artifice of Gabor's reſident in his conference with Sir Thomas, (N° CDLXXVI.) who hop'd to get at the money, and ſo concealed part of his inſtructions, which were to own and excuſe his maſter's deſertion. That the Tranſylvanian gentleman, at whoſe inſtances (See N° DXIII.) Sir Thomas wrote his letter to Gabor, (N° DVIII.) is barbarouſly murder'd by the viſier's order, at the inſtigation of Gabor's agent, who pretended he was a Perſian ſpy. Above eighty perſons die in the viſier's houſe of the plague. That notwithſtanding he will do his duty with vigour, by proteſting againſt the peace, and to prevent a treaty with Spain, for which an agent is ſtolen in under this Imperial train. He then proceeds to anſwer that part of the letter of Sir Iſaac (See N° DV.) which ſignifies his reſolution to encourage the merchants, who, as Sir Thomas ſays, are to the ſtate, as the liver to the body, which maintains the blood. He highly approves Sir Iſaac's turn this way, and his view to eſtabliſh Villa-Franca and Nizza into free ports, at the expence of Leghorn, and his reaſons for it. He touches, in a moſt curious manner, on the nature and benefits of trade and commerce: but gives inſtances where great loſſes have ariſen to the nation even from excellent projects; and cautions to be obſerved, and rules to be attended to in the removal of the ancient channel of trade; all which, he ſays, he propoſes not as objections, but with a view to promote the ſucceſs of ſo good a deſign; and that if he hear from Sir Iſaac that he can find in his return a ſafe paſſage by land, he will endeavour with his friends, if poſſible, to bring a ſhip laden to one of the new propoſed ports, to lead the way at his own peril. The viſier beſieges Arzerum, (See N° DII.) and hopes to take it by corrupting Abaſſa's followers, who begin to waver. p. 695.

DXVII. To the Adminiſtrator of MAGDEBURGH. In anſwer to that prince's letter to Sir Thomas (N° D). He relates the ſteps he was forced to take to get his letters from the German gentleman, (mentioned N° DXVI.) who deſign'd, as he thinks, to detain them till the Emperor and Gabor's agents had concluded all things with the Turks, to avoid oppoſition from the reſidents. To clear himſelf of Gabor's imputation, that his change was owing to Sir Thomas's denying to furniſh his majeſty's quota, he recites his conferences and negotiations with his agents, and how he had bound himſelf for the firſt payment of the future ſubſidies; and refers to Sir Iſaac Wake on this occaſion, and to his letters to the prince (See N° CDXXXIII.) and captain Quadt (See N° CDLXXVIII). That he will proteſt againſt this falſe peace, tho' with ſmall hope, and will move every ſtone even to the hazard of the Turkiſh fury; having, as yet, the Porte engaged to him upon the publick faith, not to ratify the treaty without his conſent (See N° CDXL, CDXLVII, CDLXXIX); tho' like the Punic faith, little reliance is to be laid upon it. That he will begin directly to throw all manner of hindrances in its way, of the ſucceſs of which he will ſend account to Sir Iſaac Wake. He expoſes the artifices and pretences of Gabor's agents, in the different reports they gave out, and in their attempt to juſtify their maſter. That he will chearfully perform his highneſs's command of applying to his majeſty for a tranſmutation of the ſubſidies (See N° D). That he will intreat Sir Iſaac Wake to ſend a copy of his next, (which he hopes will unravel this clue) to the king of Denmark and his highneſs, to which he deſires his highneſs will give full credit. p. 698.

DXVIII. To Sir ISAAC WAKE. With a copy of the above letter and negotiations. That Gabor lays the fault of his deſertion, as the adminiſtrator informs him, upon Sir Thomas: That he has juſtify'd himſelf, not as he could, but as he thought ſufficient. The viſier pretends that Gabor's negotiations at the Porte concur with Sir Thomas's, in order to hinder the peace; but Sir Thomas gives no credit to them, and believes them only formal, and to cover his double diſſimulation. That he will write freely to Gabor (See N° DXXIX.) and put him in mind, that he has aimed wide when he ſhot at him; yet will hear his miniſters patiently, and if any good may be hoped, will embrace and concur with it, and draw medicine out of poiſon. Deſires him to tranſlate into Latin, and ſend to the adminiſtrator and king of Denmark, what he thinks proper of the following piece. p. 699.

DXIX. Brief of Sir THOMAS*'s Negotiation with the Viſier at the Requiſition of the Adminiſtrator of* MAGDEBURGH. Sir Thomas and the Dutch ambaſſador preſs the grand ſignor's promiſe, not to conclude peace with the emperor, (See N° CDLXXIX.) without comprehending the friends of the Porte, and the liberty of Germany. That miniſter's anſwer, and Sir Thomas's reply. Further particulars of their conference. The peace ſo much deſired by both nations, that Sir Thomas believes it cannot be prevented. He reſolves to endeavour to throw impediments and delays into the way; but fears he ſhall not ſucceed. Interview at this audience with the Tranſylvanian ambaſſador, who tells him, that matters of the peace were not yet ſo ripe and ſo forward as Sir Thomas apprehended, and promiſes to come to him in two days, and give him ſatisfaction. The viſier ſwears to Sir Thomas, that Gabor concurr'd with Sir Thomas's motions, not to truſt the emperor. That 'twere eaſier to unfold the oracles of the Sibyls, than the preſent conduct of the Porte and Gabor. p. 700.

DXX. From Sir ISAAC WAKE. He now finds from the adminiſtrator that Gabor has made his peace, without any regard to the princes to whom he had ſworn reciprocal confederation. That he faintly and baſely excuſes himſelf on the want of the money promiſed, and craftily, and as falſly alledges, that his treaty is ſo full of gaps and holes, that he can elude it at pleaſure; promiſing, on a proper conjuncture, to break out again, and do wonders for the common cauſe; and that he has diſpatched, mean time, the firſt gentleman of his chamber, to hinder the ratification of the treaty made at Buda between the Emperor and the Porte. Sir Iſaac ſays, that thoſe who any longer believe in that prince, will deſerve to be deceiv'd; but that, for his part, he has expung'd him out of all the articles of his faith. That the French ambaſſador hath help'd to debauch him; which act may be added to the liſt of many other ſuch-like charities, which the miniſters of that crown have afforded to the common cauſe. The prince adminiſtrator, finding his ſtay to no purpoſe, is upon his return by the way he went. p. 701.

DXXI. Copy of Lord CARLETON*'s Propoſition to the* STATES-GENERAL (ſent by Sir ISAAC WAKE, by deſire of Lord CARLETON at the Hague, to Sir THOMAS ROE, with the above Letter). Containing preſſing exhortations to the States on the ſubject of his propoſitions (DXI.) which his lordſhip inforces in the ſtrongeſt manner, on account of the delay which the States made to give an anſwer to what he had before propoſed to them in relation to the uſe made of their ports and ſhipping by France; as alſo to that crown's attempt upon Rochelle, and her view to aſſiſt and ſupport, by their means, the Spaniſh intrigues and deſigns againſt England, &c. p. 702.

DXXII. Memorial of Lord CARLETON to the STATES GENERAL (ſent alſo with the above, at Lord CARLETON*'s deſire, to Sir* THOMAS). In relation to the complaint of the Dutch on his majeſty's cauſe-ing ſome of their Eaſt India ſhips to be put under arreſt; and vigorouſly inforcing the chief points in his propoſitions (Nº DXI, and DXXI). p. 703.

DXXIII. To the Lord CONWAY. The Tranſylvanian ambaſſador extraordinary delivers to Sir Thomas his maſter's letter (Nº DIII). Sir Thomas touches upon the contents, which cenſure him (Sir Thomas) for preſuming to reflect upon his actions: He ſays, that he is not aſhamed of Gabor's reprehenſions, which will prove his glory; and he will anſwer him with due reſpect to his quality, (See Nº DXXIX.) ſo as he thinks he will be loth to have the controverſy printed, and then will ſend both to his majeſty. That captain Quadt had ſent him a private excuſe that he durſt not anſwer his letter, Nº CDLXXVIII. in which he had urged his own knowledge of the paſſages of the league at the Hague; and that now they plead being kept in ignorance for thirteen months of what was tranſacted by that captain. That the ſaid captain can no more be produced, being ſince dead of a malignant fever. That the concluſion of the peace cannot be hinder'd: That general letters of acceptance of it will be diſpatched by the internuncio, and the ſolemnity of confirmation is to be deferred till ſpring, and then to be done by mutual ambaſſadors. If good news happen from Aſia, ſides will be again changed. Ill news of the German affairs ſpread by the Imperialiſts, which he hopes are not true. Beſeeches his lordſhip to ſhew his majeſty all his papers; for now he ſhall need defence, ſince Gabor quarrels who did the wrong: But knows he is ſafe in his majeſty's gracious benignity. p. 706.

DXXIV. The Particulars of the Negotiation between the Extraordinary Ambaſſador of GABOR and Sir THOMAS ROE, on the ſubject of the prince's letter, (Nº DIII.) which blames Sir Thomas, and defends himſelf. A very curious piece; on the ambaſſador's part, excuſing his maſter; and on Sir Thomas's, vindicating himſelf. After which he accepts the ambaſſador's aſſurances, that his maſter ſtill preſerves a good diſpoſition to the ſervice of the cauſe; and enters upon the conſiderations of finding means to delay the acceptation of the peace between the Emperor and the Porte. On this occaſion Sir Thomas demands a copy of the articles of the peace, to enable him to find out objections to it. The ambaſſador conſults with the old and new agents of Tranſylvania, then preſent, and approves Sir Thomas's motions for retarding the ratifications, and promiſes the copy of the treaty next day. Sir Thomas appeals to the two agents in relation to the juſtice of his proceedings about the money-affair; and is juſtify'd by them. That having waited two days for a copy of the articles to no purpoſe, and received a taſteleſs and contradictory excuſe, he obſerves, that Gabor's promiſed future friendſhip is like that of water, which, ſays he, drowns a live man; and when he is dead, teaches and helps him to ſwim. p. 707.

His Negotiation with the Viſier. Finding himſelf deluded by thoſe Tranſylvanians in relation to the promiſed articles, he obtains a three hours patient audience of the viſier, and makes ſuch obſervations to him on the new treaty, as affect that miniſter; who deſires him to let him know his doubts, &c. Sir Thomas ſays, if he could ſee the articles of the treaty, he could be more particular; but not being able to procure them, he makes ſome very curious general objections; upon which the viſier calls in the chancellor, and the emperor's letter to the grand ſignor, and ſhews it to Sir Thomas. Sir Thomas gives the ſubſtance of that letter, and makes ſome very curious and material obſervations upon it, to thoſe miniſters; and tells them what queſtions they ſhould put to the Imperial nuncio. The viſier confeſſes they were deceived, and both he and the chancellor thank Sir Thomas, and own, that he ſpoke like a good friend; promiſing that they would conſider of his advices, and preſently put them in practice. That he left thoſe miniſters in ſome confuſion, but has no hope, that any wind can move a rock. That he will endeavour to get a copy of the articles, finding they are ſtudiouſly kept from him by Tranſylvanians, Turks, and Imperialiſts, till it ſhall be too late to trouble them with an oppoſition. He then gives the ſubſtance of his negotiation, in conjunction with the Dutch ambaſſador, with the caddeleskar of Greece, on the ſame ſubject, who promiſes to uſe his endeavour to prevent too much precipitation in accepting the treaty, and to procure ſome ſatisfaction to them. p. 708.

DXXV. From Sir ISAAC WAKE. With the copies of his letter to lord Conway, and propoſitions to the ſenate of Venice. p. 710.

In Sir ISAAC*'s Letter to Lord* CONWAY,

DXXVI. He mentions the new propoſitions from Gabor; the firſt, that he will labour ſtrongly to hinder the ratification of the treaty between the Turks and the Emperor. The ſecond, to uſe his endeavours with the king of Poland, if the allies will uſe theirs with the king of Sweden, in order to make a peace between thoſe two princes, that the latter may be at leiſure to attend the affairs of Germany; promiſing, that when that ſhall be effected, he will join the Swedes in Sileſia, and take the field at his own charge. Sir Iſaac's obſervations on theſe projects. That the firſt may be of ſervice; but he ſhall ſuſpect his ſincerity, unleſs Sir Thomas Roe begets new faith in him. That the ſecond is plauſible; but that the emperor may poſſibly gain as much from the king of Poland being at liberty, as the allies from the king of Sweden; and beſides, he doubts in this alſo the faith of a prince ſo ſlippery; but refers all to his majeſty's wiſdom. p. 711.

DXXVII. In his Propoſition to the Senate of VENICE, he ſignifies, That his majeſty was very deſirous of keeping up a good underſtanding with the moſt Chriſtian king, but found not the ſame diſpoſition in the French miniſters. That cardinal Richelieu, on pretence of defeating the deſigns of the Proteſtants againſt the Catholicks, (tho' it was notorious that the former were not able to defend themſelves againſt the violences of the latter) had newly concluded an alliance between the crowns of France and Spain, which was of a dangerous tendency to the publick tranquility. That the Spaniards had made themſelves maſters of the Valteline; and that it behoved the republick, as well as all others, to conſider in time how formidable ſuch an alliance might become to all Europe. He then enumerates the intrigues of the French court in Germany, Turkey, and other parts, and with the prince of Tranſylvania, and the miſchiefs they have done (notwithſtanding their fair pretences) in the Valteline, Rhetia, Savoy, and their oppreſſing of the Griſons and Swiſs; and that it could not be otherwiſe, ſo long as that king was under the influence, 1. Of the queen mother, who was partial to the intereſt of the Auſtrians. 2. Of the cardinal de Richelieu, who ſought only his own aggrandizement: And, 3. Of the Jeſuits, who have nothing ſo much at heart as the intereſt of the Spaniſh nation, from which they ſprung, &c. p. 711.

DXXVIII. Advices from HAMBURGH, of different dates. Giving account of the treaty begun at Mulhauſen, for accommodating the affairs of Germany; ſieges of Stode, Glukſtat, Gremp, and Wolfembuttle, by the Imperialiſts; their great ſucceſſes, projects, &c. p. 713.

DXXIX. To BETHLEM GABOR. In anſwer to that prince's reprehenſory letter (See Nº DIII), and in defence of his own conduct; containing the following curious particulars: Sir Thomas begins with obſerving, That a ſoft anſwer turneth away wrath; but grievous words ſtir up anger: For which reaſon he will not move his highneſs by any reply for his too ſharp letter, but ſuch as is requiſite for the defence of truth. That he has celebrated his highneſs's valour in the remoteſt countries of Europe. That it was not ſaid of Hannibal by way of contempt, that he knew how to conquer, but neglected to uſe his victory. That he did not traduce his highneſs's fame, nor tranſgreſs the bounds of modeſty willingly, when he anſwer'd his miniſters demands and objections according to truth and juſtice. Begs his highneſs to conſider, that actions, not words, are the foundations of offence. That he would by no means exaſperate his highneſs, nor tranſgreſs the reſpect due to the ſtation of free princes, like his highneſs. That therefore his highneſs miſunderſtood Sir Thomas's capacity, which was public, not private, and which licenſed him to lay the cauſe and right of his maſter before princes who think the moſt highly of themſelves. That if his highneſs eſteem'd him a private man, what occaſion was there for a juſtification to be made to ſuch an one by a prince? That it is as allowable for him to require due obſervation of faith, as for any other (except his maſter the king) to cenſure his prudence, or publick actions, of which he is not obliged to give any one an account, according to the rule, That every one ſtands or falls to his own maſter. Replies to Gabor's anſwer to his three points: In which that prince takes it amiſs, that he ſtands charged, Firſt, with having departed, without any evident reaſon, from his engagements, and concluded a peace with the emperor without the knowledge of the princes: As to this, ſays Sir Thomas, let the league itſelf and its effects teſtify; and I will be ſilent. That he had often offer'd to pay his majeſty's quota: which he was oblig'd to ſpeak of, when he found himſelf calumniated for having detain'd and refus'd the money. That captain Quadt ought to have given frequent accounts of his proceedings, tho' he was hinder'd from returning. That his highneſs having made Quadt his plenipotentiary, who, after his return, had affirm'd that his highneſs had ratified the conditions of his admiſſion into the treaty; he could not be wholly ignorant of it. That he knows not in what condition duke Weimar's and count Mansfelt's army came to his highneſs: but that the firſt and ſecond articles of the league aſſert, that their number was complete, tho' one half only had join'd themſelves to his highneſs, while the other was making an advantageous diverſion in Sileſia. That as his highneſs might have carried on the war either ſeparately, or with the confederate forces, the confederates ought to enjoy the ſame liberty. That his highneſs himſelf had prais'd their arms and order: And that their glorious march into the bowels of the enemies dominions, beholding and at the ſame time deſpiſing numerous legions, will hereafter be greatly applauded, however now true honour lies hid in obſcurity and misfortune. To the ſecond point, in which the prince takes it ill to have it ſaid, That his highneſs had not made a juſt demand of the money; Sir Thomas anſwers, That if his highneſs underſtands the words aright, according to the ſubſequent limitation, that it could not be expected from him, who was another man's ſervant; and that there was no juſt reaſon of deſerting the league, which was ratified without relation to paſt and particular times or actions; he hopes there is no need of farther reply. As to the third point, in which it is aſſerted, as the prince complains, That his highneſs was oblig'd by the terms of his confederacy, and the decree of the Porte, to continue the war; Sir Thomas obſerves, That not to mention the chimacham's repeated proteſtations to that purpoſe, his highneſs was free, which he had proved to captain Quadt, and particularly from the grand ſignor's letters to his highneſs, the words of which he will not repeat; and if thoſe viſiers wrote any thing ſecretly to the contrary, his highneſs was well acquainted with them; and their wavering ought not to be admitted for a lawful excuſe to princes with whom his highneſs had made a league as a free and independent prince, ſubject to the will of no other. Moreover, that his highneſs had been known to enjoy and uſe the privilege of making war and peace without conſulting the Porte. Begs his highneſs's candid acceptance of theſe reaſons, and that he would think him always ready to ſerve and honour him. That his highneſs's ambaſſador has full inſtructions for concluding a peace at the Porte, who has acted ſeparately, tho' the adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh had ſignified to Sir Thomas, that that ambaſſador had orders to conſult with Sir Thomas upon two points; ſo that he is forc'd to conclude, that he foreſees an impoſſibility, or ſome other hidden impediment. He obſerves to his highneſs, that whatever is agreed to thro' neceſſity may be eaſily cancelled at a proper opportunity: And it was a ſmart ſaying, That treachery is always to be ſuſpected where the enemy ſeems over-ready of belief; and his highneſs may be ſure, that the Imperialiſts will never forget paſt actions. Begs of God, that his highneſs may not meet with the ſame favour from them, as Polyphemus deſign'd to Ulyſſes. That he will faithfully lay his highneſs's profeſſion of affection to the common cauſe before his majeſty; who eſteems him (ſo far as he knows) as his friend, and expects him to act like an independent prince, and to add new titles to the glory which he has been ſo long accumulating. Thinks his ſervices to his highneſs deſerv'd ſome other reward, beſides ſharp reproofs, which, however, he ſubmits to without reluctance. p. 714.

DXXX. To Sir Isaac Wake. He finds out the new ambaſſador of Gabor to be a Janus. The Turks incline to inſiſt upon a change in ſome articles of the treaty, but recede, and diſpatch away the internuncio with their acceptance of it, on his peremptory inſiſting upon it, and upon Gabor's two agents and ambaſſador going to the viſier, and pretending the total defeat of the king of Denmark, and that all lay at the mercy of the emperor. That Gabor is as falſe as malice can make him, if it ſpeak the worſt. His ambaſſador next day to Sir Thomas qualifies the bad news of the king of Denmark's defeat. His hypocriſy and diſſimulation. He ſends a copy to Sir Iſaac of the preceding letter to Gabor, in which he tells him he has ſtudied truth and modeſty. p. 716.

DXXXI. From Sir Isaac Wake. That the adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh on his return from Tranſylvania brings only news which confirms the diſſipation of the army in Sileſia, which he underſtands was directly betray'd and ſold to the emperor by Gabor, and of the total apoſtaſy of that prince. He rejoices that Sir Thomas is come off from him, without paying him the money. The French report that the duke of Buckingham was obliged to retire from the iſland of Rhe with loſs. In Germany the emperor is victorious every-where. The friends of the allies fall off. Neutrals incline to his party. The aſſembly of Mulhauſen (See N° dxxviii.) diſſolv'd. p. 717.

DXXXII. Anſwer of the Senate of Venice to Sir Isaac Wake*'s Propoſition*, (See N° dxxvii.) ſent with the above to Sir Thomas. They aſſert that the republick has grievouſly ſuffered as well by the great charges they have ſo long labour'd under, as the preſent expences with which they are burthen'd, without being able in all appearance to ſecure themſelves from the ſtorm which hangs over their heads at this preſent: And are perſuaded that Sir Iſaac will repreſent truly their preſent low condition to his majeſty. p. 718.

As to the Point of the Differences between England and France,

The ſenate expreſs a very deep concern on this occaſion, ſince, as they obſerve, the balance of Chriſtendom depends upon the united force of thoſe two crowns. They repreſent, that whatever be the ſucceſs of the arms of either of the contending powers, it muſt needs tend, in the end, to weaken both, as had been ſeen from the turn of affairs in Germany, and elſewhere; and that the republick deſires nothing more than to be in any way inſtrumental to reconcile thoſe unhappy differences. p. 719.

DXXXIII. Abſtract of a Letter from Lord Conway to Sir Isaac Wake. The bad opinion which they had in England of Gabor. That they hear nothing of ambaſſadors from him; but he may be aſſured (according to what he deſired N° dxv.) that upon the coming of any ſuch, and upon all other occaſions, Sir Thomas Roe and himſelf ſhall be juſtify'd in all they had done in the money buſineſs; which hath been juſtly commended, as having been guided with great judgment, strong affections, and good caution. Concerning Mr. Montague, and Sir Iſaac's advice about ſuccours from the Proteſtant Swiſs cantons, and his reference to Dr. Mayern, all has been followed as he adviſed (N° dxv). And his lordſhip acquaints him, that the offices he has cauſed to be paſſed, are approved as the work of a vigilant and judicious miniſter. He then gives the particulars of the ill ſucceſs of the attempt on the iſle of Rhe: The bravery of the duke of Buckingham. p. 719.

DXXXIV. From Sir Isaac Wake. With the copy of his diſpatch to lord Conway, and of a letter from Sir Robert Anſtruther with the news of Germany. Greatly commends Sir Thomas's letter to Gabor, both as to ſtyle and matter; that he hath ſent both that copy (N° dxxix.) and his letter to him (N° dxxx.) to lord Conway; who, he is ſure, will thank Sir Iſaac for them, and applaud Sir Thomas's dexterity. p. 720.

DXXXV. Copy of Sir Robert Anstruther*'s Letter to Sir* Isaac Wake, referr'd to in the above. The ſucceſſes of the Imperialiſts. The proceedings of prince Wallenſtein. Repreſentations of the ſtates of Bohemia to the emperor. The king of Denmark's ſituation, and forces, and that of the Engliſh auxiliaries, &c. p. 721.

DXXXVI. Copy of Sir Isaac Wake*'s Letter to Lord* Conway, ſent alſo to Sir Thomas with the preceding. Commendations of Sir Thomas Roe's letter (N° dxxix.) to Gabor. That prince's perfidy and baſeneſs. If it be permitted, Sir Thomas and he (Sir Iſaac) will unmask and ruin him, as he deſerves, both with the Emperor and the Turk, and reap the benefit of revenge at leaſt. That it was Gabor who brought off the marquis of Brandenburgh from the king of Denmark (See N° div); that he attempted to corrupt the adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh into the emperor's ſervice: And that he wanted to betray the king of Sweden, as he had already done the king of Denmark. p. 722.

DXXXVII. To the Queen of Bohemia. Praiſing Sir Iſaac Wake's zeal in her ſervice, deploring, in lively terms, the ill ſucceſs of the negotiations with Gabor; painting in proper colours the perfidious actions of that prince; intimating what conduct ſhould be obſerv'd at the Hague to his ambaſſador, if he ſends one thither: That he daily expects his ſucceſſor; and hopes in his return to attend her majeſty, and inform her of ſome matters not fit to be truſted to the ordinary conveyances. A favour done in ſeaſon, he ſays, is like the morning dew upon withered herbs; therefore he will preſume to remind her majeſty, that her mention of him to his majeſty, againſt the time of his return, will grace him, and enable him to do her better ſervice: Wherein, tho' the preſent harveſt hath been blaſted, the ſeed is incorruptible in his heart, and may live to ſhew the fruits of his humble vows, &c. p. 723.

DXXXVIII. To Sir Isaac Wake. Further proofs of the perfidy of Gabor. That the ill ſtate of the Turkiſh affairs induces him probably to court the emperor. The grand viſier is forced to raiſe the ſiege of Arzerum, (See N° dii, dxvi.) and retire towards Aleppo, and his army ſeparated to winter as every man pleaſes. Grieves for the king of Denmark's miſfortunes. A project of the Imperialiſts to depoſe that prince, and give his crown to a ſecond ſon of the emperor. Complains of neglects and ſlights from England. If any thing he writes is worth communicating, it will be beſt accepted from Sir Iſaac's authority, and obtain more credit; for that he has ſpent his ſpirits and his purſe, and loſt ſix years. His only conſolation is, that he is ſo much nearer heaven. He repreſents, that tho' it may be thought he has been too plain and round with Gabor in his letter (dxxix.) as he is a prince, yet conſidering his provocations, which he ſets forth, he thinks he has been very tame and temperate. That he has forborne to write one word in his defence to his majeſty, on Gabor's complaints againſt him, becauſe he would not uſe the poor ſhift of prevention. Profeſſions of his ſincere value and honour to Sir Iſaac. ibid.

DXXXIX. To the ſame. Severe cenſure of Gabor's ambaſſador extraordinary at the Porte, and his baſe conduct. Secret intelligences which he procured from the viſier and the ſecretary of Gabor's agent, further detecting the falſhood and fables of that prince. That he, Sir Thomas, has open'd to the viſier all his proceedings and fallacies, both paſt and preſent, with his new intrigues with the Emperor and Spain. That the Turks ſuſpect him as inclinable to a revolt, he having written a quarrelling letter to the viſier, relating to the death of the gentleman formerly adviſed, (See N° dxvi.) and betrayed by his own reſident. Morteſa, baſſa of Buda, likewiſe ſuſpected, and ordered to come to Conſtantinople, to anſwer for himſelf. The French ambaſſador and Gabor on ill terms. That ambaſſador's credit extremely low at the Porte: That tho' he (Sir Thomas) finds no real help, yet he diſcovers an affection in the Turks to the Engliſh, and the contrary to all his majeſty's enemies, wherein the French have a large ſhare. That he has received from lord Conway the approbation of his paſt negotiations with Gabor (See N° cdxcviii.) and an acquittance from all further engagements with him. p. 724.

DXL. From Sir Isaac Wake. He thanks Sir Thomas for many papers which he received from him with his laſt; and ſays, that as he is a witneſs of his painful and wiſe dexterity, ſo he will be a faithful herald to blazon his worth and merits in all places where he has any credit. The incroachments of the Venetians upon the Engliſh trade in the Mediterranean. He ſends incloſed papers relating to his project (See N° dv.) of making Villa-Franca a free port: And will write to the duke of Savoy to let him know of Sir Thomas's noble reſolution to honour and favour that port (See N° dxvi). That he ſends to him, Sir Thomas, a copy of his laſt diſpatch to lord Conway, and alſo what he has received out of England. p. 726.

DXLI. Copy of Sir Isaac Wake*'s Letter to Lord* Conway, ſent as above promiſed to Sir Thomas Roe. Death of the duke of Mantua. His good character. His care of ſecuring his ſucceſſion to the duke of Nevers, and to diſappoint the intrigues formed to prevent it. Aſſaſſination of ſignor Zen, a principal Venetian ſenator, &c. ibid.

DXLII. To Lord Conway, in anſwer to his lordſhip's letter (N° cdxcviii.) acknowledging thankfully his majeſty's gracious acceptance of his tranſactions with Gabor. A clear and intelligible recapitulation of thoſe negotiations, and ſome new lights relating to the premeditated perfidies of that prince; who, he ſays, is not only loſt to the allies, but gotten by the enemy. His diſſimulation and intrigues in order to impoſe on the Porte on one hand; and his proceedings on the other, to cultivate the friendſhip of the Emperor and Spain, with the probable motives thereof; to wit, the ill ſucceſſes of the one, and the good ſucceſſes of the other. That he, Sir Thomas, has put Sir Iſaac Wake to diſcover his ſecret practices with the Auſtrians, in order to make uſe of it at a proper time againſt him at the Porte. His practices with the king of Poland and the brother of the Tartar han, ſhew he has ſuch an unquiet ſpirit, that he cannot reſt but in a ſtorm. His ambaſſador's declaration to Sir Thomas on his departure from Conſtantinople, and Sir Thomas's ſhort anſwer to it. Practices of the Jeſuits and the French ambaſſador againſt the Greek church: They incenſe the Turks againſt the perſon who brought the Greek types to Turkey, in order to ſet up printing there (See N° cdlxxxii): All his goods and types ſacked and deſtroy'd. Sir Thomas gives an aſylum to the undertaker, and appeaſes all, turning the ſhame on the authors; and thereby redeeming the patriarch (at whom they chiefly levelled) from a great danger, he being then printing a book by him dedicated to his majeſty, which was one of the cauſes of their inſtigating this inſurrection. That he will not, however, reſt ſatisfy'd with having appeaſed this tumult; but will join with the bailo to baniſh the Jeſuits from the whole Turkiſh dominions, which he ſays he is able to effect; and will undertake to ſatisfy his majeſty, that it is both a neceſſary and a profitable ſervice. That he has received his majeſty's letter in anſwer to the grand ſignor's complaints (See N° cdxli, cdxlvii) of the depredations committed on his ſubjects in the Red-ſea; which was very acceptable to the Porte: That he, Sir Thomas, having no copy ſent him, the viſier open'd it, and gave it him to tranſlate; upon which he had taken the boldneſs to add a few words, requiring juſtice in a particular caſe of a great injury done to the Engliſh conſul at Smyrna; for which he humbly aſks his majeſty's pardon; for thereby he is likely to recover for the merchants 4000 dollars taken from them, without the leaſt diſadvantage whatever. The great viſier in his retreat from Arzerum, (See Nº DXXXVIII.) fallen upon by Abaſſa baſſa; who cuts off all his rear, takes his treaſure, cannon, and baggage. The army mutiny hereupon, and ſeek to ſtone the viſier. That he will obſerve his lordſhip's caution about Camerarius (See Nº CDXCVIII). p. 727.

DXLIII. From Sir Isaac Wake to Sir Thomas Roe, with Copies of five ſeveral Pieces: In his own letter, he heartily thanks Sir Thomas for his animadverſions on thoſe writings which concern Villa-Franca, and the free trade begun there, (See Nº DXVI.) which he has ſent to his ſecretary at Turin to ſerve for his inſtruction and direction. He hears that Sir Peter Wyche is imbarked for Conſtantinople, and that he carries a commiſſion for Sir Thomas to remain there as extraordinary, 'till his majeſty command the contrary (See Nº DVII). p. 730.

The five Pieces, are,

I.

DXLIV. Abſtract of Sir Robert Anstruther*'s Letter to Sir* Isaac Wake. Giving the news of the ſiege of Stode, defended by general Morgan againſt count Tilly, and other advices of the North: With a caution for the Engliſh to uſe the Hans towns favourably. p. 731.

II.

DXLV. From the ſame. Containing Sir Robert's conferences and debates with the Daniſh miniſters in relation to money demanded by them towards their expences in the German war, grounded on loans to his majeſty, and on the treaty of the Hague. Sir Robert's dexterity and addreſs on this occaſion. Reaſons why his majeſty ought not to pay the money demanded by Denmark: That the demands of the Engliſh upon the Danes will make as good a figure as their pretences founded upon the treaty at the Hague; for, Sir Robert obſerves, the words of a treaty are but the bodies or paintings; the ſenſe, uſe and execution, are the ſouls which give them life and vigour. The affairs of Poland, Sweden, and the North. The emperor ſeeks to accommodate matters between the Swedes and Poles. p. 730.

III.

DXLVI. Copy of Sir Isaac Wake*'s Letter to Lord* Conway. The ſenate of Venice brought to do ſome juſtice, at his majeſty's inſtance, to the Engliſh commerce. He puts in force Sir Thomas Roe's declaration to the Engliſh commanders of ſhips, (See Nº CDLXVI.) and inforces the right of conſulage. The ſenate forbid their ſubjects to hire or freight any foreign ſhip after a year's time to come, which will put an end to that diſpute. Particular caſe of Mr. William Garroway fined by the Venetians 500 ducats for a contraband trade. Sir Iſaac ſays, he will obey the order he has received; but knows not how it will ſtand with the honour of the king to beg off ſo poor a fine, as, in rigour of law, ſhip and cargo too were forfeited. He complains of ingratitude from the merchants, who are very zealous, he ſays, in ſetting forth their juſt grievances; but take not the leaſt notice of what he has done in their favour from time to time, and the redreſs he has procured for them; which would have ſtood well with grateful diſpoſitions. That inſtead of ſuch thankful acknowledgment, he mentions a very ſordid and ingrateful return on the part of the Tin company, which he ſubmits to the conſideration of his lordſhip, and will not aggravate it ſo far as it deſerves. p. 733.

IV.

DXLVII. From the ſame to Lord Conway. With the news of Venice: The French ſtir for the duke of Nevers's ſucceſſion to the dutchy of Mantua. The Spaniards, it is thought, will diſturb him in it, by arms. The emperor likely to ſet up his claim to it, as a fief of the empire. New French ambaſſador at Venice complains of being received with leſs reſpect than Sir Iſaac was. The aſſaſſinator of ſignor Zen (Nº DXLI.) diſcovered to be the ſon of the doge; who flies to Naples. p. 734.

V.

DXLVIII. From the ſame to Lord Conway. The Venetians acknowledge the duke of Nevers for duke of Mantua, but give him no hopes of aſſiſtance, if attacked by Spain. The ſenate's round declaration to the new French ambaſſador (on his recommending the intereſt of the duke of Nevers) of his maſter's having abandoned his beſt friends, and given the Spaniards ſpirit to attempt any thing. They recommend to him a reconciliation with England, and ſatisfaction to be given to the duke of Savoy. The ambaſſador pronounces that duke to be gone over to Spain; and gives his reaſons for it. p. 735.

DXLIX. From Sir Isaac Wake to Sir Thomas Roe. He ſends him the copy of another of his diſpatches to lord Conway, and the abſtract of another letter which he received from Sir Robert Anſtruther. p. 736.

DL. Sir Isaac Wake*'s Letter to Lord* Conway contains, account of the arrival of the duke of Nevers at Mantua, who takes poſſeſſion of that dutchy. The French ambaſſador, ſupported by the pope's nuncio, moves the Venetians again in his favour. The Spaniards and the Emperor ſtill believed to be contrary to that duke. Ill conduct of the Venetians in diſguſting the auxiliaries who had ſerved them. Inſtances of a cloſe union between the crowns of France and Spain, tho' their miniſters differ in the Valteline. Spaniards believed to deſign innovations in Italy. Suſpicious that a great armament, fitting out in ſeveral of their ports, is deſign'd againſt England. p. 736.

DLI. Abſtract of Sir Robert Anstruther*'s Letter to Sir* Isaac Wake (ſent with the above to Sir Thomas Roe). The king of Denmark again in heart. Emperor's attempts to draw the king of Sweden into his intereſts unſucceſsful. The Hamburghers begin to miſtruſt the Imperialiſts. Good condition of general Morgan at Stode. Other affairs of thoſe ports, and of Germany. The pride of the Auſtrians. They inſiſt that the Hamburghers cauſe the Engliſh ambaſſador to quit their town. That his lordſhip has decypher'd Gabor right; but that the two points of throwing difficulties in the way of peace between the Emperor and the Turks, and the motion of the peace between Sweden and Poland, muſt not be neglected. p. 737.

DLII. To Lord Conway, from Sir Thomas Roe. The French ambaſſador makes publick triumph and rejoicings at Conſtantinople on the Engliſh ill ſucceſs againſt the iſle of Rhe. Sir Thomas complains againſt that inſolence, and acquaints the viſier, that it was for joy of a new league ſtruck up between the French and their, as well as our, inveterate enemies the Spaniards. The maſters and gunners of the ſhips which made the rejoicings, caſt into irons; and the French ambaſſador obliged in perſon to aſk pardon, when he himſelf received a ſharp check, and ſcorn for his vanity; and Sir Thomas reſolves to keep him under, during his reſidence. That Sir Thomas has kept his word about the Jeſuits (See Nº DXLII). Thoſe fathers are ſeized, and carried to priſon: Books dangerous to the ſtate found in their cuſtody. Notwithſtanding the utmoſt efforts and bravoes of the French ambaſſador, they are ſentenced to be baniſhed for ever, and thoſe at Conſtantinople to be ſent to Scio, and ſhipt off for France in the firſt French ſhip, never to return on pain of death; and that the like commands will be iſſued, to diſpatch their fellows throughout that empire the ſame way. That he has had great reaſons for this ſtep, which he will ſoon render to his majeſty; they having plotted the patriarch's death, and the ſubverſion of the Greek church, and filling it up with their own proſelytes bred up at Rome. That apprehending, they could not ſucceed in this deſign, on account of Sir Thomas's favour to the oppreſſed church, they reſolved to involve him in it, and took occaſion of the Greek types brought from England (in order to ſet up printing at Conſtantinople) to impute ſuch things to him, as, if his credit had not been high at the Porte, might have had dangerous effects from the incenſed ſoldiery. The good conſequences that may iſſue from this affair, to foment a difference between the Imperialiſts and Turks, which may affect the ratification of the peace between the two powers. That the Porte has diſpatch'd ſharp letters to Gabor, to withdraw him from his intrigues with the Imperialiſts and Spaniards. Sir Thomas's meſſage to that prince, of ſervices when he ſhall return to England, in order to leave a door open for his ſucceſſor to practiſe with him, as occaſions may offer, tho' he expects no good from him. A ſtrange propoſition made to him by the Dutch ambaſſador, for which he has apply'd to Sir Iſaac Wake, who will inſtruct him, and whoſe advice he will follow. That the machinations of the Roman-catholick princes in general, render any helps juſtifiable; but he hopes we are not reduced to the neceſſity of having recourſe to it. This propoſition he explains in his ſubſequent letter to Sir Iſaac Wake at length. p. 738.

DLIII. To Sir Isaac Wake. The ſtrange propoſition made to him by the Dutch ambaſſador (touched upon in the concluſion of the preceding letter to lord Conway). That it is a motion made by the adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh, and others, as the Dutch ambaſſador pretends, to endeavour a reconciliation between the Turks and Perſians; and then to ſound the grand ſignor, if he would not accept the contributions from the confederates, which they had agreed to give Gabor, to induce him to make war upon the emperor; to which the Dutch ambaſſador requir'd a preſent anſwer, and Sir Thomas's aſſiſtance in it. Sir Thomas's queſtions to that miniſter thereupon, and his anſwers. He refers the further inquiry and deciſion of the matter to Sir Iſaac; and delivers his opinion, as to the matter itſelf, and on the ſordid and ſelfiſh motives, which he thinks influence the Dutch ambaſſador on this occaſion; and ſays, that if he, Sir Iſaac, thinks there is need of ſuch a nauſeous remedy, he will attempt a more probable way; which he lays down; and deſires Sir Iſaac to mention this matter, and his own judgment upon it, to England, and to lord Carleton. That the duke of Savoy at Turin, and his ambaſſador at Rome, as he heard to his great wonder, concurr'd in the French triumph, on account of the ſucceſſes of France. Inſtance of the Dutch ambaſſador's indiſcretion on the ſame occaſion. He reminds Sir Iſaac of his biſhop, whom if he could place in Scio, it would be of great ſervice to the Engliſh; as he had frequently intimated (See N° CCCLXX, CCCLXXI, CDXLIV, CDLXVIII, CDLXXV, CDLXXXVIII). p. 740.

DLIV. To Sir Isaac Wake. Sir Thomas's conference with the viſier in relation to the project of the Dutch ambaſſador, mentioned in the preceding N°. That miniſter's ingenuity. Who gives the reaſons of the Porte's late conduct in haſtening the peace with the emperor; and ſays, that the emperor's pride on his ſucceſs, and other incidents, might make a conjuncture favourable, when he and Sir Thomas might further confer on the ſubject; and that he attended a ſpeedy anſwer from the meſſenger he had diſpatched to Gabor, with intent to diſcover that prince, (See N° DLII.) and the inclination of the Tranſylvanians, which would alſo add a further light to matters now in ſuſpenſe: But Sir Thomas is of opinion, that while the troubles laſt in Aſia, they will not adventure any breach on the other ſide, unleſs they be compell'd; and he has no faith in any thing ab oriente. That the Jeſuits are burrs hardly to be pulled off (See N° DXLII, DLII); but he hopes they ſhall hereafter give but little trouble to the poor Greek church, which hath ſpent, and is indebted by their practices 120,000 dollars, beſides this laſt inſurrection on account of the types, and againſt the life of the patriarch, and Sir Thomas's honour. p. 741.

DLV. To Lord Conway. Refers again the motion of the Dutch ambaſſador, (See N° DLII, DLIII, DLIV.) to Sir Iſaac Wake. The Jeſuits brought to the water ſide to be ſhipt off; but by the craft of the officer who was to ſee it perform'd, return'd to priſon. The French ambaſſador vehemently ſtruggles in their behalf, and, as Sir Thomas thinks, too far engages his maſter's name. He threatens to depart himſelf, if he cannot reverſe their ſentence. The round anſwer of the Turkiſh miniſters on that head. He proceeds with ſo much vehemence in the affair, that he ſtakes his maſter's honour, as well as his own, on the event. Sir Thomas refers the account of the motives of this ſtep of his, to his majeſty, till he ſees the concluſion of it. Another inſtance of the bad policy, and baſe ſelfiſhneſs of the Dutch ambaſſador at the Porte. p. 742.

I.

DLVII. An Abſtract of his Letter to Lord Conway. The ſucceſſion of Mantua controverted by the marquis of Guaſtalla: His pretenſions againſt the new duke. The duke of Savoy's oppoſition to the ſucceſſion of the duke of Nevers, likely to be taken off by the marriage of the new duke with a daughter of Savoy. The pope's double conduct in reſpect to ſignor Cornaro, the aſſaſſin of the ſenator Zen (See N° DXLI, DXLVII). Death of the patriarch of Aquileia, which is likely to raiſe as much diſturbance as the Mantuan ſucceſſion. p. 744.

II.

DLVIII. Duplicate of Sir Isaac Wake's Letter to Lord Conway. The Venetians not to be moved to perform the part expected of them in the general alliance againſt the Auſtrians. Sir Iſaac accounts for their conduct, and adviſes how to proceed to ſound them to the bottom, and to obviate their pretences to avoid affording the aſſiſtance expected from them. The duke of Savoy motions an accommodation between England and Spain, and Sir Iſaac believes him more ſincere than the Venetians, who want to encourage the German war, and will contribute nothing to it. p. 745.

III.

DLIX. Abſtract of another Letter of Sir Isaac Wake to Lord Conway. Affairs of Italy ſtill uncertain. The Venetians ſee their error in diſarming ſo haſtily. Further account of the death of the patriarch of Aquileia, (See N° DLVII.) and the conſequences likely to attend it. The fraudulent conduct of the pope, with reſpect to confirming the coadjutor of that patriarchate, in which he aims at making the future nomination of a patriarch to depend upon the court of Rome. The dilemma into which the Venetians are driven on this occaſion. Other affairs of Italy. The emperor's pretenſions to nominate to that patriarchate. p. 747.

Containing the affairs of the court of Savoy, and the intereſts and pretenſions of that duke upon Mantua; as alſo his reſentments againſt France, and the probability of his joining to diſturb the duke of Nevers in his poſſeſſion of Mantua. Other particulars relating to that court, and the Italian affairs. ~~p. 748.~~

DLXI. From Lord Carleton at the Hague, to Sir Isaac Wake. With a propoſition of the French ambaſſador to the States, ill reliſh'd; and the news of the Low-countries, &c. p. 750.

VI.

DLXII. The ſaid Propoſition of the French Ambaſſador at the Hague. Preſſing in very high language for the ratification of a treaty made with France by the ſieur Languerac, their reſident at Paris; which in the former letter lord Carleton ſays, they intend to diſavow. And alſo urging for ſatisfaction on other complaints from that crown. p. 751.

DLXIII. Extract of a Letter from Lord CARLETON to Lord CONWAY. On the ſubject of Languerac's treaty, and the above propoſition. The States anſwer to it. Lord Carleton's vigorous repreſentation againſt the French being furniſh'd with ſhipping in Holland (See N° DXI, DXXI, DXXII); and their anſwer thereto. The States inſtances to him for the ſupply of the Engliſh garriſon at Stode. His anſwer. Proceedings of the French agents to procure ſhipping in Holland. The pulpits in Holland ſound loud againſt the Dutch neglect of the antient alliance with England, &c. p. 751.

VIII.

DLXIV. Extract of another Letter from Lord CARLETON to Lord CONWAY. With the news of Denmark, the Low-countries, &c. p. 753.

DLXV. From Lord CARLETON at the Hague to Sir THOMAS ROE. Excuſing his late ſilence; repeating (See N° CDXC.) the approbation given to Sir Thomas's negotiations in England, and by the queen of Bohemia. The deſire of that princeſs to have Sir Thomas made ambaſſador at the Hague; that he will uſe his beſt endeavours to promote it, if Sir Thomas approve it, and Sir Robert Killigrew give it up. That the old marquis of Baden is at the Hague with one of his ſons; alſo the old count de la Torne, neither having given or received much contentment in Denmark. That all things in that kingdom are at the loweſt ebb of deſpair; but begin to riſe by the princely friendſhip of the king of Sweden. p. 753.

DLXVI. From Lord CARLETON to Sir ISAAC WAKE. With his further negotiations at the Hague in oppoſition to the deſigns of the French. Alſo in ſupport of the Eaſt-India company of England, which ſuffers by the violence of the Dutch India company. The Dutch ſend two ambaſſadors to England, and two to France, to endeavour a reconciliation between the two crowns; who are detained by croſs winds, and an odd accident. p. 754.

DLXVII. Abſtract of a Letter from the HAGUE. With advices from Holland, France, Germany, Denmark, &c. p. 755.

DLXVIII. Advices from PARIS, of the ſtate of affairs publick and private, in that kingdom. p. 756.

DLXIX. To the KING. Sir Thomas juſtifies his proceedings at the Porte againſt the Jeſuits (N° DXLII, DLII, DLIV, DLV). New practices of Gabor. The Turkiſh affairs ſo low by their ill ſucceſſes in Aſia, that he apprehends nothing can be expected from thoſe parts; and wiſhes his majeſty to withdraw all thoughts of ſerving himſelf that way. p. 757.

DLXX. A relation of the Practices of the Jeſuits againſt CYRIL Patriarch of Conſtantinople, and the Cauſe of their Baniſhment from the Turkiſh Empire. Sent with the above letter to his majeſty. A curious piece of hiſtory, giving a particular account of the practices of the court of Rome againſt the Greek church for ſix years together (as particulariz'd in ſeveral of the preceding letters of Sir Thomas Roe to the archbiſhop of Canterbury); and of Sir Thomas Roe's watchfulneſs and dexterity in defeating their deſigns, and thoſe of the French ambaſſador, and turning upon the Jeſuits the miſchiefs they had intended for others (See N° DXLII, DLII, DLIV, DLV, DLXIX). Together with the particulars of their laſt plot againſt the patriarch for attempting to introduce printing into Turkey, and againſt Sir Thomas for protecting that deſign. p. 758.

DLXXI. To the Duke of BUCKINGHAM. Deſiring his grace's favour in protecting his proceedings about the Jeſuits from miſinterpretation; which he fears not, he ſays, from the merits of the cauſe; but the ſtrong faction of the enemies. He acquaints his grace with the unfortunate death of the agent he had employ'd with ſucceſs, as mentioned in his former letters to the duke, in ſearch of marbles (See N° CDXLIX, CDLXXII); which will occaſion much trouble, and the recovery of what he had collected will be a new work. That he will do his endeavour to make the beſt of this misfortune for his grace's ſatiſfaction. p. 763.

DLXXII. To Lord CONWAY. He refers him to his hiſtory of the Jeſuits, (See N° DLXX.) in which, he ſays, the bailo hath had his part both of injury ſuffered, and repulſed. His ſentiments of Gabor's future conduct. The grand ſignor depreſſes the Spahees, and encourages the Janizaries, which makes a diviſion between them, likely to be attended with tumultuous conſequences in the city. The ſucceſsful proceedings of Abaſſa baſſa, who threatens to beſiege the grand viſier in Tocat, where he winters. It is apprehended that neither Spahees nor Janizaries will march to oppoſe him, or the Perſians. The diſmal condition to which the Turkiſh empire is reduced. He earneſtly prays for his return. p. 764.

DLXXIII. To Sir ISAAC WAKE. With a copy of his hiſtory of the Jeſuits, (N° DLXX.) and the conduct of the French ambaſſador upon it; and copies of extracts from the two preceding letters. That he has found a jewel, being, as he conceives, a ſecond tome of a copy of St. Chryſoſtom upon the pſalms, containing thirty-two that are neither printed nor found in any library of Europe. Deſcription and further particulars of it; that he will endeavour to retrieve the other part; and hopes to bring home for Oxford ſomewhat elſe of this kind, which they have not. He anſwers Sir Iſaac's letter (N° DXLVI.) which ſignifies to him his majeſty's reſolution to protect the merchants; and the new edict of the pregadi at Venice to prohibit the trading on foreign bottoms. He enters, in a very curious manner, into this ſubject, and apprizes Sir Iſaac of the only miſchief which can ariſe to England from this ſtep of the Venetians; which he recommends to him to obviate. He ſays, that we have two republicks to our friends, but of different complexions. He is perſuaded the VENETIANS wiſh well to England, and will not underhand help our enemies; but, actively, are a frozen generation. On the other ſide, the HOLLANDERS openly concur with us; but to get a few ducats in private, will do as much for our enemies. The Dutch clandeſtine trade in corn with the Genoeſe, (who ſerve Spain with it) a matter complain'd of by the Venetians in the Engliſh, but now carry'd on more freely by the Hollanders, and worthy of Sir Iſaac's interpoſition both with the Senate and England. That he once touched this matter; but has obſerved a neglect of any thing that comes from Conſtantinople, as not being matter of ſtate: ſeldom has he had anſwer; never redreſs; therefore he deſires Sir Iſaac to lend the common good his countenance. That he daily expects his ſucceſſor, and if he may prevail, and return by ſea, and if the merchants have any goods to lade, he will viſit Villa-Franca (as he had promiſed N° DXVI); but when he is there, Sir Iſaac, he ſays, has forgot to inform him how by land he may ſafely get home, when he muſt proceed thro' enemies in every place. p. 765.

DLXXIV. From Sir ISAAC WAKE. He comforts Sir Thomas with the aſſurance that his negotiations with Gabor (whoſe falſhood, he ſays, has redounded to his glory, and been a foil to illuſtrate his honour) will be approved in England, as it deſerves. The adminiſtrator of Magdeburgh's character and opinion of Gabor. He recommends to Sir Thomas, to take, if but for form-ſake, ſome notice of a memorial of the prince of Piedmont, in relation to a trade deſired by that prince with Turkey, &c. He earneſtly renews his ſuit that he will take Venice in his return, and undertakes to ſecure his paſſage: That he does infinitely deſire to have the honour to ſerve him, and perhaps, he ſays, ſome communication betwixt them, may advantage the ſervice of their gracious maſter. With this letter Sir Iſaac ſends Sir Thomas copies of the following pieces, viz. p. 767.

I.

DLXXV. Abſtract of Sir ISAAC WAKE's Letter to Lord CONWAY. The Dutch ambaſſador at Venice demands of the ſenate the payment of two years arrears of contribution due in virtue of their defenſive alliance, and a regular payment for the future. The ſenate's anſwer full of good words, without effects. State of the affair of the ſucceſſion of Mantua, and the part the French take in that buſineſs, who accuſe the duke of Savoy as gone over to the Spaniards. Complaint of the Venetians of a ſlight from the new duke. Speculations on a voyage of the great duke of Tuſcany to Rome, Loretto, &c. p. 768.

II.

DLXXVI. Abſtract of a Letter from ZURICH. The vigorous proceedings of the Proteſtant cantons of Switzerland for a precautionary defence of their liberties, againſt the Auſtrians, or other enemies. They ſummon a general diet, and all the cantons, to meet at Baden, in order to know what they may expect from the Catholick cantons, whom they ſuſpect. p. 769.

III.

DLXXVII. Abſtract of another Letter from ZURICH. The diet ſummon'd at Baden, contrary to uſual cuſtom, put off for eight days by the Popiſh cantons. The Proteſtant cantons continue their meaſures for a vigorous defence, in caſe of need. ibid.

IV.

DLXXVIII. Propoſal of the Dutch Ambaſſador to the Senate of VENICE, mentioned by Sir Iſaac Wake to Lord Conway, (Nº DLXXV.) ſetting forth the imminent danger of the liberties of Europe, from the ambition and ſucceſſes of the houſe of Auſtria, and from the contention on foot between the two kings of England and France; and what his maſters have done to oppoſe the one, and reconcile the other. He repreſents to the ſenate their own danger, among the reſt, and moves them to join vigorouſly in the common cauſe; and particularly preſſes very earneſtly, that they will ſpeedily pay to his maſters the arrearages due from them by treaty, and give order for the regular payment of their ſtipulated quota for the future. p. 770.

DLXXIX. To Lord CONWAY, from Sir THOMAS ROE. That there may be hope that Proteus, as he calls Gabor, will be forced to fall off from the emperor, fearing that the brother of the late prince of Tranſylvania may be ſet up by Poland againſt him: From whence, he ſays, ſomewhat may emerge, over which he will watch; but yet he ſings one ſong, that he has no faith in any thing that ſavours of him, unleſs his own neceſſities give it credit. A new Poliſh ambaſſador arrived at the Porte, who, at the recommendation of that king, lives at his houſe, as they have done for four years paſt, ſo that he ſhall know the ſecret of his errand, which he will communicate by the firſt poſt. At the motion of Sir Iſaac Wake, he procures orders to be ſent to hinder the infamous practice of the Dutch, to lade corn in the arches for Genoa (See DLXXIII.) to make biſket for the Spaniards. That having received information of his majeſty's purpoſe for his ſtay in the Turkiſh court, (See Nº DVII, DXLIII.) he obeys, and acknowledges his infinite grace to deem him capable of any thing: but that he ſhall deceive himſelf, and do his maſter no ſervice. That that empire is at the very brink of diſſipation, and Gabor is as broken glaſs, that cannot be handled without harm or danger. If he could extinguiſh the fire, he would kiſs the flame, and leap into it; but he begs it may be conſidered, that where the foundation is ſand, the building muſt be as light as ſtraw. That it is unqueſtionable, that from thoſe parts the moſt happy diverſion might have come: but that the opportunity was neglected. That, however, he ſhall put all things to tryal, and ſtartle Gabor; but when he has done all, he deſires to be judg'd rather by his zeal, than the effects. He acknowledges his majeſty's grace to the Levant company, in the orders ſent to Sir Iſaac Wake, for their benefit; and hopes they will not forget gratefully to confeſs the preventing care of that worthy gentleman, and his ſucceſsful pains for their ſervice, (See Nº DXLVI.) of which he is a manifold witneſs. p. 772.

DLXXX. From Sir ISAAC WAKE to Sir THOMAS ROE. That he ſends him what advices come to his hands of the French affairs, that he may confound the French ambaſſador when he publiſhes lyes and his own inventions at the Porte. The ſtate of the attempt of the French king upon Rochelle. That Sir Peter Wyche has written to him from Leghorn, to invite him, Sir Iſaac, to correſpond with him, which he will do, when he ſhall be ſettled. He again urges his return by way of Venice, and informs him of the care he will take to procure him a ſafe paſſage. That the Venetians thank him (Sir Iſaac) for giving them advice of the emperor's intention to viſit them with 30000 men, which afterwards comes confirmed to them by other advices: they promiſe to requite him with the like confidence and communications, as occaſions ſhall offer. That he has given this advice alſo to the duke of Savoy. p. 773.

I.

DLXXXI. Extract of his own Letter to Lord CONWAY. The likelihood of new broils in Italy in relation to the Mantuan ſucceſſion. Miſerable ſtate of the Milaneze. Venetians treat ſecretly with the duke of Candales for French levies. Duke of Savoy ſuſpected to be gone over to the Spaniards. Cardinal de Richelieu's project to engage the Venetians to ſupport the duke of Nevers in the Mantuan, (in order to free France of that burden) not likely to ſucceed. p. 774.

II.

DLXXXII. Advices from ROME, in relation to the patriarch of Conſtantinople; to the Bohemian affairs; to the patriarchate of Aquileia, and the ſtate of Venice. p. 775.

III.

DLXXXIII. Abſtract of a Letter from HAMBURGH. With the news of Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Saxony, and other parts of the North. Preparations againſt Venice. Archduke Leopold ſuſpected to ſet up for being elected king of the Romans, in oppoſition to the emperor's views, &c. (of which ſee further Nº DLXXXVII). p. 776.

IV.

DLXXXIV. Advices from Memmingen, with the news of thoſe parts of Germany, &c. p. 777.

V.

DLXXXV. Copy of a Letter from Mr. OLIVER FLEMMING, Secretary to Sir ISAAC WAKE at Zurich; with further account of the preparations of the Proteſtant Swiſs cantons; their forces, &c. ibid.

VI.

DLXXXVI. From Lord CARLETON to Sir ISAAC WAKE. His opinion of the affair of the patriarchate of Aquileia, and that of Mantua. The unſatisfactory anſwer made by the States to his laſt propoſition, (Nº DLXVI.) makes him give it them back, without ſending it to England. The Dutch ambaſſadors (See Nº DLXVI.) arrive in England. His majeſty's meaſures for a vigorous proſecution of the war. The French little inclined to accommodate matters either with England or their Proteſtant ſubjects. p. 778.

VII.

DLXXXVII. Advices given to the Tranſylvanian Agent, partly by Sir ISAAC WAKE, and partly from others. Containing the projects of the emperor and his houſe againſt Denmark, which kingdom, and that of Sweden, they pretend to divide between general Wallenſtein and count Schlick; that mean time, they ſecretly determine at Vienna to declare the kings of England, Denmark, and Sweden, and the ſtates of Holland, as alſo the Venetians and Swiſs, enemies to the empire, as ſoon as the French king ratifies the treaty with the Imperialiſts. That the better to cover theſe deſigns, they pretend that the emperor and the archduke Leopold (See Nº DLXXXIII.) are at variance with each other, and carry on ſeparate views. That the king of Poland ſhall eſpouſe the cauſe of Andreas Battorus, brother of the late prince of Tranſylvania, (See Nº DLXXIX.) in order to depoſe and chaſtize Gabor, and to ſecure the Auſtrians on that ſide. p. 779.

DLXXXVIII. To Sir ISAAC WAKE, from Sir THOMAS ROE. The ſentence of baniſhment againſt the Jeſuits put in execution (See N° DLXX). The French ambaſſador's conduct hereupon. Deſigns of the Jeſuits upon Jeruſalem, fruſtrated, and the reſt of the order every-where to be baniſhed; which will be a great advantage to his ſucceſſor, both in publick buſineſs, and for balancing the French ambaſſador, who, as univerſal legate, ſought a monarchy over all Chriſtians at the Porte. The ſtate of Gabor's affairs at the Porte. The Turkiſh miniſters ſuſpicions and wrath againſt him. Sir Thomas's conduct not to let this be carry'd too far againſt that prince, ſo as to procure his depoſing, or to forward the machinations of the Imperialiſts againſt him (as hinted N° DLXXIX, DLXXXVII); which would be of bad conſequence to the common cauſe, as well as to the Proteſtant religion. He gives information to that prince of the machinations forming againſt him. His negotiations with the chimacham on this ſubject, and advice to him to write to Gabor to aſſure his faith to the Turkiſh empire, and to clear himſelf of the ſuſpicions he has given them. This motion very acceptable to that miniſter. The good influence it may poſſibly have on both ſides. Sir Thomas, tho' doubtful ſtill of the ſucceſs, and Gabor's faith, yet gives an account of the view he has in this ſtep, and what may poſſibly flow from it. Further account of the clandeſtine trade in corn carry'd on by the Dutch (See N° DLXXIII, DLXXIX.) to ſupply their and our enemies the Spaniards, for the ſake of ſordid gain; and the ſteps he has taken on that head. The Venetian bailo complains of ſome violences committed on a veſſel of theirs miſtaken for a Frenchman, by an Engliſh ſhip. Sir Thomas promiſes redreſs, and future circumſpection and regard, as far as in his power. Wiſhes as great an aptneſs on their part, to fulfil their engagements, and do juſtice to the Engliſh ſubjects. Preparations of the Turks for the Aſian war. Proceedings of Abaſſa baſſa, with the Poles and Coſſacks. By way of poſtſcript he adviſes, a viſit made him by the Tranſylvanian agent, who had not before held any correſpondence with him, to thank him for the information he had given him, as above, of the deſigns againſt his maſter. Good character of this agent. The ſubſtance of the free conference between them on this head, not as miniſters, but as private perſons. The agent deſires Sir Thomas's aſſiſtance to reſtore his maſter to the good opinion of the Porte. That he leaves theſe ſeeds to God's bleſſing, and the dew of heaven. p. 779.

DLXXXIX. To Lord CONWAY. Reſolutions and proceedings of the Turks in relation to the war in Aſia, and that againſt Abaſſa baſſa. A late aga of the Janizaries choſen grand viſier, but is not to be declared, till he is on the way, in order to ſave expence, and not to diſoblige Halil baſſa, the old grand viſier. Preparations for two fleets, one for the Black-ſea, the other for the Mediterranean. The Tartars invade Poland. The Coſſacks prepare to revenge it on the Turks. The ill ſtate of the Turkiſh marine in the Mediterranean. The continued baſeneſs of the Dutch trading in corn for the ſupport of Spain (See N° DLXXIII, DLXXIX, DLXXXVIII); which he hopes his majeſty will reſent at the Hague. The Poliſh internuncio departs. His buſineſs. Sir Thomas's conference with the chimacham on the ſubject of reconciling Gabor to the Porte (See N° preced.). That miniſter's jealouſy both of Gabor and the Emperor. Deſires Sir Thomas to ſound the agent of the former, and let him know his opinion of his ſincerity. A ſpy for the king of Spain taken in the houſe of the Imperial agent. Great offence taken thereat, and ſuſpicions entertained by the Turks. p. 782.

DXC. Recapitulation of all the Negotiations of Sir ISAAC WAKE, in the Year 1627: A curious piece, ſumming up all the occurrences of that year, "That, "by looking back upon things paſt, as Sir Iſaac ſays, "Sir Thomas Roe may in the ſame glaſs ſee the ſtate "of things preſent, and conjecture of the future;" in which that able miniſter ſuccinctly ſets forth the ſtate of affairs relating to Venice, and to his different negotiations there; to the marquis of Baden; to the count de la Tour; to Bethlem Gabor; to the differences between England and France; to the Engliſh merchants in the Levant; to the Valteline affair; to the Spaniards proceedings in Milan; to the duke of Savoy; to the republick of Genoa; to Mr. Walter Montague's fruitleſs negotiations; to the affairs of Mantua, upon the demiſe of Ferdinand Gonzagu; to ſeveral matches propoſed by different princes with the daughters of the houſe of Medicis; to the proceedings of the pope; to the patriarchate of Aquileia; to the diſpute about the ſucceſſion of Mantua, on the death of the duke Vincenzo, who ſucceeded Ferdinand, &c. p. 783.

DXCI. From Sir ISAAC WAKE. In relation to the overtures of the Dutch ambaſſador to give money to induce the Turks to break with the Emperor, which Sir Thomas Roe had open'd to Sir Iſaac, and deſir'd his opinion of (N° DLII, DLIII, DLIV, DLV). Sir Iſaac relates what he knows about it; but declines giving his opinion upon it, as a matter out of his ſphere, and beyond his underſtanding. He ſends to Sir Thomas a letter from the king of Denmark to himſelf, (Sir Iſaac) by that prince's order; as alſo one from M. Scultetus, which ſhew the ſentiments of his Daniſh majeſty as to the application of the money that was to be paid to Gabor. Report that Gabor protects the Proteſtants of Hungary by force of arms againſt the emperor: but tho' this advice comes from good hands, he can hardly believe any good of that prince. Sir Iſaac adviſes Sir Thomas, (and doubts not he will make good uſe of it) that the emperor has moved the Venetians to join with him againſt the Turks; but that they have rejected the motion. That he cannot do any further ſervice for the archbiſhop of Smyrna, recommended ſo earneſtly by Sir Thomas to the biſhoprick of Scio, (N° CCCLXX, CCCLXXI, CDXLIV, CDLXVII, CDLXXV, CDLXXXVIII, DLIII.) and the reaſons why. The formidable progreſs of the Imperialiſts, and their advantageous place of rendezvous, which will enable them either to march againſt Italy, Switzerland, Metz, the Low-countries, or the Turks, as they ſhall ſee occaſion, of which he, Sir Thomas, will be able to make good uſe. p. 786.

I.

DXCII. Letter of the King of Denmark to Sir ISAAC WAKE, directed by that Prince, as above, to be ſent to Sir THOMAS ROE. In which his majeſty propoſes, that the money deſign'd for Gabor, had he prov'd conſtant, ſhould be diſtributed among the Turkiſh miniſters, in order to prevent the confirmation of the peace with the emperor, or to procure the Turkiſh forces to march towards the borders of Hungary and Auſtria. He deſires that the deſign may be kept ſecret from Gabor, &c. leſt he ſhould fruſtrate it. p. 788.

II.

DXCIII. From Sir ISAAC WAKE to the King of Denmark. That he has ſent his majeſty's letter (after having tranſcribed it in cypher) to Sir Thomas Roe, from whom he doubts not a ſpeedy anſwer. Many rumours abroad of changing the ſtate of affairs in Italy. That tho' it would be of advantage to make war out of the bounds of Germany, yet his majeſty would do well to diſcredit flying rumours, and think ſolely of recruiting his army, and guarding the Baltick; and hopes ſucceſs from his majeſty's zeal for the cauſe of liberty. That he has ſent purpoſely one meſſenger to Vienna, and another to Ulm, to examine all the enemy's projects, and will diligently watch over every occaſion in order to inform his majeſty of matters neceſſary for his knowledge. p. 789.

III.

DXCIV. From Signor SCULTETUS to Sir ISAAC WAKE. Containing a detail of certain diſappointments likely to happen in the affairs of his Daniſh majeſty. Concluding with the unhappy ſituation of M. Joachim Mirlaff, late commiſſary-general of that prince in Sileſia, who is accuſed of capital crimes, in the execution of his office. p. 789.

DXCV. From Sir Isaac Wake to Sir Thomas Roe, with the following papers; viz.

I.

DXCVI. Extract of a Letter from Lord Carleton to Lord Conway. With the warlike affairs of Holland, &c. His lordſhip's negotiations with the States in favour of Sir William Balfour, and againſt the ſhipping preparing in their ports for the French to be uſed againſt England and the Rochellers, &c. Anſwer of the States. He takes ſome notice of an inſolent propoſition made to the States by the French ambaſſador, mingled with ſatirical ſtrokes, againſt them and the prince of Orange, which gives great offence, and is deſigned to be complained of at his court. A quarrel ariſes between the followers of the French ambaſſador and one of the prince of Orange's guards, who is murder'd by them: He protects the murderers, and endeavours to make a national quarrel of it. p. 791.

II.

DXCVII. From Sir Isaac Wake to Lord Conway. With the affairs of Italy, and the movements of the Spaniards and Savoyards to diſturb the duke of Nevers, in his poſſeſſion of Mantua. League between the Spaniards and duke of Savoy for that purpoſe. Preparations of defence of the new duke of Mantua. The artful conduct of the Venetians on this occaſion. Sir Iſaac's reaſons why he thinks thoſe ſtorms may blow over. His opinion to the Mantuan agent how little ſtreſs is to be laid by his maſter on the aſſiſtance of France, who had violated her faith without ſcruple, with the Venetians and Savoyards, and whoſe prime miniſter, cardinal Richelieu, was more intent to procure a port in Brittany for himſelf, than the dutchy of Mantua for M. de Nevers. Sir Iſaac adviſes, that his majeſty ſhould not build on any diverſion in Italy; but attend to the ſecuring of the Baltick ſea, &c. (See N° DXCIII.) p. 793.

III.

DXCVIII. From Lord Carleton to Sir Isaac Wake. Reflexions on the conduct of the French ambaſſador at the Hague, with regard to his inſolent propoſition made to the States, (See N° DXCVI.) whoſe ambaſſadors in France are ordered to complain of it. He cenſures the levity of the French nation. And obſerves as to the Dutch, that they are an untractable people, and that no honour is to be got by negotiating among them. That his majeſty has favour'd him with letters of revocation. He promiſes on his return to England, to do juſtice to Sir Iſaac's merit, &c. p. 795.

He aſſures them, that thoſe troops are not his, but the emperor's, and that it is wholly out of his power to oblige their lordſhips by removing them from their confines ſo ſpeedily as they might wiſh; but that ſuch is his regard to their lordſhips, and to the hereditary alliance between his family and the Swiſſers, that he will uſe the warmeſt inſtances with his Imperial majeſty, that thoſe troops may be withdrawn. ibid.

DCII. Intelligence from Memingen. Of 24000 horſe and foot quartered between Ulm and Vangen, beſides 7000 foot more, and a large body of horſe, daily expected at Ulm. Other parts of Germany overrun with ſoldiery, who occaſion great dearth, and many diſorders. Diets called in divers places. The Proteſtants of Landt-Obder-Ens allowed half a year to ſell off their goods and retire. Jeſuits introduced into Memingen, who demand church goods from ſeveral free cities. p. 799.

DCV. Advices from Paris. Relating to cardinal Richelieu; the ſiege of Rochelle; and other French occurrences. ibid.

DCVI. From Sir Isaac Wake to Sir Thomas Roe. He acknowledges the receipt of his letters relating to the Jeſuits and Greeks, to Gabor, and his ſtate of the Turkiſh empire; for which, he ſays, he ſhall make but a poor return as to value, tho' he ſhall pretty near come up to him in bulk. That it is likely to prove a hot year in Italy; and that the duke de Nevers will have much ado to ſave himſelf; for the French can do nothing for him, the Venetians will not paſs the bounds of neutrality, and the pope muſt ſtand padre commune. That he is informed from a good hand, that the Venetians have diſpatch'd orders to their bailo, to do what he can to induce the Turks to break with the Emperor; which he refers to Sir Thomas, who being on the ſpot, will know the truth of it, and how to make the beſt uſe of it. He repeats that he can do no more for his archbiſhop, (See N° DXCI.) the houſe of Savoy, by whoſe means he worked for that prelate, being in contumacia with the court of Rome. He repeats his opinion, that the way of Venice will be the moſt commodious for Sir Thomas's return, where he expects him with much devotion. p. 801.

With this Letter, Sir Isaac ſends to Sir Thomas the following Pieces; viz.

I.

DCVII. Copy of Mr. Hales's Letter from Turin, to Lord Conway. With advice of hoſtilities begun againſt the Montferrat by the duke of Savoy, in purſuance of his pretenſions againſt the new duke of Mantua (See N° DLX). DCVIII. From Sir Isaac Wake to Lord Conway. That the war in Italy is now begun; of the ſucceſs whereof he gives his lordſhip an account. As alſo of the claims, pretenſions, views and policies of the contending parties. The ambitious projects of the houſe of Auſtria. p. 804.

DCIX. Abſtract of a Letter from Mr. Hales, at Turin. With the further proceedings of the duke of Savoy in the Montferrat; and thoſe of the duke of Rohan in France. The French ambaſſador in Savoy diſmiſſed by the duke from his court, and followed with univerſal maledictions. p. 805.

IV.

DCX. Relation of the Duke of Florence's Reception and Entertainment at Venice. p. 806.

DCXI. From Sir Thomas Roe to the Duke of Buckingham. He gratefully acknowledges the favour of a meſſage he received from his grace by Sir Peter Wyche. The death of his ſervant on one ſide, (See N° DLXXI.) and the difficulty of getting the Engliſh ſhips to go out of their way on the other, will diminiſh the muſter of his diligence as to marbles, &c. He will leave his ſucceſſor in the right way both as to this ſearch, and to publick affairs, and augures him a happy progreſs. He commits himſelf to his grace's protection, &c. p. 808.

DCXII. To Sir ISAAC WAKE. An ambaſſador expected at Conſtantinople from Gabor, to endeavour to reinſtate that prince in the good graces of the Turks. Sir Thomas has no faith in Gabor. Further account of the Spaniſh ſpy (mentioned Nº DLXXXIX). Preparations of the Turks for the Aſian war. Abaſſa baſſa's bold declaration to the grand ſignor. He, Sir Thomas, ſees not the commiſſion of his being to act as extraordinary ambaſſador at Conſtantinople (See Nº DVII, DXLIII). His ſucceſſor, he thinks, did not like ſuch an one, thinking it a diminution to him to be under, and Sir Thomas not deeming it an honour to be above him. That if there had been occaſion for his ſervices, he ſhould have been truſted with the knowledge of his majeſty's pleaſure directly to himſelf. That his ſucceſſor boaſts to him of having procured the ſhadow of an honour at the Engliſh court to Sir Thomas; which at the ſame time he is loth Sir Thomas ſhould uſe, and he has no need of ſmoke or empty titles. He expreſſes warmly his zeal for his majeſty's ſervice, but cannot help, in honeſt confidence, as he calls it, expreſſing his diſſatisfaction at the treatment he has met with from England, which has left him ignorant and unabled. As to the way of his return, he believes the ſhip muſt go to Leghorn. That to ſee Sir Iſaac is a greater longing to him, than towns and cities to young men. If God diſpoſe it otherwiſe, he will moſt ſincerely ſerve him in England, where he hopes to ſee him as one of his protectors; that his lordſhip's friendſhip is the beſt gain of his Turkiſh journey; and he concludes, in the words of Job, Naked came he in, and naked goes he out. p. 809.

DCXIII. To Lord CONWAY. Tho' he has been afflicted with a great indiſpoſition, which has left him very weak, yet would he not omit to adviſe his lordſhip of freſh letters from Gabor to be deliver'd to him (Sir Thomas) the next day. That he will prepare his ears before his heart to believe: That Gabor hath been practiſing with the king of Sweden and others, but to what end he at preſent knows not; but in two or three days ſhall be able to judge of the whole web by the ſeveral threads. That he will proceed by the communication and counſel of Sir Peter Wyche, being uncertain how to behave himſelf, having now no authority or inſtructions, no commiſſion, and quite out of pay; only, as he underſtands that his majeſty expects his ſervice in this caſe, his ſpirit bears him up not to give over, tho' he were to prove a ſacrifice. p. 810.

DCXIV. To the ſame. An account of the conference between Sir Thomas Roe and the new ambaſſador of Gabor (in purſuance of the above letter) in preſence of Sir Peter Wyche, and the Dutch ambaſſador. That miniſter's propoſitions to him from his maſter. Sir Thomas puts the matter of them home to him; but upon the whole thinks that all his pretence of renewing the war, &c. will end in air and ſmoke, and that no dependence can be had on Gabor. That, however, yielding to the ſtrength of the Dutch ambaſſador's faith, who thought ſome advantage might reſult from that prince's preſent diſpoſition and propoſals, he reſolves to try; and accordingly joins to repreſent to the Turkiſh miniſters the formidable power and dangerous views of the Auſtrians; and endeavours to move them to throw obſtacles in the way of the peace. The anſwer they return. His converſation with the chimacham on Gabor's new propoſals and ambaſſage to the Porte, and that miniſter's bad opinion of him. The Tartar han declared a rebel to the Porte, and his brother overthrown by prince Cantemir. A reſolution taken to recal Gehan Ghiray from his baniſhment, and eſtabliſh him han in place of the other. ibid.

DCXV. To Sir ISAAC WAKE. He intreats him to copy and ſend forward to the queen of Bohemia and Lord Carleton at the Hague, the above letter to lord Conway, for which he has not time. The ſubſtance of Gabor's long letter to the viſier, and purport of his ambaſſage to the Porte. That prince dares not now truſt his own ſubjects, and will bury all his glory alive by his inconſtancy. He touches upon the requeſt of the prince of Piedmont (mentioned by Sir Iſaac Nº DLXXIV); and ſets the matter of it in a proper light. Uncertain ſtill, and in perplexity about the manner of his return; but tho' he ſtays but two days, will ſee his lordſhip at Venice, if poſſible. p. 812.

DCXVI. To Sir ISAAC WAKE. In anſwer to his letter (Nº DXCI.) in relation to the Dutch ambaſſador's motion to engage the Turks by money to attack the emperor; and alſo in anſwer to the letters of the king of Denmark (Nº DXCII.) and that of ſignor Scultetus (Nº DXCIV). In which he ſhews the impracticability of attempting to hinder the Turks from ratifying their late peace with the emperor, or, while that ratification is expected, to bring them with an army to the frontiers. That the Dutch ambaſſador has paid the money ſent him for Gabor partly to that prince, and returned the reſt, and ſo it cannot be made uſe of as his Daniſh majeſty deſir'd; nor, if otherwiſe, could any ſafe dependence be made on the performance of the Porte, were its miniſters to undertake, for the ſake of the money, to anſwer his majeſty's wiſhes. But that, however, the neceſſity of their own affairs may compel them to take ſuch meaſures, as may, at a cheaper rate, anſwer all that could be wiſh'd by the princes of the alliance. For that the emperor had raiſed ſome ſcruples to delay the expected ratification; and Gabor had taken alarm at the formidable power of the emperor, who had 150,000 men on foot in ſix different armies, one of which he ſuſpected to be deſigned againſt himſelf and the Porte, and had ſent an expreſs meſſenger to warn the Turks of their and his own danger, inciting them to take meaſures of defence and oppoſition ſuitable to the occaſion. That this alarm might poſſibly effect what would be vain to attempt to bring to paſs otherwiſe, and for any other's ſake, but their own. The viſier declares to Gabor's miniſter, that he, Sir Thomas Roe, had apprized him before of this danger, which he intends to make proper uſe of, to be in readineſs to oppoſe the deſigns of the Imperialiſts. Sir Thomas's opinion of what may blow away, or bring on, this ſtorm: And thinks, that, let the matter be as it will, good uſe may be made of the fraud, if fraud it be, of Gabor, and the fear of the Turks. Mean time he reſolves to nouriſh the hopes and apprehenſions of the former; and doubts not that his own (Sir Thomas's) conduct has been a means to influence Gabor to this preſent change of meaſures. The Tartar han and his brother in danger to be taken alive by prince Cantemir. p. 813.

DCXVII. To Lord CONWAY. Anſwer of the grand ſignor to Gabor's letter of alarm mentioned above, informing that prince of the orders given to draw an army of Turks towards Buda, to attend occaſion; but no order of acting offenſively. The ſituation of Gabor between two formidable powers, neither of which dare truſt him. The grand ſignor afraid of ſending him larger orders in writing, leſt he ſhould communicate them to the emperor. Sir Thomas knows not what to determine about Gabor; but thinks it beſt to ſeem to forget what is paſt, and hope for better, in order to ſweeten the way for his ſucceſſor, if that prince has any latent good meaning. The captain baſſa and the armada are ſet out for the Black-ſea, to make Gehan Ghiray prince of the Tartars. (See Nº DCXIV.) p. 815.

DCXVIII. To his MAJESTY. He gratefully acknowledges the favour of his revocation. He briefly mentions what he has done, in his negotiation; and regrets that he could not effect what he had ſet his heart upon, the ſecuring of Gabor to the publick intereſt. That he has inſtructed his ſucceſſor to the utmoſt of his power, and given him copies of his beſt obſervations, ſo that his majeſty may expect from him the fruits he could not reap himſelf, if that prince move not more out of habit than counſel; for that all his actions are cut in characters, and none can read them without his own cypher. He then gives account, that Gabor is again flying to arms; and that the Turks, deſpairing of the emperor's ratification of the late peace, are marching once more to the frontier to attend occaſion. That prince's agent aſſures Sir Thomas, that he will ſoon hear of greater matters from his maſter, than he is impowered to reveal, or Sir Thomas is ready to believe. Sir Thomas ſays, that tho' to conjecture about the future actions of Gabor, is like judicial aſtrology, yet he ventures to deliver his opinion upon that ſubject, and gives his reaſons for it. He adds, that if he can be recovered, he will do more ſervice than a regular army, and at much leſs charge; becauſe his marches are furious like thoſe of Jehu, and ſudden like lightning, and that he draws with his train the fear of the Turks. Where to begin to lay hold of him will be the greateſt difficulty. That this encounter of the concluſion of the treaty, he, Sir Thomas, did ambitiouſly deſire to ſee finiſhed, having been practiſed in it; but the delay is like to be more effectual than his oppoſition: And having received nothing under his majeſty's hand, nor other directions, he ſuppoſed no more was expected from him than obedience to his diſcharge. p. 817.

DCXIX. To the Duke of BUCKINGHAM. That he has preſumed to write to his majeſty the concluſion of his negotiations, and his wavering judgment about Gabor, which, he ſays, is a ſubject ſufficient to diſcredit any man; but ſeeing he writes as that prince appears, he cannot keep one form while his ſubject is continually changing. That tho' his majeſty need not hinder better preparations by relying upon him, yet he thinks it expedient to take Gabor at every bound, and to nouriſh him in all his own ways, to which, and to ſome money, he will be conſtant, for neceſſity and avarice. He informs the duke that he is now collecting and lading the marbles he has procured for him: He apologizes for them, and profeſſes a warm zeal to his grace's ſervice, &c. p. 818.

DCXX. To the Lord Viſcount CONWAY. He ſignifies the concluſion of his negotiations; and apologizes for again mentioning Gabor as worthy of attention. But ſays, that ſeeing his (Sir Thomas's) changes are not natural, but carried about by the violence of that prince's active ſphere, he cannot be blamed for varying opinion, being bound to obſerve his elevation and depreſſion. He explains himſelf to the like effect as in the above letters to the king and the duke; and notifies his own arrival at Smyrna, (the ſecond church, ſays he, poor indeed, and full of blaſphemy) in his way to recover his happy country, &c. p. 819.

DCXXI. To Sir PETER WYCHE, Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople. A very curious letter of inſtructions concerning Gabor, and the peace between the emperor and the grand ſignor. ibid.

DCXXII. To Mr. STRINGER, cenſuring warmly an hoſtile attempt of Sir Kenelm Digby in Scanderoon road, and directing what is proper to be done on that event. That Papiſts in queen Elizabeth's time were not uſed to be truſted with letters of marque and reprizal. He ſays, that while he was hunting the Jeſuits at Smyrna, he hears they are freed at Galata. He is ſorry the bailo hereupon did not better corrupt a corrupt ſtate. He makes the fathers of that ſociety fly before him. He paſſes a ſevere reflection upon the French ambaſſador at Conſtantinople. p. 821.

DCXXIII. From Sir PETER WYCHE. Promiſes that the letter of inſtructions Sir Thomas ſent him from Smyrna (See N° DCXXI.) ſhall guide him in his negotiations at the Porte. The new Tartar han eſtabliſh'd by the Turks. The warlike preparations of the Ottomans againſt the Emperor. The grand ſignor's letter to his Imperial majeſty, requiring the ratification of the peace, or the breach of the treaty, ſent to the baſſa of Buda to be uſed occaſionally. The Dutch ambaſſador propoſes to Sir Peter, to join with him to make large offers to ſome Turkiſh miniſters, to incite them to break with the emperor; but that he, Sir Peter, excuſed himſelf, having been adviſed by Sir Thomas to avoid ſuch a ſtep. He refers to Sir Thomas to act as he ſees fit, when he comes to England, on this head; but hopes the buſineſs will do itſelf, eſpecially as they have now good news from Perſia, as Sir Thomas will ſee, he ſays, in the letter he incloſes of the chimacham to Gabor (See N° ſubſeq.). Account of his audience of the grand ſignor. The plague at Galata. That the expulſion of the Jeſuits, in which, as Sir Peter obſerves, Sir Thomas ſo well play'd his part, is come to nothing ſince his departure (See N° preced.); the two that remained there having obtained leave to continue at Conſtantinople, and exerciſe their functions, in their former college. The unlucky affair of Sir Kenelm Digby's attempt at Scanderoon (See N° DCXXII). p. 822.

DCXXIV. The CHIMACHAM*'s Letter to the Prince of* TRANSYLVANIA, referred to above. The umbrage taken by the Ottomans at the proceedings of the emperor. Exhorts his highneſs to be vigilant in obſerving the motions of the Imperialiſts, and to lay aſide fear. The great ſucceſs of the Turks in the Perſian war, which obliges the latter to ſue for peace. That the grand ſignor has written to the emperor to ſend back his ambaſſador, &c. That God will no longer delay juſtly to puniſh thoſe Germans who have ſpilt ſo much of their own brethrens blood, without any regard to natural affection, by the keen ſwords of the Ottomans. p. 823.

DCXXV. To Mr. BUNDOCKE, Captain of an Engliſh Ship, concerning his taking of ſignor Coſmo Orlando's ſhip, and the bad conſequences which may follow that ſtep; with an account of what paſſed at Leghorn between Sir T. Roe and the governor of that city, and the Florentine ſecretary, in that matter. p. 825.

DCXXVI. To the Lord Viſcount GRANDISON. Sir Thomas gives an account of his ſafe arrival at Leghorn, and of his good reception there by order of the grand duke. Some account of the war in the Montferrat, and the ſucceſſes of the duke of Savoy. He gives his lordſhip a relation of a ſharp engagement which the ſhip he took paſſage in, had with the gallies of Malta: His lady's uncommon magnanimity on this occaſion. He cenſures the licentiouſneſs of the Engliſh ſhips, which fly at all, and in time, he ſays, will leave us neither trade nor port in the Levant. Gives inſtances of this in the affair of Sir Kenelm Digby at Scanderoon, (See N° DCXXII, DCXXIII.) and the action of captain Bundocke (See N° preced.). That if a bridle be not put into the mouths of theſe ſea-horſes, his majeſty's honour will be offended, and all our trades forfeited. p. 826.

DCXXVII. From Signor HAGA the Dutch Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople, to Sir THOMAS ROE. He congratulates his excellency on his ſafe arrival at Leghorn, and more particularly for his fortunate eſcape in his late furious encounter with the Malteſe gallies (See N° preced.). Informs him, that the Turks have been very ſucceſsful in Aſia: That having furiouſly cannonaded the city of Arzerum for fifteen days, Abaſſa baſſa had ſurrender'd it to the grand viſier on condition of his pardon, and that the Janizaries ſhould be reconciled to him. That this ſucceſs, and thoſe which the Turks had met with in their expedition to dethrone the han of the Crim Tartars, &c. (See N° DCXIV, DCXVII, DCXXIII.) had greatly animated the Ottoman court; ſo that the Imperial ambaſſy, when it arrives, is not likely to find the Turkiſh miniſters ſo tractable, as they would certainly have been, had it come at the time ſtipulated between the commiſſaries; eſpecially, if the Perſian ſhould ſolicit a peace on tolerable conditions; which he will very probably do, being greatly embaraſſed both by the Uſbec Tartars and the great Mogul: That Bethlem Gabor, believing himſelf ſecure from the Imperial arms, for the preſent, reſolves to be quiet, and leave his allies to God's protection, &c. p. 827.

Notwithſtandinge, leaſt the ſaid letters ſhould not come ſafely to your roiall hands, we have thought fitt againe to make knowne our purpoſe of recalling our former embaſſador Sir John Eyre, and to deſire you to diſcharge and diſmiſſe him from your port, and to receave and admit in his roome our truſty and welbeloved ſervant Sir Thomas Roe, one of the principall gentlemen of our court, and of our privy chamber, whome we have now expreſſely ſent, and whome we authoriſe under our greate ſeale of England, as our embaſſador to reſide at your porte, and to negotiate in our name, and in the behalfe of our ſubiects abidinge within your kingdomes, of whoſe fidelity and diſcretion as we are well 1621.

1621. aſſured, ſo we doubt not but he will give you good content in his demeanor and negotiation with We have alſo thought fitt to put you in mind of thoſe comon rovers upon the ſeas, who are enemies to the lawes of nations, and ſpoilers of the quiett and peaceable marchant, by whome amity and frendſhippe is maintained betweene kinges and princes, that you would pleaſe to exerciſe your great and mighty power to chaſtiſe and deſtroy them, as traitors to your honor, and infringers of the ſacred and publique peace, in full aſſurance that you will extend the ſame good reſpect unto us as your royall anceſtors have done unto our moſt renowned predeceſſors, whereby that ancient league and commerce may be inviolably maintained betweene both our kingdomes, which, on our part, we ſhalbe very loth to infringe or diſſolve: We do, by theis our letters, recommend unto your princely favor this our ſaid truſty ſervant and embaſſador to reſide and remaine in your port, on our behalfe to treat with you in all affaires for the publicke weale of our dominions, and for the generall peace of us both, and of our allies and frends; as alſo for the ſupport and aid of all our ſubiects which doe live and trade within your eſtates and contries, to whoſe good diſcretion we do recommend their affaires, and by whoſe induſtry and mediation we conceave our people may be releeved in their juſt and reaſonable demaunds, to the perfect maintenance and aſſurance of that mutuall commerce, which hath ſo long tyme been continued betweene our royal progenitors. And as we have greate cauſe to profeſſe our gratefull acknowledgment for manie favors which our former embaſſadors, and all other our ſubiects have and doe receave from your roiall hands, ſo, in our princely love, we doe intreat you to take knowledge of, and to command redreſſe for divers oppreſſions and wrongs done unto ſome of our ſaid ſubiects perſons and goods that live under the aſſurance of your frendſhippe with us, which we have formerly ſignified to our reſidents at your port; but as we verily beleeve they have never come unto your eares, that are open to the iuſt complaints of all ſtrangers, whereof we have now given charge to our ſervaunt and embaſſador to acquaint you with more at large, unto whome we deſire you to give protection and credit in whatſoever he ſhall move and propound for the eſtabliſhing, confirmation and inlargement, in all occaſions, of thoſe liberties and priviledges, which our ſubiects have anciently enioyed by the benignitie of your ſelf, and of your roiall anceſtors, and in all other thinges and occaſions, wherein he hath or ſhall receave our commaunds, as if our ſelfe did communicate them with you; which we doubt not ſhall redound to the great utility and honor of both our empires. And ſo we wiſh you health and true felicity. Dated at our roiall city of London, the 6 day of September, Anno Domini 1621, and of our raigne of Great Brittaine, France and Ireland the 19th.

James R.

HAVING already given order for the revocation of Sir John Eyre, our ambaſſador now reſident at Conſtantinople, in whoſe roome nevertheleſs wee have thought fitt in the interim, and proviſionally, to ſubſtitute John Chapman as our agent, for the diſpatche of ſuch affayres as concerne our merchants and their trade in the Grand Signior's dominions, qualifying him with that title and charge, untill wee ſhould ſend thether another embaſſador; you ſhall underſtand, that ſuch is our gratious opinion of your fidelity and affection to our ſervice, and of your abilities, whereof heeretofore we have had good experience, as wee have made choice of you for that employment, whereof though the principall part heereafter perhapps may conſiſt in your carefull endeavors and negociation for the good of our ſubjects that trade into thoſe parts, which was the firſt and onely foundation of that correſpondency which our crowne hath hetherto held with that ſtate; yet now the preſent condition of Chriſtendome conſidered, and the miſerable garboyles and diſſentions amongſt chriſtian princes, of which, it ſeemes, the Grand Signior takes his advantage, and in hope thereof is already farre advanced in an expedition, either againſt our good brother the king of Poland, or ſome part of Hungary, gives us occaſion to make further uſe of your ſervice at this time, and to lay our royall commaundements upon you, as wee do by theſe preſent inſtructions, to uſe our name, and your utmoſt endeavors with the Grand Signior, in ſuch ſort as you ſhall find moſt avayleable, to 1621. divert him from proſecuting thoſe furious and violent ends, which it ſeemes hee profeſſeth by that greate armie, wherewith hee comes marching in perſon towards Chriſtendome. And foraſmuch as wee did heeretofore, about a twelve moneth ſince, upon the firſt rumor of this greate preparation againſt Poland, commaund our embaſſador there reſident, to expoſtulat with him, and to lett him knowe the jealouſie that wee and all other chriſtian princes had of ſuch an attempt, and how it would engage us neceſſarily, though unwillingly, to take armes againſt him, in the defence of our neighbor princes and allies, you ſhall now againe putt him in remembrance of it, and lett him underſtand, that there are no reſpects of friendſhippe ſo deare unto us, as the obligation wee have to defend thoſe princes and ſtates that bee fellowe-profeſſors with us of the ſame chriſtian faith; and therefore, that wee earneſtly adviſe him yet as a friend to deſiſt, and not to deſpiſe (though his enterpriſes ſeeme never ſo hopefull) the meanes which God hath putt into our hands, with other our friends and confederats, to reſiſt him, whenſoever wee ſhall undertake it. In which ſtile of admonition, we thinke fitt, you at firſt proceede with him, with ſuch confidence and bouldneſſe as is befitting our honor, and as you ſhall finde requiſite; ſo as your words extend not to a direct declaration, or proclaiming of warre and enmitie, which, at this time, might proove dangerous unto our ſubjects, and their fortunes, who have trade within his dominions, and would bee litle avayleable now, if the Grand Signior bee reſolute in the proſecution of this action, conſidering how unready wee are with our forces, and of how litle uſe they can bee in reſpect of our remoateneſſe from the preſent ſervice and occaſion, without the helpe and coaſſiſtance of other princes, whoſe intentions in contributing to the generall cauſe wee knowe not; and therefore if you finde, that thoſe round admonitions of ours do not prevayle, you ſhall certify us with all ſpeede, and give us an accompt of your negociation, that wee may thereupon conſider what is further to bee done. In a word, becauſe, upon the place, you ſhall better diſcerne what is fitt to bee done in particular, then we can direct you heere, wee muſt referre much to your owne diſcretion, laying before you this generall ground, which, upon your duty and allegiance to us, wee charge you to obſerve, that whatſoever ſervice you may heerein do, either unto the Emperor, or to the king of Poland, againſt whom, either both or one of them, this invaſion is threatened, that you do it to the uttermoſt of your power, ſincearely and heartily, and to give us an accompt of it from time to time, as there ſhalbe occaſion. And if it pleaſe God, that either the adviſe which you ſhall give unto the Grand Signior in our name for ſtay of his attempts and proceedings againſt Chriſtendome, or any other overture from the Emperor or the king of Poland, ſhall ſo farre prevayle upon his judgment or affections, as to induce him to hearken unto a peace, and that there ſhalbe thereupon any place of meeting appointed for the commiſſioners or miniſters of either ſide to debate and conclude the ſame, wee give you full power and authority, if in your diſcretion you fynd, that your perſonall aſſiſtance and preſence there may any way advantage the buſineſſe, to tranſport your ſelf thether, and to negociate the ſame in our name. And becauſe that ſmall portion of treaſure which wee have heere disburſed, as you knowe, unto the Poliſh embaſſador, may perhapps come unto the notice of the Grand Signior, and bee taken for an actual aſſiſtance of that king againſt him; as wee would not bee very ſcrupulous in profeſſing it to the world, if the aſſiſtance were conſiderable; ſo, on the other ſide, being ſo ſmall a ſomme as ten thowſand pounds, and employed to another purpoſe, wee would have you remove that jealouſy, and lett him knowe, that it was onely our guift unto the embaſſador.

FURTHERMORE, wee muſt recommend unto you in ſpetiall, the caſe of certaine noblemen and others of Poland, lately taken by the Turkes in Valachia, and now priſoners in Conſtantinople; for whoſe liberty and preſent inlargement you ſhall mediate in our name by all meanes poſſible, and if you cannot obtaine a preſent enlargement, yet ſome better uſage and treatement in the mean time; amongſt whome wee muſt recommend unto you in particular, a noble-man of Poland called Wollmar Farensbecke, now held captive with the reſt; as likewiſe one William Fourbes, a Scottiſh man's ſonne taken in the place aforeſayd by Mahomet Cielebin, a Tartarian captaine.

FOR

1621. For all other matters concerning our merchants, and their trade in the Leuant, wee doubt not but you will have that care which becomes you, in any thing that may appertaine to the wellfare of their perſons and goods; referring you for all particular informations and directions unto the Leuant company, either at this time, or heereafter, as they ſhall have occaſion to write unto you: onely wee muſt remember you of that, which, without doubt, doth moſt concerne the good of their trade, and toucheth us not a litle in honor, the ſuppreſſion of thoſe inſolencies committed upon our ſubjects, and their goods, by the pirates of Argier and Tunis, againſt whom wee have ſo often heeretofore complayned in that port, but have found no redreſſe: You ſhall therefore lett the Grand Signior now knowe, that howbeit wee have beene forced, out of neceſſity, to ſett forth of late a royall fleet, for the ſecurity of our merchants trade in the Mediterranean ſea againſt that wicked crewe, whoſe actions, wee knowe, hee, in his juſtice, will not avowe; yet wee do ſo much relie upon his friendſhippe, which wee have ever beene carefull to preſerve, by all good offices on our part, as that he will take preſent order therein himſelf to cutt off thoſe common enimies, and their harborers and receivers within his dominions, that the commerce betweene our ſubjects may bee ſafe and free, as in times paſt it hath beene, which is the onely meanes to continue amitie betwixt us; and in this point you are to deale very effectually and roundly, as to your diſcretion ſhall ſeeme meete.

At Wyndſore,

GEO. CALUERT.

Right Honourable,

I Am arrived ſafely, by God's aſſiſtance, at Malago in Granado, where I was willing, aſwell to refreſh my company, that were unaccuſtomed to the ſea, as to informe myſelfe of the eſtate and deſignes of the pirats of Algier, and ſo have landed and reſted two dayes. I purpoſed to doe this in a privat maner; but the corrigidor Don Franciſco de Trexo would not overſee mee, but tooke preſent notice by a meſſenger, and ſoone after ſent his wife and ſome ladyes to wellcome and enterteyne myne, with aſmuch courteſy and reſpect as I can acknowledge. Since, he hath viſited mee, and would not be excuſed of that trouble, offering mee, with great apparance of freedome, his houſe, and all other eaſes and commodities in his government, which I determyne to repay before I take ſhipp, aſwell as my meanes and tyme will affoord; yett I thought fitt to ſignify unto your honor theſe outward [reſpects], that (which I humbly beſeech) they may be acknowledged to the conde of Gondomar, as done in honor of my king and maſter. I have found all the way full of clamor and [lamentation] and I doubt not you knowe howe theſe knaves have ranged all the coaſts ſince the departure of our fleete from the Leuant. They have taken neare forty veſſells of his majeſty's ſubiects; thoſe who had any goods they have carryed away; ſome others, they have ſcourged with blowes, and diſgracefull, barbarous uſage, ſuch as I am loath and aſhamed to mention. Here are about fourteene Engliſh in the roade, that have bene taken, rifled and diſmiſſed, becauſe they made no reſiſtance; and ſome 4 or 5 are recovered agayne from them by the Spaniſh Gallions, and now become good prize to them. Such as have fought, they have fired and burnt, men and all, taking none to mercy; as the Delight, wherein was maſter one Young of London, reproaching them in miſery, THAT THEY DURST RESIST. In concluſion, the eſtate of the poore merchant is moſt miſerable, and, I will be bold to ſay, much the worſe ſince our late unhappy and unperfect attempt; for they are enraged doggs, and proteſt a bloudy revenge upon our nation, who now arme into the ſea above 70^{ty} ſayle: no head-land, no place from Sicily as high as the North Cape free of them. I will informe your honor nothing out of myne owne feares, but the truth, though, I aſſure you, the perill I ſhall runne is much more then I will make it; and the diſhonor to his majeſty, if they ſhould meete and attempt us, you will feelingly, I knowe, conſider. We are here uncerteyne, whether they are yett abroad in fleets, or gone to the iſelands, or within, ſcattered upon the chriſtian coaſts. Soe many they are, and ſo univerſall the feares, as I can give no certeyne adviſe of their courſe, nor is it now needfull.

1621. YETT I have thought it my duty to informe your honor of the lamentation of the merchants, and people in generall here, and to proteſt in their behalfe, that if the trade from the north of the Cape, to the Streight, and from thence into the Leuant, be of any conſequence to his majeſty, or the commonwealth of England, there muſt be ſome ſpeedy courſe taken for the ſuppreſſing of theſe robbers, leaſt they growe too powerfull at ſea for the armyes of kings; for the greateſt ſtrength of the merchant into the bottom, which their trade can beare, will not ſecure them. They muſt come home with great eſtates ſingle, and the ſmall men and fiſhers of the weſt are but frye before them; ſoe that after great loſſes, and the ruyne of many of his majeſty's ſubjects, the iſſue will be a diſſolution of all theſe trades. I beſeech your honor to beleeue I write not paſſionatly, but what I foreſee upon aſſured grounds: And for one inſtance, which you will conceive to be ſtraunge, but is very true, whereby you may collect their growth and encreaſe: They haue at Algier, upon the wharfe before and about the town, 1000 peeces of our Engliſh iron ordinance, which they cannott yett ymploy. How miſerable are wee, that cannot keepe ſuch a treaſure, and ſuch a defence to ourſelues? A treaſure aboue the mynes of India!

I KNOW his majeſty hath bene at a great charge, and therein engaged his honor to doe ſomewhat this laſt yeare which hath not ſucceeded. I will not preſume to looke into the cauſe, nor trouble you with every report; but I could, I think, ſatisfy your honor, that the deſigne was not well grounded, and worſe ſeconded; wherein the generall may well excuſe himſelf upon want of victualls and ſupplyes which this coaſt cannott affoord, and perhaps of that aid expected here: Butt if his majeſty will be pleaſed to looke uppon the diſtreſſes of his poore people with pitty and care, and determine once more to endeauour their ſafety, you will give mee leaue to offer my poore aduiſe, which I ſubmitt to his majeſty's wiſedom with all humility. To enter hereinto. The corrigidor of this towne hath enquired with great earneſtneſs, whether his majeſtie will proceed in the deſigne or not, and hath preſſed mee to write to our ambaſſador at Madrid, and to ſome others, miniſters in that court, to aduance and farther it, which I haue excuſed to do, as being no part of myne. And though I know that theſe here plead their own intereſt of trade, yet our neceſſity is not leſſe, if wee continewe theſe commerces: And therefore I have medled ſo farre as to promiſe this aduiſe unto your honor; and to lett you knowe, that the gouernor here makes great proffers on their part. I was bolde to tell him, that the greateſt cauſes of withdrawing his majeſties forces, in my opinion, were, beſides the complaynt made from Sardinia, without head or foot, Firſt, That the contract was not kept on the behalf of Spayne for ſuch ſuccours as were needful: Next, That our ſhipping could not carry aboue ſix months victuall and munition, and that this coaſt was not able to ſupply ſodainly with ſuch food as our people require; therefore it was in vayne, at ſo great charge, to ſecond the attempt, unleſs there were erected a ſtore and magazine in ſome fitt port of Spayne beforehand, of all things for relief, that our fleets might not ſpend uſeleſs tyme in harbour, but might be monethly prouided from the ſhore; and that his majeſty of Spayne would ioyne ſuch forces as ſhould be agreed vpon. Theſe diſcourſes he ſeemed to apprehend eagerly, and to make offer that he would engage himſelfe to accommodate all, and to that end would write to court, which I could not encourage him in, as beeing without my limitts; yet he hath profeſſed to make ſome motion to the ſtate, and to ſend ſome overture to the ambaſſadour reſident in England.

BUTT, if his majeſty have any ſuch honorable and gracious purpoſe, you will give leave to tell my opinion, Firſt, That it is neceſſary ſomewhat be done; and to advance it, I have written my thoughts to the merchants: But ſo great a charge is not needful, nor to engage ſo much of his majeſty's honor nor roial nauy. Tenne ſhips on our part, well fitted, with as many of Spayne, are ſufficient; and moſt of theſe may be furniſhed from the Thames, and the expence of too many veſſels converted into good prouiſion, and vpon double manning and good pay of thoſe that are ſent. I knowe no power of theſe knaues dare attempt the force propoſed and countenanced with two ſhipps of his majeſty's; and if they may be maynteyned, and have expreſſe commiſſion to ryde before the towne, when weather will give leave; and to ſtand off to ſea, and retorne vppon euery opportunity, in two years they wilbe 1621. worne out, and diſperſed, beſides the opportunityes of fire, and ſuch other as ſhall in tyme be offered.

THE captaynes in theſe ſhipps ſhould be choſen of the ſeamen moſt expert maſters that haue vſed the Leuant; and I doubt nott, to this charge, and vpon theſe conditions, the merchants of England would willingly and largely contribute a proportion.

FOR the victualling, which is one of the greateſt wants vpon this coaſt; wyne is plenty to make beuerage as cheape as beere; therefore leſſe of that which takes much ſtowage, would ſerue, and affoord more roome inſtead thereof. Bread cannot be wanting here or in Sicilia; but as I propounded, there muſt be one ſtorehouſe erected at a fitt port, and two ſhipps only for that ſeruice to paſſe to the fleete with monethly ſupply.

ANOTHER way to weaken theſe robbers I will be bold to propoſe. It is a true word, Receiuers make theeues; and if they had not ſo many traders with them from the chriſtian coaſts, they would be ſoone vnable for want of munition, and more for lack of vent. They are ſupplied, and traffique freely with Ligorno in Italy; and in Prouence are ſuccoured from Marteque, Marſeilles, La Cioutat, Tolon, Santropes, Canas, Antiquas principally, but generally from one of the petty ports: Yea, ſome of theſe ports of Prouence haue contracted with them for all the fiſh they can take from our Newfoundland-men (little of which they would elſe make uſe of) to receiue it, and giue 8 rialls the quintall, whereby they are the more encouraged and animated to make prize of that, which elſe they would refuſe, to our great damage.

THEREFORE, if his majeſtie pleaſe to giue order to his miniſters, or by exp reſsletters, to make vehement complaynt againſt theſe courſes; and to declare, that if the king of France, and the Grand Duke take not ſtrict order to confiſcate any of their ſubjects that ſhall any way haue commerce or trade with Algier or Tunis, that then they ſhall not take it in ill part, that prizes be made of all the ſhipps and goods of the inhabitants of thoſe parts, whereſoeuer mett on the ſea: There is no one thing of more conſequence, to preuent, at leaſt, the encreaſe of theſe common enemies, in which I moued the count of Gondamor to be aſſiſtant, by my letters from the Downes before I left the coaſt.

LASTLY, To diſarm them of all the diſſembled countenance of the Grand Signor, who delights in, and makes uſe of their fearful growth, his majeſty may bee pleaſed to giue mee commiſſion to intimate thus much, that if he will not vſe his authority to deſtroy theſe villains, but connive, that neither the commerce of Conſtantinople, nor the bottom, can be mainteyned; nor can the Turke take it in ill part, if his majeſty vſe the ſame policy, and winke at any of his ſubjects that ſhall do the like ſpoile vpon any of his ſubiects in the Red Sea. I well know not only how eaſy it is thereby to bring the Grand Signor to good termes, but alſo to fill his majeſty's coffers, whenſoever he ſhall pleaſe no longer to enterteyne friendſhip with him: And though our Leuant and Turkie companies may miſlike this as prejudicial to their trades, yet I know it were better to have none at all with theſe Infidels, than ſuch as wee now drive on the [preſent] conditions; and this, though they are loath to confeſſe, yet they do and will [grant].

THE corrigidor Don Franciſco de Trexe this day hath informed mee, that the plate fleete is ſafely arriued, and the king's armado ſent to convoy them, retorned to Gibralter to attend the piratts, and that comming in they met their ſquadron, and haue taken 7 ſaile of them.

I HAVE troubled your honor with a large diſcourſe; you will make mee this excuſe, that I ſhall not eaſily nor tymely againe write of this ſubiect, and ſomwhat may be deſigned to which I would be gladd if I could add one ſtick to encreaſe the fire that ſhall burne them. I beſeech you to preſerue the remembrance of mee to his majeſtie, and as you ſtand a feador, ſo to confirme him in this thought of mee, that I will willingly ſacrifice my life for his ſeruice and honor, and that I will approue myſelfe a good chriſtian againſt all Turks, Infidells, and Jewes, whereof I will giue his majeſtie the teſtimonie of true and loyall obedience. I know excuſes to great perſons are accuſations. I owe my Lo. Admiral this accompt, but I have not tyme to ſleepe. I commit myſelfe into honorable hands how to free mee not only from blame, but ill conceipts; and I will make the amends I owe for it: And ſo, preſuming your honor, is very weary, I ſhall have leave to ſeal this profeſſion. 1621

To Mr. Secretary CALVERT.

Right Honorable,

THESE encloſed are a tranſcript of my laſt from Malago, wherein, with much fervency, I repreſented to your honor's conſideration, the danger of the merchants in theſe ſeas: Nor hath the ſafe paſſage I haue found in the many waters between that and Meſſina in Sicily (where, by God's help, I am arriued the 3d preſent) any thing cooled mee to be leſſe inſtant and earneſt to lament for them; but that I hope it hath taken ſo good impreſſion in you, that you wilbe pleaſed fully to informe his majeſty, and to aſſiſt in a worke ſo glorious and neceſſary, as the ſuppreſſion of the pirats wilbee. From this place there is the ſame cry, and the ſame hope, that his majeſtie will not deſert the generall cauſe, wherein his own ſubiects are ſo much intereſſed. I haue been occaſioned to ſtay here ſome daies for the diſcharge of goods, and made no noiſe of my arriual; yet before I landed, notice was taken: Don Phillibert of Sauoy, with the 3 generalls of Spayne, Naples, and Sicily, with the armado of gallies, beeing in the towne and port of Meſſina. The Prince is made Vicario in the kingdom, which is as much more than Viz-re, by the addition of power to diſpoſe of all offices, without ſtay for order from Spayne. The Duke of Tauriſano, late Viz-re, is yet in Palermo, and expected daily here to reſign, and ſo to depart; at whoſe arriual the prince will publickly take the gouernment. As ſoone as I came into the port, Don Pedro de Leua, general of the gallies of Spayne, came abourd to giue mee the Buen-Venido, and to inuite mee aſhore, offering mee accommodation in his houſe; but I took the houſe of an honeſt Engliſhman, where, in few hours time, the prince ſent a cauallero to viſitt and welcome mee: in the afternoon, the maſter of the horſe, with divers gentlemen, with new ceremonies, and many courteſies, offering mee all the commodity of the citty, and thereby doing me ſo much reſpect, as I cannot obſcure and temper it, becauſe, being a teſtimony of their deſire here to honor my maſter, ſilence from me in this caſe were detraction. My wife had her part of theſe courteſies; the principal condeſſes and ladyes being ordered daily to viſitt, entertayne, and carry her abroad. The next day, the marqueſs de Sta. Cruce, lieutenant to the prince, and Don Diego de Piementell, generall of the Sicilian gallies, came to viſitt mee, and in turne, all the nobility of this litle court, and the magiſtrats of this citty; which, I hope, your honor will procure to be acknowledged to the count of Gondamar, or in Spayne to his majeſty's reſident.

IN the gallies here I found 15 Engliſh captives, that cried out to me as I paſſed to compaſſionate them; and I thought it my duty to do good to his majeſty's ſubiects wheresoeuer I found them diſtreſſed; and ſo informing myſelf of the quality of their impriſonment, I found 13 of them had bene taken by Turks, forced to ſerue, and ſo againe taken by the Spaniards, were made their ſlaues; two others that were renegados: and that it was in the power of the prince to giue them liberty. I was ſollicited by the merchants here to viſitt him, and preſſed by the cryes of theſe poore men, and therto inuited by meſſages from the court, I ſent to the prince by his ſecretary, that I hoped to haue paſſed here obſcured, but ſeeing his highneſs had pleaſed to take knowledge of mee, and to doe mee ſo many honors, I could nott depart with ciuility, and not deſire to viſitt him, aſwell in reſpect of the good affection of my maſter to the duke of Savoy his father, as of the friendſhip and ſyncere amity betweene his majeſty, and the king of Spayne; which he tooke in good part, and deſigned mee the next morning, when he ſent his mayor domo, with many cavalleros, and his coaches, to conduct mee. The generalls met mee att the firſt ſtaires foote, and the prince himſelf at the doore of his great chamber. Beeing ſate, he asked mee many queſtions of his majeſty's health, of the prince, and ſuch like; and ſo of my imployment to the Grand Signor, of the newes of Poland and France; and 1621. laſtly, moued mee to hold a correſpondence with him of ſuch occurrences as paſſed in Turky. I anſwered, that his majeſtie had commanded mee to doe all good offices to the princes and generall eſtate of chriſtendom; but in eſpecial to the ſubiects of the king of Spayne, wherein I would be very ready to do any ſeruice he ſhould command mee, and that I would, in all occaſions that might concern the king of Spaine, write to his highneſs, and giue him aduiſe of the motions and deſigns of the Grand Signor. This I thought I could not refuze, beſeeching your honor to aduiſe mee by your firſt, how farr I may performe this promiſe, that I may not tranſgreſſe by deſyre to do well; and the copies of all I ſhall ſend either hither, or to any forayne miniſter or ſtate, I ſhall duly ſend you. Hereupon I took occaſion to moue him for the liberty of ſo many of the Engliſh as were in the gallies, who had not forſaken their faith; which I knew his majeſtie would receiue as a teſtimony of his good affection, and was conformable to the league betweene their majeſties of England and Spaine; which he, at firſt motion, granted, and deſired their names in writeing, which I ſent to the king's ſecretary, who directs all here, Don Antonio Nauarra, who makes ſome difficulties and interpretations of the prince's promiſe; but yet I doubt not to procure their relief, of which the concluſion of this letter ſhall enforme you. After many courteous diſcourſes and offers from the prince, I took my leave, and he brought me forth to the outmoſt roome, through 3 anti-chambers, which I tooke as a great reſpect to his majeſtie, and I beſeech your honour it may be known to him.

THIS morning I receiued a letter from Don Antonio de Nauarro the king's ſecretary, with order for releaſe of all the Engliſh in the gallyes, whom I will diſpatch from hence as well as I can, though to my charge, and for which I ſhall have no other recompence then the good acceptation of my maſter. Therefore I beſeech your honour, not only to acquaint his majeſtie, but to procure from him ſome acknowledgment, that his highneſs may not think mee ingrate, and may be ready to doe the like in another occaſion; for wee think it here to be a great teſtimony of his affection to his majeſty, the number conſidered, and the ſpeedy diſpatch. I have no other matter fitt to preſent you, only I muſt once againe repeat it, that I think no miniſter of his majeſtie abroad euer receiued more courteſies nor honors, being anewe viſited by the prince de Roca Fiorida Stratago of Meſſina, and my wife by the princeſs, all profeſſing very much their deſire to do his majeſtie ſeruice, which I hope you will pleaſe to mention to his majeſtie; for it is no vanity of myne, who know I am but a ſhadow. I hope to depart the port to-morrowe, and ſo to proceed to myne own ſphere, where I beſeech God ſend me ſuch good ſucceſs, as I may doe ſome good worke for the general good of Chriſtendom, and his majeſties honor: And if I have in any thing here exceeded or tranſgreſſed, I hope you will make the beſt enterpretation for mee, that his majeſty may at leaſt think I would do well. However, I will give a good acconnt of my duty to him, and of my deſire to doe your honor

Meſſina in Sicily,
Decemb. $\frac{7}{17}$. 1621.

All particular Seruice.

To my Lord Admirall (the Marquiſs of BUCKINGHAM.)

My Lord,

I Can giue your lordſhip no great account of any thing that hath occurred ſince my departure. I was bold to write to mr. ſecretary Caluert from Malago, of the great encreaſe of the pirats in theſe ſeas, and of the danger of the merchaunt, with myne owne thoughts, if his majeſty have any farther purpoſe to attempt their deſtruction, which is both honourable and neceſſary, if theſe trades, or the other to the ſouth of the north cape, be of any conſequence to his majeſty's kingdoms. If they be ſuffered to encreaſe, they will braue the armies of kings at ſea in a fewe yeares, and attempt euen the coaſts and ſhores with perill: And becauſe they carry the name only of theeues, they are yett contemned or neglected: But they will become a dangerous enemy when they ſhall robb with fleetes, and therefore would be in time conſidered. The Spaniards now make great offers to continue the contract, though their performance be ſlowe, and their own eſtate chiefly intereſſed; yet beſides the danger and ruyne of the merchaunt, it is conſiderable, that this army encreaſing, is at the obedience of the Grand Signor, the common enemy, who hath no ſtrength but gallyes. I know your lordſhip will collect enough out of this without further preſſure. The armados of Spain, Naples, and Sicily have bene in the Archipelago. The Turks forces abſent in the Black Sea; yet they haue done nothing of conſequence, taken a few carmiſalls and ſlaues, and are retorned to this port, where Don Philibert of Sauoy, generaliſſimo, is preſent, who is made Vicario of Sicily; with abſolute power to diſpoſe of all the offices, without attendance from Spaine, which is more than Viz-re. Hee hath vſed mee, for his majeſty's honor, with very great reſpect, as I have in particular aduiſed Mr. Secretary. Among many courteſies, finding 13 Engliſh captiues in the gallies, I thought it my duty to ſuccour them. His highneſs at the firſt inſtance, to expreſſe his good affection to my maſter, gaue them to mee all free, which, I think, is a good worke, and not ordinary. I beſeech your lordſhip, that his majeſtie may be pleaſed to take knowledge of it into Spaine, for the princes honor, that he may, in the like occaſion, not think himſelf neglected. The aduiſe from Conſtantinople is ſeconded, of the overthrowe of the Turk. I have ſent a briefe of the particulars, as many as I know: God grant it be true; and yet the pride of the Grand Signor is not aſwaged, but he threatens a newe attempt in the ſpring.

I HOPE I have hitherto done his majeſtie no diſhonour; nor can I boaſt of ſervices; but being vnder your lordſhips protection, I will hope for a good interpretation, beſeeching you to preſent my name to his majeſtie, that I be not forgotten in theſe great diſtances, wherein my humble fortune hath kept mee; and as I have obſerued your lordſhip to be the Amparo of thoſe that pretend to vertue and honor, and not to deſert them till they haue forſaken themſelues; ſo I beſeech you take mee vpon thoſe conditions, which cannot ſtayne you; and leaue mee when I am other then

Your Lordſhip's faithful and honeſt Seruant.

Right Honourable,

I Went this day to take leaue of the prince, and to give him thanks for the reſpects he had done mee, and principally for the releaſe of my cuntrymen. He asked of me, Whether his majeſty would continue to aſſiſt in the deſigne againſt the pirats? and gaue many reaſons preſſing the daunger of their encreaſe. I anſwered, I knew nothing of his majeſty's purpoſe, but only a common voice, that the ſuccours promiſed from Spaine were not performed; and the barrenneſs of the coaſt to prouide victuals; but that, being a witneſs of the great neceſſity, in many reſpects, I had written my opinion fully to your honor. Hee demaunded further, How the marriage proceeded? To which I replied, That the reſolutions of kings were in the hands of God, and their ſecretts hidd from us; but that I had heard, that the conditions were in generall termes agreed on, and that there depended ſomewhat from Rome. For myne own part, I thought his majeſtie was very willing, if all other circumſtances were accorded; and that all the ſubiects of England did ſo rely on his majeſties wiſdome, that whatſoeuer he thought fit for his honor, and the generall peece of chriſtendom, would be receiued with great ioy and content. He treated me with as much reſpect as at the firſt, and brought mee to the outmoſt anti-chamber. Returning home, he had prepared a banquett [on board] the Real, to which my wife was inuited, accompanied with princeſſes and conteſſes, where wee had as much as could be. The gally is, without, moſt richly guilt; within, at the poope, all inlaid with maſſy ſiluer both aboue and underfoot. It had 6 chambers belowe, all guilt moſt curiouſly. The auning ouer the poope was of cloth of gold; the whole gally from ſtemm to ſterne covered with damask redd and yelowe; 30 banks of a ſide, 7 ſlaues to a bank in redd coats. She was prepared and adorned thus for vs, wherby your honor will iudge, that the prince did ſtriue to do his majeſtie all great reſpect. As ſoone as I came home, all the captiues were ſent to my houſe, 12 Engliſh and one Scottiſh, without fees, but what I gaue freely, in ſo noble a manner as 1621. the like hath not bene vſed in Spaine. I beſeech you it may be acknowledged, or I ſhall be diſgraced. I am going aboard, and yet all is not finiſhed, as I heare: But I know your honour is weary of my ceremonies, and I conclude Meſſina, $\frac{10}{20}$ Decemb. 1621.

As your Lordſhips, &c.

Right Honourable,

THAT nothing may be unknowne to your honor, I haue thought fitt to trouble you once again. When I was ready to goe aboord, his highneſs ſent the ſecretary with a memorial of the correſpondence required: It conteynes no more then generall newes of the Turkiſh affaires. In particular, to write what the ſucceſs of the Poliſh inuaſion hath bene, how many ſlayne, & cuiuſmodi; whether the Grand Signor continue his deſign in the ſpring; what forces he prepares; whether his armadoes be kept in the Black Sea, or ſent down into the Archipelago; what number of ſhipps and gallies they conteyne; and what I iudge of their purpoſes. In all this I find nothing but what I may doe with ſafety, in reſpect of his majeſties generall order to be aſſiſtant to the publick cauſe of chriſtendom: And therein, I hope, I ſhall not exceed my inſtructions; yet I beſeech your honor to acquaint his majeſtie, that I may do all by rule; for I find, that the ſtate of Spaine hath little intelligence vpon the Turk, and more may be required of mee, and I preſume I can doe more.

His highneſs ſent mee aboord, for a preſent, 6 beeues, 6 calues, 30 capons, 30 turkeyes, 4 dozen of henns, 12 boxes of ſweet-meats, 2 great basketts of fruict, one of fine cheeſe, 2 peeces wyne and other viands. I have done my part in rewards for his majeſties honor; and muſt conclude, that all theſe demonſtrate a great good affection to his majeſtie, which, I hope, he wilbe pleaſed to take knowledge of: And ſo I will pray for his majeſties health, and remayne at Meſſina, $\frac{18}{28}$ Dec. 1621.

Your Honours Seruice.

IN the writing of any aduiſe to the Spaniards, or their friends, I know there may be ſome danger in Turky; but I ſhall doe it with that warineſs, as I hope to preuent it.

To Mr. Secretary CALVERT.

Right Honourable,

YOU will think mee buſier then Chaucers lawyer, that moleſt you with ſo many lynes, and ſo little matter; and the ſtorke was more troubleſome then the block; yet your honour will rather pardon this fault then ſilence. The arriual at this place, the port of Zant, which I atteyned, by Gods fauour, the 15th preſent, hath occaſioned this diſcourſe, which I could not omitt, becauſe it may ſerue yow in ſome occaſion, for the generall good of our kingdom. Your honor remembers the ſharp complaints in parliament for the decay of money; how many ſearches were made; how it hath vexed and buſied euen your honors table. The accuſations haue fallen vpon many; and I doubt not, in their proportion truly, I haue not bene ydle allway to informe myſelfe in the trades of England; and I know, that many waies buillion is exported and intercepted; but in ſome they either importe againe, or vent with them our own commodities, or haue ſome fair pretence, if not neceſſary. But here is a litle barren iſland or two, that deuowres more money, retornes nothing but a traſh berry, takes none of our natiue merchandize, and in concluſion laughs at vs. I will giue your honor the proportion: Zephalonia and Zant make yearly 7,000,000 of currants, two thirds whereof are carried into his majeſties dominions; I haue ſeene here a medium, and haue caſt it up, that there is bought here by vs, about 2400 tunnes yearly, of which euery 1800 waight Engliſh (which is leſſe then a tunne) will coſt, clear abord, with all charges, communibus annis, 80 rialls of eight, which are valued here at 6 ſhillings the riall; ſo that there is left in theſe holes in all 213,353 rialls, which at 5 s. is ſterling 53,338 l. 5 s. which is a great and needleſſe conſumption. In former tymes they were gladd to take ſtockings, kerſies, or any commodity; now there is not one pound bought without ready money; and this I haue ſeen by experience, is furniſhed from our Spaniſh trades, which elſe would retorne for England, or by rialls bought and exported. There can be nothing alleadged for this but mayntenance of a few ſhipps; but if the pirats reigne, it wilbe conſumption of eſtates, men, and ſhipping. I need not propoſe to your honor a remedy; only I will tell you, that the people here think wee cannot liue without them, and therefore value them at gold; yet others haue thought we fedd hoggs with them; ſo great is the quantity aboue all Europe beſide. His majeſty, in his wiſdome, I hope, will ſett a limitt and ſtint to theſe ſuperfluities; and I doubt not his cuſtomes will encreaſe in reall trades; at leaſt wiſe, his kingdomes will be rich, which are his majeſty's ſureſt treaſuries. I found in port only one ſmall ſhipp of Briſtoll, from whom I heare certainly, that the Algier men haue taken, rifled, and burned a large Carick of retorne from India, which in Spain will not be confeſſed, but that ſhee was only fired. Shee had aboord 600 men, whereof 40 were of Cochin and thoſe parts. She had in her for 16000 l. in diamonds; her lading was pepper, cloues, and cloth of India. They have deſigned the Cochinois, with other preſents of good value, to be ſent to the Grand Signor, which demonſtrates their protection from him: And that they haue dared to attempt a ſhip of ſuch force and countenance, as wee haue experienced the Carricks to bee, ſhewes their ſtrength, and warnes vs of their encreaſe. The Tunis men are multiplied to 24 ſaile; and ſett out of their port the 24th october: But as we heare, they are homeward bound; and I hope we are cleare of them all for this time, which is a great bleſſing of God; for, as wee coniecture by their courſe, we haue miſſed them narowly. The ſea is full of feare, and no man dares truſt another. At Marſeilles the duke of Guize hath made an ordinance to ſett out 6 ſhipps of warr to the eaſtwards, for which they leuy 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. vpon all traders in the towne, as well ſtrangers as naturalls, which the Engliſh haue now unwillingly paid; and I think is an [vnjuſt exaction]. We haue here ſeene letters from Conſtantinople, dated the [2d of Nouember,] which mention the arriual of our agent, and the diſplacing of Sir John Eyre, to the great content of the nation. They confirm the rout of the Turks army, and add, that the peace is made with Poland, and the Grand Signor expected daily at the port, which is very ſodaine and vnlikely newes. I could willingly haue ſpared to interupt your honor with theſe fragments, but that I deſired to couer the copy of my laſt from Meſſina, leaſt it had mett with the ſame fortune that yours had done from England; and for that turn it may ſerue, and to preſent to your honor the unfeyned affection of Zant, $\frac{16}{26}$ Dec.

Your wandering Neighbour and Seruant.

My wife from Meſſina wrott to your lady her obſeruations, and now, with mee, preſents her loue and ſeruice.

A Relation of the Succeſs of the Poliſh Warre.

THE Grand Signor hauing gathered his army of foot and horſe, about 300,000 men, though reported 600,000, and arriued at the confines of Poland, attempted firſt the fortreſs of Hottini, a caſtle belonging to the prouince of Moldauia, and lately giuen by Gaſparo Gratiani to the Polacks; the which beeing ſtrong of ſcituation, and well furniſhed for defence, the Turk finding it difficult to carry in fewe daies, left it aſſieged, and paſſing the river of Boriſtine, found there the chancellor of Poland intrencht vpon the borders, in a ſtrong place, and of good aduantage, kept with 40,000 Polacks and Coſſacques, and 8000 High Dutch, ſent by the emperour in aid of the king of Poland. The prince was encamped at Caminitza, and ſtrongly entrenched with 60,000 ſoldiours, the king abiding in Cracouia with the nobility and his court. The Grand Signor faceing the trenches upon Boriſtine, with the multitude of his army encloſed them round, and ſhut upp all the paſſages, ſending preſently the prince of the Tartars, Teanbeagh-Ghiray-Han, with 30,000 Tartarians, to make incurſions within the heart of Poland, who did great ſpoile, and brought away captiues 25,000 ſoules of all ſorts; which damage did not ſo much 1621. proceed from the will of the prince, as from a captaine of his, a nobleman of Tartary, called Kante-emir-emirze, now in great fauour with the emperour: For it is thought, that betweene the king of Poland and the prince of Tartary there hath bene ſome ſecrett intelligence by the vertue of money; which being ſuſpected by the Grand Signor, it is doubted, when occaſion ſhall ſerue, that he will not only attempt to depriue him of his eſtate, but prepare him a worſe lodging. During the ſpace of 34 daies, that the Grand Signor held theſe trenches beſeeged, almoſt euery other day he gaue them terrible aſſaults, but was alway forced to retire with loſſe. The Polacks in brauery making ſome ſallies and encounters, were alſo gladd to recouer their ſtrength; only once they ſo farr aduanced in the evening with their ſhott vpon the quarter of the Janiſaries, that they made a great execution, and almoſt putt the whole campe into diſorder; and, as the Turks themſelues confeſſe, if this ſally had bene giuen in the night, it had hazarded the confuſion of the whole army: All which being ſeene by the Grand Signor, and litle hope of aduancing further for diuers reaſons, he was enforced to treat a ceſſation of armes with the chancellor. The firſt was, That conſidering he had ſpent ſo much time without any aduantage, and the winter approaching, wherby his army ſuffered great extremities of cold, and other miſeries, by reaſon of terrible raynes which had carried away diuers tents, horſes, and other cattell, and ſunk part of his cannons. Secondly, The prouiſion of fodder was become ſo deare, that diuers forſook their horſes for want of means to feed them; beſides, the great mortality of men of fluxes, feauers and colds, and the horſes of Aſia not vſed to ſuch weather, that many men of quality that came out with 10 and 12, were compelled to retorne on foote. Thirdly, The army, either for wearineſſe or for diſcontent, receiued from the emperour himſelf, for his narrowneſs and auarice ſhowed to the ſoldiour, contrary to the glorious example of his anceſtors in like enterprizes, not only refuzed to fight, but were litle leſſe then mutined. Fourthly, This attempt, from the beginning, proceeding meerly from the obſtinacy of the Grand Signor, contrary to the counſell of all his viſiers, who deſired generally a peace, at their ſollicitation, and by the mediation of Radula prince of Wallachia, both parts were eaſily induced to treaty: and the chancellor was drawen to ſend a ſecretary (who is now at this port) to the Grand Signor, where it was agreed as followeth: Firſt, That the emperour ſhould raiſe his army, and retire from the confines of Poland; and the Tartars, as the occaſioners of this warre, ſhould ſend an Emirze to reſide as a pledge from enſuing incurſions; the chancellor promiſing, in the name of the king of Poland, to keep another in the court of the prince of Tartary, with condition to pay yearly 40,000 florins; an antient pretention of the Tartars, as a donatiue from the king of Poland; promiſing moreover, for the better confirmation of the future peace, to maynteyne a reſident in the port of the Ottoman court, and vpon the arriual of euery ſuch embaſſador, to ſend a preſent conformable to the ledgiers of other Chriſtian princes: And, as the Tartars are obliged to forbeare all inuaſions upon the Polack, ſo they ſhall bind themſelues in behalf of the Coſſacques, that they ſhall committ no robberies in the dominion of the Grand Signor: And further covenanting in the name of the Poliſh merchants for the priuiledge of free traffique, to make a preſent of 100,000 chequins in plate, ſables, and Bulgary hides; alway intended with this reſeruation, that this treaty ſhall not preiudice nor bynd vntill the Grand Signor doe ſend a chiaus to the king of Poland with theſe ouertures, that he might haue tyme to aſſemble his parliament, and there reſolue to ſend an ambaſſador, with ample authority to treat and conclude a finall peace in this port: Whereupon the Grand Signor, beeing ſatisfied with theſe conditions, did diſpatch preſently his nuntio into Poland, and ſodainly, to the great content of all his army, he raiſed his camp, and retorned to Adrianopoli.

BY relation of divers preſent in this warre, it is reported, that there dyed in the Turks camp, by the ſword, famine, ſickneſs, and cold, about 80,000 men, and aboue 100,000 horſe; and the remayne, at their retorne, appearing ſo naked, poore, and ſickly, made euident demonſtration of the great loſſe and miſery ſuſteyned. The Polacks, in their trenches, loſt aboue 20,000 by the famine ſuffered in their beſeeging; and it is thought, if the winter and other wants had not conſtreyned the Grand Signor to riſe with ſome pretence of honor, and that he had ſtaied a few daies, they had been enforced to render or periſh; which is evident in that they alſo were gladd and prompt to accept of any agreement, although, as yet, nothing is fully concluded.

Rela-

Relation of diuers aduiſes ſince the retorne of the GRAND SIGNOR from the Warr of Poland.

THE Grand Signor, enformed that the emperour of Germany had ſent aid of 8000 Dutch to the king of Poland, and enraged that he had ſo little aduanced in that attempt, pretending, that the emperour by giving ſuccours had broken the peace, to vent his choller, contrary to the aduice of his counſell, preſently vpon his riſing from the confines of Poland, in his camp proclaimed warre for the next ſpring againſt Germany, commanding, vpon great penalty, all his ſoldiours and ſlaues to be ready for that inuaſion, which gaue great diſcontent to the army, in ſo much as they did almoſt publicquely profeſs, they neither could nor would follow him: And conformable to this his raſh reſolution, he gaue order to Kanti-emir-emirza, a Tartarian captain, now baſha of Siliſtra, to winter with 20,000 of his ſoldiours in the borders of Hungary, and to do all ſpoile and damage to the emperours country. Preſently hereupon Cæſar Gallo, the emperors late embaſſadour, was ſtaid at Buda, the Grand Signor pretending that the ſaid Cæſar Gallo had promiſed, upon his life, that the emperour would giue no ayd to the king of Poland; not conſidering, that he himſelf, contrary to the peace, this laſt ſommer, had ſurprized, with the connivence of Bethleem Gabor, Vatz, an emperiall towne, and had permitted many of his ſoldiours to follow the prince of Tranſyluania, as voluntaries againſt the emperour. It is reported, that the emperour hath made election of the baron Erbeſtien for his embaſſador, about theſe changes in this port, who concluded the peace 14 yeares ſince.

It is newly aduiſed from Poland, that the king, hearing of this reſolution of the Grand Signor againſt the emperour, hath called the chiaus ſent about the treaty, before him, and told him, that if the Grand Signor ſhall proceed to make warr vpon the emperour for his occaſion, that he could conclude no peace with him, beeing obliged to take part with the emperour as his brother and confederate; which meſſage the chiaus hauing ſent to the Grand Signor, when he was yet at Adrianopoli, where he purpoſed to winter, to affright the emperour, or to quicken the Polander to a concluſion of peace; to auoyd all ſuſpicions, cold in his ſodaine pretenſion, by the perſuaſions of the viziers and the mufti, he changed his reſolution, and tooke his way to Conſtantinople, where he entered the laſt of December. Herevpon it is freſhly aduiſed, that the Poliſh ambaſſador is preſently to depart for this court, and to negotiat aſwell in the behalfe of the emperour as his own maſter. Fifteene daies agoe here arriued a meſſenger from Bethleem Gabor, with letters to the Grand Signor, and to the Dutch embaſſador, who is his ſollicitor here, who reports, that his maſter is very ſtrong, and daily proſpers againſt the emperour: But it is very true, that Bethleem is in great eſteeme for his large promiſſes and ſubmiſſions to the Grand Signor, eſpecially with the Hoia or tutor of the emperour; but the ſecrett of his buſineſs I cannot yett diſcouer.

About the 10th of December arriued here an inter-nuntio from the Perſian, with a feined meſſage, That ſeeing the Grand Signor was buſy in the warrs, and from his roiall ſeate, the king his maſter had deferred to ſend his embaſſadour, and the ſilke pretended for Gorgeſtan, according to the laſt contract; and though he giues out that the ſaid ambaſſadour ſhall ſhortly be diſpatched, it is ſuſpected he is only ſent as a ſpye to diſcouer the ſucceſs of theſe late warrs, and the preſent power of the Grand Signor, that the Perſian may accordingly conforme himſelf.

It is reported, that the Emir de Saida, that was once fledd to the duke of Florence, hath raiſed new troubles in Siria, and will divert the Grand Signor, if he proſper.

To my Lord ADMIRAL.

My Lord,

I Choſe rather, by my laſt, to ask pardon for little matter then for none; yet if thoſe be arriued, I hope they may at leaſt be remembrancers to your lordſhip, of the miſery of merchants trading in the ſeas ouer which you preſide; and I will preſume to ſay, nothing ſhall add you more honor, then to be the cauſe of deſtroy-

ing

1621. ing robbers and common enemies to publique commerce. It hath pleaſed God to conduct me out of their ſight, and ſo to haſten my paſſage, that I am arriued at this port the 28th of December. In this litle tyme hauing neither had audience, nor any publique conuerſation, you will be pleaſed to expect nothing from mee extraordinary; yet I haue aduentured to ſend you, ſuch a [gleaning] as I haue made, relations of the ſucceſs of the Poliſh inuaſion, and ſomewhat happened ſince. For the things done, they are truly reported; and thoſe that are yett in intention, beleeued here. I know much of this will come to your lordſhips hands a readier way, yet you will accept my gleanings as pledges of my deſire, and giue mee leaue to make ſome judgment of the preſent tyme. The Grand Signor entered this city the firſt of january, clothed like a common ſoldiour, with no great trayne, and leſſe pompe. His loſſes in this warr haue been exceeding great, eſpecially of horſes. It was vndertaken headily againſt the will of the viſiers: The janiſaries are weakened in number, and corrupt in diſcipline, ready to mutine. The Perſian hath cunningly deferred the tribute of ſilke, and ſent an excuſe, that he would not trouble the emperour, in the warr, with ceremonies; but the meſſenger is a direct ſpye vpon the ſucceſs which ſhall gouerne the king to perform or not; and this giues the ſtate great ſuſpicion of danger on that ſide. It is reported here, that Gabor hath or will conclude with the emperour; and the Emir de Saida of Tripoli hath raiſed new broiles in Syria; ſo that the emperour ſhall need a good part of his forces to quiet him. For all theſe conſiderations, I am confident that it will be very eaſy to conclude a reaſonable peace both for the king of Poland, whoſe embaſſadour is expected, and for the emperor; [and the porte] here wilbe very glad to haue the honor and occaſion of his majeſties [mediation]; and though vpon the retorne from the Poliſh warre, the Grand Signor [haſtily] proclaimed warr with the emperour, pretending a breach on his part, for ſending certen Dutch in aid of Poland; yet he hath as meanly repented it, and remoued from Adrianopoli, only to cleare the ſuſpicion of thoſe parts; and if his own raſhneſs could be conteyned by no counſaile, yet I am of opinion, neceſſity will keep him quiet a yeare or two. But your lordſhip ſhall ſee and iudge out of the ſame grounds which I here ſend you, and conclude in your owne wiſdome. I preſume your lordſhip will expect from mee ſome account of Sir John Eyre, and I ſhall be vnwilling to add any thing to the many complaynts that I heare are ſent againſt him; nor is it my duty to prejudge, ſeeing his majeſtie hath referred the pleadings to the lords of his counſell, where both parts ſhall haue equal hearing and juſtice. I haue therefore only giuen him a chardge from the company, and taken his anſwers, which I ſend them. For his actions paſt, they aroſe all about money and accompts between them; but ſince the receipt of his majeſties letters, I muſt witnes a truth: hee hath fully and temperatly obeyed; ſo that, for his remooue, ſubmiſſion, and receipt of me, I haue no cauſe to accuſe him. Your lordſhip hath taken me into your protection; I hope I ſhall avoid complaints; but it is not a paſſive glory I ayme at; I ſhalbe as aſhamed, if I may not here doe his majeſtie ſome publique ſeruice. Therefore I humbly beſeech you to make my deſires knowne, and to miniſter me ſome occaſion, wherby I may be bound to you for my honor, as I preſume I am for your fauour, and therein dare take this title of

Conſtantinople,
Jan. $\frac{9}{19}$ 1621.

Your Lordſhips honeſt and humble Seruant.

To Mr. Secretary CALVERT.

Right Honorable,

MY laſt was directed to your honor from Zant, which was the third interruption I haue giuen you ſince my departure; and becauſe I have by the ſecond euer ſent tranſcripts of the firſt, I hope ſome of them haue found a true paſſage, whereby I haue at leaſt diſcharged my conſcience to informe your honor of the miſery and danger of the merchant in theſe ſeas; and the tymes haue come about to the ſame thing, the place only changed, as Rome once did; and wee ought, in euery occaſion, to cry out, Memento Carthaginem; for either they muſt be ſuppreſſed, or theſe trades deſerted. It hath pleaſed God to conduct vs ſafe from their viewe, which I acknowledge as a peculiar bleſſing, and was beyond expectation of all that know their courſes, and I will bind it vpon my ſhoulders. I arrived here the 28th December, with health of all myne; the Grand Signor not then entered the citty, but lay for a good howre a fewe miles without: Two daies after he made his entry in no great glory; retorned from the warr with loſſe and diſhonor, his army almoſt mutined; ſo that, I beleeue, he is at reſt for a yeare or two. I am yet ſo rawe, and haue ſo litle acquaintance, as I cannot enforme your honor of any extraordinary matter. What I could collect, I haue encloſed to my Lord Admiral, which, I doubt not, he will communicate unto you. [We omit part of this Letter, the Contents thereof being in the preceding Relation.] I haue not yet had audience, nor ſo much as any notice taken of my arriual, which giues mee ſome diſtaſt; and I haue reſolued not to ſtirr out vntil they haue ſent their welcome, with other ceremonies, according to antient cuſtom, for his majeſties honor: And to that end I haue ſent a meſſage, That if the Grand Signor be weary of his majeſtie's frendſhip, and of his miniſters, that I will eaſily depart; which I think will quicken them; for they deſire no breach, at this time, with any. 1621.

BETHLEEM GABOR hath of late ſent a meſſenger here, to confirme (as is thought) the fauour of this court: but his arrand I knowe not; only I am ſure hee is in great eſteeme here, and deals only with the Hoia, or tutor of the emperour, and treats ſecretly. The Dutch embaſſador is his agent and protector. There are many reports of him, that he is now treating with the emperour of Germany for peace, and that he hath refuzed the aid of Turks. From Raguſa it is aduiſed, That the Tranſyluanians haue compelled him thereto, becauſe he ſuffered the Tartars, ſent by the Grand Signor, to wynter in the borders of Hungary, to ſpoile their country. For myne owne part, I am perſuaded he will do well his owne buſineſ, to the preiudice of Chriſtendom; becauſe I ſee here is much expected from him; and he is eſteemed a good ſubiect to the Turke. I beſeech your honor aduiſe me what his majeſtie intends towards him, that to his miniſters and affaires, [according] as I ſhall here diſcouer, I may conforme myſelf to his majeſties will, which I only deſire, knowing obedience is the beſt of my ſeruice. When I may haue audience, I purpoſe, notwithſtanding the alterations ſince my inſtructions, to aduiſe the Grand Signor in his majeſties name to peace, which is yet unconcluded, and to abate nothing of my commiſſion, wherein, I hope, his majeſty ſhall haue the honor of vmpire, becauſe, I know, they will be gladd of ſo roiall a mediator. For the priſoners, recommended by the Poliſh ambaſſador, they are yet ſo cloſe, as I cannot heare of them; and Correskie's caſe is deſperate, becauſe of his laſt eſcape, which if he ſhould attempt againe, and I only once moue for him, I might run the hazzard of the late French ambaſſador; but I will endeauour all, and giue your honor an accompt by every poſt. I haue written to the prince Philibert, who ſent a man to mee within two daies after my arriual, which ſeemed ſtraunge to mee: I could not refuze it, for the many courteſies receiued from him. I ſent him the generall newes of the ſucceſs of Poland, and of the loſſes of the Grand Signor, with other ordinary newes; and dare proceed no further with him, vntil I receiue his majeſties order, for which I haue ſollicited your honor in two letters. I ſhall, with great longings, expect your directions, which, I hope, you will the rather affoord me plentifully, becauſe you gaue your word I ſhould doe well, and are ſo bound to aſſiſt mee. There ſhall nothing more comfort mee in this baniſhment, then to know his majeſtie hath good opinions of mee, not for any ability, but for a ſyncere deſyre to doe him ſeruice; which I beſeech your honor witneſs for mee, as for

I HAD forgotten to ſay a word of Sir John Eyre, and it is but one: He hath obeyed his majeſtie fully, and receiued me ciuilly: For the reſt, as I am not his judge, I will not be his accuſer: there are enough prepared for that office. He hath taken mony by force, and pretends it was his right; for which he had no other way.

Copy to my Lord of ARUNDEL, Earl Marſhal.

My Lord,

I Receiued your lordſhips letter in the Downes; and though my imployment bee the other end of the circle, to attend new things; yet myne owne inclynation is curious enough, to my meanes, to look back upon antiquity, and ſome learnings loſt and decayed, rather, as I think, ex induſtria, then by the moth of tyme; in which opinion, the little examination I haue made in theſe parts, confirms me; where I find the gentleſt arts and ſciences rather deſpiſed and neglected, then worne out; as if they were meanes to ſoften and ciuilize thoſe natures, whoſe end and propoſition is warr, blood, and conqueſt: Yet hereby I find no difficulty in procuring any ſuch reliques, if I could diſcouer them; for I think they would here follow the precept of a barbarous Goth, Not to deſtroy, but leaue and deliver them to vs for our corruption, to diuert us from the thought or vſe of arms: But they are abſurdly miſtaken; for ciuility and knowledge doe confirme, and not effeminate good and true ſpirits: Therefore I could fall eaſily upon another conſideration, how terrible this overgrowne ſtate is to all Chriſtendome, that knowes it not but by vniuerſall report, which, not examining particulars, neuer iudgeth aright; but this occaſion ſerueth it not; and I fear, at beſt, it were loſt labour: Howſoeuer, I haue little experience; yett I dare pronounce there is no ſuch terror, if we knew them, and how to proceed with them: and there neuer was any great empire ſo vnarmed, and ſo eaſy to deſtruction; nor neuer any tyme ſo ſeaſonable as now: And of this I dare vndertake to make demonſtration, if ever I be called to it. But now I deſire only to giue your lordſhip an accompt of the care I haue of your lordſhips commands. I moued our conſul, Richard Milward at Scio, whom I found prepared and ready: Wee conferred about the maid of Smirna, which he cannott yet obteyne, without an eſpeciall command. I brought with mee from Meſſina, the biſhop of Andre, one of the iſlands of the Arches, a man of good learning, and great experience in theſe parts. Hee aſſured mee, That the ſearch after old and good authors was vtterly vaine; that neither in Greece, nor in any other place ſubiect to the Grand Signor, were left ſo much as the footſtepps or ruines of any antient learning. The laſt French ambaſſador had the laſt gleanings; only of ſome fewe he gaue mee notice, as of an old Tertullian, and a piece of Chriſoſtome in manuſcript, which may be procured to be copied, but not the originall. Hee hath undertaken to make enquiry for mee; and the fruict of my labour your lordſhip ſhall freely partake. Concerning antiquities in marbles, there are many in diuers parts, but eſpecially at Delphos, vneſteemed here; and, I doubt not, eaſy to be procured for the charge of digging and fetching, which muſt be purpoſely vndertaken. It is ſuppoſed, that many ſtatues are buried, to ſecure them from the enuy of the Turks; and that, if leaue obteyned, would come to light, which I will endeauour as ſoone as I am warme here. Coynes wilbe had from Jewes, but very deare when enquired for. Two are giuen me by Dominico to preſent to your lordſhip, which I haue deliuered Antony Wood, captain of the Rainbow; the one gold, is of Alexander; the other is braſſe, and very antient, of a queen of Seruia, with hieroglyphicks now unknowne. I haue alſo a ſtone taken out of the old pallace of Priam in Troy, cutt in horned ſhape; but becauſe I neither can tell of what it is, nor hath it any other bewty, but only the antiquity and truth of being a peece of that ruined and famous building, I will not preſume to ſend it you; yet I haue deliuered it to the ſame meſſenger, that your lordſhip may ſee it, and throw it away. At Scio I found diuers rare peeces of white corall, the gatherings of a dead Engliſh gentleman, in the hands of our conſull; which, becauſe I thought they would well affect you for fountaines, (your lordſhips curioſity being vnlimitted) I aduiſed him to ſend, which I think you ſhall receiue by this ſhipping. What other ſeruices I can doe your lordſhip, I will not fail, by uncerten promiſes; but I ſhall endeauour to giue you a better teſtimony, then profeſſion, that I am a louer of thoſe vertues which haue made mee

Conſtantinople,

Your Lordſhip's Seruant.

Right Honorable,

I Haue troubled you with many letters. In euery one I haue mentioned Algier and Tunes with as much hatred to them as I could expreſs: And though I ſhould neuer forgett them while I had the charge of my nation here, becauſe euery good or ill of them doth now concerne mee; and the proſperity or rain of them in general, the commonweale of England; yet I haue now occaſion to remember what I haue vrged againſt them in my former, that their encreaſe would become an aid to the Grand Signor in any enterprize in the Leuant ſeas, and their ſtrength embolden him to come out; whereas his gallies ſcarce durſt appear theis paſt years, eſpecially in the tyme of the duke of Oſſuna. Your honor may be pleaſed to looke back vpon my laſt aduice, wherein I ſignified the reuolt of the emir de Saida in Sorya, vpon whom the Grand Signor reſolued to go in perſon; but, conſidering the uncertenty of the affaires of Poland, and that he ſhould leaue his imperial citty to the Coſſacques; and for other reaſons here encloſed, he hath changed his purpoſe, and ordered an army at land, and a fleet at ſea of 100 gallies, which now are in preparation, with all expedition, for the Leuant ſea. The pretence of the armado is, to preuent any aid that ſhould be ſent from chriſtendom; but what they will attempt when they are abroad, and encouraged by the ſtrength and experience of the piratts, I cannot foreſee: Only I think fitt to acquaint your honor with the councell, and leaue the judgment to his majeſtie. When the firſt reſolution was to ſend out Halil Baſſa, admiral of the ſea, with 100 gallies, he ſhewed the weakneſs of that force, and made knowne the ſtrength and army of prince Philibert at Meſſina; and vrged, that they now found by experience, the vnequall match of their gallies with ſhipps and gallions; inſomuch that they were at a ſtand in this reſolution: But at laſt it was concluded, to ſend to Tunes and Algier for aid of 20 men of warre, to attend and weſt them: And ſo they are now bold and aſſured to attempt any thing in thoſe parts. The prince Philibert hath a ſtrong armado both of gallions and gallies, if they may be prepared. I ſhall take the boldneſs to giue him aduiſe, as ſoone as I can; for ſo I vnderſtand his majeſties commands, in generall. Your honor will hereby collect of what danger theſe knaues bee, when their force only emboldeneth and aſſureth the Turkes to looke abroad, who were neuer ſo weak, nor ſo diſcouraged as now.

I GAVE your honor an accompt of the affaires of Poland; and I fear his majeſtie will expect from mee ſomwhat more exact of his commands; but I am as fearfull to come before him in raggs and peeces, vntill I haue found the way here to know all things with aſſurance; and becauſe I haue as yett had no audience of the Grand Signor, which I daily expect, I beſeech your honor to make my humble excuſe, and to acquaint his majeſtie with that which I write to you as part of the diſcharge of my duty. Your honor will remember, that in my laſt aduiſe I ſent you the conditions made vpon the place, betweene the armies, with a reſeruation to the parliament of Poland for approbation and finall concluſion; which hauing bene aſſembled, they haue vtterly refuzed the conditions of giuing one penny of money, or of binding themſelues for the Coſſaques, and haue preſented new articles, very honorable for them, and ſuch as declare they feare no warre; the particulars whereof I ſend encloſed, to which, for the preſent, I will referr your honor, only I will acquaint you with what I haue herein done. An agent from the king of Poland hath viſited me, and taken knowledge of his majeſtie's purpoſe to aſſiſt his majeſtie in the warr, or in the treaty: The one, I think, is at an end; and therefore I did not greatly deny, nor plainly affirme it, only I lett him know his majeſtie had giuen mee commaund to ſignify to the Grand Signor his diſlike of the inuaſion begunne; and that he would not leaue the common cauſe of chriſtendome, for any priuat reſpects. The concluſion of our diſcourſe was, That if they needed here the authority of my maſter, or my aſſiſtance; if they did communicate with mee the preſent ſtate of their affaires, and their purpoſes, I ſhould then be able to accommodate my negociation here with the Grand Signor in their behalfe, according to their deſire and preſent condition, which was much changed ſince I receiued my maſter's inſtructions, and that then I ſhould obey his generall command, to be in all things aiding to them; which beeing

1621. taken in good part, and promiſe made to doe nothing without mee, wee ended, and thereupon I haue thought fitt in my demands to the vizier, to prepare for the king, to require the peace of Poland, and the priſoners; which though I know they will be agreed vnto, yett in the interim, while they are in treaty, my mediation in his majeſtie's name will procure the concluſion and facilitating of the Poliſh deſires, which the Turks will be gladd to caſt vpon his majeſtie, as done in honor of him, to take from themſelues the ſhame of yeelding by neceſſity: and this I doubt not but to gett publiquely declared by letter to his majeſtie. I haue found here litle reſpect to the quality of a chriſtian prince's ambaſſador: I haue had ſome ſpeech thereof with thoſe that reſide here, and I find that the intereſt of the Venetian, by his neighborhood, to beare any thing, and the errors that the French hath fallen into, and the ſufferance of my predeceſſors, haue by litle and litle brought them into contempt. I haue vndertaken to beginne a reformation; and becauſe I would not runne alone, and be left ſingle, I haue required articles of all the reſt to ſtand with mee, which they haue promiſed. In the meane while, I have taken myne owne courſe to reſtore the honor due to his majeſtie herein; and hauing at my firſt comming bene neglected of the vſual welcome, and other courteſies, I wrott to the vizier, that his majeſtie had taken notice of the diſreſpects done to his former miniſters, and had commanded mee either to reſtore and recover that due reſpect, and to ſuffer no affront or injury, or elſe to keepe my houſe vntill I receiued his further pleaſure. I haue hitherto had good ſucceſs therein, and thoſe errors haue bene acknowledged, and my welcome ſent mee. The chancellor hath viſited mee, and ſome others. The viſier hath promiſed ſatisfaction in all, which I will expect. I write your honor this, becauſe I might perhapps be blamed, if it ſhould not ſucceed well, or any trouble ſhould come vpon it. But if you ſawe how neceſſary a reformation were, and how much the honor of chriſtian princes is here trampled vpon, you would vouchſafe to be my aduocate herein: and beſides, I take a good tyme, and find them very loath to giue any diſcontent; and you ſee, by circumſtances in all, that their pride is inwardly abated, though they are loath to confeſſe it. I am confident they dare not breake with his majeſtie; though they pretend courteſie, they are poſſeſſed with an vniuerſell feare: And now the youth and raſhneſs, the diſcontent and weaknes, of king and ſoldiour, doth inuite ſome great and worthy action; but God hath not opened the eyes of this tyme to ſee it. I am ſo troubled with viſitts and preparations, that your honor will pardon my confuſed writing, and be pleaſed to accept the encloſed, and to communicate it to my lord admirall: overtaken with tyme; and though I knowe that herein I accuſe myſelf, yet I beſeech you prepare my excuſe, becauſe I would not preſent him with ſo diſordered and unperfect ſtuffe. Your honor will take all in good part; for his ſake that is

SINCE my laſt aduiſe, the emperour continuing his purpoſe to goe in perſon againſt the emir de Saida in Sorya, who is ſaid to haue poſſeſſed himſelfe of the citty and caſtle of Tripoli, had given out 60000 checquins to prepare the carriages, and his pauilions, and taken order to prouide his palace in Aleppo, determining to paſs that way, to amuſe and raiſe ſuſpicion in the Perſian, and likewiſe had commanded the army of Aſia to be in a readineſſe by the end of the moneth of Aprill, and giuen out commiſſion for the victualls, munition, and other neceſſaries. The mufti, hoia, and other the viziers, miſliking this counſaile, with great inſtances and reaſons diſwaded him, as beeing a courſe very dangerous to his eſtate; firſt, that his majeſtie ſhould goe in perſon, leauing all Greece deſolate, and committ the care and gouernment of his emperiall ſeate to a poore kaimacham or lieutenant, it not beeing probable that the emir de Saida would ſtay to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the force of his roiall army, but rather make an eſcape, and retire himſelfe to ſome part of Chriſtendome; and that a generall by land, and the captain-baſſa admiral of the ſea, with his fleet of gallies, would ſuffice to puniſh, and to deſtroy him; beſides, if his majeſtie vndertooke the journey in perſon, it were neceſſary that all his ſoldiors ſhould attend him, which were a charge ſuperfluous, and aboue the enterpriſe, and almoſt impoſſible poſſible for them, hauing bene ſo haraſſed and diſtreſſed in the late inuaſion of Poland (who did euen publiquely murmur that they would not goe). For which reaſons the king hath changed reſolution, and is content to make a generall by land, with the army of Aſia, to which charge is named the baſſa of Cairo. The next day after the Grand Signor's comming to the arſenall, he called the vizier-baſſa, the admirall, and the great treaſurer before him, where it was concluded to make ready at leaſt 100 gallies; for the preparation whereof 60000 checquins were then deliuered, the viſier promiſing to furniſh the reſt of the whole charge with expedition, of his owne purſe, and to take it vp vpon the king's aſſignations; whereupon the Grand Signor with great content did veſt them, as a marke of fauour; and gaue preſent commiſſion to the admirall to be ready, and to depart by the middſt of Aprill, and for his better ſtrength he gaue a command to ſend for aydes to Tunes and Algier; which was thought requiſite, becauſe it was declared, that the prince Philibert had in readineſs 60 gallies, and 6 gallions at Meſſina, which force was doubted, would be imployed to giue ſuccour to the emir de Saida, or to reuenge the attempt, and late ſack of Manfredonia. So that now theſe are with all expedition rigging, and preparing the armada in the arſenal; and for prouiſion and preuention of the worſt, there are ordeyned 12 ſmall gallies, and the ordinary army of frigatts, to keepe the Black ſea, from the incurſion of the Coſſaques: And though it be giuen out, that this army is only prepared againſt the emir, yet many that vnderſtand the ſecretts of this empire, knowing it to bee too great, doe believe that it is ſent to preuent a generall reuolt, which is murmured and ſuſpected in Aſia. 1621.

THERE hath bene daily expectance of the ambaſſador of the Perſian with the ſilke, according to the laſt treaty; but it is now thought he will not ſend att all, and rather doubted, he will make ſome attempt upon the borders; vpon which ſuſpicion this laſt weeke were diſpatcht away 16 captains of janizaries, with their companies, to make garriſon vpon the frontire.

FROM Poland it is written, that in their laſt parliament there was named for ambaſſador to this port the duke of Baraſky, the lord Samowsky, and the lord Zalkowsky, out of which number the king ſhould make his election; with concluſion that they would not ſend one penny, nor no acknowledgment, neither as compenſation of charge, nor as a preſent; and for the promiſe made by the chancellor, and the marſhall of the army, who is ſince dead, as it was giuen without authority, and with reſeruation of allowance, ſo it ſhould not be performed; and in the reſt they haue agreed to demand theſe 4 articles, as a concluſion of the peace: Firſt, that the king of Poland ſhall haue the election and removing of the princes of Bugdania and Walachia, as an antient priuiledge, by agreement in former treaties; and that the confirmation ſhall reſt to the Grand Signor with his ordinary tribute; for the Polacks pretend, that if theſe princes haue no dependency vpon the crowne of Poland, they will euer be the occaſions of newe trouble, and the peace with the Grand Signor will neuer be aſſured. Secondly, as long as the Tartars forbeare their incurſions into Poland, they will ſtand pledges for the Coſſaques, and no longer. Thirdly, that all the Poliſh nobility taken in theſe laſt warrs ſhall be ſett att liberty. Fourthly, that all other conditions of peace ſhall haue reference vnto the capitulations agreed vpon in the tyme of ſultan Solyman, and ſhall be anew eſtabliſhed. This being the reſolution of the parliament, the ambaſſador hath order to goe no further then Caminitza, but only to ſend a ſecretary with theſe articles; and if the Grand Signor accept of them, he ſhall then proceed and come hither, to make and ſeale a full concluſion of peace; which particulars beeing come to the knowledge of the grand viſier, (though this ſecretary be not yett arriued) he called the agent of Poland, that is reſident, and taking notice of the premiſſes, deſired him to write to his maſter to diſpeed away the ambaſſador, and that he would vndertake that the Grand Signor ſhould accept the conditions without contradiction. The agent replyed, that he would write, but had no authority to promiſe any thing: So that it is euident, the Grand Signor is very eager vpon any concluſion of peace, that he may follow his deſigne of Aſia. And though I doe not beleeue that at firſt theſe conditions will be agreed vnto, if the Poliſh ambaſſador were preſent, yet the viſier would trayne him hither, hoping therby to gett ſome tyme, and to wynne vpon him by aduantage of place: In the meane while, I doubt not to make his way the more eaſy, and to give the honor of finall accommodation to his majeſtie.

1621. Some 10 daies ſince, ſecrett order was giuen to Diac-mohemet the baſſa of Caniſia, and to Gelut-Emirze a Tartarian, to vnite themſelves with Bethlem Gabor againſt the emperour of Germany. But ſince, the baſſa of Buda hath twice aduertized, that Gabor hath concluded peace with the emperour, butt the conditions are not knowne; which newes doth greatly diſpleaſe here.

About 12 daies ſince, contrary to the counſell and will of all his miniſters, the Grand Signor hath married the grandchild of a ſultana, wife to Pertau Baſſa, only for her bewty, without any pomp, which is ill interpreted here; his aunceſtors of late yeares not vſually taking wives, eſpecially of a Turkiſh race, for reſpect of kindred. This and other inconſtancies, with extreame auarice, hath made him odious with the ſoldiers; and his daily haunting the ſtreets on foot, ſometymes diſguiſed, with a page or two, pryeing into houſes and tauernes, like a petty officer, encreaſeth his contempt euen in the citty.

To Sir Henry Wootton.

My Lord,

From Meſſina, where I refreſhed in my paſſage to this place, I invited your lordſhip to an unproffitable traffique with mee by your letters, which now in this deſolation would come like a ſhower in a dry ſpring. I hope that may be come to your hands, (though of no other uſe to you, then to let you know my fortune to live, and converſe out of Chriſtendome) becauſe I ſuſpect no ſtay, nor foule play in that way; but here wee only are ſo barren, that ſince my arrivall three poſts have come to the port, and no letters for us, ſo that I doubt, either wee are forgotten, or that ours are intercepted. I beſeech your lordſhip, take it a litle to your conſideration, and if you find that any miſgrounded jealouſy makes thoſe wee truſt ouer-wiſe, that you will take ſome courſe, that our letters may come as ſafe, and as ſpeedy, as thoſe to other nations. The Dutch embaſſador hath ſo good a correſpondency with the Venetian, that he is euer full, and wee ſtarue. I have at ſome diſtaunce ſpoken to the bailo, and done whatſoeuer becomes mee, to mayntеyne a good quarter with him, and have offered myſelfe in all his publique occaſions, wherein I knew my maſter's credit can much auaile him, and he hath returned all other outward courteſies; but this I fear, perhaps, becauſe we too eaſily committ ourſelues to a truſt; for it is ſtraunge, and out of courſe, that wee muſt receiue all our letters at the courteſy of another ſtate. I have no other grounds for my ſuſpicion, but the want which hath bene upon the nation, now more then a yeare; therefore your lordſhip will uſe my warineſs to our aduantage, and if there be cauſe, to diſcouer, and amend it for us; for howſoeuer this imployment hath bene uſed, I find there is great ſtore of matter, and of good conſequence, fit for his majeſtie's information; and when I am in, I ſhall adventure to write often to him. This is my firſt, and carries the anſwere of my meſſage; I pray your lordſhip, give a ſpeedy paſſage unto it. Nothing concerning Poland can be any newes unto yow, except that ſince the retorne of the emperour, who is very earneſt upon the concluſion of peace, the parliament there hath not ratified all the concluſions made vpon the border. Their great ambaſſador is not heard of, no, nor any meſſage or letter ſince, which makes theſe here very diſcontent, as vnfitt for the warr, and aſhamed to ſeeke a peace. The pretence of the Polacks is, that the Tartars haue diſſolued the treaty by a new incurſion; and they, by God's bleſſing, hauing eſcaped the fury, and knowing the weaknes of the Turks, and their deſire of peace, are too ſlowe, and perhaps too ſtiffe, and may drawe on them the rage of a young and unaduiſed prince; but becauſe they ſtill pretend that their ambaſſador is comming, there is no mouing here, and wee expect a nuntio or ſecretary before, with the concluſions of the parliament, which if the Grand Signor accepts not, the ambaſſador ſtayes at the border. The conditions are very honorable for that ſide; they will not pay any tribute, nor ſo much as ſend any preſent, leaſt it be ſo accepted. They will not ſtand ſuerty for the Coſſacques, but reſpectively, as the Grand Signor will doe for the Tartars; they only have deliuered Chotyn to the prince of Bugdania, and in recompence demand the election of him, placing and diſplacing, and the confirmation is only left to this court. Some other ſmall matters with the deliuery of all priſoners, and theſe I think this ſtate would accept, if they were here preſented with a little forme; or if any difficulty ariſe, his majeſtie ſhall be umpire. The armado is making ready for the Leuant, about 80 gallies in all, good and badd, if they can attayne to ſo many. They haue ſent for ſome ayd to Tunes: The firſt pretence was, to keepe the ſea, that no ayd ſhould be giuen to the Emir de Saida in Soria, who was noe leſſe then reuolted, and the emperour determined to goe in perſon againſt him. But ſince he hath ſent his tribute, and it is accepted, ſo that euery where they are gladd of quiettneſs. And now I think, this fleet ſhall viſitt the coaſts of Sicily and Naples, if they dare, for ſo they give out; in Perſia they feare a chaunge, and, briefly, they are in trouble on every ſide, their army decaied, their janizaries weake and fewe, and the whole government and diſcipline corrupted; ſo that there is no cauſe to feare them, but in their name. I could in this theme be large, but that God hath not fitted a tyme, nor cares for it: We receiue here at the ſeconde hands ſtraunge newes of alterations in England, ſuch as I cannot recite, without ſuſpicion that I made them; and nowe laſt from Germany, that ſince the peace made with Bethlem Gabor, the Marqueſs of Jaquendorph ſhould fall vpon the emperour vnawares, and kill him, with Leopoldus, and one of his ſonnes, his daughter, and diuers barons. It is beleeved here ſo farr, that order is giuen preſently to ſtirr vp Gabor, to lay hold of the occaſion, and great ayds appointed him. I know theſe, and truths are knowne to your lordſhip; I doe not write you newes, but meditate vpon them, for they are mirabilia in oculis noſtris, and God alone will finiſh his owne works; I pray your lordſhip's compaſſion and charity; lett us pertake, if not the occurrences, yet of your converſation; for therein you ſhall make mee have ſome dayes content, and I ſhall retorne the affection of

To Sir GEORGE CALVERT.

Right Hon.

I Haue at laſt had audience in this court, and haue bene receiued with extraordinary courteſy; I deliuered his Majeſty's letter, with a briefe of my meſſage, and ſome other compliments in writing, whereof, and of the ſeuerall anſwers receiued, I haue preſumed to ſend his Majeſtie a copy; perhaps his Majeſtie will think mee very formall and impertinent to trouble him with ſo many particulars; but for our owne buſines, I found it in ſuch diſorder, our capitulations and priviledges ſo confuſed, that I thought it not amiſſe that his Majeſtie ſhould knowe the termes wee ſtood in, and if it be fitt that an ambaſſador be kept here, it is as fitt, that he ſhould giue accompt once of all things, which I think was never done. And for the buſineſs of Poland, although I found the Grand Signor retorned, yet was there no peace concluded, and the king as apt to a new attempt as any vnaduiſed man could bee, if he were not reſtrayned by vehement perſwaſions of his viſiers, which gaue mee a good occaſion to aſſiſt them, and to honor my maſter, aſwell by declaring his roiall reſolution, as in taking to him the honor of the concluſion, which I haue done with conſent of the Poliſh agent here. If in beeing ſo large I haue committed a fault, I ſhall hereafter with eaſe mend it, and his Majeſtie may be pleaſed to giue your honor the papers to eaſe him; and if they may be ſo happy to come into your hands, I hope you will expunge my errors, and make for mee a reaſonable excuſe. There is no weeke but brings out alterations in this court, and the emperour is ſo full of heate, that he hath no other affection but the warre; neceſſity only bridles him, and therefore it is very fitt he be kept lowe. There is come to vs an aduiſe of the infortunate death of the emperor of Germany, which they apprehend here as a great oportunity of aduantage, and preſent order is giuen to reconcile and draw back Bethleem Gabor, and all the baſſaes and beglerbegs of Hungary and Grecia, haue commands to aſſiſt him with all their power, if he will attempt the territories of the houſe of Auſtria, to whom only I find an inueterate hate, and I meruaile at it, for if they did well conſider it, they haue no ſuch frends in the world: Your honor will pardon mee, that I ſay ſo; I haue weighed their meanes, and oportunity, and ſcituation to trouble and moleſt the Turke, and of the other ſide I finde their diuerſions otherwaies have occaſioned his greatnes and aduancement vpon Chriſtendome. I haue humbly deſired his Majeſtie to giue mee order how I ſhall gouerne myſelfe in the affairs of Germany, for that way I foreſee all the ſtormes from this vnquiett coaſt will fall; for vntill I receiue 1621. receiue ſome, I ſhall not moue, becauſe though I haue no letters from England, the other ambaſſadors here will tell mee newes, that is ſtraunge enough of alterations att home; the fleet of gallies is preparing with all haſte to joyne with ſome of the pirats; and if the troubles of Aſia be appeaſed, by the ſubmiſſion of the Emir de Saida, for want of countenance and ſuccours, as it is like by the arriuall of his agent and tribute here; then they giue out plainly, they will trouble the coaſts of the king of Spaine, which I haue aduiſed to Meſſina, and ſo am diſcharged of my obligation. I ſhall reſt from all foraine buſines vntill I receiue order from his Majeſtie or your honor; which I deſire you to procure mee; for I ſhall be ſought vnto of both ſides, there beeing ſome opinion of my litle creditt here. To His MAJESTIE.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

I Haue giuen diligent account to my Lord Admirall, and Sir George Caluert, your Majeſtie's ſecretary, of all things which haue fallen in my knowledge, or conſideration, both vpon the way, and ſince I arriued at this port, which I hope your Majeſtie hath vouchſafed to accept, in diſcharge of my duty, that I did not preſume to importune you with my letters in euery occaſion. In them I humbly deſired, that your Majeſtie myght knowe the honor which prince Philibert of Sauoy did render to your name in the enterteynment of mee your vnworthy ſeruant at Meſſina, and in releaſe of all your Majeſtie's ſubjects there in captiuity, which I cannot but againe acknowledge. And becauſe your Majeſtie gaue me waighty and vehement command to ſerue you in taking care of the generall eſtate of Chriſtendom, I humbly craved leave that I might aduiſe thither (beeing a part moſt obuious and eaſy to the attempts and incurſions of the Turks) of any preparations here ſuſpicious againſt them, and of ſuch other chaunges, as might be important to them; of which, becauſe I could receiue no aunſwere in tyme, and a fleet making ready here, and vaunted to trouble the chriſtian coaſts, I haue aduentured to giue aduertiſement both of the numbers, force and pretenſion, as much as I knewe, for which haſt (which could not be delayed without cenſure of ingratitude or treachery) I caſt myſelfe at your Majeſtie's feete, and with all duty entreate to receiue your farther pleaſure, how to proceed, or to deſiſt in the like correſpondence. In all thoſe aduiſes, which I preſume haue come to your Majeſtie's knowledge, I haue bene very vehement againſt the encreaſe of the pirats, whoſe danger, not only as theeues, but as armed and ſtrong enemies, I better underſtand, then I could think of at the diſtance of England; and I am of opinion, there is no one thing of more conſequence conſiderable in the chriſtian commonwealth, then their growth; for, as in the declynation of the papacy, the jeſuits roſe as newe engineers and councellors to ſupport the imminent ruyne of the tyranny of Rome; ſo I find theſe laſt locuſts are encreaſing to be a bulwarke and guard of the falling eſtate of the Turkiſh empire, which is ſo weakened in power, and corrupted in diſcipline, that it is vpheld now more by opinion and reputation, then by any true and reall greatnes, which conſiſts not only in multitudes and extent of territory, but in exerciſed ſoldiours and politique gouernment; for it is become like an old body, crazed through many vices, which remayne, when the youth and ſtrength is decayed: Their force at preſent, which was of moſt terror, is ſo abated, that this empire cannott make, well fitted for warre, 100 gallies, which together dare not looke vpon tenne good ſhipps, nor now appeare in the ſea, but vnder the conduct of theſe villaines, who are bredd vpon the loſſe of the poore merchaunt, and ſoſtered by the negligence of thoſe princes, that were opportunely ſeated to ſuppreſſe them tymely. But I haue bene large in this ſubject in former relations, and know the tranſcendency of your Majeſtie's wiſedome, and therefore I aſke pardon, that I cannot conteyne my zeale to the generall good, nor my hatred to the vnworthy enemyes.

I HAUE troubled your Majeſtie thus farr with them, becauſe beeing now to giue an accompt of your commands, and letter written to this port, for their ſuppreſſion; your Majeſtie ſhall find a falſhood, that will betray euen their owne diſtruſt and weaknes'; for here they ſeeme to reject them, will write commands, ſend officers, doe and ſay any thing, to giue a preſent content againſt them; ſo that it be of no effect to harme them; and at the ſame tyme cheriſh, yea, ſo farr honor them, as to accept aſſiſtance from them; whereby it is euident, what aunſwere ſoeuer is giuen, they doe now, as their greateſt policy maynteyne them, as the ſcourge of Chriſtendome vpon the ſea. Yett I haue done my vtmoſt, in your Majeſtie's name, to putt them to tryall, but impudence and falſhood are euer companions, and though I make their deluſions viſible, they will not ſee, and ſo hope to keep vs blynde; but if your Majeſtie were pleaſed to deale roundly, your authority can worke greater effects here, then all the intereſſed and neighbouring princes.

TO giue your Majeſtie an account of the reſt of your commands ſince my arriuall in this court. I found Sir John Eyre reſigned and obedient to your roiall order: In the controuerſy betweene him and the merchaunts, I haue not to doe; they will charge him fully, and he is retorned to aunſwer. I found here the reputation of chriſtian princes ambaſſadors declyned almoſt into contempt, by the misfortune of the French in later yeares, by the intereſt of the Venetian, and by the want of buſines or praticque in your Majeſtie's: I haue endeauoured and encouraged them to reſtore their dignities, and with ſome diſputes and difficultyes I haue had audience, with as good reſpect, or better, then is vſuall. I haue deliuered your Majeſtie's letter, and made knowne your reſolution, not to deſert for any reſpect the publique cauſe, with that confidence which your Majeſtie commanded, and required reparation of many wrongs ſuffered here; bnt finding the condition of the affaires of Poland altered ſince I receiued my inſtructions, and the Grand Signor retorned without ſucceſs from the inuaſion, though no peace abſolutely concluded, I was enforced to chaunge the manner, I hope not leſſe to your Majeſtie's honor. Your roiall letters are promiſed to bee anſwered by the next poſts, and order giuen therein, but I feare only in generall termes, which is a way of falſe protraction: What anſwere I haue receiued, your Majeſtie will be pleaſed to be informed by this encloſed relation, which, though yett vnperfect, I was fearfull to delay, leaſt it ſhould haue bene imputed to negligence. I doubt not but I ſhall enforce and extort from them ſome better termes, becauſe they know your Majeſtie is able to viſitt them at their dores; but if they knew that your Majeſtie were reſolued to breake with them, if they did refuſe you juſtice, I am confident the emperour would rather ſtrangle tenne viziers, then diſmiſſe your miniſter: But they haue bene vſed to ſuch flattery and ſeruility, that they are confident in vs rather then in themſelues, and therefore preſume to doe many injuries, which done and growne old, are very hard to repaire: But (I hope your Majeſtie will pardon mee this preſumption, which is no ſingular ambition in mee) if your Majeſtie durſt truſt your ſeruant here ſo farre, as to referre it to diſcretion, and putt this commerce into an euen ballance, when he ſhall pronounce a breach, and giue him power to reſigne the capitulations, which he would neuer doe, for his owne intereſt and ſafety, but in ſuch occaſion as could beare no delay; I am aſſured, they would not accept them, but rather ſtoope from their ſeate of the ſcornfull, att leaſt to doe right; and ſooner for the reſpect of your Majeſtie, then of any other prince, becauſe your kingdomes are out of their reach, but your Majeſtie's ſhipps haue wings to fly to their ports; and though it befitts not mee to diſcouer the ſecretts of trades, vntill I bee called, I will yett take away that objection; that the generall nor particular proffit of this is not worth one tittle of your Majeſtie's honor.

I HAUE preſumed I knowe too farre, if I knew not I had a moſt gracious maſter, who will ſee no faults of infirmity; and though my beſt fortune in your Majeſtie's ſeruice hath bene two honeſt baniſhments, yett there I will pray as heartily for your Majeſtie, as they in thoſe churches doe, which, I pray God, you may long liue to gouerne happily and glorioully.

Adviſe and Account ſent to his MAJESTIE. Conſt. Mar. $\frac{9}{19}$ 1621.

FIRST, I acquainted the viſier baſſa, with the ſubſtance of theſe 5 demands in wryting, and vrged them as farr as I could, proteſting in your Majeſtie's name, that by reaſon of the robberies of the pirats, and the inſolency and injuſtice of the miniſters of this court, it was impoſſible to maynteyne and continue any commerce in theſe ſeas, deſiring him wiſely to waigh and conſider, whether his maſter made due accompt of the frendſhip of your Majeſtie, and whether it concerned him not, to preſerue the antient league of your kingdomes; for that things were now growne to that extremity, as wee could no longer bee deluded with words and promiſes, but that your Majeſtie would either expect juſtice for the wrongs done vnto his ſubjects, or recall and retire them to your owne roiall protection, and free them from the ſeruitude they liued in; and in reguard of the rouers, your Majeſtie muſt either ſend an army to defend them, which would be troubleſome neighbours, or elſe ruyne and beat downe the townes that harboured and receiued them; or finally, give letters of mart to your Majeſtie's oppreſſed ſubjects, to right themſelues vpon all the frends and abetters of their villany: Therefore I deſired him to take our redreſſe to heart, for that your Majeſtie would be blameleſs before God and the world, hauing ſought in the way of frendſhipp and refuſed, if you ſhould be enforced to carue out your owne ſatisfaction.

THE viſier, a graue, wiſe and temperat man, replyed, Your Majeſtie's frendſhipp was antient and ſacred in this court, and they knew it depended not vpon intereſts, as that of other princes, but of your owne free loue; therefore I ſhould not doubt of that good ſatisfaction conformable to the league and amity of your Majeſtie's, and to the juſtice of this court: And ſo deſired mee not to deliuer them by word of mouth, becauſe that tooke leſſe impreſſion, and our interpreters would feare to ſpeake, but that I ſhould preſent them in writing, and he would vndertake a reaſonable and juſt anſwere.

AT my firſt audience I deliuered a preface of ceremony by word of mouth, then your Majeſtie's letter; laſtly, I cauſed my interpreter to reade theſe demands in the very expreſſed termes, and then deliuered them in writing to the Grand Signor's hands.

A FEW daies after, I ſent to the vizier, to know if he were ready to giue me anſwere, and that I would come to ſatisfy him, if there were any difficulty.

HE replyed, He would not that I ſhould come in perſon, vntill all things were accorded, becauſe it would be a ſhame to him, to refuſe the ambaſſador of ſo great a Majeſtie any thing that he ſhould vrge, and the denyall would breed diſtaſt betweene vs, which he would auoyd; but that firſt he would diſpute the points apart, and when all conditions were agreed, that I ſhould come with freedome: And my ſeruant being inſtructed in writing, hee proceeded:

TO the firſt he ſaid, That the emperor had giuen him order to renewe the capitulations, and to make any ſuch additions as ſhould be requiſite, agreeable to their lawe, and conformable to the antient league, and that therein I ſhould find no difficulty; for they honored your Majeſtie, and were reſolued to giue you aſſurance of their will to maynteyne a true frendſhipp; and therefore deſired, that I would drawe, and prepare the capitulations, and ſend them to him and the chancellor, who would conſider them, and beeing ſuch as were fitt to be granted, I ſhould haue ſpeedy order. Which hauing peruſed, I haue found them confuſed things, peeced vp without forme or ſubſtance; but I haue new digeſted them, with conuenient additions, and am ready to preſent and maynteyne them, if any ſcruple ariſe; and I doubt not to obteyne them, if after they will maynteyne themſelues.

TO the ſecond the vizier anſwered with great ſubtilty; firſt juſtificing the occaſion of the warr, and imputing the fault to the Coſſacks maynteyned by the Polacks, to robb euen at the port of Conſtantinople; therefore that the emperour could not in honor but chaſten and deſtroy them; hauing firſt by meſſage demanded juſtice againſt them; and now his maſter beeing engaged at great charge, and in his honor, he could make noe peace with thoſe that had beguiled him, pretending that they had no other intention, but the warr, (which I know is furtheſt from truth) becauſe that vpon the border the Polacks hauing obteyned a ceſſation vpon diuers conditions, tions, (which I ſent your Majeſtie) wherein they promiſed a preſent, and an ambaſſador, and other ceremonies, and that he ſhould arriue as ſoone as the Grand Signor could gett to Adrianople; whereupon hauing raiſed his camp, and diſſolued his army, they now ſcorned him, and kept no faith; neither ambaſſador nor meſſenger, no, not any letter, ſent ſince their retorne: That therefore they could not hearken to any mediation, and that your Majeſtie did not value the honor of the Grand Signor in this motion: Which was deliuered to drawe from mee ſome earneſtnes, or to ſee if I would make the offer in the name of the king of Poland; which hauing aduiſed with the agent here, and knowing it not to be honorable, as they now ſtood, I would not doe, but ſent anſwer, That your Majeſtie moued it as a frend, and to admoniſh the Grand Signor, not to pull vpon him ſo many enemyes; for that no reſpect was of power to make your Majeſtie forſake the generall cauſe of Chriſtendome; that his grandfather had ſo vnderſtood the like motion from queene Elizabeth with good ſucceſs; and I doubted not your Majeſtie had deſerued as much reſpect from the Grand Signor as any of your roiall predeceſſors had done from his aunceſtors: But that, if I ſhould retorne anſwer to your Majeſtie, that they would hearken to no peace, I was ſorry they were ſo blynded in their owne cauſe. To which he replyed, and the concluſion was, that I ſhould rather write into Poland, and be a meanes to procure the coming of the ambaſſador, with the power of the nobility, for a finall concluſion, that the honor of the emperour might be ſalued, and that then, if any difficulty in the treaty ſhould ariſe, your Majeſtie ſhould be vmpire; and I your vnworthy ſeruant ſhould decide and accommodate it; and therein they would ſhow what reſpect they bare to your Majeſties name and frendſhipp. 1621.

THAT your Majeſtie may know how the eſtate of that treaty ſtands; if you vouchſafe to looke back vpon my laſt aduiſes, the conditions made vpon the borders were reſpectiue, and with reſeruation: The parlement hath ſince refuſed to ſend any guiſt or preſent, leaſt it be interpreted a tribute; only they haue ratified the deliuery of Chotyn to the prince of Bugdania. They demand the power, as a dependent vpon the crowne of Poland, to elect, place and diſplace the prince, leauing the antient tribute and confirmation only to the Grand Signor: They require all their priſoners; they will no further be pledges for the Coſſacks, but reſpectiuely, as the Grand Signor wilbe for the Tartars; they will trade freely, with or without a reſident, at their pleaſure; and with theſe conditions the ambaſſador was expected, but is ſince ſtayed, vpon a new incurſion made by the Tartars; proteſting, if firſt the Grand Signor doe not puniſh the captayne of that troope, that they will not proceed to treaty. At this they are here troubled, and deſire upon any conditions to drawe hither the ambaſſador, beeing unfitt for warr, and aſhamed to ſeeke a peace. The plea of the Grand Signor is, that he cannott puniſh the Tartar, becauſe the Pole hath not diſſolued his army on the border, which he requires, and the other will not doe, vntill all be concluded. The Turks haue alſo excited the duke of Muſcouia to inuade of the one ſide of Poland, and promiſed to diuide the ſpoile; which by honorable letters he hath refuſed; ſaying, That peace is made for 14 yeares, and that without iuſt occaſion, he will not for anothers cauſe diſſolue it.

SO that on euery ſide this court is in deſpaire of any better end with the Polacks then ſhame, and therefore though they pretend the contrary, they are moſt gladd of your Majeſties motion: I muſt confeſſe, that many think here, that the Polacks are too ſtiffe, and that the fault will reſt vpon them, if peace proceed not; and though God hath bleſſed and deliuered them from the firſt fury, they ſhall not doe well to exalt themſelues, and drawe vpon them the deſperate rage of a young and headdy prince, that wants not yet meanes nor power to aſſaile them; therefore I ſhould, with hope of your Majeſties approbation, venture to write into Poland; but that I haue certen aduiſe that a ſecretary from thence is on the way with ample inſtructions; and that if the Grand Signor accept of the conditions, the ambaſſador ſhall proceed; vpon whoſe arriuall I doubt not to accommodate all differences, by the authority and to the honor of your Majeſtie. The agent here accepting only the fauour of your Majeſty, and refuſing the like from all other ambaſſadors reſident: The French hath had the ſame order from his maſter by a letter yet vndeliuered, and becauſe he did doe nothing in the heate, I think he ſhall not be called to the concluſion.

TO the third the vizier replyed, That the motion for the priſoners was vnſeaſonable, becauſe in order it ſhould follow the generall treaty, and making peace, which,

1621. if finiſhed, your Majeſtie ſhould find, that for your ſake all thoſe mentioned in the memoriall giuen mee by the count of Olensky ſhould be free, except only for the prince Corresky, who hath bene the cauſe of many troubles, and hath made eſcape from priſon formerly; but at this tyme he was taken in the generall cauſe, and therefore the Polacks will make no peace without his liberty: Then I demanded better treatment and fairer captiuity, they beeing chayned in the night, and blynded in the day; which I doubt not to obteyne, but that I dare not engage myſelfe for them, remembring the caſe of the French ambaſſador: For the Scottiſh man, the ſonne of William Fourbes, he was taken by the Tartars, and fallen to their lott, and is out of the power of this place, but by money: But Wolmarus Formzback, now one of theſe priſoners, who renders your Majeſtie infinite thanks for that particular recommendation of him, hath certified mee, that he hath giuen order for his and diuers others redemption that ſerued vnder him; and that therein he will expreſſe his gratitude to your Majeſtie by particular care.

To the fourth, the vizier makes proteſtation in the Grand Signor's name againſt them, offering that I ſhall haue what commands, what meſſage I will deſire, in company of any Engliſhman; but becauſe I know, neither they wilbe obeyed, nor is it meant, they ſhould, I haue further required an article in the capitulations, that if they ſhall, after the receipt of the firſt command, doe any ſpoile vpon the ſubjects of your Majeſtie, that then the Grand Signor ſhall oblige his honor, not to ſuffer them to enter any of his ports, nor to haue trade, reliefe, anchorage, nor water, in any harbour of his dominions; but that they ſhalbe expoſed to the ſea, that your Majeſtie may ſuppreſſe them; and that then it wilbe euident, that the emperour dealeth ſyncerely with your Majeſtie; otherwiſe wee ſhall ſtill beleeue, that all their doings are diſguiſes of falſhood; and your Majeſtie ſhould be enforced to doe your owne juſtice. Whether I ſhall procure this or not, I cannott foreſee, nor how it wilbe kept; in the meane tyme I purpoſe to take out the beſt command I can, with ample declaration of the Grand Signor's pleaſure, and to ſend it both to Tunes and Algier, where I doubt not I could make a peace, if either I thought it honorable to your Majeſtie, or that it would be honeſtly obſerued; but in this point I haue noe faith, and I humbly deſire your Majeſties order.

To the fift the vizier replyed, it was an old obſolete quarrell, and that I did him injury to oppreſſe him, when in the tyme of 3 former viziers my predeceſſors could obteyne no reliefe; therefore he would not looke backe vpon the actions of other men, nor rake in the bones of the dead; but he deſired I ſhould reſt ſatisfied with this anſwere, that while he had the honor to gouerne, there ſhould no wrong be done vnto vs, and that he would heare all our complaints, ſo as no man ſhould need to looke back vpon his actions; to this I haue ſent a ſharpe anſwere, but know not what it will effect: Your Majeſtie may pleaſe to knowe, that the wrong is very great, and vnſupportable, with others lately done at Aleppo of like quality, with which I now ſtruggle, but know no remedy, except your Majeſtie will vouchſafe, if you haue made a good election, to truſt your miniſter; for I am confident I could doe wonders, if they thought I had power.

To the laſt there is order giuen to anſwere your Majeſties letter; I haue required that all theſe may be particularly replyed vnto for my diſcharge, and without it, or ſome anſwere in effect, I ſhalbe loath to accept of generalities and words. This is the ſubſtance of all I haue yet done, which I humbly beſeech your Majeſtie to accept without ſeuere examination.

HEERE are diuers aduiſes come of the peace made betweene the emperour and Bethleem Gabor, which haue vexed this court, whereupon the miniſters of Gabor were diſcharged of their penſion, and order taken to demand an arrerage of tribute of Gabor; but more lately in 18 daies two poſts are arriued from Buda and Cænisia, that bring a ſtrange and lamentable newes, that the emperour, his brother, and one ſonne, with diuers lords, are ſlayne in the way to Inſpurgh: It is ſo farr beleeued here, that there is order gone to excite Gabor to lay hold of the occaſion, and to ſeaze what he can, and command to all the baſſaes in Hungary and Greece to aſſiſt him, becauſe I find that the Grand Signor wilbe at liberty from the warr of Aſia, of which I aduiſed, againſt the Emir de Saida, who hath ſent his tribut and excuſe with preſents, to make his peace, which I think wilbe accepted; and then knowing that he cannott be quiett, I judge he will turne all his anger upon Hungary, and the territories of the houſe of Auſtria: I humbly entreat your majeſtie to giue mee direct order how I ſhall gouerne myſelfe in ſuch occaſions. 1621.

To my Lord ADMIRAL. Two Letters, the firſt in Character.

My Lord,

I WOVLD not by this my motion hurt ſir Paul Pindur, who hath long depended upon his majeſtie; and I deſire your lordſhip, without his prejudice, to accomodate his buſineſs. But finding his majeſtie in liking with his diamond, and hearing many eſteeme it a ſtone rare in perfection, fit for a great prince, I could not but offer his majeſtie, beeing now in my power, to buy a jewell that cannot I thinke bee fellowed in the world. I haue ſeene many in Indya, and ſome one or two greater, but neuer any that might be compared. The ſtone is in weight 70 or 71 carratts, twice the weight of ſir Paul Pindurs; in forme almoſt a perfect ſquare, a table ſtone of full and proportionall thicknes, all his corners all perfections, and in water of moſt exquiſite beauty, beyond that other, which was therein the greateſt perfection. My lord, there is no other ſuch knowne in the hands of any prince. The modell I haue ſeene, but cannot ſee the ſtone, for it is the greateſt ſecret of this court: but for the prayſes I give, I am confident; for my jewellers employed haue ſeene yt. The price will not be ſo great, but that in trew valew 40000 l. may bee gained by it. A pearle pendant of 97 carratts, which is the greateſt I euer heard of, in all perfection. Diamonds from 30 carratts downward, moſt perfect. If theſe pleaſe, I deſire ſpeedy anſwere, and ſecrett order. If not, giue mee leaue to make my owne aduantage. Pet. Vanlere knows of this ſtone, but if he knew that I knew yt, it is loſt, or wilbe dearer by 20000 l. My lord, you may give your word, this only is ſans pareil. As your lordſhip tenders your ſervants good or ill, communicate with none but his majeſtie.

THO. ROE.

My Lord,

I HAVE beene bould ſince my departure to preſent myſelf to your lordſhip by two letters, which, if they be arriued, will excuſe mee of all other fayling, than of matter worthy to interrupt you. In them I gaue your lordſhip an account of my opinion of the danger, and feare of the encreaſe of the piratts, who are now become the guards of the Turkes armadoes in the ſea, without whom they durſt not appeare vpon the chriſtian coaſts, as is now euident in this prepared expedition for the Leuant: the Grand Signor hauing ſent for ten of them; and his admiral profeſſing, that he could not ſafely, with all the maritime force of this empire, vndertake, I ſay not an attempt upon others, but to paſs and keep on the ſeaes only, without their countenance. I have viewed and conſidered the ſtrength of this ſtate by ſea, and I find that they are not able to make 100 gallyes good and badd, and of thoſe ſome ould, ſome very ſmall; their munition, prouiſion, and diſcipline poor, ſcarce, and declined. Therefore your lordſhip will pardon my vehemency agaynſt theſe theeues, when I ſee by experience they doe not only ſpoyle the induſtrious merchant, but embroulden and aſſure a greater enemy to looke out for aduantages. But becauſe I haue often aduiſed, and at lardge, of this ſubiect to Mr. ſecretary Caluert, though I can neuer paſs them ouer in ſilence, I will no farther trouble your lordſhip: what I can doe here to defend ourſelves, ſhalbe the beſt of my endeauour. I alſo ſent your lordſhip all other occurrences and varietyes of this court, in eſpeciall the ſucceſs of the Poliſh warr, and treaty ſince; ſuch as my newnes and little experience here could learne, which, I hope, his majeſtie, by your fauour, hath taken knowledge of, and accepted in earneſt of my duty, beeing very fearfull to appeare directly before him with fragments, vntill I had done ſomewhat in his commands, and furniſhed myſelf with the beſt of this ill place. And hauing now had my audience, in which I fully deliuered his majeſties meſſage, and demanded many reparations, and haue proceeded a little in debate and negotiation with the viziers, I haue preſumed to render his majeſtie a particular account, as well of thoſe anſwers given me, as of my opinion of the ſucceſſe and effectualnes of the fayre promiſe of this deceiptful nation, which, as I take the bouldneſs to preſent them by your lordſhips hands, ſo if they may obtayne the favour to be dignifyed by one of your good woords, I doubt not but they wilbe

1621. be accepted at leaſt, for the patronage, and I ſhall enjoy ſome peace and happines, that my maſter's opinion of mee is not leſſened in this fayre baniſhment. I can doe your lordſhip here no particular ſeruice, but an ouerture being made to mee of ſomewhat that may content his majeſtie, and is very well worth the offer, I haue thought fitt to entreat your lordſhip to acquaynt him with yt; and becauſe there is ſome danger and hazard in the diſcouery, if theſe ſhould bee intercepted, I haue encloſed it in cyphur, the key whereof you may be pleaſed to command from Mr. ſecretary Caluert; deſiring your lordſhip not to communicate it to any man but to his majeſtie, and to ſend mee, with all expedition, in the ſame ſecrecy, an anſwere of his or your pleaſure. If in this kynd your lordſhip deſire ſtrange things, I know neuer man had the like opertunytye, as opinion hath caſt vpon mee; and I ſhall, as in all other, endeavour to bee approued woorthy of ſome of thoſe bounteous fauours you caſt away among your ſeruants, from which ranke nothing can remoue

From Mr. Secretary CALVERT.

My Lord,

I HAVE ſince your departure from hence receiued from you fower ſeverall diſpatches, from Malaga, Meſſina, Zante, and Conſtantinople; the laſt being of the 10th of January olde ſtile, and the firſt after your arrival there. Before I make you an anſwere to any of theſe, I cannot ſtay from telling you that myſelf, my wyfe, and all this family of mine are exceeding gladd of your lordſhips and your ladyes ſafe arrivall in that port. The many buſineſſes I haue had of late, and which lye yet vpon my hands, haue driven mee to a ſtraight of time, the poſte being ready to depart that ſhould receive this diſpatch; and therefore your lordſhip will excuſe me, if I doe not anſwere the great paines you haue taken in writing ſo largely to mee, with the like length againe. I haue acquainted his majeſtie, from time to time, with the contents of all your letters, as they came to my hands; and the laſt from Conſtantinople, hee made mee read it all over before him: which, becauſe it is now the freſheſt in my memory, I ſhall tell your lordſhip what anſwers he hath commanded mee to give you, to the points thereof wherein you deſire further directions.

HIS majeſtie is ſo good a chriſtian, as laying aſide all by-reſpects of advantage, which the good ſucceſſe of the Grand Seigniure in his warres againſt Chriſtendome, at this time may ſeeme to miniſter vnto that partye whoſe preſervation his majeſtie is tyed by many obligations to wiſhe well vnto; yet is there, I dare ſay, no prince nor private perſon more gladd than hee is, that God hath not ſuffered his armyes to be ſo victorious as there was once greate occaſion to feare: and therefore the advertiſement you ſend, both of his laſt defeate, whereof wee had heard ſomewhat before, though not in every thing ſo particular, and of his vnaptnes at this preſent to vndertake the like, was very wellcome vnto his majeſtie. If you find any inclination there, to come to a treaty of peace with the Emperor, or the Pole, his majeſtie would haue you further it by all the meanes you may, by vſing his majeſties name in the generall, and the authority of his perſuaſion, ſo farre as the miniſters of thoſe princes will be contented to haue you entermeddle; ſo as you do not ingage his majeſties word or honor for the performance of any particulars, wherein hee can neyther direct you, nor authoriſe you, being a ſtranger to their affaires and quarrells, and having no other intereſt in the mediation, then as a chriſtian prince, their friend and allie.

FOR Bethlem Gabor, the character you haue given of him agrees well with the opinion which his majeſtie hath ever had. His majeſtie hetherto would never haue any thing to doe with him, neyther would hee haue your lordſhip take any notice of him or his affairs, but to leave him vnto them that haue undertaken the care of him.

THE noble treatment which you found at Meſſina from prince Philibert, as alſo that at Malaga from the corrigidor there, is thankfully acknowledged by his majeſtie vnto the embaſſador here, as indeede it deſerves; for they could not do him more honor, then they did him there in your perſon. I haue alſo myſelfe tolde the embaſſador, how amply you haue related it, with an earneſt requeſt vnto mee, that his majeſtie might take notice of it; and I ſhall, by my two letters this weeke into Spaine doe the like. For the correſpondence which prince Philibert deſires to holde with you at Conſtantinople, his majeſtie is well contented, that for ordinary occurrents rents you ſhall not be ſparing to give him contentment. But lett mee adviſe your lordſhip, as your freind, and one that remembers you are mine, and my neighbour, take heede that even in ordinary matters you bee very warye of your conveyance: for when barbarous ſtates once intertayne jeaulouſies, they are not eaſily removed with reaſon. And I muſt confeſſe, I doe very muche miſlike that ſending a man vnto you, within two dayes after your arrivall, by prince Philibert, perhapps induſtriouſly, and not with a purpoſe to keepe your counſaile; knowing, that it were no diſſervice to the king of Spaine, if any thing might bee donne to make a breach betweene the king our ſoveraigne and the Grand Signieur. My care of you and of your ſafety makes mee doubt, peradventure, where there is no cauſe: but I am ſure, it is your perſon, and the reſt of his majeſties ſubjects, that bee now in the Turkiſh dominions, which in ſuch a caſe is moſt conſiderable; otherwiſe, vnleſſe there were ſome courſe taken to ſecure that trade better then now it is, his majeſtie had better breake with him, then to ſuffer ſo much diſhonour and diſadvantage as hee doth at this preſent by his amity.

THE cryes of thoſe poore people that haue been vndone this laſt yeare in the Leuant come dayly to his majeſties eares; and pitty it is to heare the miſerable ſtories that every day is reported of ſome diſaſter or other. Your lordſhip hath very truly and wiſely, in your letter from Malaga, ſett downe both the miſchiefe and the cauſe, and withall propounded the ſureſt remedye. But wee are ſo diſtracted heere with the multiplicity of other buſineſſes, which takes vpp nights and dayes inceſſantly without reſt, as, though that buſineſſe bee of as greate conſequence as almoſt any can bee, yet doe I not ſee an howers leyſure for it. Beſides, to deale playnely with you, who knowes well in what condition you left vs, for meanes to doe any greate exployt at ſea, I muſt needs tell your lordſhip, that his majeſties exchequer is not yet able to furniſh any conſiderable part of the charge to ſo greate an enterpriſe. On the other ſide, the marchants are earneſt ſuitors to come to ſome treaty with thoſe of Argier; but that his majeſtie will not hearken vnto, taking it to be a diſhonour vnto him, as in deede it is (though the Hollanders haue done it of late) eſpecially now the firſt contract made betwixt him and the king of Spaine, when Sir Robert Manſell was ſett foorth with his fleete, for three yeres, being not yet fully expired; howſoever, for want of timely proviſion of victuall, and freſh ſupplye of new ſhippes, the fleete was forced to come home before the expiration of the terme. I hope, notwithſtanding, his majeſties care and providence will, eare it be long, think upon ſome remedye for the ſafety of his people in thoſe ſeas, for which I ſhall be a faithfull remembrancer, for ſo much as concernes my place and dutye.

I HAUE helld your lordſhip ſomewhat longer then at the firſt I purpoſed, or thought I ſhould haue had leyſure to doe. For our occurrents in theſe parts, I ſhall tell you as much as is worth your knowledge in a few words.

THE emperour hath agreed to a ceſſation of armes with the prince Palatine; and the conditions are to be treated of at Bruſſells: where the infanta hath full power and commiſſion from the emperour to conclude it. Sir Richard Weſton goes thither the next weeke, as his majeſties ambaſſador, to aſſiſt at that treaty. The treaty of peace will enſue imediately after; but where, or by what inſtruments, that is to be handled, it is not yet agreed vpon. In the meane tyme, the count of Swartzenberg is ſent hether vpon embaſſage from the emperour, to give his majeſtie aſſurance of his hearty affection, and deſire to reſtore peace vnto Chriſtendome, and to continue all brotherly loue and freindſhippe with his majeſtie. Hee is lodged in Denmarke-howſe; had his firſt publique audience in the vpper howſe of parliament at Weſtminſter; and is very nobly vſed every way. The next weeke hee takes his leave. My lord Digby went from hence towards Spaine the 20th of the laſt moneth, and hath ſtayed long at Plymouth for want of neceſſaryes belonging to his ſhipping; but I hope by this tyme hee is gone: whereof I looke to heare every hower. The conde of Gondomar hath likewiſe gotten leaue of his maſter to viſite his friends in Spaine for a few monethes; but with a purpoſe to returne. In his abſence, don Carlos de Coloma, now governor of Cambray, comes hether to reſide as embaſſador extraordinary. The elector Palatine is gone privately diſguiſed into the Palatinate, with ſome three or fower in his company. And his majeſties royal daughter, at the Haghe, looks every hower for her delivery of another childe: I pray God ſend them both a happy and a ſafe travaile.

1621. And to your lordſhip, and my lady Roe, to whome I pray you commend my ſervice, all health and happyneſſe, as I wiſhe to

Your aſſured freind and miniſter to do you ſervice,

St. Martins-lane, 11 Aprill 1622.

GEO. CALUERT.

From Mr. Secretary CALVERT.

My Lord,

MY laſt vnto you was of the 11th of this moneth, whereof I ſend you here a copie. Synce, there hath not happened any great occaſion to write againe; only I ſhall tell you that which your lordſhipp, I knowe, wilbe gladd to hear, that his majeſties royal daughter is ſafely delivered (thankes be to God) of another daughter, on Wedneſday the 17th of Aprill, at the Haghe; and the prince Palatine is ſafely arrived in his owne countrey the Palatinate. Sir Richard Weſton is by this tyme in Flanders, and my lord Digby in Spayne, from whom we ſhall ſhortly heare what wee may expect of our two great buſineſſes, the peace and the matche. I pray you commend my ſervice to my lady Roe, who, I aſſure you, is often remembred and prayed for in my family. I wiſh to you both all health and contentment, as to

Your lordſhips aſſured freind to do you ſervice,

Whitehall, 25 Aprill 1622.

GEO. CALUERT.

YOUR letters, as they come to my hands, are all ſafely deliuered according to their directions; and therefore, I pray you, incloſe them ſtill in covers to me, and not to my coſen Branthwayte; for yf he be out of the way I can not come by my owne letters vntill his returne, though they be in my hands under his cover.

To His MAJESTIE.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

I PRESUMED by my firſt letter to render your Majeſtie an account rather of my endeauour, then of any thing I had effected; butt now, that I have brought all things then in propoſition to ſome iſſue, euen againſt myne owne hopes and beliefe, I humbly craue leaue to interrupt your majeſtie with my importunities.

THE Grand Signor hath ſent your Majeſtie an anſwer to your roiall letter, which, if you pleaſe to overſee the vanity of ſome phraſes, beeing the antient preſumptuous ſtyle of this court, for the ſubſtance, I hope, it will giue your Majeſtie ſome content, it conteyning a particular reply to euery thing, both in your Majeſties, and in the propoſitions made by mee, by your roiall order; and in the generall, I preſume, it is as full of reſpect and obſeruance to your Majeſtie, as euer was ſent to any prince, from thoſe who thinke of no equality; and I can add this circumſtance of their care to giue your Majeſtie ſatisfaction, that it was deliuered to mee with ceremonyes of honor, and required that I ſhould ſend it by an expreſs, a command of ſafe conduct beeing giuen mee to that purpoſe, which hath cauſed the diſpatch of this gentleman, whom I humbly beſeech may kiſſe your Majeſties hands in my behalfe; and for the tranſlation, I give this aſſurance, that it is as true and punctuall without addition or alteration, as our language will comprehend their rhetorique.

THEREIN your Majeſtie ſhall receiue a promiſe for the conſummation of the peace with the king of Poland, which though giuen in high termes, the meaning is, that if the ambaſſador from thence arriue, and offer a peace, which they are ready to accept by their owne neceſſityes, and any difference ſhall happen in the treaty, your Majeſtie ſhall, as vmpire, giue the lawe vnto them; and vpon concluſion the priſoners at your Majeſties inſtance ſhall haue liberty; and I am confident, it wilbe accordingly performed, if the headdineſs of this emperour cauſe not a retraction in the Polacks, which wee now begynne to doubt. If your Majeſtie vouchſafe to looke back vpon my laſt adviſe, there was expected here a ſecretary, with the articles concluded by the parlament; and that the duke of Barasky ſhould follow to the borders, and there to attend the agreeation, and ſo to proceed or retorne. Since which tyme the king of Poland hauing intelligence of the inconſtancy of this emperour, hath reſolued of greater expedition, and inſteed of that ſecretary, hath diſmiſſed the chiaus 1621. of the Grand Signor, with his letter to the vizier, promiſing abſolutly to make the peace, and to ſend his greate embaſſadour (the copy whereof your Majeſtie ſhall herewith receiue); and ſo wee hoped all things in that buſines had bene ſettled; but the emperour perſiſting obſtinatly to proceed in his pretended deuotions to viſitt the tombe of Mahomett, though many ſuſpect other intentions, and beeing no way perſwadable by his viziers nor churchmen, nor frends, nor to be diuerted by threatening, to which the ſoldiours haue proceeded, that they would ſett vpp another king, wee iuſtly feare ſome tumult and alteration here, the people falling into ſuch boldnes and preſumption. It is therefore doubted, that the duke of Barasky will not ſett forward to follow a wyld chace, not to treat with a ſimple chimacham or deputy; and ſo much the agent hath ſignified to mee, and both parts are hereby in diſtraction: Beſides, I haue ſome cauſe to ſuſpect, that the Grand Signor will promiſe to ſtay vntill the duke be aduanced into the Turkiſh dominions, and beeing then engaged and in their power, the emperour will proceed either to force him to followe, or to negotiate with his lieutenant, which the Poles will neuer conſent vnto; wherefore I haue demanded an audience, and at the requeſt of the agent of Poland, I haue reſolued to declare the doubts and changes that may enſue, if they giue not aſſurance to the duke of Barasky, that the emperour will ſtay vntill his arriuall; and therein I ſhall aſſiſt both the Poles, who deſire a concluſion, and the viziers, who vehemently labour the detention of the emperour, which they may more ſafely ſollicitt in your Majeſties name then in their owne; proteſting that if any alteration happen by the abſence of the Grand Signor, the fault is only in his owne obſtinacy; and that both your Majeſtie, who hath mediated for them, and the Poles, are wholly excuſed; and this is now the eſtate of that buſines, which yett I hope ſhall haue a good iſſue, worthy of the honor of your Majeſtie.

YOUR capitulations with fitt additions are agreed vnto, and ready for the ſeale, ſo that I may preſume, your Majeſties ſubiects haue gotten more in few dayes, then formerly in many yeares, the fruit whereof I hope they will finde, and for it thanke your Majeſtie. Among the reſt I haue procured the emperour to bynd himſelfe to your Majeſtie for thoſe of Tunes and Algier, that they ſhall obſerue the peace of this empire with the ſubiects of your Majeſtie; butt becauſe in my laſt I wrott uery diffidently of the hopes of that buſines, both of the intention here, and of the obſeruance there, your Majeſtie will pardon mee if I recant to our aduantage; not that I am now confident of the faith of infidels, but that contending againſt my owne opinion, I haue obteyned more then I expected, and ſuch as by the circumſtances giue mee ſome beleefe, that they are reall here; and hauing your Majeſties order to doe ſomewhat therein, and inſtructions from the Leuant company left to diſcretion; and laſtly, foreſeeing the great damage our trades were ſubiect to by their robberies, I haue choſen rather to make ſome tryall, then to leaue it at the worſt; therfore hauing procured capitulations and commands, as effectuall as can be acquired, from the Grand Signor, and letters from the vizier and admirall of the ſea, I haue reſolued to ſend them by a meſſenger and ſeruant of this court in company of an Engliſhman, there to propound conditions of reſtitution and peace in the name of the Grand Signor; and although that I receiued ſome intimation, that I ſhould ſend theſe about into England, to aſſiſt a treaty intended from thence, I thought it would not agree with your Majeſties honor, and ſo you would reiect the motion, to haue any conference with ſubiects of ſo baſe condition vpon termes of equality; but I thought it fitt rather to ground it from authority here, and to diſpatch it in leſſe tyme, and at leſſe charge; which I humbly beſeech your Majeſtie not only to accept, and to iuſtify mee in, but to vouchſafe mee your roiall help, that if I haue begunne this, and ſhall bring it to effect, you wilbe pleaſed to command the lords of your Majeſties councel, to whom I write more at large, and haue ſent the copies of all, that their lordſhips may iudge of the probability, to call the merchants before them, to elect for mee fitt conſulls to reſide in thoſe places, and to ſend their goods thither, as in former tymes (for therein will conſiſt the aſſurance of the peace); and I make no great doubt to ſettle all things in quiett, and to beginne a trade to as good profitt as in any parts of this empire. I haue done this, this way of myne owne head; and therfore not willing to be bold vpon the purſes of the merchants without their conſent, I haue aduentured the greateſt charge out of myne owne poore fortune, not doubting butt your 1621. Majeſtie will take order, that I ſhall not looſe for my endeauour in a publique ſeruice: Beeing it hath coſt the merchaunts generally ſo many thowſands, and all the ſoutherne trades interreſſed, the charge wilbe litle to venture with mee one thowſand, with which I hope to finiſh it; if not, yet this wilbe diſcouered, that after this tryall there wilbe no hope of any power or authority from hence, nor of any other courſe, then of fire, ſword, and reuenge.

WITH all hnmility I will preſume to become an humble ſutor to your Majeſtie for a charitable grace; here are diuers poore men your Majeſties ſubiects in captiuity to the Grand Signor, and to other men, which might be redeemed for money. I haue already, and ſtill am willing, to doe aboue my power, and haue at myne owne charge freed ſome; but the burthen is too greate for mee, and yett I cannott ſee them in miſery without compaſſion againſt myſelfe; and I have obſerued in England many collections made for particular men in churches, by licences of grace from your Majeſtie, which, I feare, haue bene abuſed; therfore, if your Majeſtie were pleaſed to ſpeake with my lord keeper therein, that no priuate letters patents might be granted; but that your Majeſtie would vouchſafe to take order with him, that a warrant under the great ſeale might be giuen to ſome honeſt and elect men of the Spaniſh and Turkiſh companyes, as treſurers for the poore captiues, ro make a monethly collection in the pariſhes of London and Middleſex, to receiue the charity of compaſſionat and well affected men, to make a ſtock, to be either remitted to the truſt of your miniſter, to relieue the diſtreſſed eſtate of thoſe who haue fallen into miſery, labouring in their vocation; there beeing for all other nations a treaſory to the ſame end. By this your gracious work and goodnes many poore ſoules might be ſaued, who in deſperation forſake the croſs of Chriſt; and many other enabled to retorne and ſerue your Majeſtie, and to pray for your eternall happines. Your Majeſtie wilbe pleaſed to excuſe my preſumptuous trouble, and though my ſeruice be of ſmall effect, my praiers ſhalbe moſt feruent for your glorious and long reigne, as

To the PRINCE.

May it pleaſe your Highnes,

I SHALL giue your Highnes a very late account of the ſucceſs of the inuaſion made againſt Poland, you hauing receiued newes of the retorne of the Turkiſh army, and of a peace that ſhould enſue; butt becauſe I thinke I can giue a more particular advice, and more certen, your Highnes will pardon mee, though I bring you ſome ſtale matter: The monſtrous and ſtupendious army ſo much ſpoken of with vs, did not ariue to half the number, nor exceeded 300000 of all ſorts, comprehending baggage; yett it was great enough to haue done more then it performed. Butt theſe ouergrowne multitudes euer deſtroy and eat themſelues, et pereunt mole ſua. A little fortreſſe called Chotyn in Bugdania ſtayed them, and defended itſelfe, about which caſtle part of the quarrell beganne, being taken by the Poles from the prince of that prouince, then vnder the protection of the Grand Signor; ſo that the Turke, paſſing the Boriſtin, was forced to leaue it behinde him vnforced, and encamped his army vpon the border ſtrongly, and then ſent out a Tartarian prince to make roads, and doe ſpoiles in the playne country. The Polacks faced the army of the Grand Signor, beeing entrenched, and commanded by the chancellor, conſiſting of 60000, the king remaining in Cracouia; and the prince, with the ſtrength of the Poliſh nobility, in Caminitza; there paſſed ſome ſmall skirmiſhes on both parts; butt after 34 daies the Poles fell in the night into the quarter of the Janizaries, and by the ſodayneſs cauſed a great diſtraction and feare, and hadd ſome execution. And the raynes falling abundantly, the armyes on both ſides wanting victuall, eſpecially for horſe, the great vizier and ſome other ſober men took this occaſion to perſwade the emperour to retyre, and to accept of conditions offered by the chaunceller, and ſo ſodainly 1622. the army brake vpp. The Grand Signor hauing loſt by the ſword, famine, ſicknes, and cold, about 80000 men, and aboue 100000 horſe, the reſt haraſſed, broken, and almoſt mutined; he retorned to Adrianople in Nouember laſt. The conditions were, the render of Chotyn to the prince of Bugdania; that the Tartars ſhould make no incurſion vpon the Poles, nor the Coſſacks vpon the Turks; and to aſſure this, there ſhould be ſent an emirze, or prince of the Tartars, into Poland, to lye as a pledge, and the Poles ſhould ſend a reſident to Conſtantinople with preſents; that the Poles ſhould pay a donatiue yearly to the prince of Tartary, antiently pretended; and ſo with reference to former treaties, both armies ſhould depart; and that ambaſſadours ſhould be ſent to conclude the peace, with reſeruation on the chancellors behalfe to the king and parlament of Poland; which ſince beeing aſſembled, hath made ſome alteration, butt of no great moment; only they will ſend no preſent, butt an ambaſſadour freely to treate, becauſe the Turks ſhall not interprett it a tribute, or compenſation of the charge of warre; thus this buſines hath depended euer ſince with no concluſion, the Poles vſing the ſodaine retraict of this emperour to their advantage, and performing yett litle of what was expected (only the ſurrender of Chotyn) to the great diſcontent of this court; yett lately the king hath written a letter hither, (the copy whereof I haue ſent his Majeſtie) promiſing to diſpatch his great ambaſſadour to ſettle all. Butt the emperour beeing ready to depart the citty, to viſitt the tomb of Mahomett, contrary to the will of his viziersand councellers; we doubt anewe, that the duke of Barasky (who is elect in Poland) will not come, neither to follow him, nor to negociatt with a deputy left here; and ſo all this is like to reſt vpon doubtfull termes, and then the vnquiett diſpoſition either of the Tartars or Coſſacks will eaſily kindle new fires. I haue mediated this peace in his Majeſties name, and, as your Highnes will ſee, by the emperors letter ſent to his Majeſtie, receiued therein an honorable aunſwere, that all differences ſhalbe referred to his Majeſtie by mee his vnworthy miniſter, and that the noble priſoners now here ſhall for his reſpect obteyne liberty, after the peace concluded, for whom I haue ſince procured fairer impriſonment.

I HAVE endeauored to ſettle, by the authority of the Grand Signor, a peace with the beghs of Tunes and Algier, and to that end I haue ſent diuers commands and letters; and though I had rather haue ſeene them buried in their owne aſhes, yet ſeeing no hope of ſo much glory by the failing of others equally intereſſed, I hope his Majeſtie and your Highnes will take it in good part, that I haue attempted at leaſt the quiett of our poore merchaunts, and their ſafety, which I doubt not to effect, to a great benefitt for the commonwealth.

THERE is no army preparing here this yeare, butt that of gallies ordinarily ſent out to the black ſea, to guard the coaſts, conſiſting of 19; and the other now ready to goe to the Leuant, vnder the captaenbaſſa, beeing about 30 more, uery weake, old, rotten, and vnmanned. And I beleeue, if they meete with that of prince Philibert, they will retorne in worſe caſe then the Poliſh army; butt I ſuppoſe they will keepe one out of anothers diſtances. Your Highnes will be pleaſed to knowe, that both the force and diſcipline of this fearfull empire is ſo farr decayed, that if the princes of Chriſtendome would either knowe or beleeue it, it would inuite them to that accord and vnity, the contrary whereof hath bene the only greatnes and cauſe of encreaſe of this monarchy; and in this theame I could be large, butt I hope your Highnes ſhall liue to ſee, and to act part of that, which is aboue all other worldly ambitions; the lyne of the Ottomans beeing almoſt extinct, butt one uncle a madd man, and one brother, and this emperour changing the cuſtome and ſtate of all his aunceſtors, diſguiſing himſelfe like a beggar ſainct, and pryeing into euery houſe, making himſelfe cheape and diſpiſed; and laſtly, obſtinating himſelfe in this voiage, guided by dreames and phantaſticque viſions, diſſoluing the lawes of his prophett, not only he hath loſt the loue, butt all reuerence and feare, which hath ſo long preſerved this great eſtate; and there is nothing expected more then a reuolt, or ſome ſodaine alteration. God of his mercy open the eyes of thoſe who haue power to make vſe of it to his glory. Your Highnes will excuſe my confuſedneſs, and vouchſafe to accept inſteed of abler ſeruice, the feruent deuotions and prayers

Conſt. 28 Aprill 1622.

Of your Highnes moſt humble ſervant.

To the LORDS of the COUNCELL.

Right honorable, and my uery good lords,

MY laſt letters to your honors were occaſioned by the requeſt of the Leuant company to make ſome certificate concerning ſir John Eyre; and beeing vnfitt and vnable to bee an accuſer, I was bold to trouble your lordſhips with ſuch matter as was then in motion in this court, that I might not ſend you empty paper; ſince I haue done ſomewhat, of which it is not only fitt I giue your lordſhips an accompt, butt that I craue your good interpretation, allowance and help therein; but before I preſent myne owne matters, you wilbe pleaſed to accept a briefe of the publique affaires as they now ſtand: The buſines of Poland depends ſtill in the ſame termes vpon expectance of the duke of Barasky, (elect ambaſſador) whoſe long ſtay hath diſquieted this court, and eſpecially the vizier, who procured the ceſſation of armes; yett a letter ſent from the king hath prolonged their hopes; butt the emperour perſiſting ſtiffly in his purpoſe to viſitt Mecha (as penance I thinke for his late ſhamefull retreat) contrary to the councell and inſtance of all his viziers and capteynes, and euen to the hazard of a generall reuolt; it is now feared, that the duke will not proceed to follow him at randome, nor to treat with his deputies left here; and it is true, though many be engaged for them, the Poles are very ſlack in performing and aſſuring the peace, (a litle too glorious of their good ſucceſs) and the nobility not ſo obedient to the king as that he can abſolutely command; which both troubles their agents here, and diſcontents the Turks; and a litle motion either of the Coſſacks or Tartars (ſpoile beeing both their liuelyhoods) will eaſily kindle new fires. I haue done all in my power to draw this treaty to concluſion, and cannott find any backwardneſs in theſe; but haue receiued aſſurance, that if the Poliſh ambaſſadour arriue in tyme (the delay beeing here interpreted for a ſcorne) that all differences ſhalbe accorded, and remitted to his majeſtie; and ſo I doubt not to obteyne whatſoeuer in that I haue in commiſſion, of which I haue rendred large account to his majeſtie.

THE Grand Signor hath ſent this weeke 37 companyes of Janizaries, and 10 of Spahees, to reinforce the borders of Buda and Caniſia, and inſtructions to withdraw Bethleem Gabor from his league with the emperour.

THE flete for the black ſea is departed in haſt, to make guard there againſt the Muſcouite Coſſacks, which are abroad, and haue done ſome ſpoile.

THE armado for the Leuant is ready to goe out, butt with all the diligence of the officers, they cannott exceed 25 gallies from this port, and ſome 8 or 10 expected to meete from Rhodes, and the iſlands of the Arches; a poore, weake and vnmanned flete, rather ſett out to keepe cuſtome, then that they dare attempt any thing of importance.

CONCERNING our owne buſines I haue obteyned all or moſt of my deſires, and haue renewed, refined and augmented our capitulations, I hope to the content and great quiett of our merchaunts. And becauſe both in my former to his majeſtie, and in my laſt to your honors, and in diuers to Mr. ſecretary Caluert, I haue iuſtly and vehemently complayned againſt the encreaſe of the piratts, yett without any hope to ſee them ſuppreſſed by force, thoſe princes who are moſt intereſſed by their neighbourhood and ſcituation, either not reguarding or not performing, and finding by wofull experience, that wee come to daily loſſes, and the courſe of trades once interrupted, they are difficultly repayred; I haue aduentured to doe my endeauour to make a peace, which I haue ſo farr aduanced, and in termes of honor to his majeſtie, that I haue procured capitulations and commands from the Grand Signor's letters, and inſtructions from the vizier, admirall, and all the great officers of this court, as effectuall as I can propound, the copies whereof I haue ſent your lordſhips, that you may judge if without reaſon I haue ſome confidence, that I ſhall make it a perfect worke. The grand vizier and admirall hauing choſen a man of quality to carry theſe in company of an Engliſhman, and giuen him publiquely graue aduiſes in the carriage of the buſines, and haue ſent a gally on purpoſe to tranſport them, which I thinke is a great fauour and teſtimony of ſyncerity; proteſting, that if hereafter the articles agreed on ſhalbee broken, that the Grand Signor will baniſh them all his ports, and that the beghlerbeghs ſhall no more excuſe their robberies vpon the ſoldiours, but that they and the other officers ſhall anſwer it with their dignities and liues; ſo that I muſt beleeue that nothing is more heartily meant here. 1622. Butt your lordſhips very well know, that as thoſe of Tunes and Algier are not in abſolute obedience, ſo I cannott warrant the ſucceſſe, yet they haue ſome dependance and awe, that where they ſee the earneſt intention of this court, they will not be wholly refractory; butt the perfection thereof will reſt partly in the good carriage of the treaty, which I will endeauour, and partly in performance from England; and therefore your honors may be pleaſed to take to conſideration, that I haue grounded this vpon promiſe that wee will trade and reſort to theſe parts in frendſhipp as in tymes paſt, and that his majeſtie will ſettle conſulls there for the gouernment of our nation, which wilbe the aſſurance of the peace; and there are many growne rich, who haue ſeene his majeſties forces, and deſire now to liue in ſecurity; therefore I humbly beſeech your lordſhips, not only to allow of what I haue done, conſidering the neceſſity of our trades, butt to ſend for the merchants of the Turkiſh company, and excite them to adventure, who know the proffit of thoſe places very well; and for the Spaniſh and ſoutherne traders, that they who partake the benefitt may contribute to ſome part of the charge, which I hauing begunne on myne owne head, durſt not putt to the accompt of the Leuant company alone; butt truſting to his majeſtie and your honors, haue yett borne it vpon myne owne adventure, which your lordſhips will not think fitt that I ſhould looſe for my publique ſeruice. Your honors wilbe pleaſed alſo to know, that if I conclude this peace, the articles are to bee ſigned by all the beghlerbeghs, beys, and officers of both the townes, and to be retorned to the Grand Signor as their obligation; the copy whereof I haue ordered, with adviſe of the ſucceſſe, to be diſpeeded by an expreſs from Algier with all expedition; which courſe, I hope, your honors will think of more diſpatch, and more honorable to his majeſtie, (I am ſure of leſs charge) then any treaty from England, with people of ſo baſe condition; and therefore I once again beſeech your lordſhips, to allow and to further this enterprize of myne, which, I hope, will proue a gratefull work to the trafficque of England; and ſo your lordſhips ſhall encourage him that is ready to ſacrifice himſelfe for his cuntry, and your lordſhips ſeruice, Conſt. 29 April, 1622. Your Honors in all due obſeruance.

To My LORD KEEPER.

Right Honorable,

THE generall account I haue giuen formerly, and by this occaſion, to the lords of his majeſties councell, will excuſe mee from needleſs repetitions of the ſame things; neither are they of that valewe or importance in themſelues, butt as they ſerue mee to diſcharge my duty, as that I ſhould importune your lordſhip with them. Butt as I thruſt my ſelfe vpon your honor att my departure, and deſired your fauour and protection in my honeſt wayes, which I would not haue done, butt that I thought your owne honorable inclynation was ready to extend your greatnes and goodnes one way, ſo hauing now occaſion to vſe both, I am bold to trouble your lordſhip with my humble deſire; I doubt not your lordſhip, when you haue fully vnderſtood the neceſſity and miſery of our trades, by the piratts of Tunes and Algier, and that there was no hope, in my underſtanding, to ſuppreſſe them by our owne force, and then a miſerable loſſe or diſſolution would enſue, if nothing were done; but that you will both allow of what I haue attempted, to make a peace for my cuntrymen, and that you wilbe pleaſed to ſecond it from England, by an acceptance, which only wilbe declared by truſt, and conſequently by trade: There can be no objection againſt this, but point of honor; which is eaſily anſwered: firſt, by neceſſity, which rules without exception; ſecondly, the treaty is made with the Grand Signor, and by authority from this court, and not with them as freemen; laſtly, the French haue once done it, and the States of Holland twice, but neither to ſo good effect, nor by ſo faire and probable wayes as I haue now begunne, and hope to perfect it; and both theſe beginne here to follow the example, and would joyne with mee, and build vpon my grounds: ſo that I hope your lordſhip will conceive it a generall good, to the advancement of traffique and to the eaſe of the poore weſterne fiſhermen, and vouchſafe your countenance and help to it. I haue alſo made a bold ſuite to his majeſtie for a work of charity and grace, which will properly and particularly require aſſiſtance from your lordſhip; and I will not take ſo much from you, as to ſollicitt 1622. it, butt to preſent it to your honor, as an occaſion to ſhow your goodnes and happines in. Here are fallen into miſerable captiuity, and daily more runne the ſame danger, diuers poore men his majeſties ſubiects, trading in their honeſt vocations, ſome that haue lyen 10 and 20 yeares in the gallies, who for ſmall ſommes might be redeemed, and ſent home to ſerue God and their cuntry. I haue obſerued in former tymes many collections made by letters of grace graunted from his majeſtie for particular men, which haue bene bought and ſold, butt litle good hath come to thoſe, for whom it was pretended; therefore, if your lordſhip pleaſe to ſtopp that courſe, and to moue his majeſtie to giue letters patents to ſome ſelect men of the Leuant and Spaniſh companies, to make a monethly collection in London, the ſuburbs, and Middleſex, and to receiue the charity of compaſſionat men, as treaſurers for the poore captiues abroad, to be remitted to his majeſties miniſter here reſident, to be imployed for their redemption, at his diſcretion, I doubt not it wilbe eaſily and willingly done, and to good purpoſe; which wilbe a worke acceptable to God, and of honor to your lordſhip; whereby you ſhall ſaue many a wretched ſoule, who in deſperation, and through want, forſake the croſſe of Chriſt, that redeemed them at a greater price; and they will powre out their praiers for your endleſs happineſs. This, I hope, wilbe welcome to a great prelate of our church, and the greateſt officer of our kingdome, wherein your honor may execute both your moſt honorable functions; and I ſhall account it a bleſſing that I haue bene a poore inſtrument therein, which I will imploy moſt faithfully. Your honor will be pleaſed to know, without boaſting, that I haue alway ſhared my fortune with the poore, and giuen the tenth to them; butt I am not able to beare this burthen alone; yett I haue, ſince my departue, by fauour, and by my purſe, ſett free fourteene, and ſent them home, whereof two had turned Turks by force and frailty. And I think, in many yeares, my predeceſſors have not exceeded mee. And there is no other nation butt hath a publique ſtock for that end, and a treaſurer here, for the Italians, Sicilians, French, and Malteſes; which may alſo moue vs to imitate them in charity, that precede them in Gods bleſſings. This I moſt humbly commend to your lordſhips wiſedome and conſideration.

PARTICULAR matter here is none worthy your interruption, vnleſſe you will contemplate many ſignes of the decay and fall of this empire; the preſent Grand Signor following dreams and viſions, and having phantaſticque deſignes, that they ſay here are ominous; and all ſorts of people diſcontent, euen to a proneſſe to reuolt; and the lyne of Ottoman very thinne, butt one maddman and a child left.

THE patriarch of the Greeke church here is a man of more learning and witt then hath poſſeſſed that place in many yeares, and in religion a direct Calviniſt; yett he dares not ſhewe yt: but it were an eaſy worke, vpon any alteration here, to ſettle that church in a right way: the waies of the Almighty are wonderfull and ſecrett; hee doth walke in the path which no foule knoweth, and which the vulturs eye hath not ſeene, which the lyons whelp hath not troden: Therefore I may coniecture as I wiſh, butt cannott iudge. But ſurely the dayes of the judgment of theſe people are not far off, and God will glorify himſelfe. Your lordſhip will excuſe and pardon my vnneceſſary digreſſions, and accept me as one that is

MY humble ſuite to your lordſhip was, at my departure, that you would ſometyme remember my name to his majeſtie, that this baniſhment may not be vnto mee a ciuill death.

The following is an extract from a letter to ſecretary CALVERT, dated April 28. The reſt of the contents being comprized in the preceding letters, are omitted.

------ THE Venetians are fallen into ſome trouble about 3 gallies taken in their gulph, which although by their capitulations they may doe, if men of warre, yett here, where there is no juſtice, they are like to be ouerborne and faced out, that they were merchants. The vizier hath giuen rough and vnſufferable words to the embaſſador reſident, that they muſt take off ſome head (which muſt be his) to make his maſters wary to offend; reviling him for a traytor and a ſpy, with other termes of indignity : and I know no cauſe why I ſhould nott aſſiſt him, if they pretend violence to a publique perſon.

To my Lord CAREW.

My Lord,

I COULD not haue held my hand from writinge to your lordſhipp, but that I deſired to be furniſhed with matter fitt or worthy your trouble; and your lordſhipp ſhall find that this place affords mee as little leiſure, as I beleeue any forreyne imployment doth to otheres; haueinge many publique buſineſſes to ſettle, and findinge the eſtate of our trades almoſt ruined here, ſo that I haue had as much to doe, and as many accounts to giue, as tyme hath rather failed mee then endeauour; and though I haue receiued no letters from England to anſwere, there hath ouertaken mee one from your lordſhipp, dated 1615, that hath ſought me in the land of the Mogol, att Bantam, and, I thinke, att China, and found me here, the ſeales whole, and the ſuperſcription rejoyced mee, as from a hand I ſoe much honour; and it hath called vpon mee to make noe more delayes, but to ſend your lordſhipp ſuch ſtuffe as I haue, beeing well acquainted with your lordſhippes acceptation, and therefore I will make noe apologie, but deſire you to take in good part a breefe, as an earneſt of my affection and ſeruice.

IN my paſſage at ſea I ſaw nothinge that is new to your lordſhipp, nor that I thought ſtrange, but the fire of Ætna vpon Sicily, and Strombolo, a ſmall Iſland; and it is unneceſſary that I make any deſcription of Scilla and Charybdis, or of the braue and famous fare of Meſſina. I was receiued there by the prince Phillibert of Sauoy, now vicario of Sicily, (which is more then viceroy, by addition of power to rule and diſpoſe of all offices, without attendance from Spaine) with very great courtiſy and honor; inſomuch that, beſides his owne noblenes, I begann to ſuſpect that he thought he might make ſome vſe of mee: In the meane time I made ſoe good vſe of his humanity, as I freed all my countrymen that were ſlaues in the gallyes of Spaine, Naples, and Sicily, which were 13, the whole fleete beinge newly arriued from the Arches, where they had done as much as wee at Argier; and this I tooke to be a great and extraordinary fauour; and I haue ſent them all home to ſerve his majeſtie vppon our owne ſhippes. I anchored 3 nightes att Zant; and ſawe Cephalonia, famous in her Vliſſes; Lepanto; Morea; and ſoe paſſed into the Archipelago, by Delphos, Tenedos, Troy, Chios, and all the antient Townes of the merie Greekes, and arriued at Conſtantinople iuſt in two moneths; haueinge ſtayed at Malago, Meſſina, Zant, and Sio, 16 dayes, and in my way ſaw noe enimie, though they wher often but a day too ſoone, or too latte, which is one of the happieſt paſſages that ever ſhippinge made, and, in reſpect of my wife and family, a great bleſſinge of God, which ſhall be a tooken vpon myne hand, and as frontlettes betwene mine eies. Now, my lord, if I ſhould ſpeak of the ſcituation of this place, I could not doe it for admiration : But it is enough, that Polibius, one of the wiſeſt men of his tyme, now many hundreth of yeeres ſince, did propheſy, or foreſee, that it ſhould become the head and miſtris of the worlde, becauſe yt was ſeated to command ſo many waters, and by conſequence ſo many trades; or that the oracle called thoſe men blinde that firſt planted Chalcedon right againſt yt, and ſaw not the difference, when yett that ſeate is allmoſt incomparable. In breefe, there is nothinge in the world of that magnificence and delight; but if wee then conſider the people that poſſeſſe yt, and the vncleanly order and gouerment in yt, it is a ſinke of men and ſluttiſhnes. If your lordſhipp expect that I ſhould compare the greatnes of this empire with that of India, it will aske a large diſcourſe, in particulars to ſhowe their differences : butt I will touch certaine generalities; I was receiued with as much ceremony and pomp as any ever was, and I requiered yt, and with more than at the Mogols court; but here I ſpake to a dumb image, and ther I treated familiarly with an affable and courteous prince : I obſerved a great ſtate in all thinges, eſpecially a dead ſilence in the court, and every man in his order, but no ſplendor or greatnes butt in the aga and gard of janizaries, which were then 4000; butt in the other, I allway ſaw a free and noble jollity, accompanied with infinite riches and greatnes; breefely, the Mogoll is in greatnes of revenue, in brauery of court, in multitude of attendance, in ſtate abroade, in riches, in elephants, 1622. in his ſports, and, which is moſt honorable, in his conuerſation, a man that liues humanely with men, very much to bee preferred ; and ſo I leaue my deſcriptions, to come neare to ſome buſines.

Your lordſhipp will perhappes haue heard with what vehemency I wrott to his majeſtie and the ſtate, both in my paſſage, and att my firſt cominge, againſt the piratts of Tunes and Algeer, and how I propounded nothinge but fire and ſword; and now you will finde, that of myne owne head I haue endeuored to make peace with them, which may ſeeme a great leuity; but you wilbe pleaſed to knowe, that when I ſpake of warr, I rather wiſhed then hoped to ſee them ſuppreſſed ſoe honourably. I deliuered truth, that if ſome order were not taken to ſtop their grouth, who now makes 100 ſayle of ſtout ſhippes, being furniſhed with ordinance for twice the number, lyinge on their wharfes, not only, after great loſſes of priuat men, theſe trades muſt be all deſerted, but our fiſhermen could not looke abroad, and when ther were no booty at ſea, they would viſitt our ſhores and coaſt townes. I intimated alſo, that they would become a fearfull ayde to the Grand Signors deſignes vpon Chriſtendom; and now that he was decayed in gallies, he had at his command a better fleete, which he bredd upon our loſſes. But when I had written all this and more, did I beleeue I could moue an army? No, my lord. But I alſoe conſidered, ſomething was to be done to ſecure our ſelues; I remembred what difficulties to ſett out the laſt fleete, and what they effected; what ſupplyes and performance came from Spaine, whoſe intereſt is greater by vicinity; I ſaw both att Malago and Meſſina, that the prince, generalls and gouernors were verie deſirous to keepe their owne coaſts ſecure att our charge, and were willinge enough to ymploy and weare out our nauy in the Leuant, rather then in the Indies; butt I could not draw from them any aſſurance, that they would aſſiſt really; nor ſaw any probability how they could ſupply the hungry wants of Engliſh bellies: Therefore I reſolued to complaine with that confidence here, which hath wrought an vnlooked for effect, both by capitulations, commands, and letters ſent by an expreſſe gally and meſſenger from the emperor, ſuch and ſoe effectual, as I doubt not (with honor to his majeſtie) to ſettle a peace and trade in thoſe parts. If any object, that wee treat with piratts, I anſwere, I treated only with the Grand Signor; they are his ſubjects, and hee is become pledge for them; beſides, I heard of a motion to ſend from England, which had bene more ſhamefull; and lett them complayne that haue done ſoe much as wee, to ſett out a fleete, which they never aſſiſted, nor ſeconded; and laſtly, their was miſerable neceſſitie to ſuccour our marchants ſome way, when ther was noe hope of the beſt way. Your lordſhipp, in my letters to the lords of the councell, ſhall ſee my grounds and deſires, and how I haue proceeded, with copies of all, which you may be pleaſed to read, for they are verie rare examples; and I hope you will both approue and juſtify mee in a worke, which, though vndertaken without abſolute order, yett it may proue (if God bleſſe yt) of great advantage for the ſecurity and encreaſe of traffique in England.

HOW the buſineſs of Poland hath paſſed, and how it reſts, your lordſhipp will find by theis encloſed; and, as you will ſee, by copy of the Grand Signor's letter, I hoped to haue the honor of the concluſion of that peace; but now I feare the duke of Baraſky (elect for Poland) will not proceed, hearinge that this gyddy kinge is goeinge to Mecha, which haueing mentioned in my generall letter, you will excuſe the repetition, only I haue made a proteſt in their name, to aſſiſt to ſtay him; but as yett nothing can prevaile againſt his fate, which is to deſtroy himſelf, as homo natus ad imperij ruinam. If it be lawfull for mee to prophecy, I durſt ſay, that this mightie empire hath paſſed the noone, and is declyninge apace, if not verie neare yts deſolution, the lyne of the Ottomans beeinge allmoſt extinct, but one vncle, a madd-man, and one boy a brother left; and this kinge a man odious to all ſorts, deſpiſed of the ſoldierie, hated and feared of the viziers, curſed by the churchmen, changinge and diſſoluinge both lawes and cuſtomes, ruled by phantaſtique dreames and viſions, affectinge reuelations, forſakeinge all the ſtate of his anceſtors, and makinge himſelfe cheape and vulgar, by night walkes, and in diſguiſed habitts, hauntinge tauernes and by-places, and ther exerciſeinge the office of a conſtable; the gallies, which were one piller of ſtrength and greatnes, all rotten and decayed, without care of reparation, inſoemuch as this yeere the capten baſſa goeinge accordinge to cuſtome to ſea, cannot make 40, and thoſe verie yll manned, and worſe munitioned; and the janizaries, which was the other, are ſo corrupted, not only in their diſcipline, but in their inſtitution, beinge now the ſonnes of Turkes, and admitted to that fraternity for mony; who were antiently all the children of tribute, and knew no father but the emperour, and eſteemed themſelves his adopted ſonnes, ſo ſtood upon their honor; which was magnum arcanum imperij, that now they neither are ſoldiers bredd, nor yet beare him any reverence or feare; but are all apt to mutiny and diſſolution: I ſhall pray ſoe farr for them: Da pacem, Domine, in diebus noſtris; and then, fiat voluntas tua.

I HAUE troubled your lordſhip with broken ſtuffe; but if you pleaſe to looke upon the kinge's letter, and the copies of all that I haue ſent, your lordſhip ſhall find, that in the whole, I haue don ſome buſineſs; and I know not how yt will bee interpreted, nor how to releaſe my ſelfe from this ciuill baniſhment; for, God knows, I am as weary of the company of infidells, as they would be of hell; and have now no ambition but of chriſtian buriall, and to be eſteemed by my friends an honeſt man, and of your lordſhip, an

THE king of Bohemia and count Mansfeld, marching with their armies towards the marquis of Baden, with a reſolution to hazard nothing till they were ioyned with him, upon the $\frac{16}{26}$ of April, found themſelues, towards the eauening, fallen upon Monſ. Tilly near Wiſſelock, where he had given his troupes their rendeſvous, with purpoſe to fight if he could, having to that purpoſe taken all the aduantages of the ground there, and planted four pieces of ordinance in the ſight of a hill, with which he roued to the king's army, but with ſmall harme. Hereupon the count Mansfeld and the king tooke their quarter that night at Mingleſheim, a fayre village about an houres way diſtant. The next morning, they having, as is aboue ſayd, no intention to fight, endeauoured to haue marched away; and to that purpoſe gaue the arrieregarde of their army vnto the regiment of horſe of Obertraut, and a duke of Weymar; and to Sir Andrew Gray his regiment of foote, and to others, reputed the beſt in the army. Theſe were charged home by the enemy, yet gott of, though in a little diſorder, and paſſed partly through the village, and partly over a ſtraight paſſage by it, there being but one, by reaſon of hedges and other impediments. The count Mansfeld obſeruing this, and the feare which this retreate ſtroke into his army, commanded the village to be preſently ſet on fire, whereby he both retarded his enemyes comming on, and gayned time to put his men in battayle array, and for the king to go about to encourage them, which his majeſtie did cheirfully and brauely. In this time Monſ. Tilly not being able to diſcerne what his enemyes were doing, by reaſon of the ſmoake, behinde which they ſtood, and preſuming, as it ſeems, that they had beene put into route by the retreate of the arrieregarde, advanced his men boldly over the narrow paſſage, the village being impaſſable by reaſon of the fire. The count Mansfeld commanded his men to ſtand ſtill untill two regiments of horſe, two or three of foote, and foure pieces of artillerie, with which Tilly himſelfe was, were marched over. Then he commanded his late reiregarde now made his vantgarde, to charge; which they did ſo well, and the enemyes expected it ſo little from them, that they were broken without reſiſtance, and 2400 of them ſlayne upon the place, diuers taken, among them a page of Tilly beleeved his maſter to haue been one, but he eſcaped. There were ſome who would haue beene purſuing the enemyes in their flight; but the count Mansfeld commanded a retreate to be ſounded, wiſely foreſeeing that if his men ſhould have paſſed ouer that ſame ſtreight, they might haue alſo incurred the ſame danger from the enemyes, who all this while held his mayne battayle firme on his ſide, as the count Mansfeld did his on the other, till the enemy parted them, in ſecurity on both ſides.

From Sir FRANCIS NETHERSOLE.

My Lord,

IN my laſt and firſt from this place, of the 22d of April, I gave your lordſhip a ſummary accompt of the good day the king of Bohemia and the count Mansfeld had then had in a rencontre with monſ. Tilly. I do now, though ſomewhat late, ſend you the particularityes thereof, both becauſe it was a buſines carryed very ſoldier-like, as I heare men of the profeſſion iudge here, and becauſe I am willing to entertayne you as long as I may vpon good newes, which I do not now begin to feare did only wellcome us to theſe partes, and preſently tooke leave, thorough our want of meanes or skill to vſe them well: for while the king of Bohemia and count Mansfeld, inſtead of purſuing their victory, went to joyne with the marquis of Baden, monſ. Tilly retired his forces to Wimphen, where he had his bridge upon the Neckar, and there entrenched them ſo well, that the king and marquis (who followed at leyſure, and en paſſant, repriſed all the ſmall townes had beene taken by monſ. Tilly on that ſide the Neckar) found they could do no more againſt him; for he could not be tempted to venture any more, vntill he ſhould be renforced with the ſecours of twenty-one coronets of horſe, and nine companyes of foote, ſent him from Bauaria; and with the forces of don Gonſaluo de Cordoua; which comming too late to his ayde before, as I thinke I mentioned in my laſt, repaſſed the Neckar at Lademburg; and from thence marched upwards to Wimphen, to joyne with the Bauarians. Upon intelligence thereof, the king and marquis being not well able to ſtay thereabouts together, for want of victualls, or for ſome other priuatt reſpects, ſeparated their armyes agayne, the marquis ſtaying there to entertayne Monſ. Tilly; and the king marching downe to Heydelberg, where he paſſed the Neckar, and after, ſate downe before Lademburg. The importance of that place vnto the enemy, as well in reſpect of the vſefulnes thereof to them, both for the bridge, and the ſtore of corne and wine layd up therein, as alſo of the moleſtation it gave to vs, by hindering the free entercourſe betweene this towne and Heydelberg, beſides others; together with the conſideration of what might be afterwards attempted on other Spaniſh garriſons in Gonſaluos abſence, gave a reaſonable ground for a preſumption, that upon this news he would returne. In which reſpect there was ſo much haſte made of the ſiege, that Lademburg was taken by aſſault the ſecond day, the gouernours and commanders made priſonners, and the common ſoldiers forced to turne caſaque. But, to put water into this wine, we had the ſame day and houre newes, that the marquis of Baden his army, conſiſting of 12000 foote and 2000 horſe, well armed and euery way well appointed, was quite defeated by Don Gonſaluo and Tilly, who, contrary to expectation, ſtayed together. The occaſion of this misfortune was an inuention the marquis pleaſed himſelf in, of encompaſſing his camp with a barricado of wagons made for the purpoſe, inſtead of entrenching it after the good old Roman diſcipline. Vnto which the enemyes obſerving that he truſted, drew out their canon, and with them played ſo hot upon him, that, to deliuer himſelf from the moleſtation, he was fayne to ſend out his cauallery, who behaued themſelves ſo well, that they broke two regiments of the enemyes foote ſett to guarde their canon, and tooke it; but could not go away with it. For the enemy, to preuent that, ſent forth their whole cavallerie alſo, which ſoone, and very eaſily, put the marquis his horſe to forſake the canon and the field too, thorough the marquis his fault, as I heare ſoldiers ſay, that he did not ſecond them with his foote, and rather ſet up his reſte at once bravely, than looſe it poorely at two ſtakes, as he did. For his foote, being now left to ſtand alone, were eaſily forced the next day, by the ſame means, to come out of their wagons and fight, which they did well for new men; but were broken by the enemyes horſe, as muſt be imagined, and put to the rowte. There were not aboue 2000 ſlayne on the place; but the marquis his canon, baggage, and vnlucky wagons were loſt. Of perſons of quality, only Magnus duke of Wirtemberg. The old marquis himſelfe made ſhift to eſcape, and to get to Stutgard to the duke of Wirtemberg, by whoſe interceſſion he ſueth and hopeth to obtayne a peace for himſelfe, hauing, as an inducement thereunto, declared, that he intendeth to liue the reſte of his dayes as a privatt man; for he made his eſtate ouer to his eldeſt ſone upon his taking armes, and to meddle no more with the warres, although one of his colonells, Gulſtein by name, hath gathered together about 6000 foote and 1500 horſe of his men. And ſo we have done with that fire of thornes. 1622.

THE king and count Mansfeld, after a ſerious and hard conſultation what courſe they ſhould take vpon theſe newes, reſolued to paſſe over the Rhyne at Manheim; and after that marched downwardes as farre as Wormes, with deſſein to have attempted to breake the Spanyards bridge at Oppenheim; but were forced to giue ouer that deſſein, by Don Gonſaluo his retreate into the Bergſtraſſe, and Tilly with him, who made haſt, out of hope to haue found the king ſtill on this ſide the Rhyne, and ſo to have made an end of their worke in the field. In this meane time, the archduke Leopold beſieged Hagenaw; and, vpon newes thereof, the king and count Mansfeld, who hath his particular intereſt, as your lordſhip conceyue, reſolued to marche thither to relieue it, which there is ſmall doubt but they will eaſily do, and wee look for the newes euery minute. Gonſaluo and Tilly lay for a while after they knew this in the Bergſtraſſe. Since, wee heare, that Tilly is marched backe towardes Wimphen; but whether with all his troopes, or part of them, we know not yet. Gonſaluo is paſſed ouer the Rhyne at Oppenheim and Gernſheim, and wee are in payne what way they will both take, becauſe wee could direct them dangerous ones for the king of Bohemia; which, I pray God, I may have no occaſion to adde, ere I can cloſe this letter.

WHILE the warre proceedeth thus roundly and early, we are amuſed with expectation of a ſuſpenſion or depoſition of armes, and of a peace to enſue, not only from Bruxells, from whence your lordſhip will heare what is now done or doing, but euen here alſo; for the eccleſiaſticall princes make ſhew to grow weary of the burden of the warre now their purſes are growne light, and ſince they feele it lying upon themſelfes, as they do all either by ſenſe or by apprehenſion. They haue therefore employed the lantgraue of Darmſtat to the duke of Bauaria, to perſuade him to give ouer his priuat ambition after the electorat, for the publique quiet of the empire, retarded chiefly thereby; and the duke pretendeth to be of himſelf diſpoſed thereunto, as he hath ſignified to the duke of Wirtemberg, by the chancelor of Bavaria, ſent to him in an ambaſſage to that ſame purpoſe; and to intreate him for the advancement thereof to procure a ſpeedy truce. The duke of Wirtemberg hath thereupon ſent a gentleman to the king of Bohemia, to ſound his inclination thereunto, and his majeſtie hath returned him with this anſwere; That, although his laſt yeares experience might diſcourage him from harkening to another truce this yeare, yet, to ſhew his willingnes to embrace all ouertures tending towards peace, his majeſtie will be contented to harken to a ſuſpenſion of armes for a moneth, while the iſſue of the treaty at Bruxells may appear: And, to further that alſo all he may, both his majeſtie and the count Mansfeld haue, by me, intreated my lord ambaſſador, Sir R. Weſton, to procure letters of ſafe-conduct from the infanta, for ſuch perſons as, vpon the receipt thereof, they intend preſently to diſpatche thither, to informe his lordſhip particularly, both of the preſent ſtate of their affayres here, and of the conditions they thinke neceſſary to be inſiſted vpon in a depoſition of armes.

DON Gonſaluo lyeth yet ſtyll between Wormes and Oppenheim; Tilly, about Hirſheme, two miles aboue Heydelberg, with what deſſein we know not yet; but it looks as if they intended to yield in earneſt to a truce, or peace; which your lordſhip may conclude to be true, if you heare that Bethleem Gabor comes on agayne, which you will do before we here, or as ſoone.

SIR John Ayres is lately paſſed by vs here for England, by whom I had the firſt certayne knowledge of your lordſhip's being well arrived at Conſtantinople, which I do moſt heartily congratulate.

AND ſo I humbly take leaue.

Your Lordſhip's moſt affectionate and humble Seruant,

Manheim this $\frac{12}{22}$ May, 1622.

FRA. NETHERSALE.

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

ABOUT tenne dayes before the date of this, I diſpatched a gentleman, my kinſman, expreſſe to his majeſty, with letters from the Grand Signor Sultan Oſman; and gaue large aduiſe to your honor, and to the lords, as well of the publique occurrences, as of myne owne ſucceſs in other buſineſs: wherein you ſhall find, whenſoeuer they arrive, that I had ſettled all things giuen me in commiſſion, both from his majeſtie and the company, and obteyned newe and large priuiledges; recouered, by warrant money extorted, though yet vnpaid; procured ſuch commands and letters for Tunes and Algier, ſent expreſly by the emperour, that I might haue boaſted of a proſperous induſtry, as you will ſee by copies already ſent you. And therein your honor will finde, that I propheſied of theſe things that are now come vpon vs, foreſeeing that which I could not preuent.

ON Wedneſday laſt, the 7th preſent, the Sultan, according to his obſtinat purpoſe, ſending over his pauilions, the ſouldiours roſe, both Janizaries and Spahees, and firſt ſtaid the tents, and then brake into the courts of the Seraglio with infinite tumult, demanding of the emperour not to proceed, and to deliuer the great vizier Delauir baſſa, and the hoia the tutor, the caſlariaga, the chiefe eunuch keeper of the women, and the teſterdar the treaſurer, and ſome others, as priuy and conſenting to this voiage, which would (as they pretended) deſtroy the empire. The king promiſed, but delayed, and attempted to conuey them, and ſome treaſure, to Aſiaſide; but they preuented him, and kept guard all that day, only ſacking the houſe of the Hoia. The king in the meane tyme made ſome ſhowe of defending his pallace. The next morning the fury encreaſing, they demanded thoſe officers, or elſe they would carue their owne juſtice; ſo that he for the preſent was forced to hyde himſelf; and then taking oath among themſelves, not to rifle the kings houſe, they entered in, and by menaces found the vizier and caſlariaga hidden, whom they preſently cutt in pieces; and ſo ſeeking the emperour, not able to finde him, nor force any to tell where he had conueyed himſelf, they cryed out, they muſt haue a king; and then demanded for Sultan Muſtafa, uncle to Oſman, by him depoſed, beeing a ſoft-ſpirited man, and (to ſpeake modeſtly) of no great witt; who beeing found in a vault (where the king had putt him ſince the beginning of the rebellion) halfe-ſtarued, they tooke up, and ſett him on the throne, and proclaymed him emperour, taking him out of that ſeraglio, and carryeing him to another. Oſman amazed with theſe newes, firſt practized the woemen, whither he was conueyed, to murther him, and here beganne in the night a newe uprore: The ſouldiours reſcued him, and tooke him to their owne colledge halfe dead. Thus a man deſpiſed, naked, taken from a pitt, at firſt only begging a little water, was in a moment made one of the greateſt monarchs in the world. The depoſed, not yet in deſperation, the ſame night dealt with the aga of the Janizaries, and one Huzein baſſa, vizier in the warrs of Poland, to aſſiſt him, promiſing the ſouldiours great beneuolence. They counſell him, in this extremity, to goe out to the mutined troops to offer his larges, and to ſee if he could move them to any compaſſion; which he did, with them, and fewe others accompanied. When he came ſo vnlooked for, they laid hold on him, as he was pleading his owne cauſe. The aga of the Janizaries, and Huzein Baſſa butt ſeeming to perſwade for him, were inſtantly cutt in pieces. Then the poore Oſman tooke a clothe, and couered his face, expecting death; but they ſet him vpon a horſe, and ſent him inſtantly to the Seaven Towers vnder good guard, and euer ſince have bene ymployed in the ſack of thoſe houſes with whoſe maſters they had any quarrel as yll miniſters, and haue touched nothing elſe. At this inſtant I am aduiſed, that the newe great vizier Daout baſſa, by the command of the newe emperour, hath ſtrangled Oſman, ſent to priſon butt fower howers agoe: The firſt emperour that ever they laid violent hands on; a fatall ſigne, I think, of their declynation.

I cannot diſcourſe at this preſent, hauing butt one hower allowed mee to write by the Venetian baile, and all not yet appeaſed: But I would not his majeſtie ſhould receiue yt from another hand; therefore you wilbe pleaſed to preſent, and to accept res geſtas, in this hurly-burly. I have knowledge of all the ground of this buſineſs, and the practize of the great vizier, now ſlayne, to alter the whole frame of gouernment of this empire; a braue and wiſe plott, if yt had taken effect; which had either made him monarch of the world, or wholly torne and diſſolued it: But God hath his hand and power in theſe things above our reach; and I will ſend your honor the ſtory of this, wherein you ſhall ſee ſtraunge things propoſed, and now confounded. And this is the third day ſince theſe troubles beganne, and I hope wilbe the laſt; though I ſuſpect a warre to enſue, of which I will adviſe your honor in tyme.

Conſtantinople. 10th May, 1622.

To the ſame.

Right Honorable,

THE former is a copy of myne, ſent you the laſt weeke, written in haſte, and while wee were vnquiett, and not free from feare; for the ſubſtance, it is all true, only ſome difference in the manner of no moment, which I muſt then take as I could gett yt from report. Butt I will in few daies trouble you with the whole and large diſcourſe, which I think is one of the rareſt and ſtrangeſt ſtories, both for the deſigne and confuſion thereof, and for the great alterations following, and waies opened to greater, that this age, or many former haue produced. In the meane while, to giue your honor a longing to know more, I will for this tyme touch the proiect, and ſome fewe obſeruations vpon it, and then conclude with myne owne buſineſs. Firſt, your honor muſt knowe, that this laſt emperour, Oſman, was a youth of a great and haughty ſpiritt, very couragious, a moſt mortall hater of the chriſtians, enuious of the glory of his aunceſtors, hauing deſigned great things, and ambitious to aduance his name higher than any of theirs. His firſt enterpriſe was that of Poland, which hee vndertook of his owne head, againſt the liking both of viziers and ſoldiours, who in a monarchy grown, to riches and hight, declyned from her antient diſciplyne by eaſe and wealth, and perhaps, longa dominatione inertes, are euer corrupt and lazy. This action he thought ſo eaſy, as that he had diſpoſed of the diſtribution of his conqueſt, and diuided the live lyon's skynne. Being met vpon the borders with a poore army, in compariſon, he was firſt (as I enformed you) worſted at Chotyn, ſo that he was fayne to leaue yt vntaken. Then, when he would haue forced the trenches of the chancellor, to haue advanced into playn country, he could neuer procure his Janizaries to fight. though engaging his perſon, once or twice, beyond the regarde of his quality; and in concluſion was compelled to riſe ſhamefully, and to treat vpon eaſy conditions; and, to ſaue his honor, was very gladd, by my comming, of that pretence to make a peace (which yet depends) vntill hee had executed his deepe conceiued councells. For this diſgrace, he tooke ſo rooted an indignation againſt the Janizaries, and ſo iuſtly, that he often complayned he was no king that was ſubject to the inſolency of his owne ſlaues, vpon whom he ſpent his treaſures, and yet they would neither fight in warre, nor be content in peace without exacting bounties. Delauir Baſſa vizier, a man of great witt and courage, and called from the eaſtern parts to this action, who came in a braue and ſouldiourly equipage aboue all his captaines, was ſudainly made great vizier, the former beeing in the ſame diſgrace common with the ſoldiours, though not in the fault. This man was neuer bredd here, but had liued in action for many yeares, and ſo had no faction, nor dependance in court, but ſtood vpon himſelfe; and beeing now vnlooked for advanced to this high dignity, he wrought vpon the kings diſcontent, and nouriſhed yt, and in concluſion told him, It was true, he was no emperour, nor could bee, while the Janizaries had the power which they had lately vſurped: That they were corrupted from their antient inſtitution, and were lazy cowards, vnworthy of bread: But if he would follow his advice, he could prouide him a newe ſoldioury about Damaſcus, and from the Coords, of men euer bredd in the frontire warre, and of great courage; and that of them he ſhould erect a newe militia, that ſhould wholy depend of him only, enterteyning 40000 in pay, which ſhould allway be his guard: That euery beglerbegh, in his gouerment, ſhould trayne ſome of the inhabitants, who, in all occaſions of making a great army, ſhould be in readynes; and hereby he ſhould ſpare infinite treaſure, and ſecure his eſtate eaten and in danger by theſe drones, and be able, with men of new ſpiritts, to doe greater matters then any of his aunceſtors. The king, pleaſed with this councell, gaue all to the viziers direction, who was a true 1622. ſoldiour, and a very wiſe man, able, by his creditt in Aſia, to performe this and more; for he was exceedingly beloued in thoſe parts, very rich, and had kept Damaſcus for himſelfe in the laſt rebellion. Upon this concluſion betweene them, he ſent his letters to his frends, and prouided 10000 thereabouts, and 10000 from the Coords, all vpon pretence of invading Perſia; and had cauſed the Emir de Saida to raiſe 20000, which was called a reuolt, but was indeed in ayd of the king's purpoſes, who pretended to goe priuately to Mecha; but his end was to meete thoſe ſoldiours, and to ſtay a yeare at Damaſcus vntill he had regulated his new army, and then to retorne to Conſtantinople, and root out and diſſolue all the chambers of the Janizaries, and caſt the Spahees and Timariotts, and to exauctorate all their captaynes, who eate vp his country. And hauing thus ſettled all things here, he then reſolued, with his new ſoldiours, to attempt the recouery of his honor in Chriſtendome; in the meane tyme to hold all good frendſhipp and correſpondence there in all parts. Certenly this was a braue and well-grounded deſigne, and of great conſequence for the renewing of this decayed empire, if God had not deſtroyed it; for it is very true, the Turkiſh emperour is now but the Janizaries treaſurer. If this proiect had taken place, God knowes what euents it might haue produced by a civill warre; for doubtleſſe the ſoldioury here would haue ſett upp a new king, and maynteyned him as they could, and this European part had bene torne away by the diuiſion; beſides Delauir baſſa hauing the king in his poſſeſſion, and the treaſure and his owne authority ſo greate, and his inclynation velle imperare, once diſcouered, it may well be thought that he would haue ſhared ſome part of this greate eſtate: If, on the other ſide, the king had preuailed, and the vizier proued faithfull, I am perſwaded they would haue made ſuch a reformation, and erected ſuch a newe order for the warre and treaſure, that he would haue troubled all Chriſtendome; but, ubi diſquiſitor ſæculi huius? nonne infatuavit Deus ſapientiam mundi huius? perdam ſapientiam ſapientum, et vanam reddam intelligentiam intelligentium. I know not whether I ought to wiſh that theſe councells had ſucceded or not: Now I am ſure we are here governed by a poore and ſeely man, or rather, here is no gouernment, where ſlaues, that in fewe howres could chaunge the greateſt monarch, are become ſo inſolent, that yett there is no open diuan or councell, vntill they haue receiued a donatiue for guerdon of their iniquity. Your honor will giue mee leaue to make ſhort obſeruations: Firſt, That the treaſury, by the three chaunges in fower years (for euery Janizary in the empire, whether abſent or preſent, hath 25 checquins gold, beſides the Spahees and other orders) and by the late warr, is very much exhauſted, and theſe fellowes all liuing that haue had the milke, and now inured to proſperous mutinies, they haue taken ſuch head as cannot be ſuffered, nor ſafely taken off; and I doe not think that all is quiett, though it appears ſo; but that we ſhall haue new troubles from thoſe prepared in Aſia, who will attempt a reuenge for the death of a king that was their martyr: et hinc ruinæ. Secondly, in the degrees of the vprore itſelfe, That the ſoldiours had no intention at firſt, either to depoſe or hurt their emperour, butt only to ſtay him, and to cutt off the counſellors of his journey, whom the next day, dead and buried, they bitterly lamented, knowing they had raſhly ſett vp one whom they muſt change for diſability. Thirdly at the order, That theſe mutiners, hauing no head nor direction, kept that reglement, that they tooke oath in their fury in the kings yard, not to ſpoile nor ſack the imperiall throne, as their owne diſhonour, and neither committed nor ſuffered any inſolency nor violence in the citty; and, which is ſtrange, I thinke there hath not bene done, in the three days and three nights, 1000 checquins dammage to the neutralls, nor to any butt to thoſe obnoxious for ſome former quarrell: And ſix of them meeting with 100 l. of myne in the ſtreets, in the hands of a poore man, they firſt tooke it away; but he pleading it was myne, they retorned yt; ſo that I may wonder at ſuch orderly diſorder. This plott was diſcouered to the ſoldiours, by words of diſdaine lett fall from the king, by remouing all his treaſure, pulling down the riches of his houſe, melting furniture and ſaddles, and whatſoeuer could be converted into bullion. Thus your honor hath a modell of troubles and my contemplations, which tyme may enlarge. For our owne buſines: They will now doe any thing I ſhall propound for Poland, hauing ſent offers thither, and will ſend into England; but whether it were well done now to aſſiſt to any peace, I know not; yet will follow my inſtructions. Within fower days after this, I procured to be renewed all my commands and letters for Tunes and Algier, in this emperours name, and haue diſpeeded them away, according to my adviſes ſent your honor by my coſen, Robert Roe; ſo that I think I ſhall rather fortify then weaken that deſigne. The letter written to his majeſtie by the laſt emperour ſhalbe confirmed, and wee are iuſt in priſtino ſtatu. I beſeech your honor, read part of this my letter to his majeſtie, and mediate for me, that yt may abſolue mee, vntill I can put it in better forme, being ſcarſe allowed tyme to tranſcribe this, that you may read yt. Et ab his incendiarijs libera nos, Domine.

Conſtantinople,
16 May, 1622.

Your Honors affectionate Seruant.

Relation of the Death of Sultan OSMAN.

THE Grandſignior Sultan Oſman, diſcontented euer ſince his diſgrace in Poland, as ſoone as he came to Conſtantinople, pretended a journey vpon the emir de Saida, who was reported to be in rebellion, hauing taken armes to other ends: But beeing diuerted from this purpoſe by the great inſtance of the viziers, and that it would not ſo well ſerue his ſecrett deſignes, becauſe he muſt then keep an army on foote, he gaue out that he would viſitt Mecha, the tomb of his falſe prophett. To make this voiage the more ſecure in appearance, he ſeemed content to accept of any treaty with the Polacks, euen to conditions both of diſadvantage and diſhonor. For his eſtates in Hungary, he reenforced the frontire with diuers troopes; and though he were much troubled at the league betweene the emperour of Germany and Bethleem Gabor, yett he diſſembled it ſoe as that he would not diſpleaſe the Tranſyluanian, but rather offered newe ſuccors, and forbearance of his tribute. From the incurſions of the Coſſacks, he hoped to aſſure himſelfe by the treaty of the Poles; and in occaſion of breach, he had the Tartars ready to requite them, it beeing both their trades to liue vpon ſpoile and robbery; and for more ſecurity he appointed 20 gallies to keep the Black-ſea. The common people, and viziers, that loued reſt, and knew not the deſigne, were much troubled and diſcontent at this journey, who made many remonſtrances to him of the inconuenience and danger to leaue the ſeat of his empire to the truſt of a deputy, in a tyme when Bethlem Gabor was newly reconciled to the Germayne emperour, and therefore not to be truſted, and the Polacks newly reconciled to him, and therefore to be miſtruſted. Diuers other reaſons were made to him, many petitions delivered from the churchmen, lawyers, and from all eſtates; but melancholy reuenge had wholly poſſeſſed him, ſo that by no meanes he could be perſwaded to deſiſt. The ſoldioury paſſed ſo farre, as to threaten publiquely, and to proteſt they would not follow, but rather ſett upp another king in his abſence, that ſhould ſtay among them: This alſo wrought no other effect, butt encreaſe of deſpight againſt them. In concluſion, carried by his owne fate to deſtruction, the 7th of May (hauing firſt commanded away all his gallies to the Leuant, and thereby diſpoſed away many of his ſoldiours) he beganne to paſſe ouer his tents and pauilions to Aſia-ſide, with great quantities of treaſure. The Janizaries and Spahees (who had alſo ſecrett intelligence vpon the king, his owne words and actions betrayeing ſome further deſſigne then a pilgrimage; for he made preparations to carry away all his jewells and treaſure, euen defaceing his pallace, and taking from churches, and his wardrobes, whatſoeuer could be conuerted to buillion) ſuddenly mett at the Hyppodrome in the city, vpon a word giuen, and from thence ranne to the ſeraglio in tumult, butt without armes; and there, according to their barbarous mutinyes, cryed out for the king (hauing firſt taken order to ſtopp the paſſage of any thing vpon the water) who appearing to them, asked, What this inſolency meant? and what they pretended? They then, by the mouth of a multitude (for they had no head but that of the monſter) demanded firſt, That he ſhould not proceed in his purpoſe to goe to Mecha, nor into Aſia; but that he muſt abide in the citty. Secondly, They would haue deliuered to their fury the great vizier Delauir baſſa, the hoia, or confeſſor of the king, the caſlariaga gouernour of the woemen, the tefterdar or treaſorer, the caddee-leskar, or chiefe juſtice, and ſome others, as enemyes to the ſtate, and conſenting to this voiage, which, they pretended, would be the ruyne of the empire. The firſt, after a litle diſpute, the king granted vnto 1622. them, promiſing to giue ouer his journey; but they, not content, exacted it in writing. To the ſecond he replyed, That it was a diſhonor to him to haue his ſeruants ſo vſed without order of juſtice; but perſwaded them to haue patience to ſtay untill Satterday, the next diuan or publique councill, where they ſhould all appeare, and, if they were found culpable, they ſhould receiue puniſhment: Not meaning to performe any of this, but to gett tyme, and allay the preſent fury. Theſe fellowes, not content with this moderat anſwere, vndertooke to knowe that they were guilty, and therefore that there needed no other wittnes, tryall, nor judge, but themſelves, and with extreame clamor called to haue them deliuered; but the king refuſing to giue them any other ſatisfaction, and they vnprepared for force, retorned into the citty, which was now all in feare, euery houſe and ſhopp ſhut upp, expecting a generall ſack. But they followed the way of their owne hatred, and firſt went to the houſe of the hoia, which they brake and pillaged; but not finding him, they proceeded to the great viziers, who made ſome defence, and, they beeing unarmed, beat them off, and ſo they ſeparated, beeing nowe euening; but kept a guard in ſome parts of the towne. This night the king made an attempt to ſend ouer to Aſia-ſide, but was preuented, and to fortify and defend his ſeraglio, which is walled ſtrongly about, and hath alway in it, of houſhold ſeruants, about 3000: But, it ſeems, no man would arme in his cauſe; for the next morning theſe mutiners aſſembled againe, and taking their armes, went firſt to the mufti or arch-prieſt among them, and forced him and diuers others to accompany them to the court, where they anew demanded theſe men, butt with more inſtance and fury. In the mean tyme, the hoia, caddee-leskar and tefterdar fledd, and were yet neuer heard of. The vizier retired to the king, and perſwaded him earneſtly to goe ouer in perſon in his owne boats (which from his garden he might eaſily doe) to Aſia, and there to take horſe, and he would ſecure him from all perill; but the king would not moue, bidding him ſtay confident and aſſured, that he would puniſh theſe rebells. The wiſe old man, ſeeing this conſtancy or obſtinacy, deſired leaue to ſhifte for himſelfe, which he either tooke, or obteyned, and ſo gott away to the hermitage of a ſainct renowned amongſt them, who (like himſelfe) betrayed him to a captayne of the Janizaries, yet did him the fauour as not to deliuer him to the multitude, but carried him back into the kings houſe. All this tyme it was diſputed in the ſeraglio about the deliuery of theſe officers, the emperour refuſing, the rebells clamouring and threatening, inſomuch as he beganne to feare they would break in, and, in their rage, do worſe then was yett pretended. Whereupon, whether by the kings order, or by his owne conſent, willing to be the peace-offering, the vizier went out to them, and with good aſſuredneſs demanded, what they ſought of him, and wherein he had offended? But they anſwered him with their ſwords, and ſodainly cutt him in pieces. The emperour, ſeeing their fury ſo outragious, had now more cauſe to doubt, and retired himſelfe; then too late, when he had loſt his braue counſellor, would haue fled into Aſia, and could not, but conueyed himſelfe into a priuat place, prepared by his Buſtengi baſſa, or chiefe gardiner. The rebells continue without in their maddneſs, asking for the king, and for more ſacrifices: But the ſeruants proteſting they knew not where he was, they ſaid, They muſt haue a king, and, if he would not appeare, they would make another. And hauing a while attended, they reſolued to enter the pallace (but firſt tooke a generall oath, not to ſack the imperiall throne, which they called their houſe and their honor) and there ſeeking for the king, not able to find him, they extorted by confeſſion, the caſſariaga, and ſlewe him; and then they demanded for Muſtafa, vncle to Oſman, by him formerly depoſed, a man eſteemed rather holy (that is franticque) then wiſe, and indeed fitter for a cell then a ſcepter. The king, the firſt day of this tumult, had putt Muſtafa into a vault with two Negro women, without bread or drink; in which eſtate theſe new electors found him allmoſt naked, and halfe pyned. At firſt ſight, he thought they had bene the meſſengers of his death; butt that feare paſſed ouer, he begged of them a cupp of water, whom they tooke, and inſtantly proclaymed their emperour, which he was as loath to accept, uti pudebat aucti nominis. How vnſtable are the eſtates of the greateſt princes! quem dies videt veniens iacentem, hunc dies videt fugiens regnantem; he that was now in the jawes of death, naked, ſtarued, and dyeing for thirſt, is become the emperour, and may drink gold, or the bloud of men. They, as yet not knowing what was become of Oſman, and loath to truſt Muſtafa in the pallace, carried him in 1622. tryumph to the old ſeraglio, and there left him, departing to the ſack of the viziers houſe, and ſo in the euening to their rendeuous, where they kept both good guard and good order in the citty, from fires and other inſolencies. Sultan Oſman, amazed with this newes, ſo ſoone as they had left the court, came out, and called to counſell in the night Huzein baſſa, late vizier in the Poliſh warr, and the aga of the Janiſaries, both faithfull to him, and demanded their aduiſe; firſt hauing ſent to the ſeraglio, to practize the women there to ſtrangle Muſtafa: Butt ſome taking his part, a newe vprore aroſe in the houſe betweene that ſexe; and the ſoldiours that kept watch, taking the alarum, entered in and reſcued him, and from thence remoued him to the chambers of the Janizaries, where they guarded him for that night in an ill lodging. All this tyme Oſman conſults what courſe to take. Theſe two his frends, and ſome others, tell him, That the caſe was deſperat, and would not be cured but by a deſperat remedy; and therefore they agreed, that the aga ſhould goe and perſwade with the mufti, and that the king in the morning ſhould ſodainly preſent himſelfe to the ſoldiours at their owne dore, and make experience what his preſence, his ſubmiſſion, and his beneuolence promiſed, could worke, to moue them to loyalty or compaſſion; which counſell, early in the morning, they putt in practize. The king, accompanied with the mufti (who neuer conſented to his depoſing, though he fauored the ſoldiours againſt the vizier) with Huzein baſſa, and about twelue horſemen, went directly to the Janizaries colledge, where Muſtafa was kept, and there in teares made them an oration, offering great recompence, repenting of his errors; and finally, inuoked them, by the meritts of his father, and all his aunceſtors, to haue ſome pitty upon their true maſter. The multitude, tam prona in miſericordiam quam immodica ſævitiâ fuerat, now know not what to doe; a ſilent murmur ranne amongſt them, and they were halfe conuerted: But the aga of the Janizaries, thinking to merit of the king, and beginning to plead vnſeaſonably for him, with ſome harſh words of vpbraydure, ut natura maris omni flatu venti turbida, anewe moued their fury; ſo that they cryed out, Treaſon, and fell vpon him and Huzein baſſa, and cutt them into peeces, euery man taking a part of their fleſh to ſatiat their revenge. The mufti would ſpeake, but is withdrawne by ſome for reſpect to his place, and with difficulty is conveyed away. Now the poore Oſman ſees his frends ſlayne, and knowes not which way to conuert himſelfe; but bynding vp his eyes with a napkin, expects death as the laſt of their fury. But they carry him firſt before Muſtafa, and accuſe him as the diſturber of the peace of the empire, and demand ſentence againſt him: more vulgi, ſuum quiſque flagitium alijs objectantes. The forſaken prince pleades for life, and the newe king knowes not how to condemne, but nodds, and agrees to all that is propounded. At laſt they conſult with themſelues, and putt him vpon a horſe (an inſolent Spahee changing turbants with him) and ſent him away priſoner to the Seauen-towers vnder good guard, and then retorned their newe maſter, and placed him in the ſeraglio, and imperiall throne, where he hath need of good broaths and nouriſhment to reſtore his decayed body. The ſoldiours think all is done, and (only ſacking the houſes of Huzein baſſa, and ſome others their conceiued enemyes) they retorne in quiett to their ſeuerall lodgings, and haue no further malice. But the newe vizier, Daout baſſa, made by Muſtafa, knew well, if Oſman liued, that this ſtorme might paſſe ouer, and he would as eaſily, and by the ſame meanes, retorne to his eſtate, as he fell from it; vulgus, ut mos eſt, cuiuſque novi motus cupidum; therefore he conſulted with ſome fewe intereſſed in Muſtafa's preferment, and thereby obnoxious to Oſman, to ſearch how many of the roiall bloud were left aliue, and reſolued, if there remayned twoe, to make an end of Oſman. Twoe of his brothers were found, the one about twelue, the other about ſeauen years of age; and thereupon the vizier went himſelfe to the priſon, with a pack of hangmen, and gaue order to ſtrangle the vnfortunat prince, who now, hauing had no reſt in two nights, and thinking himſelfe ſecure for a ſeaſon, was newly fallen aſleepe; but, awaked by the comming of theſe meſſengers, asked, What newes? ſayeing he did not like their ſodayne intruſion. They at firſt ſtood amazed, and the king made ſhow to defend himſelfe; but a ſtrong knaue ſtroke him on the head with a battleaxe, and the reſt, leaping vpon him, ſtrangled him with much adoe.

THIS is the laſt act of the life of Sultan Oſman. But his intents and great deſignes which drewe vpon him this fatall blowe, I ſuppoſe will not be vnworthy the communication: The practices, reaſons, ſecretts, and councells of all actions beeing the ſoul of hiſtory, and res geſtæ but the bare carcaſs. And I am perſwaded, as many ages haue not produced ſo ſtraunge an example of the incertenty of humane greatnes, ſo in the diſpoſition thereof, and in the waies leading thereunto, there is ſeene euidently, the wonderfull prouidence of God, in confounding the councells of the worldly wiſe, who had laid a foundation of newe greatnes, whereby he aſpired the uniuerſall monarchy; ambitious of the honor of Traian, in whoſe tyme the decayed empire was ſaid, primùm movere lacertos, et ſenectutem imperij quaſi redditâ iuventute revireſcere; and, laſtly, the world may ſee vpon how weake foundations this monarchy was at firſt builded; how it is now ſhaken and corrupted; how their kings are ſubiect to the rage of a fewe ſlaues; how anarchy hath prepared yt an eaſy prey to any able hand that would attempt it. From the inuaſion of Poland all theſe changes tooke their beginning. Sultan Oſman aduanced to the throne in his youth, full of heat and bloud, beeing of a great and haughty ſpiritt, very couragious, ſtrong of body, a mortall hater of chriſtians, enuious of the glory of his anceſtours, and ambitious to raiſe his name aboue any of theirs, had proiected in himſelfe the conqueſt of the remaynes of the bordering Europe: But to ſo great deſignes he had one vice that reſiſted all hope of proſperity, which was extreame auarice, and hee fell into the later tymes, and decrepid age, ubi vires luxu corrumpebantur, contra veterem diſciplinam, et inſtituta maiorum, apud quos, virtute quam pecuniâ, res militaris meliùs ſtetit. His firſt enterprize was that of Poland, moued by the incurſions of the Coſſacks, which yet he undertooke of his owne head, without the councell of any his viziers, who in a monarchy growne to the height by eaſe and wealth, and perhapps longa dominatione inertes, are euer corrupt and lazy, and againſt the likeing of all the ſoldiours, who nowe, contrary to their inſtitution, beeing married, and fathers of a family, entered into trades, receuing nothing, in warr more then in peace, præter pericula et labores, are not eaſily drawne from their owne chymneyes. This action he thought ſo eaſy, as he had diſpoſed of this conqueſt, and diuided the liue lyons skynne. But beeing mett vpon the borders with a poore army in compariſon, he was firſt arreſted at Chotyn, a litle fortreſſe, which he was fayne to leaue behind him untaken; and then ſeeking to aduance into the playne cuntry, by forceing the trenches of the chancellor of Poland oppoſed againſt him, he could neuer procure his Janizaries to fight, though engageing his perſon once or twice beyond the reguard of his quality, and his owne troopes ready to mutyne againſt him, or forſake him, he was enforced at laſt to raiſe ſhamefully his camp, and to accept of any treaty to ſaue his outward honor. In this attempt he loſt aboue 100000 horſes for want of fodder, and 80000 men for want of fighting; for they would rather dye running, or pyllaging, or eating, then in the face of the enemy. For this diſgrace, he tooke ſo inward and rooted indignation againſt the Janizaries, and ſo iuſtly, that he often lamented himſelfe, and complayned, he was no king that was ſo ſubiect to the inſolency of his owne ſlaues, vpon whom he ſpent great treaſures; and yet they would neither fight in warre, nor obey in peace, without exacting new bountyes and priuiledges. Delauir baſſa, a man of a great wit and courage, lately called from the eaſtern parts, where he had long gouerned with honor, to this action, who came in, though late, yett in a very braue and warrlike equipage aboue all other his capteynes, was ſodainly made great vizier, the former, Huzein baſſa, being in the ſame diſgrace common with the ſoldiour, though not in the ſame fault. This man was neuer bredd

1622. at court, but had liued many yeares in action, and ſo had neither faction nor dependance here, butt ſtood upon himſelfe and his owne meritt. And beeing now, vnlooked for, advanced to this high dignity, he wrought vpon the kings diſcontent, and nouriſhed it, and in concluſion brake with him: That it was true, he was no emperour, nor could be ſafely aliue, while the Janizaries had that power which they lately vſurped: Informing him, that they were corrupted from their antient inſtitution, and were lazy cowards, giuen ouer to eaſe and luſt; et animo per libidines corrupto, nihil honeſtum inerat. But if his majeſtie would pull vp his ſpirits, and follow his aduiſe, he would prouide him a newe ſoldioury, about Damaſcus, and from the Coords, of men euer bredd in the frontire hardnes and warre, of great courage and experience; and that of them he ſhould erect a new militia, that ſhould wholly depend of him, enterteyning only 40000 in pay, which ſhould allway be his guard; and that in the diſtribution of euery prouince, he ſhould conſtitute, that the Beghlerbegh in his gouerment ſhould trayne ſome of the inhabitants, who in all occaſions ſhould be in readineſs; and hereby he ſhould ſpare infinite treaſures ſpent vpon theſe drones, that eat vp his eſtate, and with men of newe ſpiritts and hopes he ſhould be enabled to doe greater matters then any of his aunceſtors: But, with all, he deſired the king to communicate this counſell to no man, nor to truſt his life vpon anothers ſecrecy. Delauir baſſa neuer reuealing himſelf to any butt to the king, who extreamely pleaſed with this aduiſe that flattered his owne humour, conſented, and remitted all to the viziers direction, who was a true ſoldiour, and a very wiſe man, able by his creditt in Aſia to perform all he had vndertaken, for he was exceedingly beloued in thoſe parts, very rich, and had kept Damaſcus, whereof he was gouernour, for himſelfe in the laſt rebellion. Vpon this concluſion betweene them, it was firſt agreed, that the king ſhould pretend to goe in perſon againſt the emir de Zaida, who was moued to take armes really, to aſſiſt in the deſigne. But they vſed it to couler the departure of the emperour, which when it was well weighed, it was found, that then the army of Janizaries muſt be kept together, which could not agree with their ends. Hereupon the journey of Mecha was diuulged, that the king might, vnder the ſhadow of an holy pilgrimage, goe out with ſmall trayne, and diſperſe thoſe who were ſuſpected to him; and for this preparation was made, but ſomwhat too groſsly, by melting of all the plate, ſaddles, furniture of houſe, lamps of churches, and whatſoeuer elſe could be more eaſily conueighed away in mettle, with all the jewells and treaſury. This gaue the firſt ſuſpicion, which was confirmed by diuers vnaduiſed words lett fall by the king, of diſdayne againſt the cowardiſe of the Janizaries, and that he would ſhortly find himſelfe ſoldiours that ſhould whipp them; and laſtly, diſmiſſing all his houſhold, except ſome fewe elect, the diſcontented obſerued and betrayed him. Delauir baſſa kept his owne ſecrett, and in the meane tyme prepared by his frends in Aſia 10000 about Damaſcus, tenne thouſand from the Coords, beſides thoſe in readineſs of the emir de Zaida, and all vpon pretence of defending the borders of Perſia, as hauing intelligence of ſome chaunge in thoſe parts; and gaue order, that all theſe ſhould meet the kinge at Damaſcus, where he would preſently cutt off his guard, and ſtay there vntill he had regulated his new army and diſciplyne, and then to retorne tryumphant to Conſtantinople, and vtterly root out the order of Janizaries, Spahees, and Timariotts, and to exauctorat all their capteynes and officers, to ſettle a new gouerment, and to chaunge the name of the citty. And all theſe things ſucceeding, he then reſolued, with his new ſoldiours, to attempt the recouery of his honor in Chriſtendome; in the meane tyme, to hold a diſſembled frendſhipp there in all parts. Certenly this was a braue and well-grounded deſſigne, and of great conſequence for the renewing of this decayed empire, languiſhing vnder the inſolencies of lazy ſlaues, if God had not deſtroyed it; it beeing very true, that the Turkiſh emperour ſtands at the deuotion of his owne troopes for peace or warr, life or death; and is, in effect, nothing but the ſteward or treaſurer of his Janizaries. If this proiect had taken effect, what euents it might haue produced by a ciuill warr, is not eaſy to iudge; for doubtleſs the ſoldioury here would haue ſett vp another king, and maynteyned him as well as they could, and this European part had bene in danger to haue bene torne away by the diuiſion. Beſides, Delauir baſſa hauing the king and the treaſury in his poſſeſſion, and his owne creditt ſo great, and his inclynation, velle imperare, once diſcouered, it may well be thought that he had ſome ends of 1622. his owne to ſhare a part of this mighty eſtate. If, on the other ſide, the vizier had proued true and faithfull, the reformation and new erection of the diſciplyne of warre, and the encreaſe of treaſure conſequent to the diſmiſſion of the old militia, would haue bene fearfull to all Chriſtendome; but, Ubi eſt ſapiens? ubi diſquiſitor ſæculi huius? Perdam ſapientiam ſapientum, et vanam reddam intelligentiam intelligentium. It is a great queſtion whether were the wiſer wiſh, that theſe counſells had ſucceeded, or not; for either diuiſion and ſubuerſion, or a new proſperity and enlargement of their dominion, had neceſſarily followed. Some obſervations vpon this occaſion will not be very impertinent to thoſe that deſire to know as well the diſpoſition and vſe, as the things themſelues. Firſt, in the purpoſe of the ſouldiour, not at all to violate nor hurt the king, much leſſe to depoſe and murther him; but only to take away thoſe about him whom they thought aſſiſtants in this project. Yet the fury once on foot, they proceeded by inſenſible ſtepps, to the uttmoſt of outrage, againſt many innocents in that buſineſs, though otherwiſe obnoxious, and againſt the throne and life of their owne emperour; ubi furor ingruat, innocentes ac noxios iuxta cadere. Secondly, in the degrees, that euen yett the king had not fallen thus lowe, if firſt he had not loſt that awe and reuerence which alway attendeth vpon majeſtie, by vnſeemely offices done by him in the ſtreetes and tauernes, apprehending many ſouldiours for petty faults like a conſtable, making his perſon common, cheape, and deſpiſed among them, which was wont only to be ſeene and feared, as ſomwhat ſupra humanitatem. And this he did alſo in hatred and diſdayne of thoſe that had in the warr forſaken him. And laſtly, now in his laſt act, if his owne obſtinacy had not plunged him into deſtruction, but that he had ſoftened them by ſeaſonable yeelding to tyme, he had preuailed only by tyme. Thirdly, in the order, that theſe mutineers hauing no head nor direction, kept that reglement, that they tooke oath in their fury, in hot blood, in the kings yard, not to diſhonor, ſpoile, nor ſack the imperiall throne; neither committed nor ſuffered any inſolence nor violence in the citty to the neutralls, butt rather proclaymed peace and juſtice. Fourthly, in the conſequence, that at the third dayes end all was as quiett, and all men in their trade, as if no ſuch thing had happened; only the Janizaries ſuffered no diuan nor councill, vntill they had receiued a donatiue, as guerdon of their iniquity. In which alſo the infinite waſt of treaſure is worthy conſideration, which muſt of neceſſity bee exceedingly exhauſted by 3 changes in 4 yeares, and by the late warrs in Perſia and Poland. For euery Janizary in the empire, abſent or preſent, whoſe roll is about 40000, receiue 25 chequins gold, beſides Spahees, Jamoglans, and all other orders, at euery alteration, which amounts in all neare to two millions. And now theſe fellowes all liuing, that haue taſted the ſweet of proſperous mutinies, haud ignari ſumma ſcelera incipi cum periculo, peragi cum præmio, they haue taken ſuch a head as cannot ſafely be ſuffered on, nor ſecurely be taken off. Fiftly, of certeyne præſages that foreranne; it being related to mee from the mouth of a caddee inward with the king, a moneth before the tumult, that Oſman dreamd in the night that he thought to ryde a cammell; and beeing mounted, he could not force him to goe by ſtrypes or fayre meanes; and then, he deſcending in a rage, the body of the beaſt vaniſhed, and left his head in the kings hand; who next day, troubled at this fancy, ſent to a learned man familiar with him, for the interpretation; he excuſed himſelfe, as vnfit to giue opinion in a matter of that conſequence: But perſwaded Oſman to ſend to the mufti; he alſo craued pardon, butt withall ſaid, there was none ſo fitt to interprett it as Muſtafa, the kings vncle, and now emperour, who is eſteemed an holy man, that hath viſions, and angelick ſpeculations, in playne termes betweene a madd man and a foole. The king repaires to Muſtafa, who briefly tells him, the camell ſignifies his empire; his ryding, abuſe in gouerment; his deſcention, his depoſition; the vaniſhing of the body, the reuolt of his ſubjects; the head remayning in his hand, only a bare title; and that he ſhould ſurely dye within fewe moneths, and looſe his kingdome, and the empty name of emperour accompany him to his graue. A ſecond of leſſe conſequence, in the vizier Delauir baſſa, from whom I hauing receiued particular frendſhip about 6 dayes before this vprore, I went to viſitt; and hauing no other buſines butt to perſwade him to ſtay the king from this intended pilgrimage, I gaue him many reaſons in the preſent eſtate of their owne affaires, eſpecially the treaty with Poland. To which he replyed very grauely; then vrging the feare of ſome tumult collected from the licentious ſpeeches rumour'd in the towne, I was bold to deale playnly, ſyncerely, and frendly with him, that if any ſuch thing ſhould happen, the fault would only be imputed to him, as beeing of authority to perſwade the king, whom his quality and youth would excuſe; but all the fury would be diſcharged vpon the greateſt miniſter, deſiring him to conſider the euent, att leaſt to take my affection in the beſt part. The old renard ſtayed a while from reply; at laſt, ſmiling to himſelfe at mee, who perſwaded him againſt that which was his owne counſell, he gaue mee a final anſwere; That there was no remedy, he durſt not hazard himſelfe to oppoſe the kings reſolution; but aſſured mee, he would ſo order the matter as this journey ſhould not proceed ſo farr as was expected. I concluded for myſelfe, deſiring then, that he would leaue mee a particular recommendation to the chimacham, or deputy, as his frend. To which he ſodainly replyed, trouble not your ſelfe, nor feare; I will neuer remoue ſo farre, but that I will leaue one of my leggs in this citty to ſerue you. Which the poore man fullfilled; for beeing murthered in fewe dayes after, one of his leggs, whole and entire, was hanged in the Hippodrome, the moſt publique place of the citty. Laſtly, in things yet to come, and probably to be ſuſpected: That the ſoldiours in Aſia, who haue nowe loſt their hopes, will not ſitt downe with this affront, but rather will attempt ſome reuenge for the death of that king which was their martyr: Or that ſome great baſſaes farr remoued from court will apprehend this occaſion, not to obey an vſurper ſett vpp by treaſon, and vpon that coulor ground their owne ambition: Or that all euery where will fall into combuſtion, and inteſtine warre; for I dare not hope that God will open the eyes of chriſtian princes to ſee the littleneſs of their owne vnciuill quarrells, while this mighty monarchy inuiteth them to concord, and to deuide yt as a proſtituted prey.

ON Satterday euening, the firſt of June following, the capiaga or maior domo of the ſeraglio, hauing receiued a ſecret order to remoue the brethren of Oſman from their lodgings, and in the night to ſtrangle them; as he was performing his command, ayded with a fewe of the carnifices to carry away the princes, they cryed out; the pages running to the noiſe, and encouraged by the caſlariaga, who had ſome ſuſpition, without further examination kill the capiaga; now almoſt euery order hauing riſen againſt their owne head, that night they ſent ſecretly to the Janizaries and Spahees to enform them what they had done, and in the morning early hanged his body in the Hippodrome for a publique ſpectacle. The ſoldiours retorned in fury to court in fauor of the pages, and demanded juſtice againſt thoſe that had conſented to this wicked order, which had made an end of all the Ottoman race, only this Muſtafa left aliue, who is ſo holy a ſainct, that he will not people the world with ſinners, nor endure any woemen about him. The innocent king proteſts he knowes nothing of this purpoſe, and if his command were procured, it was gotten by ſubreption; and he is eaſily beleeued. But his mother, another Liuia, and the new vizier Daout baſſa, who had her daughter to wife, were vehemently ſuſpected. It was a day of diuan or councill, but theſe ſoldiours would ſuffer none, vntill they had an accompt of this treaſon. The vizier denyes all, the mother is a wooman, and hidden in the houſe, yet it is very likely that both were guilty, to vphold and ſecure their owne authority, yt beeing rumored, that the vizier determined to place ſubditiouſly, in the roome of the elder prince, his owne ſonne, and very like him, and ſo to gouerne Muſtafa for a tyme, and by his remoue to eſtabliſh himſelfe and his race for euer. But now, ſomwhat muſt be done to appeaſe the people; therefore Daout baſſa is degraded from his office, and one Huzein baſſa, newly arriued from the gouerment of Cairo, aduanced to his place, with promiſe of further examination; ſince, the fury once ouer, there hath bene no great ſearch nor diſcouery made; I think the ſultana's chequins haue quieted the matter. This new vizier, a man here without frends, yet very rich, of a ſtubborne and obſtinat nature, reported juſt in his waies, but peremptory and inflexible, audax, ferox, et prout animum intendit, pravus aut induſtrius, eâdem vi, one from whom all men may expect much good or much ill, beginns his gouerment roughly, undertakes to puniſh inſolencies early, and profeſſeth a reformation, or to be a ſacrifice: A man fitt for theſe times, that are deſperate; for the worſt wilbe, that he muſt at laſt endure their fury. In the meane while, he procures a litle awe, and hath reſtored the face of juſtice; yet, I am perſwaded, yt cannot laſt long: The ghoſt of Oſman will not be at reſt, vntill 1622. there are ſome parentalia made vnto him. The nature of this vizier is inſupportable: But if he preuaile, and once ſettle himſelfe, he will anew change the king, and lay an obligation vpon the brethren of Oſman; for he will neuer think himſelfe ſecure vnder a man gouerned by an inſolent woman, dominandi avida, and what aſſurance can he haue in that prince, cui non judicium, non odium eſt, niſi indita et iuſſa? And though I cannot foreſee the particulars, and where the diſeaſe will breake out, yet I am ſure the whole body is ſick: And the princes of Chriſtendome ſhall haue breath three yeares, before they ſhall haue any cauſe to feare this ſtate, whoſe preſent king is mentis inops; and the next in expectation, a child vnfitt for action; and all the great men and ſoldiours decayed, mutined, and corrupted.

From the Lords of COUNCEL.

AFTER our very hartie commendacions to your lordſhip: It is not vnknown vnto you what exceedinge loſſe and preiudice this kingdome hath ſuſtayned by the Turkiſh pyratts of Argier, and what robberies and ſpoiles haue ben committed by them vpon his majeſties ſubiects; all which you haue well expreſſed in a letter of yours which hath ben ſhewed to vs. And foraſmuch as thoſe iniuries and depredacions are nowe growen to that height and exceſſe as cannot be ſuffered without an utter diſſolution of trade and commerce, there being aboue a thouſand of his majeſties ſubiects nowe captiues at Argier, Tunis, and Tituana; and all the weſterne ports of this kingdome ſoe diſcouraged, that they are euen at a ſtand, and readie to giue over all further commerce to thoſe parts: His majeſtie, as hee cannot but in honor and juſtice reſent theis fowle and barbarous iniuries, ſo he hath commanded vs to require your lordſhipp, in his name, to make a liuely repreſentation of the ſame to the Grand Seignor, and the ſtate there; and to remonſtrate vnto them the diſadvantage which falleth dayly vpon his people, by the coreſpondence he hath with that port. For whereas, in conſideration of the capitulation of treaty concerninge free trade and commerce, his majeſtie doth at a very great charge keepe you, his ambaſſador, at that place, for the maintenance thereof, as farr as may bee expected from a juſt prince; yet neuertheleſs, his merchaunts are dayly robbed and ſpoiled by the Grand Seignors ſubjects, to the vtter breach of the ſaid capitulations. And therefore you ſhall require, that all the captiues, beeing ſubjects to his majeſtie, bee foorthwith ſett at libertie, with free lycence to retorne home into their countrey; and that there bee ſpeciall and ſpeedie order taken, and particularly with thoſe of Argier and Tunis, for the ſtay of anie further ſpoile and depredation vpon his majeſties ſubjects, by anie colour or pretence whatſoever. Otherwiſe his majeſtie is reſolved (which you are to ſignifie to the ſtate there) to recall yourſelfe, and the reſt of his ſubiects, out of the dominions of the Grand Seignor; and to ſeeke ſatisfaction from the ſubiects of that ſtate, as well in the Leuant as the Redd Sea. Hereof we pray you to haue that care as is meete; and to certifie vs of your proceedings herein, and what aunſwere you ſhall receave, with all poſſible expedition. And ſoe wee byd your lordſhip verie hartely farewell.

At Conſtantinople.

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

I Trouble your honor herewith, with coppies of three letters ſent you, becauſe in theſe times the paſſadges are dangerous, and our way of conueyance ever ſuſpected; it beinge a poore wiſdome of the Venetians to ſtay all letters in every alteration, that they may honor their owne miniſters with the firſt relations in all parts: ſo that you ſhall find, I haue beene carefull enough, howſoeuer they haue ſpeeded.

I HAUE alſo ſent agayne to his majeſtie the coppy of ſultan Oſman's letter, if the originall ſhould miſcary, as well to diſchardge my ſelfe, as that the new vizier hath promiſed confirmation in all poynts, and it is now a letter from the ſtate, or from both kinges: they, accordinge to cuſtome, haue motioned to ſend a chiaus, with letters to his majeſtie, the French kinge, and to the ſtates of Holland, to aduiſe of the aduancement of ſultan Muſtapha; but I haue deſired the letters to be deliuered to mee, to ſaue the chardge of rewardinge an vngrateful cannalle, who, at their returnes, neuer doe good offices.

AS things now ſtand here in ſo doubtfull tearmes, I thincke it were not amiſſe that his majeſtie did alſo write a letter to congratulate, another to the vizir, without any name, that I might make vſe of them now, or in new alterations, which muſt of neceſſitye follow: for wee are rather in a little calme, then at reſt. I hope God will preſerue vs, becauſe wee hope only in him: but theſe letters by mee might doe mee great pleaſure in occation; or, if all thinges ſettle, may ſerue to ſett a foote a new buiſſines, for the good of the marchants. I haue renewed all thinges againe in the name of this emperor; and ſent away to Tunes and Algier, with as much hope as the power of this court can give mee: I will mention yt noe more, not doubtinge but it wilbee acceptable to his majeſtie.

I HAUE ſent Mr. Brantwayt the tragedy at lardge of ſultan Oſman; which, if it be worth the readinge, your honor may command: I thincke it as ſtrange a ſtory as many ages hath produced; and yet I purpoſe to enlardge vpon it, as a ſubiect full of great varietye: I could not ſend ſeuerall coppies, for ſwellinge of my packett; but I haue giuen order to him, to diſtribute yt to many of the lords, and ſome other priuat friends; which, I beſeech you, accept. I had almoſt forgotten my ſelfe: I had a poore pention from his majeſtie, in the court of wards, the beſt of my liuelyhood: his majeſtie neuer gaue mee any thinge, amoung all his bountyes: I came by this by marriage; my wife, in recompence of joyncture, by the fauor of my lord of Saliſburye: ſince my departure, it is ſtopped, or refuſed to bee payd. I haue ſerued his majeſtie long abroad, and att home; it is now hard, in my abſeynce, to take away my bread: I know not to whom to complayne; but, I beſeech you, only lett his majeſtie know my lamentation, and then doe els for mee what you thincke good: I am perſwaded, his majeſtie rather thinckes mee worthy of ſome reward, then to take from mee that which I thincke is mine: I am ſure, I come to yt, bona fide, and neuer defrauded his majeſtie in any thinge: I have ſpent, ſince my departure out of England, only to doe his majeſtie honor, and vpon his poore ſubiects, for which I ſhall neuer haue recompence from thoſe that pay mee, aboue 500 l. which I might have ſaued; and if this my little ſtaff of foode be taken from mee, if my toonge would be ſilent, my belly would crie out. Perhapes ſome of his majeſties good husbands thincke I haue great gaine by this employment: I proteſt before God, I doe not ſee how I can returne the richer by it by 100 crownes, if other yeeres prooue like this: at aduenture, I will come to a true account with them, for 1000 l. for three yeares ſervice here, in perills and continuall troubles; and, I doubt not, whoſoeuer grudgeth me this, geets more while they are ſleepinge. I haue no particular ſuſpition who is my enemy; but I would faine find out, who would bee my friend. Your honor pardon me this paſſion, and comfort mee by a few lines. I ſhall ever loue and honor you, as one that I relye vpon, becauſe you gaue me aſſurance to doe ſoe, as

To my Lord ADMIRAL.

My Lord,

MY laſt letters importuned your lordſhipp to preſent to his majeſtie a letter from the grand ſignior ſultan Oſman, who is ſince ſtrangled by his own ſlaves; not with ſtandinge, I haue preſumed to ſend a coppy therof, as well to diſchardge my duty, as that ſince, the preſent emperor, by this new vizier, hath promiſed confirmation of all thinges therin contained; ſo that is now, in effect, a letter from both: they are anew in ſpeech to ſend a chiaus to his majeſtie, inro France and Holland, to bringe the newes of the eſtabliſhment of ſultan Muſtapha, and to deſire renewance and continuance of the leagues: but I haue thought fitt to perſwade them, to deliuer only their letters unto vs, miniſters here; to ſpare the charge of entreteininge raſcalls, that ever, vpon their retornes hither, doe rather ill then good offices: ſo that I thincke the emperor will ſhortly write, if his people giue him leaue to liue ſo long; for here is noe goverment, no juſtice; but the ſoulderers are kings, judges, and executioners. Your lordſhipp may thincke I haue a hard employment amonge thoſe infidells, that haue broken their alleadgeance, and that wee can hope of little ſafety upon the publique faith, if any toy take in the heades of the multitude; but this is my portion: Fiat voluntas tua. I have herewith ſent you the tragedy of the late emperor, in which yout lordſhipp ſhall find variety of matter, and haue cauſe to contemplate the greatnes and providence of Almightie God, that confounds the deuices of the worldly wiſe:

Involvit humile pariter, et celſum caput;
Æquatque ſummis infima.

If your lordſhipp will doe me the fauour to make offer thereof to his maieſtie, that it be not imputed negligence in mee, that I adviſe not of ſo great changes, (I haue forborne to write a purpoſe, becauſe I would not fill my letter with ſoe ſad a matter) I ſhall both wayes, by your lordſhipp's mediation, be excuſed; your lordſhipp may retrench and cut of what you pleaſe. By my laſt, ſent by my kinſman, I ſent your lordſhipp a modell of what I had mentioned in cyphar, and ſollicited your anſwere. I would be loath to diſapoynt his majeſtie in his purpoſe of that already in his power; and ſince theſe troubles, no man dares declare himſelfe: I doubt not but I ſhall come againe to it, and muſt be ready for the firſt offer. Your lordſhipp may doe verie well, to lett the firſt match proceed, and to make vſe of this your ſelfe, to bringe foorth in tyme; you ſhall profit in yt 20000 l. I deſire your lordſhipps anſwere, in the ſame cyphar; and, if you reſolue, that it alſo bringe your order upon ſome merchants; and I beſeech you, not forgett the promiſe you made mee the laſt hower, that though this were out of the way, yett it ſhould not bee quite backward. I am aſhamed of any inconſtancy; and therfore will not mooue that too ſoone, which may be miſenterpreted: but I will ſpeake by time, that your lordſhipp may know, I am allway ready and deſirous to ſerue your lordſhipp at home, as one of thoſe honor you.

To my Lord of DONCASTER.

My Lord,

I HAD rather your lordſhipp ſhould ſay, you had receiued from mee a fruictleſs and empty letter, then that my ſilence ſhould giue you cauſe to thincke that I haue forgotten both your fauors, and your vertues, which equally bind mee to loue you. If you expect not to gather grapes from thornes, you will not looke for much from this place, where barbariſme is philoſophy, and mutinye juſtice. I need not praiſe the ſeate of this cytty; for the oracle, before it was founded, called the next colony blind, for refuſinge it; and Polybius did foreſee, that it muſt be miſtris of the world, becauſe it commanded ſo many waters; and ther is nothinge to bee ſeene of ſo much ſtate and comodytie, but the inhabitants make it a ſincke of filthines. I cannot prayſe the gouerment; becauſe your lordſhipp ſhall ſee, that all is confuſion, by the ſtorye now ſent you; which, becauſe I dare not make my packett ſwell, by many coppies, I will entreat you to accept from Mr. Brantwayt, whom I haue ordered to wayt vpon you. Your lordſhipp ſhall find that this mighty monarchy hath no other walls to defend it, but the vnciuill diſſentions of chriſtian princes: It neuer had but two pillars of any ſtrength, the Janizaries and the gallies: Theſe are rotten and decayed, and what are left, vnfitt for ſeruice, and the few fitt, without munition, and men to ſerue in them: The other are corrupted from their antient diſcipline and inſtitution, and haue ſhaken off that reuerence to their emperors, (whom they eſteemed as a common father to them, not knowing their owne) which was magnum arcanum imperij, and now they are neither ſouldiers, nor ſubiects; who cannot bee ſafely ſuffered, nor eaſily reſtrayned. I could in this ſubiect be both hardye and paſſionate, to let the world ſee, how it is deceiued in this monſter, which is more monſter now, beinge gouerned by the baſer multitude; but, cui bono? Who is there that will make vſe of it? God will then rayſe vp a cankar of diuiſion in their owne bowells, becauſe ſinfull men are unworthy to aſſiſt in ſo glorious a woork. Veniat regnum, fiat voluntas tua: I could bee content to bee part of the fewell, to make the fire that ſhould conſume them; but ſeeinge I may burne alone, I ſometyme wiſhe I were attending your lordſhipp at Eſſex-houſe, that I might ſleepe ſecurely; for though they haue offered vs no injurie, yet, when madnes and fury rageth, who is ſafe? For the reſt, I will referr your lordſhipp to your owne meditations vpon the tragedy of Oſman: your owne judgment will beſt informe you; and you will find there, like one that is skillfull in pictures, ſome curioſity which I cannot tell you; and this only ſhall ſerue to bringe me to your lordſhipps remembrance, leaſt this honeſt baniſhment make you forgett you haue ſuch an humble ſeruant.

EAUEN now, at the finiſhing of this letter, the Janyſaries are in new combuſtion, and will haue more heads to ſatisfie their reuenge: Ab inſano populo libera nos, Domine.

Conſt. 1 June, 1622.

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

I HAUE enioyed a great deale of comfort by your firſt letter, of the date of Aprill, mentioning the arriuall of fower of myne. Since which I haue ſent you ſixe, with ſeueral tranſcripts, and of diuers matters and chaunges in this port, not doubting butt ſome copies of all haue come to your hands; and therefore I will omitt mention of things paſt, and addreſſe this to a direct anſwere of your honors receiued. I humbly thank you, and my lady, for the affectionate ſenſe you haue expreſſed of our ſafe arriuall, which I hope my tyme here, and retorne home ſhall make euident, that you haue not caſt away ſo pretious ſeed in too barren ground: I alſo acknowledge your honors fauour, that by communication of my poore advertiſements, you haue taken occaſion to preſent my name to his majeſtie, and that I heare not of any diſlike of my beginnings.

HIS majeſtie hath euer had the glory to be the firſt mouer and vpholder of the peace of the Chriſtian commonwealth, and therefore God hath bleſſed him with peace in his owne. Butt when he ſhall contemplate from my former aduiſes, the deſignes of the late emperour Oſman, if he had proſpered either in his firſt attempt, or in his meditation of reuenge againſt his neighbours, his majeſtie will then haue much more content; becauſe this action of Poland was but the beginning of troubles which he had fore-thought. Butt now God hath laid him in the duſt, and ſhaken this empire ſo farre, that there is no feare for many yeares of any motion. They wilbe gladd to keepe the frends they haue, or to ſeeke newe, whom they may feare. And hauing vnderſtood his majeſties intentions by your honor in theſe treaties of Poland, Germany, and Tranſiluania, I will punctually and regularly conforme my ſelfe to them; but becauſe, in all, there are ſome alterations, I will trouble you with my collections.

FOR that of Poland, I muſt looke back to the part where I ended with your honor: That I had determined to doe my endeauour to ſtay the grand ſeignior from his intended voiage; which I vndertooke for two reaſons: Firſt, Becauſe I foreſawe the ambaſſador of Poland would not advance, but that the incurſions on both parts muſt continue, which would produce a warre. Secondly, For particular intereſt, that wee here were likely to fall into inconuenience, either by being forced to follow the king, or to be left in a place full of rumour, vnder a deputy from whom we could expect no juſtice; and that the remooue of the king had vtterly ouerthrowne 1622. throwne our merchaunts trade in this citty. To this end, about 6 dayes before the inſurrection, I treated with the braue and wiſe vizier Delauir baſſa, not knowing either the ſecrett of the king's purpoſe, or that the vizier was of that councell; but thought to doe a good office to him, a better to the Poles, at whoſe inſtance I vndertooke it, and the beſte to my ſelfe. I gaue him many reaſons, eſpecially that the grand ſeignior was engaged to his majeſtie by letters to conclude a peace; that the rumours gaue great cauſe of ſuſpition of ſome troubles vpon the emperour's departure. I found nothing did moue him, that had his owne hidden deſignes; butt he putt me off, that he determined to retorne the king ſooner then was expected; and that it was fitt to give him leaue to ſpend his humour, ſeeing no man could or durſt aſſure him, that the Poles would either ſend, or make peace, if he ſhould ſtay, hauing ſo long delayed, deluded, and failed in divers promiſes.

HEE demaunded, if I would engage for them; which I could not doe, as neither hauing ſuch direction from his majeſtie, nor aſſurance from Poland; finding truly, that they ſtood vpon their advantage more ſtrictly, then the extent of their victory would warrant. Then he deſired, That I would procure and haſten the arriuall of the ambaſſador; on their part, giuing aſſurance of good order in his reception, and that his letter ſhould be accepted here, and ſent poſt, and ſhould receive honorable aunſwere from the grand ſeignior immediate, without further trouble. This I undertooke to ſignify without engagement. From this generall, I deſcended to the hard captiuity, wherein the nobility of Poland, here priſoners, were kept; vrging either their liberty, as a meanes to drawe on the peace, or at leaſt better treatment, hauing receiued a letter from the king of Poland to that purpoſe, ſolliciting mee in his majeſties name, to aſſiſt them, without any mention of other buſines. To this he replyed, That he had litle cauſe to doe any thing for that nation, from whom he could not obteyne a ſeruant; and that theſe men were ſure pledges, whoſe liberty would ſett all looſe, and bondage haſten the concluſion of that ſo much deſired: but that, at my inſtance, he would take order for their good vſage, ſo farre as might agree with their ſafe cuſtody; and that, when the Poliſh ambaſſador ſhould arriue, his majeſties requeſt for them ſhould be honored. This he honeſtly, the next day, performed, and they haue acknowledged yt very gratefully to his majeſtie by their ſeuerall letters. Thus this buſines ſtood at the beginning of our troubles; ſince, there hath bene no tyme to meddle in forraine affaires, the fire beeing at home. Nowe rumours being a litle quietted, I haue bene againe ſollicited to deale for them, who are retorned into their chaynes and darkneſs; but the newneſs of officers, their ignorance, and myne owne occaſions, will not yett giue leaue. In this meane tyme, the duke of Barasky is come neare the border, and ignorant of theſe chaunges, hath ſent a ſeruaunt with a letter to the dead vizier, with whom only they had treaty. The contents are, That the king of Poland hath ſent him to conclude a peace, vpon ſuch conditions as were agreed vpon by the vizier and the commiſſioners of Poland, ſigned on both parts; but that it was reported, the grand ſeignior was varied from ſome of them; that he had no other inſtructions to treate anewe; butt if he would giue his word, that there was no alteration, he was ready to ſett forward. This letter, receiued by the newe vizier, is Greeke to him, who is lately come from Cairo, and underſtands no article nor peece of the buſineſs: which was ſo carried by Delauir baſſa, that ſultan Oſman and he beeing dead, here is no man hath a copy, or knowes the ſubſtance of the agreement. So that this vizier giues good words, aſhamed to confeſſe his ignorance, promiſeth all things; butt knowing not what to write in particular aunſwere, is at a ſtand. The meſſenger importunes a diſpatch, and he muſt take it in generall termes, of which the ambaſſador may make good advauntage. The chancellor informed the vizier, That I had dealt ſecretly with the laſt, and did know many particulars. He anſwered, That when Barasky came, I ſhould be called to the concluſion; and ſo it reſts now vpon a newe treaty, or they muſt accept of whatſoeuer the Poles will obtrude. The end wilbee, that Barasky will proceed, and the vizier will agree to any thing, beeing afraid one of another. His majeſtie ſhall haue the honor, though I do not thinke this emperor or vizier will keepe their dignities till that tyme, and in any chaunge a child muſt come in, who cannott better their condition. When the ambaſſador ſhall arrive, which we expect in two moneths, I will vſe him with all fitt ceremony, and enterteyne him. Butt in the treaty, I will putt my ſelf no further on then I ſhalbe called too, or entreated by him. And thus I hope I ſhall obey his majeſtie. 1622.

FROM Germany wee heare of none to come, ſince the agreement made with Gabor, which on both parts is thought ſyncere, the emperour neglecting the Turk, and he diſpleaſed with the Tranſiluanian; ſo that I think there ſhall neede no entermedling with their affaires, who are ſecured by the pouerty and diſſention of this ſtate, and by the diſability of the preſent king, and childhood of him that ſhall ſucceede. If expected alterations followe, theſe quarrells nowe will accommodate themſelves.

I RECEIUED an inuitement from Sir Francis Netherſall, wherein, I hope, I ſhall not diſpleaſe my maſter, by adviſing the true eſtate of theſe parts, that they be not deceiued with a broken reede. For it ſeemes to mee, that they thinke, that Gabor hath made this peace with the emperour to gett breath, vntill he can receiue ſuccours from hence. I know not his inward thoughts; but, ſure I am, the ſtate here beleeues, that he is abſolutely gone; and are ſo farr from ſending ayd, as they demand their arrearaged tribute of his miniſters; and if they had any ſuch intention, they themſelves muſt breath a year or twoe, before they can be fitt for any great action. I doubt not they would be gladd to withdrawe him from this league; but he that left them when they were in better eſtate, will not come back for charity in their worſe. I think he will find more aduantage by proſperous frends, then by weake and mutined: And ſo he purſues his owne ends; but I will not meddle with any thing that concernes him, but ſo farre, as to attend what he practizeth here.

THE correſpondence deſired from mee, and now licenced by his majeſtie, is ſo importuned, that it is to mee both weariſome and ſuſpicious, not in reſpect of faith and good meaning, but of daunger of miſcarriage, hauing receiued from truecanrnutunacanrcauutuuece, fiue letters, and anſwered twoe. Inſomuch as I haue bene enforced to deſire him to be more reſerued and ſparing, that he diſable mee not both to ſerue his majeſtie and the publique. I humbly thank your honor, for your louing and free aduiſe: I haue bene wary of myne owne wayes, and conſidered among whom I liue. I will both reſtrayne him and myſelfe to fitt, and ſafe, and good occaſions, or vtterly quit all, and deſire pardon. He is of a noble and braue nature, and I acknowledge much to him, yet am not bound by any obligation, but of courteſy.

THE complaints I haue made to your honor of our loſſes, and feare of encreaſe of the piratts, will, I hope, free me from any ſuſpition that I would not their deſtruction at myne owne perill: Butt ſeeing no remedy in preſent hope, as I enformed, I haue endeauored to make a peace with them vnder the capitulations of this empire. Your honor ſeemes to intimate, that his majeſtie will embrace none, in reguard of the contract made with Spaine vnexpired. I hope yett, my vndertaking wilbe acceptable, and will no way contradict that obligation, which I well foreſawe could not be ſodainly putt in execution: Butt wee daily ſuffer, and ſomwhat muſt be done to keepe vs from ruyne. I thought I ſhould neede no apology for my good intent, and I am yett confident that my deſire to doe all within the compaſſe of my inſtructions, makes mee more iealous then I need; yet, ſeeing your honor hath touched it, I wilbe bold to preuent miſinterpretations, and preſent my reaſons. Firſt, Sir Robert Manſell did himſelfe treat, and I vnderſtood, had power to conclude a peace, and he made no warre vpon the gouernors of the townes, to whom only I haue ſent. The Spaniard performed not on his part the ſupplyes contracted; from ſome of the Leuant company I had intimation, that it would be treated from England; which I thought diſhonorable, as I ſignified in myne vpon this buſineſs. Laſtly, his majeſties inſtructions commaund mee to make complaynt againſt them to the grand ſignor, to ſeeke redreſs, and to ſecure the commerce of his majeſties ſubiects in theſe parts, the companies inſtructions preſſing the ſame, which I am bound to follow. How could I doe any thing herein, but procure the grand ſignors commaunds for reſtitution, and for peace and free trafficque for the tyme to come? And how could this be graunted, vnleſs that I did promiſe, that if they obeyed the command of this port, wee would conforme ourſelves as to the ſubiects of this empire? I haue kept my ſelfe within this limitt: I haue ſent capitulations from this court: I haue treated only with this emperour, and vnder the league I haue 1622. challenged juſtice againſt them; and my inſtructions are, That the officers of thoſe citties and harbours ſhall ſigne the promiſe of their obedience to their owne emperour, and the meſſenger is his ſeruaunt, and this cannott be excepted againſt by the ſtate of Spaine; becauſe, if they be ſubject to the grand ſignior, they were compriſed vnder his majeſties league before, if they will accept it: if they be not, nor will obey, then I haue only declared them rebells to him, and enemyes to vs. I hope your honor will iuſtify mee, and I am confident the good ſucceſs will plead for mee, and that my inſtructions will warraunt what I haue done, and that I ſhall haue thanks in tyme.

I AM very gladd to heare of any probability, that his majeſties royall ſonne hath hope of a faire reſtitution, to retorne to his inheritance. I ſhall reioice in myne owne error, who neuer could beleeue, that a bare treaty would reconquer that which hath coſt ſo much; and I haue ſeene fewe examples, that the princes in whoſe hands it is, or at leaſt that will command it, would lett goe that which they any way poſſeſſed. When this is done, I ſhall wiſh to ſee the ſame conſcience reſtore the Griſons, and I ſhall then ask pardon for my ill faith. In the meane tyme I will doe it of your honor for this my freedome; I cannot diſſemble in this buſineſs, which hath long poſſeſſed my loyall heart to his majeſtie with feares: But his wiſedome is out of my humble reach.

I HUMBLY deſire your honor to informe his majeſtie, that I haue receiued anſwer from Poland, that by the meanes of Wolmarus Farensback, William Fourbes, whom his majeſtie recommended to my care, is redeemed from the Tartars, which he hath done to ſhowe his gratitude to his majeſtie.

THE merchants aduiſe mee, that there is intended a proclamation for the prohibition of grograms, which, if it may aduance our owne commodity, will be an act of good policy; but I am bound to informe, it will retrench halfe the trade of this port. And it will be great reaſon at leaſt to giue them ſome tyme, they hauing newly ſent home, and ſince bought for about 60000 l. in that commodity. I am alſo informed, that our Indian fleete is gone into the Redd ſea. If they touch the goods of the Turks, wee here muſt aunſwere it. I hope they will proceed with a decent care of our intereſts. The fleet of gallies prepared at Meſſina, and ready about the 10th preſent, haue ſome deſigne vpon the Arches, to take and fortify an iſland; which, if it take effect, will block vpp the Helleſpont: It were a great happineſs, if all their thoughts were conuerted that waye.

I HAUE troubled your honor aboue the limitts of your leiſure, but you haue encouraged mee to this fault, by your acceptation, and to importune you to continue the fauour, to acquaint his majeſtie with my deſire to ſerue him faithfully, and that you will euer nouriſh the beleefe in your owne breſt, that I am

Your honors humble and honeſt ſeruant.

THIS letter could not be cloſed, vntill it were filled with a new and ſtraunge act of barbariſme. This morning the prince Corresky, one of the lords of Poland, taken in the laſt warre, recommended by his majeſtie, that had formerly made an eſcape from this captiuity, was ſtrangled in the priſon, after two yeares detention. This hath putt vs all here into murmur; and I can conſider no reaſon nor policy, but as they are carried with a brutiſh fury. They here deſire the peace, and yett haue nowe done that which will vtterly breake it; their liberty beeing one of the conditions agreed and promiſed. Whether they think it will haſten the concluſion, for the feare of the reſt, or that they haue had ſome ſuſpition of any practize of his, or whether he hath bene betrayed from home, by intimation that his ſtimulant nature would neuer ſuffer the peace long to continue, I cannott coniecture. Sure I am, that neuer was done a more barbarous deed, nor a more fooliſh to any of their owne ends, except God hath ſo blynded them, that they take this occaſion to ſeeke a warre to exerciſe their mutined ſoldiours, who will not goe, and are (if they would) vnfitt, and ſo haue drawne an enemy vpon them in their diſſenſions. I cannot diuine, and the thing is newe. The nuntio is gone to the great viziers, to take his leaue, and I know the duke of Barasky will neuer proceed; and, I beleeue, a preſent reuenge will follow: For (the Poles beeing ſo backward to peace) this will vtterly breake all treaty. Neuer was opportunity ſo faire: All the ambaſſadors here, ſpecially the French, take it very ill; he profeſſeth he will not ſtay, and I doe not know that any man, or any quality, is ſafe here. Your honor may conſider our hard eſtate; and, I beſeech you, acquaint his maieſtie with it, who is alſo iniuried, having medyated for him, and receiued a promiſe: butt theſe think of no faith; and though they are afrayd of euery body, yett they are confident that the warrs of Chriſtendome will ſecure them. If the warr followe, which cannott be avoyded, wee alſo, in every diſaſter, ſhalbe ſubiect to their fury: There is not one Chriſtian but wiſheth himſelfe in a poole of cold water at his owne home, whither God ſend

In our publique buſines, when wee ſhould ioine, wee are all hindered by the matter of precedence betweene the French and my ſelfe: It hath bene giuen here formerly by warraunt of my lord of Salisbury, in tyme of Sir Paul Pindar. I pray your honor giue mee ſome order.

To the Queene of BOHEMIA.

Madame,

THIS my honeſt baniſhment is accompanied with many diſcontents, troubles and melancholies, as your Maieſtie will in part find, by the tragedy I haue now preſumed to ſend you; butt there is none more neare my ſoule, then that I can doe your Maieſtie, to whom I haue bene devoted from your infancy, and from whom I haue receiued ſo undeſerued fauours, no ſuch effectuall ſervice, as that you ſhould not only thereby know my heart, butt receiue ſome fruict. O how happy ſhould I bee, if I could add one tittle, or bring one contented thought to you! Butt, by your Maieſties goodnes, I enioy the reward of all; for I am confident, you beleeue that no man is more ready to ſacrifice himſelfe, and his, then I am, among all theſe troubles and rumours. A litle newes, which I haue nowe receiued, of a good and proſperous beginning of the king of Bohemia, in his owne cuntry, haue made mee haue one day of feaſt and ioy: I am aſſured it is true, becauſe my ſpiritt foretells mee of his happines yett to come. Now his maieſtie is in the right way, to lend his countenance and preſence to his owne affaires. Subiects take courage from the ſight of their owne lord, as hearbs and plants doe from the influence of the ſunne, and his abſence is their winter. I can doe nothing butt ſend up my uowes and praiers to heauen for your Maieſties proſperity, which ſhalbe as inceſſant and feruent as for myne owne ſoule. I dare not preſume to giue any counſell: I am now in a quality limitted and bounded, and haue not the freedome of your ſeruaunt. But ſeeing I haue received from England adviſe, that there is great probability that your Maieſties ſhall be reſtored to your antient territories of inheritance, by the authority of the king my ſoueraigne, in a treaty now on foote; I ſhall humbly wiſh, that all other greater thoughts may be depoſed, and that you will giue way to tyme, which comprehends many chaunges: the wiſeſt and the greateſt princes in the world haue done it: and your Maieſtie may liue to ſee, that this vnnaturall duke of Bauare, who hath betrayed, and ſought the diſhonor of the head of his owne bloud, may leaue you his inheritance by the hand of God, in reuenge of his attempts and thoughts to take away yours by the arme of uiolence. I muſt confeſs, I, poore man, beare him a litle ſpleene, and ſhall reioice in any thing that may bring him ſorrowe. Butt who ſees not, whence this ambition comes, and who nouriſheth it? The holy father of Roome makes the fire, and the ieſuits blow it. Where is that zeale of ſanctity ſhowed, in theſe parts, where I live? Here is ſubiect enough both for his deuotion, and their ambition: Butt God hath ſhutt upp their eyes and hearts: And I beleeve yett, that as God would not giue the children of Iſrael the land of the Ammorites, though he were Lord of all the earth, butt that he would firſt lay them a iuſt title, euen in the eyes of men, by refuſing paſſage and water, and things of right and common by the lawe of nature; ſoe he hath ſtirred up ſome, to open a iuſt way to their owne deſtruction. I cannott prophecy; butt I am confident, that God will nott lett his church be trampled on, though he chaſtice it awhile. I haue receiued a letter from Sir Francis Netherſale, requiring of mee a correſpondence and intelligence of the affaires of this port; which I ſhall moſt willingly affoord him: butt I feare there will nothing therein be of uſe of his maieſtie, except only to know the weaknes of this empire, which is gouerned by a ſanton, prophet, or maddman; and if he be remoued,

1622. a child ſhall ſucceed; and both theſe gouerned by their mothers, and they by their owne paſſions. The ſouldioury is mutined and corrupted, all things in confuſion; ſo that I beleeue, for a yeare, two, or three, there is not much to be expected from hence; they being now rather fitt to be a prey, then to moleſt their neighbours. I perceiue there is yett ſome thought left, that Bethleem Gabor hath made his peace with the emperour, only to gett time, untill he might haue ſuccours from this ſtate: which as I doe not beleeue, butt that he hath done it hartily for his aduantage; and I am ſure, the viziers here are of the ſame opinion; ſoe nowe, I am confident, he will not bee ſo charitable, as to retorne to them in their trouble and diſability to help him: and I am, and euer have bene perſwaded, that he only doth his owne buſines on both ſides, without any zeale of other frendſhipp, howeuer the ſtates ledger here thinks otherwiſe: yett whatſoeuer I can collect, that may aduance your Majeſties affaires, I will allway communicate with you. If euer your Majeſtie read the life of monſieur Vendome, or the tales of Gaulard, that, when his coachhorſes wanted ſhoes vpon the way, and were ſtayed, he commanded the coachman to driue on the coach alone, for the horſes would ſoone ouertake it; think then, that you reade the acts and geſts of this emperour, who lately going on the water, and beeing uery charitable, threw money to the fiſhes; and riding to his bardge, would haue gon in, horſe and all: butt when he was told his horſe could not enter it, he then deſired the barge might be brought aſhore, to rowe in his garden. I could tell your Majeſtie many merry tales; butt when I haue no other matter, I will ſend you his whole life. I cannott enlarge this packett; therefore I will humbly entreat, when you haue uouchſafed to read this our ſadd ſtory, that you will be pleaſed to ſend it to your ſecretary, to be preſented to the king, who may find ſomthing therein worthy his majeſties obſeruation.

I DARE not trouble his excellence the prince of Orange with any of my meditations, knowing hee hath here an abler hand to ſerue him, yett I deſire he ſtill beleeue he hath none readier: and if your Majeſty will be pleaſed to ciuilize one day in this barbarous cuntry, and to ſend mee a fewe lynes from your roiall hand, I ſhall receiue them as patents of honor, and will liue and dye, in deſpight of any diſtance or baniſhment,

Your Majeſties humble and faithfull ſeruant.

My Lord,

YOUR diſpatch of the 8. of Marche is ſafely arriued heere, wherein you giue an accompt of your firſt audience, of your propoſitions, and anſweres giuen vnto them. I know not what my lo. admirall hath written vnto you, who delivered your letter to his majeſtie; but I find, both from the king, and the lords, to whom I haue communicated the moſt of your diſpatches ſent vnto mee, a generall approbation of your proceedings; and that your diſcreete carriage in all things hitherto negotiated there, aſwell thoſe that concern his majeſties allies and friends, as thoſe which concerne the ſecurity of his ſubjects trade, hath beene ſuch, as hath reſtored againe the honour of our king and nation: and the beſt inſtruction therefore, that can be giuen you now, is, Perge facere ut facis.

As for the intimation you giue, of ſome likelihood to make a peace with the pyrates, I cannot yet giue you any warrant from his majeſtie for ſuch a treaty; neither do I obſerue in your lordſhipps memoriall, deliuered unto his majeſtie, that your ſelf do much incline to any ſuch councell. The French embaſſador here reſident with his majeſtie, hath of late, vpon notice ſent from that kings miniſter in Conſtantinople, that you refuſe to joyn with him, and the reſt of the Chriſtian embaſſadors, to ſigne the ſeale, in reſpect of the queſtion of precedency, moued, that directions might bee ſent unto you, to make no farther ſcruple of it, as ſuppoſing it to bee a matter very cleare, and the place yeilded unto France, by all the kings embaſſadors in other parts. It is very true, that, of late yeares, ſome Engliſh embaſſadors haue yeilded it, whereof I haue been an eye witneſſe my ſelfe, to my greefe, by what warrant I knowe not; and I finde, vpon enquiry, that Sir Paul Pindar did it there without warrant (the more to blame hee): But his majeſtie is reſolued to yeild it no more; and therefore commends your lordſhipp, for avoyding all occaſions that may bring it into queſtion.

SIR Richard Weſton is ſtill at Bruſſels, treating a truce for the Palatinate, whereof wee expect a concluſion ſhortly: In the meane time, the adverſe party hath yet the better, and, I fear, is maſter of the field.

FOR our home occurrents, all I can tell you, is, that this afternoone the lord viſcount Grandiſon, and Sir Edward Conway, are to be ſworne councellors.

ALL your friends heere, thanks bee to God, are well; and, amongſt the reſt, my wife commends her ſervice to your ſelfe and my lady Roe: So, committing you to Gods holy protection, I reſt,

Your Lordſhipps aſſured friend to do you ſervice,

GEO. CALUERT.

Extract of a Letter to Sir FRANCIS NETHERSALE, at Heidleberge. Dated 1 July, 1662.

The reſt of the Contents being comprized in other Letters, are here omitted.

—— THE Tartars haue againe invaded Poland, and the Coſſacks the Black-ſea, and haue taken many Turkiſh ſhipps: They haue putt Caffa in danger, and given us at this port an alarum within few daies. What then is the courage of this place, to feare a rabble of vnarmed borderers? They now prepare to ſend out a few frigatts againſt them, butt with ſo much difficulty, and ſo poorely furniſhed, that they ſcarce will ſerue to make a ſhowe: They haue no munition in their magazines, butt were forced to ſend to mee for two barrels of powder, which I denyed; and they ſtayed a ſhipp of oures upon other pretences, vntill I was forced to make that vnfitt preſent. The ſeruant of Barasky, ſent hither for ſafe conduct, and to know the reſolution, cannott gett his diſpatch; there is a great difficulty. The Poles require, that, by authority of this court, the Tartars may be recalled, or diſauowed. The Turks dare not doe either: To recall them, they feare they will not now obey, and ſo they ſhall diſcouer a weakenes: To diſauow them they never will, for feare to drawe vpon them a daungerous enemy: without one of theſe, the Poles cannot make a ſafe peace. Notwithſtanding, I thinke neceſſity on both parts will ouercome all other differences: and I ſuſpect more vehemently, by the viziers ſmall eſtimation of Correskyes death, and of his denyall, that it was wrought by ſome treaſon from Poland; and that he well knowes, that will be no obſtacle: butt, on the other ſide, it may breed ciuil diſſention there, if it be diſcouered. What wilbe the ſucceſs, I will yett make no judgment thereof. I haue ſome good hopes to procure the enlargment of the other three noblemen priſoners here: I am ſure I could doe much more, if any of our Chriſtian ambaſſadors would aſſiſt; butt either they are obnoxious to the Turks for ſome their owne priuat intereſts, or haue no courage nor heart to doe any good and publique office. ——

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

THERE is no letter of myne from this place, but muſt bring you the maddnes of this people, who euery day make newe commotions. There was lately, vpon aduantage of the want of gouerment, an auenue laid vpon us, on our ſilke, after it was ſhippt. I have reſiſted it, and done whatever I could. I haue proued the juſtice of our cauſe, butt all in vayne; the vizier tooke part againſt vs, the verieſt villaine that euer liued; and vſed mee with great contempt, threatened to hang my ſecretary, and drogermen, if they ſpake in my cauſe; whereupon I threw him my capitulations, and bare nothing at his hands, and vnladed my ſilke, reſolued to ſtand yt out. To this end, I procured all the ambaſſadors here to ioyne; and wee were on our way, with full reſolution to goe to court, and to procure his head, or to aske leaue to remoue our cuntrymen, and their eſtates, which are now in great danger. By this I haue gayned ſome honor, beeing the firſt that ſhowed any oppoſition to the inſolence of this tyme. It beeing a buſines that concernes principally our merchaunts, I haue at large enformed them, and I ſhall deſire your honor to take the relation from them: Butt God tooke 1622. my quarrell in hand, and I receiued a letter in the ſtreete to retorne to my houſe; for all the ſoldiours were vpp in armes at the ſeraglio, and were riſen againſt this vizier, that had done mee this affront. The occaſion was, he had in the night ſent for their aga, or chiefe captayne, and depoſed him, and ſent him to the iſlands to be ſecretly ſtrangled, and had giuen order to murther ſome other baſſaes and officers, and then to depoſe the king Muſtafa, to ſett vp Moratt, the child and brother of Oſman, many beeing of his party. Butt the medling firſt with the aga of the Janizaries gaue the alarum; wherby they aroſe, reſcued their capteyne, and the reſt, and demand his head. Hee is fledd, and order giuen to kill him where he is firſt found. The ſoldiours require alſo the head of the mother of Moratt ſultan, and diuers others; but nothing is done; I think, for feare, they dare not ſearch into the conſpiracy; only my enemy is putt downe, and fledd, his houſe ſackt, an infinite treaſure taken, and they are quieted for a day or twoe, by making a new vizier, who is a ſoft natur'd man, that dares not doe juſtice to offend any man. The worſt, or beſt, is, that there is nowe a faction made betweene Muſtafa and Moratt, and we expect howrely a great ſlaughter, and maſſacre in the citty, for one ſide muſt fall: it is impoſſible this empire can ſtand. I doe not knowe, nor euer read of ſuch a confuſion, nor can I tell how to deſcribe it, butt that all is diſſolution. I hope to make good ſhift for myſelfe, and I haue vnited all the ambaſſadors into one courſe, butt with much adoe; hauing wonne them by declaration of my reſolution to ſtand alone, and to ſhame them. For the ſurrender of my capitulations there was no remedy; for the vizier would not acknowledge them, and then what ſhould I doe with paper? I haue done all with generall conſent of our nation, and will make good vſe of this iniury, if this ſtate ſettle: for all the reſidents here will goe together to demand juſtice, and I will not accept of myne agayne, but to ſtrengthen them. I haue another copy to ſerue my turne in neede; butt I rather pretend that the vizier hath broken league, by accepting or forceing mee to ſurrender them, which I threwe at his feete; and, if God had not preuented mee, I hoped to haue the honor to depoſe at leaſt one great vizier; and in this troubleſome tyme it was no ſmall vndertaking.

BUTT if things continue here as yett they doe, and as there is no like butt that all wilbe torne by ciuill warr, and the empire cantoniſed, or generally ſackt, or that the Tartars will come in vpon the aduantage, I beſeech your honor fully enforme his majeſtie, and the lords of his councell, that the merchaunts may be ſodainly called before them, and that I may haue order what to doe in caſe of extremity. I haue ſhowed here, that I doe not feare; all the chriſtians, all nations, will witneſs it for mee; and that I only haue ſtood vpon myſelfe, and putt heart into the others; nor will I bee the firſt that ſhall moue my foote, et cedere ſtationi: But who can be ſafe from the fury of the multitude? and it wilbe late to aske leaue to ſaue our ſelues. The people of the cuntry hyde their goods, and fly the citty. Therefore, I beſeech you, procure mee ſome order, or prepare for mee, that all may be accepted that I doe, which ſhalbe with the conſent of my nation. I ſhall, I hope, ſecure my ſelfe; neither would I that my frends ſhould conceiue feare, that is, thoſe that wilbe paſſionate, and are your honors neighbours; for I doubt not to defend myſelfe; butt I will not warrant that I muſt not leaue that behind mee which I can hardly ſpare. I haue propoſed the worſt, and deſire your honor to propound it for mee.

FOR the outward eſtate: The laſt vizier, who murthered the prince Corresky, forſware it to the agents of Poland, pretending he dyed a ſodaine death; and I greatly ſuſpect, that ſome treaſon from thence procured it, becauſe the Turks are yett confident of the peace, which they would neuer bee, if they had not ſome ground. The ſeruant of the duke of Barasky is diſpeeded away, with his letter of ſafe conduct, and theſe expect that he will haſten: but I do not beleeue it, becauſe Corresky was his kinſman, and his death will either breake the peace here, or at home. The Turks haue at laſt yeelded to recall the Tartars, and to putt out Kante emir emirze from the baſha title of Siliſtra, to pleaſe the Poles. But all this, I think, will not procure quietnes; for the Tartars haue anew inuaded Poland, and the Coſſacks the Black-ſea, and done great ſpoiles on both parts. Here then is the difficulty: The Turks and Poles would make peace on any conditions; butt they know not how to doe it for thoſe robbers, who now feare nobody. Therefore the Poles haue demanded, that the grand ſignor ſhould either by his authority compell the Tartars to peace, or elſe to diſauow them, and exclude them the treaty. The Turks feare to ſhow, that they haue no power to command them; and dare not leaue them out, leaſt they proue the worſe enemy. Yett neceſſity hath enforced a tryall, and the emperour hath written; which if they obey, and the death of Corresky be ſmothered vp, then a peace may follow; if not, the Poles haue a braue aduantage. The emperour courts Bethleem Gabor, rather, I think, to hold him neutrall, and to ſecure his owne frontire, then for any hope or deſire to make a warr in Hungaria by his meanes. His agents here are very cold, and pretend they attend new inſtructions. The king hath ſent him a rich veſt lyned with ſables, a horſe brauely furniſhed, and twelue veſts to diuers principall men about him. This the grand ſigniors haue not vſed to doe, and your honor may gather therby, the doubt they haue of themſelues. I think the Tranſiluanian will rather make vſe of the diſſentions here, then retorne to their frendſhipp, vntill hee ſee them better eſtabliſhed.

I BESEECH your honor, excuſe mee to his majeſtie; I know not how to trouble him with our broyles; and to take ſome care of vs, that for his ſeruice expoſe thoſe liues, which we would ſpend to better purpoſe. Wherſoeuer, I ſhall allway bee moſt ready to doe your Honor ſervice.

Conſtantinople,
1 Julij, 1622.

From Mr. ROWLAND WOODWARD.

Right Honorable,

I THOUGHT your lordſhip happy, in finding out an imployment ſo far from the noiſe of the troubles in theſe parts, wherwith we are continually affrighted, vntil I heard of the death of the grand ſignor, committed by the defection of his owne people: it came lately hether from Naples to the Spaniſh ambaſſador; which if it carry truth, I ſhall much feare, Sir, the ſafety of your perſon there, and that of thoſe deere pledges in your company. This vnexpected accident, ſo much for the good of Chriſtendome, if the princes will make benefit of it, to me is not altogether ſo ioyful, as otherwiſe it would, if your lordſhip weare here among your frends, and not vpon the place, where you muſt run the haſards of a ſtate inclyning to a change of gouernment. But I hope, the God of heauen, that conducted you thether, through the dangers and impediments of ſeas and pyrats, will preſerue you there, in the downefall of that tottering empire, to worke ſomwhat aduantagious for the party profeſſing the name of Jeſus, which at this day ſuffers ſo cruel and bloody a diſtraction in Germany, France, Italy, and the Low Cuntryes, that many yeares will not be ſufficient to repaire the deſolation which a few haue cauſed. The king our ſoueraigne hath left nothing undon, which the wit of man could inuent (except taking armes) for working peace in Chriſtendome: but now we begin to find, that that is neuer to be won by treaty, which hath beene loſt by the ſword.

SIR Richard Weſten from Bruxells, in a letter very freſh, vſeth theſe words: That it is as poſſible for him to make ropes of ſand, as to doe his majeſtie ſeruice there according to his directions. In the Palatinat, the king of Bohemia, and Mansfield, obey'd his majeſties pleaſure, in yeilding to the treaty at Bruxells: Soone after (vpon the 10th of the laſt) Tilly and Cordoua ſet vpon the duke of Brunſwick in his paſſage over the Maine, neere Francfort; where he loſt, by report, 4000 men, and the next day ioyned with Mansfield at Manheim. The king and Mansfield haue left the Palatinat, and are gone towards Bauaria, which they on the other ſide terme rather a flight then a diuerſion. By this you may judg of the honeſty of their proceedings. Ther went letters from Bruxells to Leopold and Cordoua, for a ceſſation: my lord Chicheſter ſent to them, demanding performance; they confeſt the receipt of ſuch letters: but Tilly anſwered, That he was not included, and therfore would not obey. Then preſently they wente to meete Brunſwick, and gaue him a cruel blow.

THERE came letters from Spaine the laſt of the laſt, wherwith they ſay the king is very much diſtaſted. I ame here out of the way, and therfore cannot yet learne what it might be. Some ſaye, Gondomar is retyred into a monaſtery, as 1622. being charged with aduancing the mariage beyond his commiſſion. Likewiſe the Venetian ambaſſador (who is now returning) aſſured his majeſtie, from the ſtate, That the infanta ſhould marry the young duke of Florence. In France, my lord of Doncaſter hath had no better ſucceſſe then Sir R. Weſten at Bruxells. The king proceeds in picking vp the ſmall townes, where he vſeth great cruelty, reſeruing Rochel and Montauban for the coronation of his inglorious actions; where perhaps he may bury all the honor he hath hetherto gotten, vpon men, whoe haue religion and neceſſity to ad force to the weakneſſe of their troupes.

AT home we doe the ſame things over agayne, or the like: new counſailers and mariages of late haue bene made: marquis Hamiltons ſonne is marryed to my lord Fieldings eldeſt daughter: my lord Digbies eldeſt ſonne marryes the marquis Hamiltons daughter: the lord Maxwells ſonne of halfe a yeare old, marryes Mr. John Murrays daughter of ſeven yeares old: Mr. John Murrays eldeſt ſonne marryes my lord Fieldings youngeſt daughter: my lord Fieldings eldeſt ſonne marryes (ſome ſay) my lord of Southamptons; others, my lord of Arundels daughter: my lord Hume marryes my lord of Fauklands daughter: my lord Bruſe marryes Sir Robert Chicheſters daughter. There are likewiſe 4 erles to be created: The lords Cranfield, Fielding, Doncaſter, Mr. John Murray, &c.

FOR concluſion, I will giue your lordſhip that which you will eſteeme before the reſt, the health of all your frends here that I know. Sir Jo. Brooke was hunting yeſterday here in Wymbleton Parke, with the maſter of the jewell-houſe, where they had wet ryding, and dry ſport. And now I will make a requeſt vnto your lordſhip, although in matters of this kind I know your noble diſpoſition needs no remembrancer: Ther is a frend of a very good frend of mine comming by ſea into thoſe parts; his name is Mr. Aſhley; on whome I beſeech your lordſhip, for my ſake, to let fall ſome beames of your accuſtomed favor; and likewiſe to let me vnderſtand by your commandments, that I haue not loſt my part in it.

Wymbleton the 3d of
July, 1622.

Your Lordſhips trew louer and ſeruant,

ROW. WOODWARD.

I deſyer my poore ſeruices may be remembred to your noble and vertuous lady, and to honeſt Mr. Robert Roe.

Right Honorable,

WEE haue now bene 14 daies in a calme, by the eaſineſs of a new vizier; butt I feare the block will as much afflict vs as did the ſtorke. There haue bene many councells held how to ſettle this gouerment, and to take away the diviſion, the ſoldiour in theſe parts taking part with Muſtafa, becauſe they are ſure of him alway to haue their wills; and the churchmen and lawyers practizing for Moratt, as ſeeing a lethargy now both in the ſtate and their religion. I know not to whatt to impute the late quiettnes, whether to their ramazan or lent now beeing; or to the policy of ſome, who haue ſpread abroad prophecies, that the 15th of this moneth, if any motion, the ſtreets ſhould runne with bloud: but this I obſerue, that in the ſtrict obſeruation of the command of their prophett, in which the abſtinence from all ſuſtenance, ſo much as from water at this tyme, hath bene ſo duly obſerued, now euery day, and euery where, the ſoldiours are drunk, contemning the lawe, and, I think, the giuer. They ſay alſo, that the ſoldiours haue taken oath not to draw a ſword; but, I feare, at the breaking vp of this their faſt, and holy tyme, which yett reſtraynes ſome, wee ſhall fall madd againe. There is no likelyhood that the vizier can ſtand long; I think now they chooſe them as wee doe mellons, taſt and throw away, vntill we find one good; the wiſeſt men of this empire vtterly refuſing to take ſo great a charge vpon them, which was wont to be ſought by all the handmaids of ambition.

THE prouinces from whom now wee haue heard, are all rather amazed, then quiett; the ſoldiory there beeing alſo growne rich, and dares not ſtirr. The gouernors attend to heare more, and to gouerne themſelves by occaſion; only at Salonica there hath bene ſome buſines, the citty beeing rich, the Turks, and Chriſtians neighbors neighbors to it, ioyned together, and held it 3 daies after the ſack, and hauing their ends, which was only booty, are ſince diſperſed.

IN the auenue or tax laid vpon vs, I haue preuailed, and gott a judgment in open diuan, and I hope alſo to hang the Jewe that durſt attempt to giue cauſe of the breach of amity betweene his majeſtie and this ſtate; for ſo farr I putt it, aſſured of their weakneſs; and I haue obteyned in ſuch a tyme, I may ſay, a victory; which I hope will bring us much quiett, and make the beſt here wary, to fall at difference with mee: I am ſure, all Chriſtians here doe thank mee.

THERE is no way unſearcht, to reduce Bethleem Gabor to adhære to this empire, and to quitt the frendſhipp of Germany. I cannott learne what he is like to doe by his miniſters, only, by generall judgment, he will firſt ſee what this ſtate will doe with it ſelfe.

THE king of Perſia is otherwiſe ymployed to recouer Candayr from the mogol, and in a warr with the Portugall in the Gulph: he hath, with aſſiſtance of our ſhipping, taken the fort of Kiſhmee, ſacked the citty of Ormus, and beſeeged the caſtle. The Engliſh landed their ordinance, and made the battery: I doubt they haue exceeded their ſea commiſſion.

WEE attend daily to heare anſwere of the diſpatch made to the duke of Barasky; they are confident here of a peace, and I am in doubt they will obteyne it on their owne conditions; for neceſſity aſſiſts them euery where, there being no man fitt to take the opportunity to ſcourge them. The Poles will make ſome difficulty, butt they muſt alſo haue peace: that kingdom is not framed for an offenſiue warr; the difficulty will only reſt in bridling the Tartars and Coſſacques, who were laſt weeke within the mouth of the Helleſpont. Wee are not yett ſo aſſured of our quiett here, as that I ſhould not be gladd to receiue his majeſties order what to do in extreamity. I humbly thank your honor for your laſt, and both your letters; they are like dewe in a hott day, they both refreſh and enrich mee. Wee have rumours from Buda, butt ſo improbable, as I will not mention them; your honor ſhall haue the truth, before it can come this way. Every letter of myne muſt haue one concluſion, That you wilbe pleaſed to preſerue mee in his majeſties memory, and in your owne opinion, as Dated 11 ana 25 April.

Conſtantinople,
14 July, 1622.

SIR,

I HAVE enioyed two of your letters, both of ſuch content to mee, becauſe they came from you, that I am ſure the matter pleaſed mee not ſo well, as the affection of the writer. I liue ſo remote, and heare ſo ſeldome things that pleaſe mee, that though I cannot weane my ſelfe from the error of our life, to ytch for newes, yett ſomtymes I wiſh I were not concerned in the world, or that I might enioy a peacefull ignorance. I muſt confeſſe, that I am a paſſionat man in ſome generall cauſes, and they trouble mee, as children doe other men, with ioyfull and ſorrowfull cares. Butt there is a good God that diſpoſeth all things: and I haue taken a heathens councell, Quamvis cauſam tantæ diſpoſitionis ignores, tamen, quoniam bonus mundum rector temperat, recte fieri cuncta ne dubites. I may be bold to meddle with privat men: I am amazed at the biſhop of Spalata, and confeſs I doe not now, nor neuer did, conceiue the force of ambition. Is it poſſible? Hath the graue ſence of preferrment? which, the Pſalmiſt ſaith, hath no proffitt in it; and that the duſt cannott ſo much as giue thanks. I deſire to heare particularly the motiues of his departure: in the meane tyme I will ſtill loue my God, who giues vs water out of hard rocks, and makes the worſt men glorify him; for his works ſhall liue, and all the popes in hell ſhall neuer be able to reconcile them. It cannot bee butt he diſſembles with God; he can neuer putt out the light that was kindled in his breſt. Oh! I feare, perhaps he feared he ſhould no wheare haue reſt, and plaid the Gibeonite, to make a crafty tymely peace, though for euer he therby made himſelfe a ſlave. Of my lord of Oxfords committment I deſire to heare ſomwhat: I hope he is fallen but into miſconſtruction, and not into fault.

FROM Heidleburgh I haue due correſpondence; from thence I heare nothing of great pleaſure; the marqueſs of Badens loſſe hath cooled the beſt beginnings. I feare the 1622. nature of thoſe princes that have the poſſeſſion, or at leaſt the vſe of thoſe cuntryes, that they will not ſo eaſily part from them by treaty: I am ſure, they neuer gaue an example of that conſcience. Lett Milan, Naples, Sicily, Navarre, and now the Voltaline, ſpeake their deſignes: if now they doe, I ſhall beleeue they haue chaunged their confeſſors, and reioyce at myne owne error. I am a plaine man, and could not forbeare to write my thoughts herein to the ſtate, and I feare no miſconſtruction, becauſe I haue an honeſt heart to the religion, to his majeſtie, and to his iſſue. To the religion; Is it not the truth of God? Hath the church of God any ſuch marke as perſecution? Where is it now quiett? Hereticques haue bene puniſhed, butt neuer enioyed the crowne of martyrdome, which hath many vertues accompanying it, as peace, and ioy, and conſtancy in death.

AH, poore Fraunce! will the ghoſts of the Guiſards neuer ſuffer thee to be in peace? What was the pretence of the laſt troubles, that had almoſt deſtroyed that famous kingdome, but the religion? Then they feared to haue a king a Proteſtant; but what doe they feare nowe? O God, looke vpon the affliction of thy people; for the princes of the earth haue banded themſelues againſt thee. Spaine neuer had any great deſigne afoote, if you obſerue the tymes, but it then ſowed diſſentions in France. In the yeare 88 were the barricado's of Paris. I could ſhow you a corrolary of examples, butt you can better contemplate them out of your owne obſeruations.

IT cannot much pleaſe you, to haue much diſourſe of this place; and I can ſay no more, then that the diſeaſe yet works internally that muſt ruyne this empire: we daily expect more chaunges, and effuſion of bloud: the wiſeſt men refuze to ſitt at the helme, and fooles will ſoone runne themſelves and others vpon the rocks. If any able hand were ready to take the aduantage, there is not ſo eaſy a prey in the world. I will tell you a wonder: About 16 yeares paſt, there was a view made of all the villages inhabited in the dominion of the grand ſignior, and the liſt was 553000, and odd; and now this laſt yeare, before the warr of Poland, another beeing made, they are found to be decreaſed to 75000 in all, which is a ſtraunge depopulation. The ruined houſes in many places ſtand, butt the iniuſtice and cruelty of the gouernors hath made all the people abandon them; and you may ride in Greece, and in Natolia, his beſt provinces, 3 daies, and not find an egg to eat, nor a man to draw you water. This is not all; I find another ſymtome infallible of their ruinne: Beſides the contempt of their king, whom they were wont to reverence like a God, they haue made ſo many breaches into their lawe, that Mahomet ſure wilbe angry with them, and then I know no protector. It cannott be otherwiſe: Actum eſt de imperio; and wee ſhall here runne a fortune; but God will preſerue us that truſt in him. You cannot conceiue the pleaſure, that I could ſafely contemplat this malady, and not feare to be carryed away in the infection. Laſtly; The reuenue beeing decayed hereby ſo extreamely, there is not enough to pay the old inſtitution of the ſoldiours; and you may ſee by the diſcourſe, they will not be putt out of pay, nor yett be content, if they be told thet all will not ſuffice them. I haue ſent you here the copy of my thoughts, and the relation of the late tragedies, from which you will make your owne judgments better then I can. I deſire you to doe mee this courteſy, to remember my ſeruice to my lord of Dorſett; and if he will pardon mee, that yet I have not ſent my ſelfe to him, deſire him to read that, and to beleeue that I am readyer to do him really ſeruice, then to profeſſe it; butt I will diſcharge this duty myſelfe by the next occaſion.

I AM aſhamed to ſend any excuſe to Mr. ſecretary Nanton; yet if you haue any intercourſe with him, doe that office for mee, that he may not think I, with the world, have forgotten him; he is one that ſuffers, and that is enough: if you will alſo affoord him the reading of that paper, it will ſpend him a melancholy hower.

OF outward things I can tell you nothing: butt I beleeue nothing can hinder the peace of Poland; not out of any good inclynation one to another, butt, like doggs out of breath, they muſt part. The Tartars and Coſſacques continue their incurſions; and how to quiett them, that liue on ſpoile, wilbe the difficulty: all other differences will accommodate themſelues. You know that kingdome is not framed for invaſion, the noblemen are ſo great, and ſo diuided, and the king butt a duke of Venice, in reſpect of a monarch.

BETHLEM GABOR is courted by this ſtate to leaue his Germaine league, and to retorne to this more entirely: butt I doe not beleeue, that he, that had only his owne ends in indulgence, will now for charity come to the reliefe of theſe, vntill he ſee them able to help themſelues. This is all I can tell you. My wife, I think, ſends her owne remembrance to you therein; and I deſire you to preſent myne to my lady, and to beleeue that I will conſtantly liue and dye

Conſtantinople,
14ᵉ Julij, 1622.

Your affectionat frend.

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

THE laſt 14 daies haue brought forth no alteration among vs; their holy tyme hath a litle reſtrayned the inſolence that was raging; only ſome few things done among themſelues, which yet ſhowes that there is no authority that dares oppoſe any thing which the ſoldiours will: out of which, I conclude, that they who haue noe power ouer their ſubiects, ought to be no terror to ſtraungers.

THIS preſent emperor, though his ſimplicitie ſerve well the turnes of thoſe that would doe all things without feare; yett I am perſwaded, the gouerment and preſeruation of this ſtate, and hee, cannott agree together: therefore wee doe expect a ſodaine chaunge at the end of this faſt, which now approacheth; and when in the ſtricteſt tymes, for 3 daies, the people had ſufferance of a great liberty, wee now feare it wilbe extended beyond all meaſure, eſpecially they beeing vnreſtrayned to drink wyne. As in my laſt I gaue one obſeruation of the breach of their lawes, and contempt of their religion, which are ſymtoms of a deſperat and ſick eſtate; ſoe I will in their ciuill goverment lay one infallible ground, That it is ympoſſible the empire can endure, though no ſtranger had a finger to help forward their deſtruction. In the relation of the purpoſe of ſultan Oſman to chaunge the ſoldioury, and to erect a newe better cheape; though it was haſtened by his owne hatred to them, yett it had a true ground, that the reuenew of the king is not nowe able to pay them, becauſe their number is ſo much encreaſed, and that diminiſhed: wee ſaw then, that they would not be diſmiſſed of their payes, butt rather fell into the worſt of rebellions, to kill their maſter. The ſame cauſe ſtill remaynes, and the ſame reſolution in them; all the territory of the grand ſignor is diſpeopled for want of juſtice, or rather by violent oppreſſions, ſo much as in his beſt parts of Greece and Natolia, a man may ryde 3, and 4, ſometimes 6 daies, and not find a village able to feed him and his horſe; wherby the reuenew is ſo leſſened, that there ſufficeth not to pay the ſoldiour, and to maynteyne the court. It may be patcht up a while out of the treaſory, and by exactions, which now are greeuous vpon the merchaunt and laboring man, to ſatisfy the harpies: butt when theſe meanes faile, which cannott long endure, either the ſoldiory muſt want their pay, or the number be reduced: neither of theſe will they ſuffer; and whoſoeuer ſhall attempt either remedy, ſhall follow Oſman to his graue. This is the true eſtate of this ſo much feared greatnes, and the wiſeſt men in the cuntry forſee it, and retyre their eſtates as faſt as they can, fearing that no haſt can preuent their daunger.

VPON occaſion of Correſkyes death, I haue had occaſion to expoſtulat it with the viziers, becauſe the liberty of him with the reſt were promiſed his majeſtie; and that I would haue them know, that wee are not afraid both to ſee and take notice of their barbarous actions. I can gett no other anſwere butt diſauowing it with great oaths; that he dyed of the plague, is now their refuge; and I beleeue they had ſome intimation from his enemyes to be ſo bold, or elſe I doe not think that they could hope ſo to ſmother it, if they had not ſome aſſurance it ſhould not bee much queſtioned. Hereby I haue obteyned a faire impriſonment for the reſt, and renewed their promiſe for their enlargment, vpon the arriuall of the duke of Baraſky, and at his majeſties entreaty, they beeing not comprehended in the written articles, though mentioned by words and diſcourſes. I haue ſent your honor the copy of the treaty, and concluſion of the truce made vpon the border; which was made ſuch a ſecrett, as I am ſure no ambaſſador here could euer procure yt; and I think the cauſe was, both parts may be aſhamed of ſo pore a thing. Your honor will eaſily obſerue how afraid both ſides were to declare any thing clearly; butt referring all to the generall words of antichi patti, which, at the comming of the ambaſſador, ſhalbe revewed; and both hope therby to make aduantages of that, which neither durſt name while their armyes were afoote; ſo much they deſired to part vpon any termes, as in that article of the confirmation 1622. firmation of the prince of Wallachia, where the Poles enterpret it, that they ſhall name him, and the grand ſignior only confirme him, becauſe it was antiently ſoe. You will alſo find, that the peace ſhalbe made, not with reference to theſe, butt to old treaties, and the league offenſiue and defenſiue, which without comprehenſion of the emperour of Germany, meethinks, he ſhould not take in good part. In concluſion, all this is nothing, and ſo great a noiſe was neuer allayed with ſo litle matter of ſubſtance.

WEE expect the great ambaſſador daily; what then will be ſtood vpon, I cannott foretell; ſure I am, they wilbe frends vpon any conditions, the Poles hauing declared warr to the Muſcouite, and in armes againſt the king of Swethland. I lately ſawe letters from Bethleem Gabor to the vizier here, dated in June; I obſerued his ſeale and ſubſcription; that to theſe, he leaues not yet the title of king of Hungary: He excuſeth himſelfe to the emperour that he doth nothing, vpon the death of his wife; he profeſſeth that he hath a great army to renew the troubles in Germany; and for the peace made, he ſaith the emperour hath bought it at the price of many good places. I did intimat, that I thought he was firmly gone to the Chriſtian party, to ſee what opinion they had. The vizier would not endure to heare it, proteſting he was a vaſſaile, and ſworne to the grand ſignior, and that he yett went into the field vnder his banner. Here are daily expected meſſengers from him, when I ſhall better informe your honor what he intends; for here they hope many things of him; but I yett remayne in myne owne beleefe, that he will not flatter adverſity.

I BESEECH your honor, acquaint his majeſtie and the prince with theſe articles, that they may ſee there needed no great helpe to part theſe twoe enemyes; their quarrell was for as little almoſt, as the dukes of Burgundy with the Switzers, for ſheepes ſkynnes: but they are frends yett better cheape then that; neither will gett a ſheep ſkynn by the bargaine.

THERE is nothing elſe worthy your honors trouble, and for what is ſuperfluous in this I craue pardon, erring only in my affection to doe your honor ſeruice. I would omitt nothing, beeing nowe at leiſure, and writing rather out of cuſtome, then choice of matter, which yett you will receiue for his ſake, that is Conſt. 25 July 1622. Your Honors faithfull ſeruant, and humble frend.

To the Lords of his MAJESTY's Counſel.

Right Honorable, my very good Lordes,

I HAVE receiued from your lordſhips two letters at once, of ſeuerall dates, the later beeing copy of the former, wherein you haue pleaſed to take knowledge of the manifold and intollerable loſſes of his majeſties ſubiects trading the Leuant ſeas, by the piratts of Algier and Tunes; and further ſignified his majeſties roiall care and order, and your lordſhips command, that I ſhould endeavour ſome redreſſe, both for the liberty of ſo many in captiuity, for reſtitution, and for preuention of the like robberies in the tyme to come, by a quick and liuely remonſtrance to the emperor, and this ſtate, of his majeſties reſolution not to ſuffer ſo great indignity and dammage for a faithleſs correſpondence.

I hope your honors are well informed, long ſince, of the ſenſe I haue had, according to my ability, of their encreaſe; and that many of my letters haue expreſſed at leaſt myne owne indignation, which wrought ſo farre with mee, as I adventured upon my generall inſtructions, foreſeeing no other way, by preſent armes, and daily hearing the grones of thoſe that ſuffered, to performe as much as your lordſhips haue nowe giuen mee in commiſſion. I am uery gladd to haue receiued this as a warrant for what I haue done, though I neuer doubted of his majeſties and your lordſhips fauourable interpretation of my honeſt and good meaning. Of this I haue, ſome moneths paſt, giuen both his majeſtie and your honors in generall and particular, a large account, ſent by an expreſs, ſeconded with tranſcripts; in all which I craued that pardon which now hath preuented mee. By that aduiſe, I ſent your honors both the copies of the article by mee inſerted into the capitulations, of diuers commands from the grand ſignior ſultan Oſman, aſſiſted with the letters of the great vizier, Capten baſſa, and all other the principall officers of this court, ſo effectuall as nothing can be of more force, nor expected from this place. To carry theſe I procured a gally of purpoſe, with a man of quality ſent from the grand ſignior, in company of an Engliſhman, whom I ordered to repaire with an account to your lordſhips of the ſucceſs, and all theſe renewed againe by the preſent emperor. What effect they will produce, I cannot foreſee; butt the miniſter diſpatched hath undertaken ſo much, that I haue great cauſe to hope for ſuch an iſſue, as may, for the tyme, ſatisfy your honors expectation, and giue ſome eaſe to the merchant, the rather becauſe the plague hath almoſt deuoured thoſe citties, and diſpeopled them, that neceſſity will humble them.

HOW long it may endure, I dare not promiſe, becauſe (though the intention of this court ſeemes ſincere, beeing loath to breake with his majeſtie) yett the little creditt and power this ſtate hath ouer thoſe ſubjects nearer, and more under command, giues cauſe enough to putt no confidence in them; and a company of villaines gathered together, hauing no other meanes to ſuſteyne themſelues, I feare cannot long bridle their deſyre of vnhoneſt gayne.

YOUR lordſhips will perceiue by diuers later aduiſes ſent you of the rebellions, mutinies, and contempt of all lawe and juſtice in this head-citty, how litle is to be expected from their authority; they labour euen for life to maynteyne themſelves in eſtimation and quiett, ſo that they haue no leiſure to conſider other mens complaints: yet I will not faile to renew repreſentation of our iuſt griefes, and to add to it whattſoeuer I am able.

WEE ſtand here daily in doubt of new changes; the ſoldioury though a litle appeaſed, yett they undertake all matters, place, and diſplace, ſo that there is nothing certeyne, that depends upon an unruly and ungouerned multitude; and I cannott foreſee any thing butt ruyne, wherein wee may runne a fortune for a trade not worth the hazard, except things ſettle beyond all hope; which were a great ioy to contemplate afarre off, if wee had not feare to be partakers of the contagion.

THE prouinces yett moue nott, butt ſome follow the example, the ſoldioury murthering the baſſaes and all officers, erecting new at their owne choice, as they haue lately done at Bagdatt.

I HAUE ſent Mr. ſecretary two copies of the treaty of truce with Poland, a conſummation whereof theſe purſue with eager baſenes, knowing that weakenes which they are loath to confeſs. The Duke of Barasky is expected within a moneth to conclude a peace. An inter-nuntio of Poland, this day diſpatched, hath uiſited mee, to giue thanks to his majeſtie in the behalfe of the king, republique and nobility, for his roiall fauour and mediation, at whoſe arriuall the honor of all differences ſhall be referred to his majeſtie.

FOR the lords of Poland here priſoners, (except the miſerably murthered prince Corresky) I haue anew obteyned an abſolute promiſe of their liberty at his majeſties inſtance, vpon the arriuall of the duke, who were not comprehended in the treaty. In the meane tyme, I haue releaſed them of their heauy braceletts, and procured them the comfort of light; for which they haue rendred his majeſtie humble thanks, by their ſeuerall letters to mee, and will upon their releaſe acknowledge it.

YOUR lordſhips letters arriued on the inſtant of the diſpatch of our poſt, who gives not leiſure, beeing at the courteſy of another ſtate; therfore your honors will pardon mee, if I haue omitted any neceſſary matter, and vouchſafe mee both your fauorable relation to his majeſtie of my endeauours, and your honorable protection in my humble deſires to doe your Lordſhipps ſervice.

Conſtantinople, 10th of
August, 1622.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON, with Lord CHICHESTER*'s incloſed.*

My very good Lord,

I HAVE had it long in my thoughts, and was often ſetting pen to paper (but diverted by other occaſions) to invite your lordſhip to that correſpondence betwixt vs, (as well in regard of our publique charge, as privat frendſhip) in which you have prevented me by your letters of the $\frac{17}{27}$th of June, which came to my hands the $\frac{12}{22}$th of this preſent; and therwithall one to the beſt of queenes, and (I thinke)

1622. of women, with a relation of a greater mutability of fortune in that court where you reſide, then in hers and the king her husbands, though theirs be very great, and ſuch as future tymes will wonder at: but as (thanks be to God) they doe both ſurvive their fall, having paſſed many difficultyes and dangers, and ſubſiſt in deſpite of the rage of their ennemyes, though in hard condition; ſo they are yong enough to live and attend ſuch revolution as tyme doth vſually bring, and the vertue and ſtrength of minde they both ſhew in their greateſt afflictions doth very well meritt. From the queene your lordſhip will have a letter herewith; and ſhe hath given me charge to provide for you both their pictures; which our famous painter (Michel of Delph) hath already in hand, and I lay wayte for ſome fitt and ſafe commodity of ſending them to your lordſhip, as one is now preſented, by the fetching a wife (one of Michels neighbours in Delph) to Monſ. Haga, who wilbe ready for her iourney againſt the going of Monſ. Berck of Dort with his wife to Venice (where he is to reſide as ambaſſador) about a month hence; and againſt that tyme, I hope, your pictures wilbe likewiſe in readines. Monſ. Haga (who is diligent in writing, as well to the prince of Orange as to the ſtates, and therin gives good contentment; otherwiſe, I will tell your lordſhip, by the way, in the late mutations wee have had here, he might have bene heaved out of his employment by ſome of his compatriotts, who were ambitious of it) hath advertiſed hether from tyme to tyme, the tumultuous tragedyes of that court; but your lordſhip hath lively repreſented them altogether to the vew, with thoſe intermedia which were neceſſary to helpe our underſtandings, ſo much buſyed of late with our owne affaires, that no marvayle yf our thoughts could not wander ſo far abroad; and now, I would to God, the right vſe were made of thoſe confuſions by chriſtian Princes, in ſhewing themſelves in effect, as they are in name, chriſtians, by a charitable agreement amongſt themſelves, and conſent not to ſuffer ſo fayre an opportunity againſt the common ennemy to eſcape them: but I very much apprehend a contrary event, that thoſe whoſe ambition is too well knowne to the world, and have bene heretofore chiefly reſtrayned by terrori Turqueſqui, ſeeing all ſafe on that ſide for ſome yeares, will not looſe the tyme of following that fortune, with which of late dayes they have bene exceedingly favored, and are at this preſent in greater proſperity then ever.

I need not looke far back for what is paſſed in thoſe parts where wee haue chiefeſt intereſt, aſſuring my ſelf that your lordſhip, though you be far remote, hath had a generall knowledge at leaſt of all matters of moment; yet concerning the Palatinat, it may well be, you will find ſome particularityes in the copy of a letter I ſend herewith, which I receaved ſome while ſince from my lord Chicheſter; ſince which tyme (the king of Bohemia not being able to ſatisfye his army, and as well in that regard, as becauſe the diſorders thereof, whilſt he was preſent, ſhould be no impediment to the treaty which Sir Richard Weſton hath now in hand at Bruxells, being retired to Sedan) count Mansfelt and the duke of Brunſwick have drawne their troopes to the frontiers of France, neare to the biſhoprick of Verdun; from whence the count, as chiefe, having diſpatched an expreſſe meſſenger to this ſtate, with offer of his ſervice and his whole army for three monthes, he entertaynes in the meane tyme treatyes with the infanta at Bruxells, for reconcilement to the emperour, and with the king of France, for ſervice of that crowne, in which ſtate that buſines remaynes at this preſent full of vncertainty; whilſt in the meane tyme part of his army is mutined, the reſt in great confuſion, and the countrey on both ſides in armes againſt him, as well in Luxembourg as Champagne, leſt (as he is variable) he ſhould take ſome vnexpected reſolution. In this interim the imperialiſts proceed in the conqueſt of the Palatinat, having taken Neuſtat and Germerſheim, and made themſelves maſters of the whole country, notwithſtanding my lord Chicheſters proteſts, Heydelbergh, Manheim, and Franckendale, only excepted, in which three townes the king our maſter hath garriſon vnder general Veré; but they are all three, in effect, blocked vp.

Concerning this ſtate, (in which for religion, neighbourhood, and ancient alliance, wee next have intereſt) whilſt the French king is entertayned with troubles, and ours with treatyes, (which two crownes were the wonted ſupporters of theſe provinces) the Spaniard takes the opportunity to aſſayle them in fower quarters at once; two more remote, (as Sluce in Flanders, and Papenmutz, the ſtates new foot betwixt Bon and Collen) both which are blocked up as cloſe as their ſituation will ſuffer; and two in the very heart of the ſtate, as Berghenopzoom now beſieged by the marquis Spinola, and the upper countreyes aſſayled by a camp volant, commaunded by the count Henry Vandenbergh; which ſhewing it ſelf ſomtymes on the one ſide of the Rhyne, and ſomtymes on the other, by benefitt of a bridge, firſt at Berck, now removed as low as Weſell, it is thought the chiefe deſſigne thereof is the paſſage of the Yſell, and whatſoever is done elſe but amuſement; and that being of greateſt prejudice to this ſtate, as opening a way into Holland, (though the loſſe of Berghen would prove little leſſe, by cutting and ſeparating Holland from Zealand) his excellency with the chiefe of his army doe principally intend that ſervice; where nothing is fallen out of moment, ſave onely a camiſada given the 27th of the laſt to his excellencies horſe quarter, wherin two of his horſe captaynes, (the duke of Saxe Weymar, head of that houſe, and Sir William Balfourd) having the outgardes that night, had both the miſfortune to be taken priſoners after the ſame manner, by the fall of their horſes. One of the ennemyes horſe captaynes, called Villy, by engaging himſelf too farre, was likewiſe taken by our men, and about 20 ſlayne and taken on eyther ſide. In revenge hereof, his excellency went in perſon, within two dayes after, with one halfe of his army, vpon a ſurpriſe of Bolduc; for which all things were well prepared, and the enterpriſe conducted with his accuſtomed care: but, as it falls out commonly with the exploicts of this nature, that the greateſt circumſpection is little enough to effect them, and the leſt omiſſion ſufficient to overthrow them; ſo this came to nothing, by fayling in the circumſtance of tyme, as did a former vpon Herentals, in count Henryes march into little Brabant, of which your lordſhip cannot but have heard. 1622.

THE ſiege of Berghen proves very bloudy on both ſides, and it appeares in effect the ſtrength of that towne is not anſwerable to the reputation it gott heretofore by repulſing the prince of Parma, it being commanded by ground of advantage for the ennemy to lodge behinde, both on the north and the ſouth ſide; though the eaſt and weſt be defended on the one ſide by the Scheld, on which are the two forts which keepe the entrance of the towne open; and on the other by the Zoom, the currant whereof being ſtopped, cauſeth a maraſſe on that ſide vnapprochable. The north is the ſide of the greateſt danger for the loſſe of the towne, by reaſon of the approches which in tyme may be made from the ennemyes quarter on that ſide to the north-ſconce vpon the haven; but the ſouth lyeth moſt open to the ennemyes attempts, to which their quarter lyeth very neare, from whence they have their ſeconds from all that part of the army vpon all aſſaults, with great facility. On that ſide lye the Engliſh and Scottiſh, both for offence and defence of the towne, and there have bene hetherto all the encounters: As, firſt, a great ſallye, wherin Seton was ſlayne, and two other captaynes, Coutch and Courtney, hurt; who hath bene ſince ſhott a ſecond tyme by a coup de hazard; and a French cornett ſlayne by the like accident. Soone after, an Engliſh lieutenant and enſigne were there killed in other occaſions: And the 6th of this preſent, at night, was a ſharp aſſault given to a worke thoſe of the towne had rayſed the night before, but putt in weake defence, which was wonne and loſt three ſeverall tymes, and in the end maintayned by neyther, but left full of dead bodyes, the ennemy lodging in the foote thereof, to which they preſently drew their trenches. In that ſervice was ſlayne vpon the place an Engliſh lieutenant, with about 100 men. Coronel Hinderſon (who had the commaund of both the nations Engliſh and Scottiſh) had the honor in perſon to leade thoſe men on, which at puſh of the pyke drave the ennemy laſt out of the worke; where fighting valiantly on the top of the parapett, he receaved a muskett ſhott on the thigh, with which he fell, and with the ſhott and fall brake the bone; of which hurt he dyed here in this towne on Tueſday-night laſt, conſtantly and religiouſly, and is much lamented. Sir Michael Euerard, captayne Carey, and captayne Killegrew were likewiſe ſhott and hurt in that ſervice, but without danger of death. On Saturday night laſt, the 10th of this preſent, the ennemy aſſaulted a halfe moone not far diſtant from that worke; in which attempt they ſlew an Engliſh enſigne with 15 men, and hurt two captaynes, Loulace an Engliſhman, and Caddel a Scottiſhman, who ſucceeded Seton in commaund of that company, but were beaten back, with what loſſe in both thoſe ſervices on that ſide, I cannot ſay vpon any certainty; but the run-awayes (vpon whoſe report can be built little aſſurance) 1622. aſſurance) relate that there were 500 ſlayne in the firſt, and 300 in the ſecond. All this while the ennemy hath not played much with canon, which they reſerve till they draw nearer the towne, and then vnder favour of their batteryes, to which the outworkes on that ſide lye open from all quarters, they will advance their approches very much; and the towne, in the iudgement of ſoldiers of vnderſtanding, without ſome vnexpected delivery, wilbe loſt before winter, notwithſtanding that all things neceſſary are daily ſupplyed for defence thereof, and a renforcement of 21 companyes newly ſent thether with Sir Charles Morgan to commaund in place of coronel Hinderſon.

I KNOW your lordſhip will chiefly hearken after the ſucceſſe of owr treaties. My lord Chicheſters in the Palatinat comes to nothing; his proteſtations being, like a popes monitories, brutum fulmen.

SIR Richard Weſtons at Bruxells doth but now beguin, he hauing bin all this while entertained with diſputes about titles and other circumſtances of his commiſſion, which in the end is (as I underſtand by the laſt letters I had from him) admitted, and by the next he promiſeth more newes of him. My Lord Digbyes did attend Gondomars arriual at Madrid: meane while, both he and Sir W. Aſhton aduertiſe nothing but goode hope, as well for the reſtitution of the Palatinat, as the mariage. The States ambaſſadors in England aduaunce ſlowly in theyr worke; and to couer theyr backwardnes, they would haue the world belieue, that owr Eſt Indian ſocietie will ſtand or fall according to the iſſue of my lord Digbies affaires in Spaine. I know your lordſhip will be particularly aduertiſed how all goeth at home; where, on the 5th of this month, was a general gayle-deliuery, from my lord of Oxford downewards, (for he lies faſt by it) not onely in the Tower for parliament priſoners, but likewiſe ouer all England for prieſts and jeſuits, and other recuſants; which hath ſtirred up ſome waſpiſh miniſters to ſay that in the pulpitt, which hath putt them in the others roomes.

THUS I wiſh your lordſhip all happines, and kiſſe your ladies hands, (whom I honor, though vnknowne vnto her, for accompanying you in that long peregrination) reſting euer

Hagh, the $\frac{19}{29}$ of Auguſt, 1622.

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionatly to do you ſeruice,

From my Lord CHICHESTER to Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

WHEN I came into theſe parts, I found the king of Bohemia in the army compoſed of the marquis of Baden and count Mansfelts forces, over which Manſfelt commaunded in chiefe; they were in the countrey of the Landgraue of Darmſtat, drawne thether with intention to fall towards the river of Mayne, where the duke of Brunſwick lay with purpoſe to paſſe that river, and to ioyne his forces with theirs, and was preparing a bridge over that river, their men being come into a countrey vnharrowed by them, and full of ſpoyle, fell to pillage, and hindred therby the ſucceſſe of their deſſigne, ſpending the tyme in which they might have drawne towards the duke, in vnprofitable plundering the countrey, and gave the ennemy the opportunity to fall betweene them and the river; and the forces of Don Gonzalo and the baron Tilly being ſtrengthned with freſh ſupplies from Bohemia and other parts, and ioyned in one body, fell vpon their ſcattered troopes, and cutt of many of them, and of their tyred and diſeaſed men; and advancing towards the army with their horſe, they fell to a fight, ſuch as it was, in which they loſt men on both ſides; but the blow fell heavier on our ſide then theirs, by reaſon of the ſtraglers killed and taken, as aforeſaid: but the king and his army came of in reaſonable good order, not being routed or diſmayde; but I may ſay, it fell out well for them that the ennemyes foote came not tymely enough to charge them before they were come neare to Manheim, where they left the kings forces, and marched towards the duke of Brunſwick. The count Mansfelt paſt his army over the Neckar and the Rhyne by the bridge of Manheim, and lodged them about that garriſon from the 30th of May untill the 13th of June; within which tyme the marquis of Baden, vpon diſcontent, or ſome other cauſe beſt knowne to himſelf, went in a ſecret manner, on the 10th of June, out of Manheim, without acquainting the king or any man elſe therwith, leaving his foote and moſt of his horſe behinde him; wherby it was conceaved that he meant to returne; and ſending for them ſoone after, it appeared he had quitted the ſervice of the prince elector altogether, as he hath done in a tyme when he moſt needed him. The imperial army paſt the Mayne near Franckford, and on the ſaid 10th of June they charged the duke of Brunſwick with their canon neare Heugſt, where he had made his bridge, over which he might have paſſed his baggage and his whole army the day and night before, yf he had made vſe of the intelligence and adviſe given him; but he meant, undoubtedly, to have given them battell, yf matters had fallen out according to his expectation the day and night before; and that forenoon being miſpent, he gave order to his forces to paſſe the bridge, which they did in a confuſed and diſordered manner, the horſe, foote, and baggage intermixing one with another; by reaſon whereof many fell into the river, and others, ſeeking to paſſe on horſeback, and on foote, by wading and ſwimming, were drowned; which was the greateſt loſſe he had, for few were killed of his ſide, albeit his forces defended the paſſage the whole day; and in the fight, it is ſayd, his ennemyes loſt as many men as he did; for they never purſued him over the river, nor attempted vpon him in his way to Manheim, where he paſſed the bridge, and ioined his forces with count Mansfelts on the 12th of that month. It is true, that upon the report in his army that he was ſlayne in paſſing the bridge, many of his men, as well horſe as foote, ſhifted for themſelves; and miſſing them that night, when they came to lodge together, they thought they had bene drowned or ſlayne; and moſt of them are come unto him ſince that tyme; and both armyes, being ioyned together, make a ſtrong body able to give battle to their ennemyes, and (God aſſiſting) to beate them ſoundly.

AT Manheim they conferred with the king of Bohemia, who finding that his ennemyes perſiſted to perſecute him and his auxiliaries in hoſtile manner, the propoſitions at Bruxells for ſurceance notwithſtanding, to which his majeſty and his chiefes had ſubmitted (as by the king my maſter was required) they thought it fitt to ioyne their armyes, whereof count Mansfelt was generall, and the duke generall of the horſe, and on the 13th they marched thence towards Hagenaw. The king of Bohemia went along with them, my intreatyes and perſuaſions having no power to ſtay him in the Palatinat, as by the king his father in law it was expected he would have done.

ABOUT the 22th of that month, the imperial army taking themſelves now to be maſters of the field, came to Ladenburgh, a towne on the further ſide the Neckar, betweene Manheim and Heydelbergh; and lodging their men up and downe in the ruyned and waſted villages, they gave it out that they would beſiege Heydelbergh, and fell on worke to putt over a bridge for their paſſage ouer the Neckar, which they finiſhed in a few dayes after; in the meane tyme they attempted vpon an outworke, and gott it, out of which they ſhott into the towne, and killed ſome men; but they were ſoone beaten thence with the ſlaughter of more of theirs: by this I was aſſured they meant to beſiege it, yf they were prepared for it, (as I conceaved they were not); but therupon I ſent a gentleman vnto them with my letters, demanding, In whoſe name they were thus advanced before a garriſon of the king my maſters, whoſe commaunders were payd out of his coffers? To this they made for the preſent a formall anſweare without ſubſtance; and the baron Tilly paſſing the bridge with moſt of his forces, marched by the towne without planting of his ordinance, making of approches, or ſitting downe before it, and went about two Duch leagues beyond it towards the countrey of Baden, where he yet lyes; but his men range up and downe the countrey for victualls and ſpoyle, where they can find it with moſt eaſe, and leaſt danger.

DON Gonzalo de Cordoua ſtayed at Ladenburgh with his forces, compoſed for the moſt part of Spaniards, Italians, and Wallons, vntill the 4th of this inſtant, when he began to draw thence towards Oppenheim, and lyes now over the Rhyne not far from Worms. Tilly hath ſent back a regiment for the defence of the bridge; and what deſſigne they have in hand, or what they will doe, is yet to vs unknowne: there are many conjectures and diſcourſes vpon it; a ſhort tyme will declare and make it manifeſt.

FROM count Mansfelts army wee have had no certaine advertiſement ſince the 4th of this inſtant, when it was certifyed that the king of Bohemia, for cauſes beſt knowne to himſelf, was gone privatly towards Sedan, and that the count meant to draw towards the rich countrey of Luxenbourgh, and there to attend the iſſue of the 1622. treaty at Bruxells; but I am advertiſed, that whilſt he lay about Strasbourgh, he gott from the ſmall townes, who could not reſiſt him, betweene 2 and 300 dallers, by way of compoſition, wherwith he gave the army ſome comfort and content: but the prince elector tooke ſuch diſtaſt at the inſolent rapine and intollerable miſdemeanor of the men of warre, that his highneſs complayned thereof by his letters vnto me; and not being able to indure it with patience, was one of the principall motives of his departure from the army as he did. This is the ſubſtance of what hath paſſed ſince I came into theſe parts, and the preſent ſtate of the affaires, to which God give a peacefull and ſpeedy end, yf it be his will; for more affliction can hardly be layde vpon a people, nor a countrey more ruyned then this of the Palatinat, by their owne armyes, as thoſe of their ennemyes.

From her Majeſtie the QUEENE of BOHEMIA.

My Lord,

I GIUE you manie thankes for your letter, and the newes you ſent me of the tragical end of the Turk: I am ſo much aſſured of your loue, that I know you doe wiſh your ſelf in a place more neere, to doe me good; which I aſſure you I doe the ſame; but I ſee it is not good in theſe dayes to be my frend, for they haue euer the worſe luck; but I know that will not alter you. The proſperitie the king hath had in the Palatinat, did not laſt long; for he is conſtrained to leaue his armie, being readie to mutinie for lake of payment, and to retire to Sedan, hauing no help from anie bodie. He went thither, not without danger of his life, by the king my fathers command; and when he was there, he did not ſoe much as maintaine his armie with anie helpe; but chides him, that he was himſelf in perſon in his armie, which hath forced him to leaue it, hauing no other meanes. There is a ſpeache here, that the count Mansfeld will ſerue the French king againſt thoſe of the religion; if he doe, I would he may be hanged for his paynes; but I muſt confeſs I am in little trouble what will become of a worthie coſen germain of mine the duc Criſtian of Brunſwic, who I am ſure you haue heard of; he hath ingaged himſelf onelie for my ſake in our quarell. And if Mansfeld goe to the French king, I know he will not follow him; which makes feare he will be in danger in retiring himſelf hither. I look euerie hower for newes of him and the king, who cannot ſtay long at Sedan, for feare of a ſiege. Honeſt Thom, I pray the be aſſured, that nothing good or euill that can come to me, ſhall euer alter my good oppinion of you; to whom I am euer

Your moſt aſſured frend,

ELIZABETH.

I PRAY commend me to your wife, and continue your writting to me of ſuch newes as you haue, and of the wiſe deedes of your new emperour. Your ould ſeruant Jacke is now ſitting by me, as knauiſh as euer he was; we haue manie volluntieres heere that may ſerue for theire witt your emperour, eſpecially of Engliſh and French; ſo as I am neuer deſtitute of a foole to laugh at; when on goes, another comes.

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT, with advices.

I RECEIUED two letters from the lords of his majeſties pryuy councell of ſeuerall dates; but one in the contents commanding my ſeruice in ſeeking ſome way of redreſs, for the piracies committed vpon the ſea by the authoritye of this port; which I haue already anſwered by two ſeuerall conveyances, I hope, to his majeſties and their honors ſatisfaction. The ſubſtance was, that I had long before performed what was now required of mee, and haue ſent to their lordſhipps, by the company, coppies of all the commands, and letters procured in this court, which were diſpeeded in May laſt by an expreſs ſeruant of the grand ſignior, accompanied with an Engliſhman in a gally of the port, ſo effectuall and full, that if they prevayle not, I haue yet declared, that ther is no remedye to bee expected hence, eyther thorough the diſſimulation here, or want of obedience at Tunes and Algier. I gaue order to the Engliſhman to repayre to the lords from thence, to ſignifye the ſucceſs of his employment, that they might ſoone know the reſolution, and thervpon determine according to their wiſedomes. And though I might well anſwere, That I had done all that was neceſſarie, yet in obſeruance of his majeſties order, I haue taken now occaſion to make the ſame complaynt, and receiue the ſame replye; and finding oportunely a new baſſa for Tunes ready to depart, I haue beene with him, and acquaynted him with his majeſties reſolution, to recall my attendance to his ſubiects, and made him fully to vnderſtand the conſequence of their outragious courſes. I haue giuen him coppies of all the commands and letters ſent before, to take from him the excuſe of ignorance; and finally haue procured another of the ſame tenor, to deliuer into his hands here, in the port by the great vizier. Hee hath promiſed execution therof, and to take ſuch order, that wee ſhall not neede to complayne in his tyme. I deſire your honor to acquaynt his majeſtie, and the lords, with this addition for my diſchardge, humbly deſiring them to accept my endeauor. Your honor will not expect that I can doe much, to great effect, in a place wher is neyther gouerment nor juſtice; and what refuge can ſtrangers ſeeke in capitulations and contracts of paper, when the kyng, the viziers, and all officers, hold their liues and dignityes at the courteſie of the mutined ſouldier? who hath taſted the ſweete of rebellion, and caſt of all awe and reuerence, and cannot eaſely now bee reduced to order, without much blood, and hazard of the whole. Therfore the wiſer men retyre from office and employment, and the inſufficient cauſe their owne dayly change and ruine. The ſouldier adheres to this kyng of their owne creation, and he is indeed their creature, for they gouerne him; but the lawyers and churchmen make ſecrett conuentions, and are practiſing ſome great alteration; they feare not to ſay openly, That the foundation of their ſtate is diſſolued, the kyng unlawfull, all that adhære to him lapſed into hereſye, and to haue deſpiſed the inſtitutions of Mahomet. They dare not yet moue, but they woorke, like wiſe men, by councell, houlding lardge correſpondence with thoſe of their owne coat, and ſpreading their confederacye to all parts of the empire; it is out of doubt they will procure a faction, and kyndle a greater fire then the bauinous flaſhes of the mutinous ſouldier. At Bagdat the captain of the Janizaries is riſen, and hath ſlayne the baſſa, burnt the muſty, and all his kynne; and it is reported, that he hath giuen his daughter in marriage to one Aſlan Begh, a pretender to the ancienct inheritance of a bordering prouince, and that they will cantonize that part. All Aſia ſtands in doubt whom to obey; Cayro is eaten vp with oppreſſion, and yet, which is moſt dangerous, I cannot perceiue that they haue any ſence of theſe ſickneſſes at the court; or are ſo wiſe to diſſemble it.

HERE is newly arriued an ambaſſador of Bethlem Gabor, accompanied with the old count of Torne; they entered yeſterday, and haue had no audience. The enformation encloſed I receiued before they came, from a Turke, that is enterpreter and agent of Bethlem Gabor; therfore I dare committ nothing to the truſt of the playne alphebet. In the generalytye, I am confident, the aduiſe is true; it may err in ſome circumſtances. The count of Torne ſent a ſeruant two dayes before his arriuall, to aduiſe mee of his comminge, ſo as I was enforced to take notice therof. The ſtates embaſſador ſent to receiue them: this day I ſent to welcome the count of 1622. Torne, others hauing done the like. He is lodged apart; I only uſed ceremony to him, and found him very open. They are come for ſome great practice. He ſent mee word, both hee and the ambaſſador of Tranſyluania, had order to acquaynt the ſtates ledger, and my ſelfe, with all their inſtructions. He profeſſed to haue no commiſſion from the kyng of Bohemia; but that by this tyme he knew of his comming, and buſines: he confeſſed playnly, that Bethlem Gabor made peace with the emperor, without any meaning to keepe it; and that the emperor knew as much: That he would neuer doe any thing to the prejudice of Chriſtendome; but that they would make the houſe of Auſtria know, that they could not carry all things ſo light and eaſy as they hoped. He appeares very poore, yet ſpeakes confidently. I haue not, nor meane not to viſitt, nor to medle with the ambaſſador of Bethlem Gabor; but if they both come to mee, I cannot refuſe them, nor ſhutt my doores agaynſt them, leaſt I diſcouer my ſelfe with diſaduantage to the Turkes, and looſe my creditt there: but I deſire his majeſtie and your honor to bee aſſured, that I will keepe within my rule, and doe both his majeſtie and the publicque good ſeruice; and diſcouer many things, wherof his majeſtie may make good vſe.

Torne,

THIS is all I can aduiſe in this ſhort tyme, of which I deſire your honor to enforme his majeſtie, and my lord of Buckingham, to whom I cannot write, becauſe, without cyphar, I dare not truſt theſe diſcourſes, which, diſcouered, might prejudice mee, and looſe the opinion wee haue here, that wee are frends to this port; and if his majeſtie will make any other uſe of my ſeruice, that I may receiue preſent inſtructions.

I SHALBE bold to deliuer my opinion, That I yet thincke Bethlem Gabor diſſembles with both, but that he will adhere to the ſtronger, and moſt for his owne aduantage. He ſends in an ill ſeaſon hither, vnlikely to haue any great help to farther his deſſignes: but I am aſſured, if he may, which I ſhall ſoone judge by the anſwere, he is moſt likely to thriue by theſe; and theſe will doe what they can, to ſerue themſelues by him. I ſhall by the next enforme your honor more at lardge; humbly deſiring you to confirme his majeſtie in the aſſurance, that I will not tranſgreſs his commands, nor doe any thing to his diſſeruice; for which, I pray, giue your woord, as for one that is

THE buſines of this letter, concerning the ambaſſador of Tranſyluania, was written in cyphar.

Adviſe ſent Mr. SECRETARY in cyphar, 24 Aug. 1622.

The cauſe of the diſpatch and inſtructions of the ambaſſador of Bethlem Gabor, and the count of Torne, arrived at Conſtantinople, 22 Aug. 1622.

This relation was given mee by Zulpheckar chiaus, that is, enterpreter, and a kynd of agent for the prince of Tranſyluania, 4 dayes before their arriuall, comming to giue mee knowledge of their approach.

FIRST, The ambaſſador of Gabor had order to excuſe his maſter, and to declare the reaſons why he made peace with the emperor without the knowledge and conſent of this port; which were, That the warr now continued 3 yeares in Hungarie, had ſo ruinated and deſolated the countrye, that it was impoſſible for him to ſtay longer in the feild, and to manteyne an army; for the great famine and ſcarcetye of all things, which the ſoldeireye ſuffered, and could from no place bee ſupplied; ſo that, if he had not accepted of a peace offered, he had beene enforced to quitt the countrye for neceſſitye, and, by his ſeeming flight, haue left the enemie victor; therfore he was conſtreyned to winne tyme, and to returne into Tranſyluania, to refreſh his men of warr, and to reenforce them; as alſo his owne preſſing affayres calling him backe, his brother, whom he had left gouernor in his abſence, hauing aduiſed him that the kyng of Poland, at the inſtigation of the emperor, by intelligence with ſome of the principall lords of Tranſyluania, did practiſe a reuolt, and promiſed ayd to make a new prince, that ſhould wholy depend vpon the empire

1622. and Poland; at leaſt wiſe, hereby to force him to retire out of Hungarye, and to diuert the grand ſignor from the invaſion of Poland, to defend their attempts agaynſt Tranſiluania: laſtly, ſeeing the grand ſignor had ſuddenly concluded a peace with the Poles, he feared he ſhould bee left alone to the burthen of the warr; in which the kyng of Poland beeing at eaſe, might aſſiſt the emperor, which he was not able to ſuſtayne; therfore he was content to take the oportunitye to accept of that, at the inſtance of the emperor, which he ſhould haue beene forced to doe by neceſſitye.

NOTWITHSTANDING, he had order to proteſt, That his maſter had no meaning to keepe the peace, which he had made only for aduantage, to gett tyme to viſitt Tranſyluania, and to ſecure and eſtabliſh his owne intereſt there, and to recouer monie and other neceſſarie meanes to refreſh his armie; which he hauing now done, and his troopes on the borders, he determined within 20 dayes to goe to Caſſouia, wher he would bee ready to take euery occaſion, referring himſelfe for order in all, to the opinion, will, and command of this port, as he that was moſt affectionat, and faythfull, and would ſo remayne, not doubting to receiue requiſite ayd and ſuccor in all his occaſions.

SECONDLY, That he ſhould ſignifye to this ſtate, That diuers of the principall lords and others of the proteſtant party in Poland, had ſecretly ſent to his maſter to make offer, That if he would giue them aſſurance of fayth, acceptance, and ayd, that they would by ſome meanes procure the death of their kyng, and after, by the creditt and authoritye of their faction, cauſe his election; becauſe they found, that during the preſent raygne, they ſhould neuer liue in quiett, nor could euer maynteyne a good and firme peace with the Ottoman port, by reaſon of the affinitye and leagues betweene this kyng and the emperor, whom he was euer ready to mooue and aſſiſt agaynſt the grand ſignor; as alſo to ſtirr vp vnderhand the Coſſacques to make incurſions by the Black-ſea, which would at laſt draw another dangerous warr vpon them, and hazard their whole eſtate; which they beeing deſirous to prevent, and conſidering the great affection borne to his maſter the prince of Tranſyluania, by the grand ſignor, and all the Ottoman court, they did aſſure themſelues, by his election, that they ſhould reſt in ſafety, and ſecure peace, and, in all occaſions, they ſhould bee rather aſſiſted then oppreſſed by the Turkes: which propoſition if he did embrace, they would give aſſurance for the Coſſacques, that they ſhould not only deſiſt from all attempts, but liue in obedience and at the deuotion of the grand ſignor, wherby the czars borders and traficques would be ſecured; and that in this ouuerture, he ſhould alſo demand the adviſe, opinion, and councell of this court, and know how far he ſhould therin bee aſſiſted, if he ſhould vndertake yt.

THIRDLY, That he ſhould aduertiſe, That the ſtate of Venice had lately and ſecretly ſent to Bethlem Gabor his maſter, and made offer to enter into league and confederacye vpon the ſame conditions that they had made with the eſtates of the Vnited Prouinces: which meſſage he had anſwered by another his owne ſeruant ſent thither, That he was very willinge to embrace their offer, and to enter into the leauge; but that he could not conclude any thing, vntill he had aduiſed with the Ottoman court; and that therfore he ſhould enforme and aske leaue, and take councell of this port; declaring his owne opinion, That this motion was not to bee refuſed.

FINALLY, To aſſure the grand ſignor of his maſters ſincere mind and good affection for the exaltation and ſeruice of the Ottoman empire.

CONCERNING the count of Torne; That he beeing retyred to Bethlem Gabor, he was deſired to accompany his ambaſſador, and to aſſiſt in the treaty; and had farther order, as procurador from the proteſtant party in the Seaven Provinces, to giue aſſurance, in their names, That they were conſtant and firme in their firſt will and deſire, ſignifyed by their ambaſſadors now two yeares paſt; and to refreſh the memorie of their afflictions in this court, and to promooue ſome commiſeration of them; and to renew and confirme the league and confederacye made in their behalfe; and to declare their deuotion and affection to this port; and to make knowne, by diuers reaſons and diſcourſes, the weakneſs of the emperor, and his hatred to the Ottoman ſtate, and how eaſy any entrepriſe would bee agaynſt him: in concluſion, to procure their help and ſuccor by all meanes; prouided euer to vnite, and to treate joynctly to one end with the ambaſſador of Tranſyluania.

To the KING.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

BY the laſt poſt I ſent Mr. ſecretary Caluert adviſe of the arriuall of the count of Torne, with an extraordinarye embaſſador of the prince of Tranſiluania to this port: I had ſome cauſe to ſuſpect their buſines was of important conſequence; therfore I made meanes to procure ſome knowledge of their inſtructions, which I then ſent, as beeing all I had obteyned.

I SINCE fynd I needed not have beene ſo curious, for they brought mee a letter from the prince, the coppy wherof I ſend your Majeſtie, and the ſtile may caſt ſome ſuſpition vpon mee, that I haue giuen ſome cauſe of that aſſumed aſſurance. They had inſtructions to communicate all with mee, as they pretend; which your Majeſtie will fynd they haue not done, and yet they haue opened enough to giue mee cauſe to diſavow them: I may at firſt ſeeme in ſome fault, to haue had any conference with them; but your Majeſtie will, I hope, perceuue how I was engaged by fatall neceſſitye, and without my owne conſent; and yet, ſeeing it pleaſed your Majeſtie to impoſe vpon mee ſo ſtrict a command, to doe true ſeruice to the emperor, in all occaſions for the generall peace, I thincke ther was neuer a more proper oportunitye; and I may beleeue it was the prouidence of God, that I ſhould thus erre, if it bee an error; for I may aſſume to my ſelfe to haue ſtayd, and preuented a practice very dangerous to the publicque quiett of Chriſtendome, and therin, in the end, fullfilled your Majeſties commands. Whatſoeuer I haue done, if any thing amiſs, I haue giuen a lardge and true account to your Majeſtie by Mr. ſecretarie, humbly deſiring your gratious and fauorable conſtruction. I doubt not your Majeſtie will fynd the practice ſtrange enough I haue oppoſed, beeing drawen into yt, with intent of obedience and duty; I proteſt, vpon that alleadgeance I owe your Majeſtie, I haue ſhadowed nothing, good or bad; and I will not farthur trouble you, but in all humilytye refer your Majeſty to the diſcourſe it ſelfe, which though long, to clear my ſelfe from all jealouſye, and to open all the parts and paſſages I was enforced vnto: beſeeching your Majeſtie to beleeue, that I haue no purpoſe nor deſire to buſy my ſelfe, farthur then may tend to your Majeſties honor and ſeruice, and I hope the concluſion will procure mee your Majeſties acceptation.

AND becauſe the name of his highnes the prince elector is ſome tyme uſed in this negotiation, I am bound for his honor to avow, that both by the proteſtation of the count of Torne, and by all other circumſtances, he hath no knowledge nor conſent in this practice, which I haue in his name here cleared. I dare importune your Majeſtie for nothing more but pardon, and a good interpretation of Conſt. 7. Sept. 1622. Your Majeſties moſt humble ſeruant and ſubject,

THO. ROE.

To Mr. Secretary CALVERT, with advice of the treaty with Count de TORNE, B. GABOR's Agent.

BY the laſt poſt, I ſent you in cypher ſuch aduertiſements of our affaires here, as I then knewe, the copy whereof, for caution, you ſhall herewith receiue: your honor will thinke mee very tædious, when you ſhall ſee the large diſcourſe that accompanyes it, and perhapps find it ſtraunge, that they are ſcatteringly deliuered by diuers hands; for the one, becauſe I had ſo ſtrict charge from his majeſtie to aſſiſt the affairs of 102, and to take care of the generall peace; and from your honor, not to take notice of 119, and his miniſters; and ſeeing I haue bene enforced by neceſſity to doe both, and, I may ſay, called in by prouidence, (for otherwiſe I am aſſured ſome troubles would haue enſued, at leaſt wiſe the name of 50 bene traduced) I haue thought it my duty to giue his majeſtie a particular account of euery circumſtance; for the other, the iealous eye of 179 is ſo open vpon us (and he hath knowledge that I haue had ſecrett conference with 152); and their cuſtome is, when they know or ſuſpect any great buſines, they either open our letters, or lay them aſide, vntill tyme haue diſcouered all vnto them. To preuent which, I haue deuided myne, and made a falſe packett, which if his curioſity breake, he and 205 ſhall find worke enough in an empty cypher; if yt arriue with your honor, you will pardon mee, and burne it. 1622.

WHAT theſe embaſſadors haue treated here, you will finde by the diſcourſe: I haue then nothing to doe, but to cleare myſelfe; for the letter of 119 will caſt ſuſpition enough vpon mee, that I had ſome intelligence with him, or his miniſters: and though the ſuperſcription bee not the ſame character with the in-ſide, and that I may alleadge it was added here, and ſo might be fitt for any; yett I confeſs, I beleeue ſome ſeruaunt of 50 had giuen ſome character, and ſome hope of mee, that I might be made an inſtrument of their ends: butt I proteſt, vpon the faith I beare to God, I neuer gaue any ground for this thought; I neuer had any reference, or intelligence, or communication, nor ſo much as a complement from nor with 119, nor any of his ſeruaunts.

YETT, it ſeems, his aſſurance of mee was ſuch, as he gaue inſtructions to communicate all with mee; but the caution I gaue myſelfe, and the warning of 180, who is jealous of mee, made them halue with mee. They haue not mentioned one word to mee of any practize againſt 135, becauſe they vnderſtood that I had negotiated for the peace of that kingdome, and had it in eſpeciall care; neither of any intelligence with 205, who are ſo wary, that they forbeare any ſhowe, ſo much as by viſitts. I will not ſay that the republique is priuy to this negotiation, abſolutly to make the warre, as it is propounded, to roote oute 102, and to conquer thoſe parts of 101, for 151; butt I know they haue ſecrett correſpondence, and haue made an alliance and confederacy with the prince, for the defenſiue at the leaſt. Your honor will perceiue how neceſſary it was for mee to take knowledge of their treaty, and they themſelues had engaged mee therevnto, hauing acquainted 152 with their hopes of mee, and referred him to mee as to a party of theirs, before euer they asked my conſent, or communicated any thing with mee, which then to haue denyed, had bene too groſſe diſſimulation; and, beeing called to councell, to haue giuen way to ſo many improbabilityes, had bene diſobedience to his majeſtie, and treaſon to the quiett of Chriſtendome; then I haue noe other fault butt this, that I ſhutt not my dores againſt them, which had bene vnciuill; butt I hope his majeſtie will impute none to mee, for I haue obeyed fully his commands, and I may boaſt that I haue done good ſeruice to the publique; for as no man had the honor to be called to adviſe with, ſo I am aſſured, if I had not ſtrongly reſiſted, they had obteyned ſo much as had broken the peace, and troubled the affaires of 101. What the reſolution of this port is, your honor will perceiue by the concluſion: they haue promiſed to doe nothing without me: I haue driuen it all to an equall ballancing the affaires betweene 102 and 119, to maynteyne the peace as it ſtands. I cannot iudge of ſo great matters what wilbe the ſucceſſe, nor foreſee the iſſue of the treaty at Bruxells; but I am ſure, if his majeſtie had vſe of my ſeruice here, I could amuze 102, and bring him to good termes: not that I would euer conſent to vſe the armyes of 151; for I could keep the reynes in myne owne hand, of thoſe things which I moued and directed; but becauſe I haue no licence, nor inſtructions, I haue and only will walke in the path of obedience. Since the firſt viſitt, theſe ambaſſadors haue neuer once ſent to mee, nor taken knowledge of mee, whether becauſe of my playne dealing, or that they haue found that I haue croſſed part of their deſſignes, I know not: what I haue done, I think, is ſo ſecrett, that they may ſuſpect by effects, butt they cannott accuſe mee; for 152 will neuer confeſs to them, that he hath taken counſell of mee. Butt there moues a contrary faction, 180 viſitts all, proteſts, ſtirrs, and doth whatſoeuer he can with the other viziers and mufti, to promoue at leaſt ſo much as may diſturbe 102, that 88 may be diuerted to aſſiſt him; for that is the ground of his profeſſion, and he therein followes his owne rules.

I HAUE aduiſed to Sir Francis Netherſall the ſubſtance of this negociation, and how farr the name of 50 hath bene vſed, that he may be prepared to defend his owne honor, if he ſhalbe ſuſpected or accuſed; which to cleare, beſides the proteſt of the count of Torne, by all circumſtances I dare affirme his highnes hath no knowledge thereof; I will not ſay ſoe for all his ſeruaunts, that haue ſuffered with him, and are perhapps forced to catch hold of any brambles in their deſperate eſtate.

1622. To giue ſome account what 119 ends and hopes were in this embaſſage, ſeeing I haue often, in my former, declared my opinion, that I thought he would noe more looke vpon this court in diſſention, butt enioy the peace he had made with 102, to his aduantage; the coldnes of his agents here, and their colder enterteynment, and reaſon itſelfe, made mee of that judgment; butt ſeeing the contrary by this effect, your honor will giue mee leaue to contemplate the cauſes thereof.

He is reduced to a deſperat eſtate, and fearing (though he pretend otherwiſe) that if 102 make peace in 101, he may turne all his reuenge vpon him, who hath bene the meanes of his great troubles; therfore he would make the greater ſhowes of frendſhipp and ſeruice nowe to this port, to amuze and caſt doubts in the mind of 102, that he may the ſecurer enioy himſelfe and his territories; or elſe, hauing concluded peace, without conſulting this port, he would now ſeeme to flatter, by making ouer-great offers, and hath putt a trick of ſtate vpon them by an ouerture, which he in judgment muſt think impoſſible to be accepted, and yett it might recompence his failing and neglect. Sure I am, he ſent in ſuch a ſeaſon, as he had no reaſon to hope to obteyne his ends propoſed, when hee might know the inclynation of this ſtate to peace, and their vnfittnes for a warre. If otherwiſe, and that he meant really, he hath very ill intelligence here, as indeed I find both parts poorely inſtructed, and ignorant; notwithſtanding his confident aſſeueration, and great offers made, did almoſt neceſſitate this ſtate to beleeue him, and to prouide for their owne quiett by beginning the fire farre from home; which doubtleſs had bene kindled, if I had not bene made priuy to it, and opened the eyes of the councellors here by demonſtration and reaſon.

I knowe, that whatſoeuer can be done by thoſe that affect the warre, (of which party there are ſome of the viziers, tranſported with feare and hate) wilbee practized this weeke; butt I am confident that nothing wilbe reſolued without my knowledge; and I ſhall endeauour to keepe all things in their preſent eſtate, vntill I haue further inſtructions, though I can doe nothing, neither doe I think it fitt to perſwade the deſertion of 119; for he is a tributary, and his ſubſiſtence will not be vnprofitable. If his miniſters proceed to maynteyne their aduiſe of this combination, to the danger of a breach, and invaſion of Chriſtendome, I will not faile to proteſt openly againſt it, which I haue yett done priuatly.

It remayneth then, that your honor be pleaſed to preſent theſe to his majeſtie (to whom I haue briefely written) with fauorable conſtruction, and to communicate it firſt to my lord of Buckingham, to whom I faile not in reſpect; butt beeing enforced to make my diſpatch thus ſcattered, I could not ſo properly ſend the copies as to your honor. I beſeech you alſo acquaint the prince with the ſtraightneſſe I was in, humbly referring myſelfe to your relation, wherein you may preſerue mee from all blame, and enforme as much as you think requiſite.

I live here very barely enformed, my frends forgetting mee vtterly: I haue aduiſed often to Venice and the Hage, of things fitt for our correſpondence, as other ambaſſadors doe, butt neuer receiued one lyne from them; if they haue no pleaſure in our affaires, the labour is eaſily ſpared. Mr. Branthwait neglects mee, and I know not to whom to lament. I beſeech your honor, lett one of your ſecretaries caſt away ſo much vpon mee, as that I may think I liue in chriſtian conuerſation. I may faile in judgment, deſirous to ſerue his majeſtie; but neuer in will, of which I hope you wilbe aſſured, and ſuerty for

Your Honors humble ſeruant.

Septemb. 1622.

The 24th Auguſt, hauing receiued a meſſage from the count of Torne, That he was comming to this port as a baniſhed man, in the company of a Tranſiluanian ambaſſador; and that for the honor he bare to his majeſtie, and ſeruice to the king of Bohemia, he could doe no leſſe butt ſalute mee; I ſent a ſeruant to bid him welcome, with this reſeruation, That I hoped he had no deſſigne in his comming, that might trouble the generall peace of Chriſtendome; for in ſuch caſe, I ſhould be ſorry; butt to his owne perſon I was ready to doe any courteſy. To this he replyed with large and open diſcourſe, butt declared himſelfe in no particular; only confeſſed, he had no authority nor negociation from, nor in behalfe of, the king of Bohemia.

THE 29th Auguſt, the ambaſſador of Bethleem Gabor, of whom I had not att all 1622. taken notice, ſent a meane perſon to aduiſe mee, That if I would write any thing to his maſter, that he diſpatched a poſt that day, and that he deſired to viſitt mee the next: he ſent mee word, that he had audience from the vizier, who complayned that I had neuer viſited him ſince his hauing the ſeale, nor taken knowledge of him; wherby I collected, he had mentioned mee to the vizier, as a frend to his buſineſs.

I ANSWERED, That I had no reference, nor occaſion to write to the prince his maſter, as not knowing what he meant to make that motion; for his viſitt, that I had not merited ſo much reſpect, butt that I would receiue him as became mee; but withall I deſired him, ſeeing I was vnacquainted with his buſines, not to caſt the enuy of others vpon mee; but if he pleaſed to viſitt the French ambaſſador and others in port, he ſhould be welcome to mee. That I wondered why there ſhould be queſtion betweene the vizier and him concerning mee, beeing I had neuer ſeene either of them; but that I would the next day viſitt the vizier; and therefore he might be pleaſed to make vſe of his tyme to others, before mee.

THE next morning came the drogaman of the count of Torne, to aduiſe mee, that his maſter and the Tranſilvanian embaſſador would come to mee in the afternoone.

I ANSWERED, I could not refuſe them, whenſoeuer they came; but I deſired them to ſpare mee that day, for eſpeciall buſineſs; and him, to commend mee to the earle; and if he would doe mee a fauour, or take my counſell, that he ſhould viſitt all the ambaſſadors, if he had publique affaires to treat, or elſe I ſhould miniſter occaſion of ſuſpect, to enterteyne them in a publique quality.

THE 31th in the morning by ſeauen of the clock, they both came into my houſe, and alighted, without giuing mee further warning. I tooke myſelfe ſurpriſed, and ſent my ſeruaunts to excuſe mee, that I had no aduiſe of their comming, and that I was vnready and vnfitt to receiue them. They replyed, it was their fault in omitting ſo much ceremony; that they would goe to the States ambaſſador, and viſitt him, and retorne againe. At 10 a clock they came, and I receiued them courteouſly. As ſoone as they were ſett, the ambaſſador deliuered a letter to the count of Torne, and he to mee, ſaluting mee in the name of the elect king of Hungary, and prince of Tranſiluania: vntill that tyme I neuer heard of a letter, which I read, and the contents declare themſelues.

THE count of Torne beganne, That the elect king, for the good correſpondence betweene his majeſtie and him, and for the loue and zeale he bare to the king of Bohemia, for whoſe ſeruice and advancement he would ſpend his life and meanes, could not omitt, hauing notice of my reſidence in this port, and my good affection to the publique cauſe, (for ſo hee termed it) hauing many propoſitions to make to this empire, to communicate them with mee; and therfore had written that letter of credence, and gaue his ambaſſador commiſſion to acquaint mee with all his negotiation, and to take my councell, and to deſire my aſſiſtance therein; and that therefore, if they had ymportuned mee, they deſired to be excuſed; for they were bound to deliuer the letter, and to performe their instructions.

THE count of Torne tooke the right hand, yett diſclaymed from beeing embaſſador, but euer called the other il ſignior legato: yett the letter of Bethleem Gabor mentioneth only the count of Torne diſpeeded to the Ottoman port, pro certis ac arduis negotijs, without the name of ambaſſador.

I PREUENTED his proceeding, deſirous to giue him ſome caution. I thanked the prince of Tranſiluania for his fauour and profeſſed affection to mee; but I wondred at the ſtyle of his letter, and vpon what ground he ſhould conceiue ſo great hopes of mee. I was well aſſured, that he knew the diſpoſition of his majeſtie my maſter, by all his publique actions; that he deſired to promoue and maynteyne the generall peace of Chriſtendome, and to that end had eſpecially ſent and kept mee in this place. I proteſted (and therfore deſired them to motion nothing to mee, that ſhould giue mee occaſion to diſclayme them) that his majeſtie had giuen mee in eſpeciall recommendation, and vehemently repeated it in his inſtructions, that I ſhould endeauour, not only to preſerue the peace betweene the emperour, the king of Poland, and all other chriſtian princes and ſtates, with this port: butt that I ſhould hinder and diuert (as farre as in mee lay) all occaſion and reſolution of breach with 1622. them; and that I ſhould declare to this ſtate, That his majeſties publique intereſt in the peace of Chriſtendome, was more deare to him, then any priuat reſpect. For myne owne particular, whatſoeuer my affections had bene, I ſerued nowe in another quality; and my actions were not myne owne, but would bee interpreted as the commands of his majeſtie my maſter: That I knew well the eyes of other ambaſbaſſadors would be vigilant vpon mee, eſpecially the miniſters of the emperour; and that, by a preiudice and fore-opinion conceiued of mee, I was more obnoxious to a malignant eye then another man; which his majeſtie had taken notice of: and that therefore I deſired them to conſider mee, and my caſe; and not to expect things of mee, without the rule of my maſters inſtructions, nor to importune mee by any ſhowe of negociation; which would doe them no aduantage, but rather expoſe mee to envy, and perhaps to a declaration againſt them.

THE count of Torne replyed; That he was ſorry I had putt a bridle in his mouth, to reſtrayne him from the full deliuery of that he had in commiſſion; which to haue heard, could infect no man, beeing they were deſirous to take my councell therein: but ſeeing I had ſo limitted them, he would yet, to fullfill the command of the prince, and to auoid ſuſpicion of worſe, acquaint mee (if I pleaſed) with the generall cauſe of their comming to this port, and of their ayme and pretences here.

I CONFESS I had an ytching eare, and was curious enough to know all; becauſe I would compare their owne relation with that which I formerly had, and that which I collected out of their actions and diſcourſe with the Turks, and from the States ambaſſador; ſo that I anſwered him, I would not ſhutt vp my eares againſt any thing; I could ſtopp it, before it came to my heart; and therefore, what he thought fitt to communicate with mee, I would giue him my beſt and faithfull adviſe therein. With this motion he divided himſelfe with mee, and deliuered that which followeth; refrayning to acquaint mee with two parts of his inſtructions mentioned in the former diſcourſe, as that practice of Poland, and the treaty of confederacy with Venice, and the truth of their ouerture to the Turk, which after I diſcouered.

HEE then begann with a great proteſtation, That he would neuer be an inſtrument to drawe in the Turk to the preiudice of any part of Chriſtendome; butt that they only came to ſeeke meanes to ſubſiſt, and defend themſelues from oppreſſion; therfore they had order to excuſe to this port the peace made by Bethleem Gabor with the emperour, which yett was done by meere neceſſity; the cuntry of Hungary hauing ſuſteyned the miſeries of warre 3 yeares, was no longer able to feed the armyes: therefore all the nobility cryed out, That they would haue peace; and the ſoldiour himſelfe was weary; wherby the elect king was forced to take ſuch conditions as he could procure for the eaſe and ſecurity of the proteſtants, and ſuch his frends as had taken his part, and for reſtitution of many to their eſtates and goods; but yet alway with this reſeruation, If the grand ſignor ſhould approue thereof; otherwiſe it ſhould bee underſtood but as a truce: That during the warr in Hungary, both the Poles made roades into Tranſiluania, and practized the cuntry: and the grand ſignor making peace ſodainly, and though the vizier had enformed, that they had comprehended Tranſiluania in the articles of treaty with Poland, yett the prince had cauſe to feare, and to provide in tyme for that, which he foreſawe he ſhould be enforced to by neceſſity: but that ſince the concluſion, the emperour had kept no article of the agreement, but, contrariwiſe, oppreſſed all the proteſtants, and confiſcated many, refuzing reſtitution, and many ſuch other things, to which he was bound by the treaty; aggrauating very vehemently the common-place of the proceeding of the houſe of Auſtria, to root out all thoſe of the religion their oppoſites with fire and ſword, and ſo to monarchize in Germany. Whereupon the elect king had ſent his chauncellor to demaund reaſon of the commiſſioners of the emperor in Hungary; who ſlighted the inſtance, and made anſwere, That thoſe articles were not eſſentiall to the peace, but inſerted only pro forma. To which the chauncellor replyed, That his maſter did not expect to be ieſted at, eſpecially in a matter of that conſequence; therefore he deſired them to aduiſe the emperour, That if he brake in the parts, the prince would breake in the whole, and ſeeke juſtice by the ſword; and that he ſhould take heed he did not drawe vpon him a ſecond warr, which would proue more dangerous then the firſt; ſeeing, by experience, all the proteſtants, both in Hungary and in the Prouinces, would be reduced to deſperation, finding no ſecurity in his promiſes: notwithſtanding, that the emperour continued in his reſolution to performe nothing. Whereuppon, the Prouinces were all againe ready to reuolt; and that the ſonne of the count of Torne was in armes in Sileſia, and had taken Glotz; that the people were up in Morauia; and, finally, that euen thoſe of Hungary, that had preſſed the peace, did now reſolue, rather to dye in the warre, then endure the ſlauery; and therfore the elect king, with their conſents, had ſent hither to demaund ayd and ſuccours.

I ANSWERED, That in caſe the emperour did breake the peace, the prince of Tranſiluania was free to make his owne warre, or might haue recourſe to a dyett, as nowe made a prince of the empire; butt that I could not ſee how hee could demaund any aid from hence, without occaſioning and opening a way to the Turk to enter into Germany; therfore, in this generality, I could not approue the propoſition, except they declared playnly what they intended.

THEN the count of Torne anſwered, firſt, That the emperour was very weake, and vnable to defend his owne patrimony; and therefore now was the tyme for the oppreſſed to raiſe their heads; and that therefore Bethlem Gabor hauing in readynes 30000 ſoldiours armed, they had commiſſion to moue the grand ſignor to giue them firſt a letter to the emperour; That whereas the prince of Tranſiluania, his tributary, had made a peace with him, vpon ſuch conditions, as both he, and the other prouinces, who had two yeares ſince ſent their ambaſſadors to him, to putt themſelues vnder his protection, and accordingly had entered league with this port, and were willing to continue in the ſame, might liue in peace and ſecurity, and enioy their lands, goods, and conſciences, which he was bound in honor to maynteyne; butt that, contrary both to the ſaid concluſion of peace, and termes of amity, which the emperor ought to ſhow to all thoſe that were vnder the banner of the port, hee had not only broken all the articles of the treaty, which the grand ſignor had approued, ſo long as the emperour, of his part, kept them ſyncerly, but alſo inuaded king Frederick in his realmes of Bohemia, and ſtirred vp his ſubiects to rebellion againſt him; and hauing taken aduantage of a battell, expelled him his kingdome, and baniſhed diuers noblemen his ſeruants and ſubiects, and vſed great cruelty to the inhabitants of the prouinces in league with the port: wherefore he thought it agreeable with his honor, to admoniſh him forthwith to deliuer the crowne of Hungary to Bethlem Gabor, and to reſtore king Frederick to Bohemia, and the prouinces dependant; or elſe he ſhould be enforced to aſſiſt them for recouery of their right, and to expell him not only out of all thoſe dominions, but out of his owne inheritance, which, they could make appeare, was now very eaſy to doe.

HEERE I interrupted him, and deſired to be reſolued, firſt remembring that they profeſſed they would not draw the Turk into Chriſtendome, Whether they thought, that, vpon a letter, the emperor would giue vp two kingdomes, and ſo many goodly eſtates? If not, What then they aymed at?

HEE anſwered; They did not expect that the emperour would reſigne them for words; butt they had alſo inſtructions to procure a commiſſion plenæ potentiæ, to Bethlem Gabor, and the baſſa of Buda, (who had alway other 30000 ſoldiours in Hungary and Boſna in readineſs) without attendance of further order from the port, to conſult and reſolue where and in what manner to beginne the warre; and that the baſſa ſhould aſſiſt him in perſon, with ſuch army as they two ſhould vpon the place find conuenient; becauſe the reſolutions from this court were long, and diſcouered before the execution, (by which demaund, I obſerue, that if any intention vpon Poland, it lyes hidden in this commiſſion); which if they could obteyne, then they ſhould be ready to take the firſt opportunity; and determining to leaue 6000 men about Caſſouia to make guard againſt the Poles, and 4000 to enterteyne a baron of Hungary, who had euer bene oppoſite, they would enter into Sileſia, Morauia, or Bohemia, as occaſion offered; and reconquer all thoſe cuntries, and reſtore them freely to king Frederick, Bethlem Gabor contenting himſelfe with Hungaria.

I DEMAUNDED then, If this were not to bringe the Turk into Germany? He replyed, Of neceſſity they muſt vſe the help of their army, butt in ſuch proportion, as they would euer bee maſters of the field, and of all the townes and fortreſſes.

I ASKED, If this then were all that they pretended? To which they anſwered, It was the ſubſtance.

I DESIRED then the count of Torne to obſerue well my anſwere, and to conſider whoſe ſeruant I was; a king's, that had euer maynteyned his honor to deale

1622. ſyncerely and clearly with all his allies, eſpecially in occaſions betweene them and the Turks: That my inſtructions were generally againſt the body of their propoſition: That I had order to nouriſh peace, and to doe all good offices for the emperour, and all Chriſtian princes, and neuer to conſent to any inuaſion vppon them; ſo that I ſhould bee forced to proteſt againſt them. For the prince of Tranſiluania, he was free to maynteyne his owne quarrells: butt for the elector Palatine, king of Bohemia, I was bound to diſclayme, in his name, that he had any ſuch intention to accept of the guift offered, or that he did conſent to this motion; becauſe I had lately receiued letters from his ſecretary, wherein no mention was made of any ſuch embaſſage; but adviſe giuen mee, That his highnes had conſented to a treaty of peace with the emperour: That I knew his majeſtie my maſter, by his authority, had procured a conuention at Bruxells, where the commiſſioners on both parts were in negotiation, and aſſured hope of a good concluſion, and reſtitution of the patrimony and honor of the electorat: That the prince had referred himſelfe to his majeſtie, who ſtood engaged for him; and that therefore I was aſſured he would neuer conſent vnder-hand to practize warre by meanes of the Turk, contrary to his reputation and faith; whereby he might giue iuſt occaſion for the emperour to breake off all treaty, and his majeſtie to deſiſt, and leaue him to the inconſtancy of his owne fortunes; and if that Bethleem Gabor vſed his name without his conſent, I thought he did him wrong, and that the miniſters of the emperor would make aduantage of it againſt his honor.

HEE replyed, with proteſtation, That king Frederick had no intereſt nor knowledge of the motion; butt that Bethleem Gabor was aſſured, That although he had putt himſelf wholly into the diſpoſition of his majeſtie, the emperour would neuer reſtore his cuntryes; and that thereof they had full knowledge by letters intercepted, and other pregnant proofes: That king Frederick was alſo ſo perſwaded; and notwithſtanding he was content, to ſatisfy the king of England, to make tryall of that way, yett he could not conclude any peace with the emperour without the conſent of the ſtates of the Vnited Provinces, and Bethleem Gabor, who, nowe that he had a good army, and was proſperous in the field, would neuer conſent vnto it: ſo that here was aſſured tyme and aduantage loſt, which Bethleem Gabor, by tymely preparation, would counterpoize.

I ANSWERED; For myne owne part, I was bound to beleeue my owne aduiſes, and to followe myne own inſtructions: I was ſure the king of Bohemia had agreed to treate peace, with great hopes of obteyning it, vpon honorable conditions: That it was now in action, that he had bound himſelfe to my maſter, That if he meant not to make it, he abuſed his beſt frend; if he did, and could obteyne it, the prince of Tranſiluania's care for him was in vayne: That the ſtates had conſented to the treaty of reſtitution: That they were ſo wiſe, as they had rather haue the prince Palataine to be their neighbour vpon the Rhyne by agreement, then to hazzard, by vncerteyne warre, to haue a worſe: howſoeuer they or any other chaunged their opinions, I was reſolued to diſclayme any intention of the elector to bee a party to this treaty; nor could I doe otherwiſe, though I ſhould foreknowe the treaty of peace at Bruxells would take no effect; becauſe, if the emperour had no purpoſe to conclude it, as they pretended, perhapps he could finde no better breach to eſcape at, then to accuſe mee, and in mee, his majeſtie, of fowle play: That while they treated peace vpon his roiall word, his miniſter at Conſtantinople aſſiſted to move an underhand and vniuſt warre; therfore I deſired them to pardon mee, if I did proteſt againſt it.

ATT this reſolution they were both very blank, yet vehemently vrged the neceſſity on their part, and the fraud of the emperour on the other.

HEREUPON I ſaid, As I had told them myne owne reſolution, ſo I would alſo open their eyes, and make them vnderſtand the incongruity and impoſſibility of their pretences: Firſt, They muſt take this for a rule; That if the Turk aſſiſted them, he would not doe yt for nothing; and the ſtronger party, whoſe ayd gott the conqueſt, would partake the fruicts thereof, which were both againſt their proteſtation and honor.

SECONDLY; They muſt knowe, that out of doubt the grand ſignor would giue them letters either to balance the matters in Hungary by his countenance, or perhapps to nouriſh warre betweene themſelues, that he might liue in peace; but that he would doe any act that might breake the peace with the emperour, it was incredible. His letters and commiſſions ſhould lye dormant in the hands of his owne ſeruants, that ſhould vſe them according to occaſion. What ayd did they giue, when Frederick was poſſeſſed of Bohemia, and Gabriel of Hungaria? How did they enterteyne their ambaſſadors with words, butt did nothing, except only nouriſh the warre by hopes, and expect who would bee the ſtronger? Yett the king then was young, vigorous, and enclyned to warre, and had great deſignes in his head. How could any thing be expected from this, in this tyme, when all is broken among themſelues, and they feare one another? 1622.

I WISHED them to obſerue with what precipitation the Turks had made peace with Poland, not once mentioning the comprehenſion of Tranſiluania, or any other allies, what euer they pretended; butt that the ſoldiour enforced the king to take ſuch conditions, that he that well waighed them, would find they were made in feare on both ſides; and that they parted as beaſts out of breath. I badd them conſider that the raſh laſt emperour, ſultan Oſman, madd at the retraict from Poland, hauing ſeene certeyne German troopes in the Poliſh army, and ſuppoſing them auxiliars ſent from the emperour, ſo ſoone as he arriued at Adrianople, proclaymed warr againſt him, as hauing broken the league by thoſe aydes, for the next ſpring: butt the ſoldiour preſently mutined, and proteſted they would not breake; if hee would goe, he ſhould goe alone. What ground is there nowe to think, that this will breake, or the ſoldiour moue for this ſoft king?

I DESIRED them to be well aduiſed, before they declared themſelues in that which they could neuer obteyne, nor reape any other fruict but diſhonor: to waigh the preſent condition of this ſtate, that the king was a man of peace; none of the viziers bredd or addicted to armes; the ſoldiour growne ſo lazy, as hauing no more pay in warre then in peace, they could not be moued with a whipp; yea, it was ſo odious to them, as the ground of the depoſeing and death of their laſt king was only, that hee would lead them from their chimneyes and houſes. Therefore, that they ſhould not ſhowe their ſpleene in vayne, and honor the Turks by beeing able to refuſe them; for they ſhould neuer obteyne here, other then wynd to blowe the fire among themſelues: butt that my counſell was, to ſeeke no further then for ſome countenance from the port to preſerue the peace as it was concluded, and to keepe the prouinces in quiett; which perhapps by letters from this court they might the better doe, by amuzing the emperour with feare of troubles from theſe parts. That for myſelfe, I could not meddle; but ſhould, if ſo they proceeded, vtterly diſclayme the adviſe to make warr vpon the emperour, or that the prince Palatine had any ſuch deſire or intention.

I DESIRED them not to caſt the enuy of ſuſpition vpon mee, nor to vſe my name; butt if the count of Torne had any priuat end, or hope of his owne, by the mediation of this port to be reſtored to ~~the~~ grace of the emperour, and to his inheritance, I would aſſiſt him, not as an ambaſſador, but priuatly, as one that was alway deſirous to doe any ſeruice to any of thoſe that were deuoted, and had ſuffered with the king of Bohemia: and ſo wee parted frendly.

THE firſt day of September I viſited the vizier vpon our owne occaſions: which ended, the chauncellor hauing the letter of Bethleem Gabor in his hand, asked mee, What theſe ambaſſadors, now come, were? and, What they pretended?

I ANSWERED, Their buſines was beſt knowne to him; the ambaſſador of Tranſiluania, and all his intents, were ſtraungers to mee. That the count of Torne I knewe by fame, to be a braue gentleman, and a great ſoldiour, that had bene well eſteemed in Bohemia, and had bene generall of the forces of that kingdome againſt the emperour, who now had loſt his fortune, and was a baniſhed man. That I thought he came to ſeeke ſome refuge here, which if the grand ſignior would pleaſe to graunt him by mediation, I doubted not butt he would meritt it by all good reſpect; and that it would be a work worthy the honor of a great prince.

HEE replyed, the vizier beeing preſent, That I diſſembled; that they knew I was acquainted with their buſineſs; and that, as a frend to the port, and an ambaſſador to a king oppoſite in religion to the emperour, I ſhould deliuer my opinion truly and clearly; for therein they would take my councell. By this, and other circumſtances, I perceived, that the ambaſſador had mentioned mee, as one that he hoped in, and that his maſter had written to mee, and with whom they communicated their affaires. Therfore I confeſſed the truth; that they had bene with mee, and made mee many propoſitions (grounded vpon the breach of peace 1622. concluded with Bethlem Gabor, of the emperours part) to make a warr vpon him; to which end, they pretended, that they would prepare a great party in Hungary and Germany, and did deſire power to raiſe forces from the port, to aſſiſt therein, and that this was the ſubſtance of that they had moued to mee.

THE vizier anſwered, You are their frend, and of their religion: What think you? Is it fitt that wee graunt their requeſt?

I REPLYED, It was not fitt for mee to judge what was fitt for them to doe; but that I ſawe no iuſt ground of a warre, nor no meanes to make it; and that I thought Bethlem Gabor feared his owne eſtate, and ſo ſought to engage others in his quarrells: That if the emperour had broken the treaty with him, he might ſeeke the way of juſtice in Germany; butt that any of the princes would ſtirr in new troubles, I did not beleeue it; nor did I thinke it fitt, that the grand ſignior ſhould change a ſure peace for an vncerteyne warre.

THE chauncellor ſodainly anſwered: Speake playne: Is it reaſon that wee breake the peace with the emperour, or not? For it ſtands thus; our treaty with the emperour is, that if any quarrell fall out among themſelues, lett them ſoe end it; but if the emperour ſeeke to bring in any ſtrangers, as the Spaniards, to conquer Tranſyluania, or to trouble the prouinces, then the peace is broken on his part, and the grand ſignior is bound to maynteyne his allies: butt vpon this occaſion, Is it fitt for vs to break, or not? for wee would not haue you ambaſſadors write into Chriſtendome, that the grand ſignior holds not his faith, or deales vniuſtly.

I ANSWERED, There was no iuſt ground of warre, nor no reaſon to make it.

THE vizier replyed, Doe you ſpeak like a frend? The ambaſſadors haue enformed vs, and you know it, That the emperour hath combined with diuers kings and princes, and made a league, with intention, the next ſpring, to invade the grand ſigniors territory of Hungary; and if wee preuent him not, and that he preuaile firſt in his warres in Germany, he will breake with vs. That hee is now weake, and troubled in diuers parts; if he gett breath, his hatred will turne all the warre vpon the grand ſignior, and his tributaries: but nowe Bethlem Gabor doth offer vs the occaſion to beginne with him; and that he will with his forces invade on the one ſide, if wee will ſecond him with ours on the other; and that king Frederick beeing ſtrong in Germany, will retorne into Bohemia; and ſo they both may be repoſſeſſed eaſily of their rights, and the cuntries of Auſtria deuided betweene them; and the emperour and his houſe vtterly deſtroyed, and the grand ſigniors borders and territories ſecured: therefore, What think you now fitt to be done?

WHEN I ſawe that the ambaſſador had proceeded ſo farre, I ſaid, I was ſorry to ſee deſperation, or malignity, had tranſported any to avow things ſo farre from truth and reaſon: That his majeſtie had ſent mee hither to maynteyne peace betweene the eſtates of Chriſtendome and this port: That there was any cauſe for the grand ſignior to breake, for ſuch a feare, was vtterly vntrue: That at this inſtant the emperour and the elector Palatine were treating of accord; and that, by the authority of my maſter, it was very likely to take effect: That I was aſſured his highneſs had no ſuch intention to breake his faith, nor to diſhonor his father in lawe, who ſtood engaged for him; nor that he had any knowledge of this motion, nor would accept or take part in it: That Bethleem Gabor might vſe his name for his owne deſſignes, but I did proteſt againſt it as an iniury: That the emperour had any combination to invade this ſtate, I knew no mans ſecretts, butt in all reaſon and probability it was vtterly feyned; for that I was perſwaded, if he had bene in caſe to make ſo great a warre, he would not ſoe eaſily haue treated to reſtore the poſſeſſions of the elector: That if it were true that the ambaſſadors pretended, that he was ſo weake and poore, (as doubtleſs theſe late warrs had exhauſted both his treaſures and cuntries) it would follow, he could not be ready for an inuaſion againſt ſo great a monarch ſodainly: That all Germany was weary, and though their force ioyned were very great to defend ytſelf, yett now they had noe thought of conqueſts, but deſired to recouer their owne wounds; and that therefore the grand ſignior ſhould be wel aduiſed, how he tooke falſe alarums: his owne eſtate was ſhaken by ciuill diſſention, and vnſettled; they had a good peace with the emperour and with Poland, and they were gladd they hadde made it. Now, if they ſhould, vpon a ſlight and falſe ground, breake it, they might pull vpon themſelues a trouble, out of which they could not eaſily nor ſafely retyre; that quarrells were begunne vpon ſmall matters, and by meane men; butt the beſt and greateſt did the penance. 1622.

THEY both gaue mee many thanks, ſayeing I ſpake like a true frend, and a good man: That they would call another councell, and alter determinations. Yett they deſired mee to tell my opinion, what anſwere they ſhould giue, and what reſolution, for to quitt Bethleem Gabor; and to putt him in deſperation were not fitt.

I REPLYED, They might write in his behalfe, and avowe him, and by their authority maynteyne the peace, and that therein they ſhould doe him as much fauour as he could expect: for I did beleeue he feared, that if the emperour were quiett in Germany, that he would quarrell with him, as his old enemy; therefore he ſought to putt fire in other mens houſes to ſaue his owne; butt if they kept him ſafe vnder their wings, he would be gladd enough to liue in peace.

THEY replyed, They would conſult againe, reade, and conſider well his offers and reaſons, and ſend for mee priuatly within few dayes, and conclude nothing without my priuity and approbation.

THREE daies after, the great vizier ſent to mee, to deſire mee preſently to meete him and the chancellor priuately, in the arſenall, not farre from myne owne houſe; where wee might diſcourſe, and reſolue of the laſt treaty.

BEEING all arriued: The aga of the janizaries and the treaſorer accompanying the vizier, hee with the chancellor carried mee into an vpper chamber alone, where the chauncellor beganne: Wee haue conſidered your diſcourſe, and the councell you gaue vs the other day; and becauſe wee find it was grounded vpon good reaſon, and ſeemes to vs to be ſyncere and faithfull, the vizier determining to hold the like courſe with you, wee haue reſolued to acquaint you fully and truly, with all the overture made by Bethlem Gabor; and deſire you to ſpeake freely your mynde, and enforme vs the truth, as a miniſter of a frend to the grand ſignior; promiſing, that wee will therein follow your councell, at leaſt doe nothing without you. By way of parentheſis, the ambaſſadors had, in the meane tyme, preſſed their commiſſion plenæ potentiæ ſo farr, and had ſo poſſeſſed George Mahomett baſſa and the mufti with feares, that they had giuen opinion for the warr, and had promiſed to procure it, and the vizier and chancellor were againe vnſetled. The chancellor therfore tells mee, You ſhall knowe from his owne letter, which conteynes 4 ſheetes of paper, what Bethlem Gabor writes, what he declares, what he demands, and what he promiſeth. The contents were; That hauing bene enforced to make a peace with the emperour, preſently he practized to drawe him wholly to his party, and to forſake the dependance of the grand ſignior; to which end, he acquainted him with a league made between him, the king of Spaine, and the king of Poland, and ſome other princes in Germany, to raiſe an army of 150000 men, to be ready the next yeare to invade Hungary, Boſna, and Greece, and ſo to make warr as farr as Conſtantinople, and to conquer all that was poſſeſſed by the Turks in Europe. Into which if he would enter, and bynd himſelfe, he ſhould be generall of the army, and haue, for his part, Tranſiluania and Boſna, as a kingdome, to him and his heirs, aggrauating exceedingly the hatred of the houſe of Auſtria to the Turkiſh empire. Butt that he hauing bene raiſed wholly by the Ottoman fauour, and bound as a faithfull ſubiect, could not chooſe butt aduiſe the grand ſignior of this confederacy, as reſolued to ſerue him to the death. And this inuaſion was ſo fully reſolued on, that there was no way to preuent the ſtorme, butt by taking opportunity, before the emperour had concluded the peace in Germany, and recouered ſtrength. That he was nowe weake in the borders, his forces drawne downe into the lower parts, and ſeperated; his countries waſted, Hungary, Bohemia, and all the prouinces ready to reuolt; therfore now was the ſeaſon to be ſecured from this antient enemy. And that he had aſſurance, as well from thoſe eſtates, as diuers others, that would take part in the quarrell. If therefore the grand ſignior would raiſe the army in Greece, Boſna, and Buda, and giue commiſſion to enter into Auſtria, by the way of Canitza, that he would invade Sileſia and Bohemia, and the conqueſt would bee very eaſy: briefly, that he would deliuer the emperour into the hands of the grand ſignior, and diſpoſſeſs him of all his cuntries and eſtates, and make him lord of all thoſe parts of Germany. To effect this, he vrged the great daunger, if opportunity were omitted; and the facility of effecting it, if vſed and taken.

THAT

1622. THAT hereby they ſhould at leaſt keepe the Poles in order, and perhaps open a way into their cuntry: and, finally, ſeeing he had diſcouered this deſſigne, if the grand ſignior refuſed the party, he ſhould then be driuen to all extremity; for the emperor would make that the quarrell, to enforce him to bee of the league, and ſo beginne with him; which if he then ſhifted for himſelfe, he was blameleſſe; therefore there was no way ſecure for both, butt that the grand ſignior ſhould graunt this commiſſion to the baſſa of Buda and him, to make the warre at diſcretion, without attendance of other order from the port. This, they ſaid, was the ſumme of the letters and overture of Bethleem Gabor, which was much more then the ambaſſador pretended to mee. They told mee, If this were true, there was no remedy, butt to preuent iniury by iniury: That the offer was great, the way eaſy; that they knewe the emperour was weake, and opportunity faire; and that many of the viziers were of opinion, it was not to be omitted; therefore they coniured mee to ſpeake truth, and to giue my councell.

I WAS almoſt amazed, and in ſome paſſion replyed; That I did wonder at this fiction mingled with ſome truths, to giue creditt to the vntruthes: I proteſted, I would ſpeake truly. I confeſſed, I did not doubt, and it were folly to denye, that the Poles, Spaniards, and Germans were enemyes in generall to the Turkiſh empire; and, if their owne occaſions ſerued, I would not promiſe butt that they might haue will enough to make a conqueſt of all, as, I was ſure, the Turk would doe of them; butt that at this tyme they had any ſuch confederacy, it was ympoſſible. To beginne with the Poles: They had newly entered into peace, weary of a warre: That the conſtitution of that kingdome was mighty for defence, unfitted to invade; theyr hands were full with the king of Swethland; they were iealous of the Muſcouite, and no ſuch frend of the Spaniard, as to ioyne with them: The king of Spaine had a great worke to finiſh in Chriſtendome, to perfect all his vndertakings there; the Netherlands exerciſed one army, Voltoline another; his Indies were like to fall into daunger; and that he had ſo many irons in the fire, as he was nott in caſe for ſo great a worke. For the emperour, as he lay moſt opportunely, ſo he had lately experience of the miſeries of warre; all Germany had ſuffered extreamly in it, and was now gladd of the hope of peace; that it was hard for him to drawe the princes ſo farre from home: to defend themſelues they were ready; butt to march into Greece, woould ask greater preparation then could be made ſodainly: therefore I concluded, it was all feigned, to ſerue his owne end, to fiſh in troubled waters.

THEY replyed; If all this be ſoe, and that there be no preſent feare of ſuch a combination; if wee ſuffer them to breath, and to recouer, what may wee then expect? Now wee are ſure the opportunity is faire to ſecure our ſelues for ever; for the ambaſſadors confeſs, that the emperour treats peace with Frederick, as you ſay, but only to be enabled to make the warre vpon vs.

I ANSWERED; You ſhall haue warning enough, if there be ſuch a purpoſe; 150000 men cannott be raiſed and armed in a moneth; countries foraged, and weary of warre, will not be repaired on a ſodaine to that gayety as to affect conqueſts; many circumſtances muſt concurre to ſo great an action: you haue your eyes open, and you ſhall foreſee ſuch a ſtorme at leaſt a yeare. For the weaknes of the emperour, lett not ſhowes deceiue you; his armies, wherewith he forced Bohemia and Hungarie, are but wearied, not eaten vpp. It is true, he would liue in peace, and ſo would the princes of Germany; but take heed leaſt you, for feare of a warre afarre of, raiſe not a certen warre preſently: for, be aſſured, as ſoone as you beginne to inuade, you will reconcile all petty quarrells; and not only all the princes in Germany, but the king of Spaine, and all other Chriſtians, will turne againſt you, as the common enemy. If Poland haue a will to moue, then will be the tyme, when your forces are in Germany: when your gallies are in the Black-ſea to bring you ſuccours and prouiſion, the Spaniards will viſitt your coaſts and iſlands in the Arches; and thus you ſhalbe certeyne to pull a dangerous warre vpon you, from which Bethlem Gabor will not know how to diſengage you. Beſides, conſider your owne preſent eſtate; the eyes of Chriſtendome are piercing; and wee knowe you are not in caſe to trouble the world, till you are better ſettled at home: therefore, if you will take my aduiſe, beleeue, there are other ends in this offer, then to diuert a warre from you: you haue peace with the emperour and Poland at your owne deſires; you ſhall hazard by a breach, butt gett nothing but trouble and vncertenty.

THEY anſwered; That I gaue them great ſatisfaction; butt what ſhould they doe? To leaue Bethlem Gabor, were to make him deſperate, and doubtleſs the emperour would inuade him: if that ſhould follow, they ſhould be blamed iuſtly for refuſing his offers; therefore they deſired mee to aduiſe a medium.

I ANSWERED; That they might countenance him by letters to the emperour, and proteſt his protection; equally to ballance the affaires betweene them, to keep both quiett: I did not beleeve the emperour would breake with the port for a light occaſion.

THEY replyed; Butt many here beleeue this information; and what anſwere can wee give?

YOU may demaund of the ambaſſador, What other princes or ſtates (ſeeing he pretends that ſo many offer to be in this counter-league) doe ſhowe themſelues? Where are their credences, or letters, or aſſurances? Were it wiſedome for you to breake a peace upon one mans word?

THEY vrge; But if it be ſoe, the emperour may ſodainly ſurprize Bethleem Gabor, while wee depend upon our letters, if he haue purpoſe to breake; and perhapps Gabor will not think himſelfe ſecure only vppon that protection; whereupon they reſolued vtterly to refuſe the breach with the emperour, or to giue any order to inuade his territories, butt only to protect Bethleem Gabor in his owne, and to maynteyne the peace as it ſtood; and to that end, to write a frendly letter to the emperour, approuing the concluſion already made, and avowing the prince of Tranſiluania as their ally; and for further caution, not to deſpaire him, they would giue a ioynct commiſſion to the baſſa of Buda and Bethlem Gabor to take care of the borders, and to haue a watchfull eye, that if the emperour continewed in peace, they ſhould maynteyne it: but if he practized or offered to moleſt or invade the territories of Tranſiluania, that then the baſſa ſhould haue authority to aſſiſt him, without attendance of further order. Thus as yett the treaty ſtands, and preſent order giuen to the chancellor to informe the mofti and George Mahomett baſſa of the reſolution.

THEY gaue mee exceeding thanks, made mee a good dinner, and did mee as much honor as, I thinke, euer was done to any; proteſting both to follow my counſell, and to requite it in all occaſions: and I am perſwaded, and may boaſt, that I haue done the emperour good ſeruice, and diuerted a warr, which was very forwardly; and had many frends, if I would haue conſented, or any way haue auowed the adviſe giuen, or had not ſtrongly reſiſted it: I alone, no other ambaſſador called or queſtioned, haue had the honor to conclude and direct this affaire in the councell of the grand ſignior.

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

WHERE our buſines left, you will perceiue by the copy of my laſt. Since I haue not heard from the ambaſſador of Tranſiluania, who, either for the freedome I vſed towards him, or perhapps finding ſome effects thereof, hath retyred himſelfe from any correſpondence with mee: butt the count of Torne, whether iealous of his honor, or in deſpaire to obteyne their ends, hath made for himſelfe a large apologye, with moſt deepe proteſtations, that hee neuer had thought, nor conſented to induce the Turke into Germany, or to giue him one foote of Chriſtian ground, but rather he would chooſe any exile or miſery. I then charged him roundly with his owne propoſitions to mee, and with the letter of Bethlem Gabor, and the offers therein conteyned. To this no excuſe whatſoeuer could ſerue, but a direct deniall, with deepe execrations, that he knew not the contents thereof, nor beleeued that the prince had any ſuch purpoſe, that euer he could diſcouer; and if that he had knowne ſo much, he would rather haue gone to his death, then to ſuch a treaty. But he thus now enterpretts his negotiation, That they ſeeke only a power, in all ſodaine occaſions, to be able to reſiſt, or to diuert the warr from their owne dores, which is only a defenſiue, if the emperour ſhall goe about to oppreſſe the proteſtants, or to breake the peace made with Gabor: and, for his owne part, as one now oppreſſed, he hopes, if Tranſiluania be ſecured thus, that he may obteyne 1000 horſe of the prince to putt him into Morauia, to ioyne with his ſonne and his frends there, and to try his owne fortune; but if he find here alſo the eſtate 1622. of Bethleem deſperate, and left to himſelfe, then he will retire to the king of Bohemia, or to the duke of Sauoy, and ſpend the reſt of his dayes in a neceſſary baniſhment. He hath earneſtly deſyred of mee to giue this teſtimony for him: which I am content to take as good pay; becauſe I doe think that the poore man hath bene deceiued with vaine and falſe hopes, and, in his extremity, was eaſily perſwaded to catch hold of thornes and brambles; and that he doth repent that he hath ventured his honor, which is all he hath left, vpon this ſtage. If he hope, by this ſeeming retyring, to deceiue mee, he will likewiſe faile; for I ſhall neither aſſiſt him, nor can he procure any greater matter, butt I ſhall know it. The ambaſſador of Tranſiluania hath no need of this excuſe: and though I perceiue he would not haue it knowne, that his maſter treates with ſuch offers, and in termes of a ſubiect, yett he purſues his inſtructions with all earneſtnes, and by all meanes; the ſtates ambaſſador giuing him all his aſſiſtance, and blowing the coles in euery corner: and his hopes are well aduanced ſince my laſt; for the vizier, with whom I had conference, is diſplaced by the murmur of the ſpahees, and George Mahomett baſſa admitted, rather againſt his will, then by his owne ambition: hee is the antienteſt counſellor of this empire, and hath ſatt vpon the bench 40 yeares; a very wiſe man, that knowes all the ſtate and canons of this gouerment, and is not ignorant of the affaires of Chriſtendome, where he hath allway kept a good intelligence; a man, if there be any remedy ſufficient to cure this broken and diſeaſed monarchy, beſt able to find, and apply it; but, to the purpoſe of this buſines, an antient enemy to the ſtate of Germany and Poland, eſpecially to the houſe of Auſtria, and the greateſt frend and maynteyner of Bethlem Gabor: hereupon they and all their frends ſtirre; butt, I am perſwaded, they ſhall not obteyne much more then the reſolution taken, only to auowe the protection of Tranſiluania. I haue ſpoken with this new vizier, who did not open himſelfe with mee ſo freely as the laſt, butt yett deſired to know my opinion; which I refuſed to giue, becauſe I ſawe he knew it well enough before: in concluſion, I was enforced to ſtand to my firſt, That I knew no cauſe why the grand ſignior ſhould breake, and inuade the emperor; and I was ſure they would not forſake and expoſe the prince of Tranſiluania. Here I diſcouered more and new practize; the vizier confeſſing, That both the king of Poland did demaund the deſertion and deſtruction of Gabor; and that he alſo wrought both here, and in Poland, to ſupplant the king, and to bring in himſelfe; which he will find a hard buſines to deale with that proud nobility, though he may haue ſome partakers. In Poland there hath lately bene ſome trouble, and the ſoldiours mutined againſt the king, refuſing to diſarme without their moneths pay: it was once appeaſed, but now wee heare new rumors; which if true, remembring the practice of Bethleem in Poland, which I mentioned in his inſtructions ſent in cyphar, it is very ſuſpicious that his ambition hath no bounds, where he hath hope to raigne per fas et nefas: howeuer, I am ſure here are many ſtraung practizes on both parts; and the Turks nouriſh both, and laugh in their owne ſleeues. In all theſe the ambaſſador of Flaunders is much to blame; for he ſtirrs euery ſtone, to putt but a thorne in the emperours foote, and is, if any be guilty, the moſt guilty: Bethleem Gabor hath promiſed him a title and conte in Hungary, if he obteyne the kingdom; and he is apt enough to take aduauncement any where. I ſhall alway know how they proceed, and will no further meddle, then the ſeruice of his majeſtie, and the generall good, ſhall call me into: yet nowe, if I did not more truſt in the neceſſity of the preſent affaires of this ſtate, and that the vizier is a man of 80 yeares, not fitt for the warre; and if he conſent to a breach, he is ſure to aduance another into his roome; I ſhould doubt, that the diſaffection he beares to the emperor, would procure them ſome power to trouble him: but I am confident, both in his diſcourſe, and in the condition of the tyme, that they ſhall not bee able to break the peace; but only ſome good aſſurance they may gett, to comfort and ſuccour the prince in his feares; which what they truly are, I can now, by circumſtances, more nearly coniecture. Hee doth not feare his Tranſiluania; becauſe that prouince beeing tributary to the Turke, he is both ſure of aſſiſtance, and the emperour will be wary how he occaſions the breach with this port; which he ſhall doe, if he inuade it. But by the laſt treaty, a good part of Hungary is left to him; and he feares, that if the emperour haue peace in Germany, he may reſume that, as hauing better title to it; and that he ſhall not breake with the Turks for recouery thereof, becauſe it is not comprehended in the articles of peace betweene them: therfore he would preuent the emperour, and by enlarging his jealouzy, 1622. draw this ſtate to partake therein; and to that end, enformes them of a league made to inuade the Ottoman empire, hoping to procure therby this large commiſſion plenæ potentiæ, with the baſſa of Buda, that hath bene 20tie yeares in that charge, and knowes well the borders: and then to make vſe of it vpon the firſt occaſion, either to moleſt the emperour, or to advaunce himſelfe in Poland, in any chaunge, which is now very much in his thoughts. This is, I am perſwaded, the ſcope of his embaſſage; to procure which he hath not cared what he ſaid, nor what he offered.

HERE is arriued an agent from the emperour, who hath order to attend the treaty of theſe, and to aunſwere; and to procure againſt them for his maſter: he yet hath viſitted no man; therfore I know no more of him, but that he ſhall reſide. I will ſitt ſtill, like a watchman, though both ſides ſeeke to drawe mee; I ſhall therfore be the more vpright, and will haue no guide but his majeſties commaunds; nor end, but his ſeruice; which I deſire your honor to witneſſe for mee.

HERE is arriued, neare, an ambaſſador from Perſia, with the tribute or preſent, which long hath bene deferred; but the king hauing latly had a great ouerthrowe by the mogol, he is gladd to keepe his peace here.

I HAUE written to his majeſtie, with reference to your honor, for the relation of our affaires, in which I eſteeme my ſelfe ſafe; becauſe I hope you eſteeme mee as Conſtantinople, $\frac{20}{30}$ 7ber, 1622. Your Honors humble frend and ſeruant.

Advertizment from FRANCFORT.

ON Wedneſday the 18th of Auguſt, collonell Meruen of Heidlebergh writt to the lord generall Vere, That the enemy haueing laine longe before the towne, had not gayned ſoe much as one of the out-workes; and aſſured his lordſhip, that aſwell burgers as ſouldiours, were verie well diſpoſed to doe their duties, making worthy mention of Sir Garret Harbert; and for his owne particular, he was reſolved to hold it out to the vttmoſt extreamitie. On Thurſday and Friday, the 5th and 6th of September, the enemy played hard with their ordinance vpon their out-workes of greateſt importance, and vpon the towne; by the which they coniectured, that they intended to make ſome bould attempt vpon them. On the Friday, towards evening, the generall Tillay did prepare his men, and marſhalled them for a generall aſſault, and gaue vpon Trofskeiſer and Trofsheiern their two ſtrongeſt out-workes, well able to haue bene defended againſt a more bould and reſolued enemy; but before they came to the foote of the rampire, the commanders and ſouldiours did either render themſelues to the enemy, craueing quarter, or did abſolutely abandon their places in a moſt cowardly and baſe manner; caſting away their armes, and running towards the towne, where the governour ſhutt the gates againſt them; by which meanes many were ſlaughtered at the verie port. The enemy was contented to haue parlied with the governour, and to haue made a compoſition, as well for the preſeruation of the burgers as the ſouldiours and boores, that fledd thither for ſuccour; but the keyes of the towne being longe in finding out, the enemie blew open the gate, by which, and ſcales of ladders, they entered the towne, and committed cruell murders and outrages, as well vpon the burgers and peaſants as ſouldiours.

COLLONELL Landſhafe, who commaunded in cheife vpon thoſe out-workes, was taken priſoner, without giueing or receuing a blow; of the other captains and officers, ſome were ſlaine, and ſome rendered themſeues to the enemie, as aforeſaid, and are now entered into his paie. Sir Garret Harbert commaunding in chiefe in the houſe and caſtle of the prince elector, haueing his owne and Sir John Wentworth companies with him, defended the worke behind the caſtle, which was furiouſlie aſſaulted by the enemy; where he aboad two or three aſſaults, and repulſed the enemy with admirable valour, to his great honour; but being oppreſſed with freſh ſupplies of men, who charged ſtill vpon him, haueing ſent for ayd and ſuccour, was in the generall rowt and amazement neglected; and haueing broken 4 pikes with his owne hands vpon the enemy, was ſhott with a musket thorough the head, 1622. and dyed vpon the place; his lieuetenant alſo being ſhott in the arme. Vpon this ill accident, lieuetenant Wentworth, who commaunded the workes vnder Sir Garret Harberts charg, ſtayed vpon the place with the Engliſh that were with him, vntill he was called of by the governour; and with the dead bodies of their freinds and ordenance, retired into the caſtle, where they found the governour before them, who had brought much of his goods thither for ſafetie, and with him many captaines, officers, ſouldiours, burgers, and boores, and women, who ſoe overmaiſtered the ſmall remainder of the Engliſh, that they would not permitt them to diſcharge a peece, or to make any declaration that they intended to defend the place. Thereupon the generall Tillay, thus haueing plundered and ſact the towne, did ſommon them to render the caſtle. The governour craued a ſhort time to ſend to the lord generall, to know his adviſe and directions therein; which being graunted, their governour ſent one captaine Villers, a French man; whoe declaring the vnexpected accident, and the manner of yt, did add to his other afflictions; and he retorned him anſwere, That he had placed him there chiefe governour and commander of that towne and garriſon, and had found him carefull, and an vnderſtanding gentleman for the time paſt; and, being now vpon the place, knew beſt what he had to doe for his honour and the ſafetie of what remained; with this addition, that he ſhould conſider that the eyes of this parte of Chriſtendome were vpon that ſiege; and that men would iudge of him and his actions, by the iudicious concluſion hee ſhould make after this unfortunate diſaſter. The captaine returned with this anſwere; he propounded large conditions for himſelf and thoſe in his companie, craueing leaue, among other things, to march into Manheim and Frankendale; which was abſolutely denied them, the generall Tillay ſaying, That Manheim was already beſieged. The gouernour, and ſome captains and officers, are come hither with about (as they ſaie) 500 men, nere this towne, whereof 120 are Engliſh; their ſafe conduct will warrent their ſafeties noe further than this towne; they craue money to carrie them hence into Holland. Mounſieur Burlimaochi (who by good fortune is here) tells me, that there wilbe found ſome due vnto them, vpon their accounts and reckonings. I haue adviſed him to impreſſe to ſuch as will goe into Holland, two dollars apeece towards the defraying their expences thither; and for ſuch as intend to goe to the enemie, to giue them nothing; to which courſe I vnderſtand all the Allmaines are inclined, a commaſſarie of barron Tillaies being come hither to entertaine them. This is the true relation of this vnfortunate accident, as I haue collected by the diſcourſe with the governour, captaine and officers, come hither, and out of ſuch letters as are come vnto me.

From lord CAREW.

My very good Lord,

YOUR lordſhips of the 29th of May, I receaved not vntill the 22th of September followinge; the reaſon that it came ſo late vnto me after the delivery of your other letters to the lords and others, was (as I conceave) my abſence in the country, where I haue ſpent this whole ſommer. I confeſſe your lordſhips longe ſilence did not a little vex me, fearinge that I had loſt that which I hould deare, ſome parte of your favour; but when I ſawe your hand, this jealouſie vaniſhed, my thoughts were reconciled, and I was angry with my ſelfe for doinge you that wronge, for the which I pray your lordſhips pardon and abſolution. Our peaceable eſtate yealds little newes or alterations; God in his mercy ſo contynewe it vnto vs: but when I contemplate the affayres of Chriſtendome, as now they ſtande, I feare that this ſunneſhine wherein wee live, will ſhortly be over-clouded; for his majeſties peaceable intentions takes not that effecte, which he in his pious deſires (to pacifie our neighbours, which are in flame) labored to bring to paſſe: Heydelberge is taken by the count Tilly; it is thought that he is nowe at the ſiedge of Manheim, which, for want of victualls, cannot longe hold out. Frankendale is in the like eſtate; and when they are loſt, there is not one foote of lande in all Palatinatt lefte to the king of Bohemia. The citties of Spire and Wormes are alſo in the actuall poſſeſſion of the enemie. The vicount Doncaſters negotiation in France (to worke ſome good conditions for the proteſtants) proved alltogether fruitleſſe, the kinge ſtill perſeveringe his vnmercifull warre vppon his ſubiects, yet he cannot boaſt of any victorious ſucceſſe; 1622. for in all his attempts, the loſſe hath fallen on his parte. The ſiedge of Montpellier in Languedoc hath held him worke for all this ſummer, and yett he is as farr from wynninge, as at the firſt day he ſatt downe before it. In three ſeverall ſallies, the beſiedged haue beene victorious; in them many dukes, princes, marqueſſes, earles, with an incredible nomber of the nobleſſe, beſides common ſouldiers, haue been ſlayne. The kinge, weary of the ſiedge, is gone to Lyons, and hath lefte his new conſtable, Monſ. de Deſdigueres, who is tourned catholique, to proſecute the ſiedge, betweene whome and the prince of Coundy (it is ſayd) variance is riſen, the prince diſdayninge that the conſtable ſhould commaunde in cheife. Before Montaban, the duke of Vendoſme was lefte with a compitent armye; but the towne is in noe feare of what maye be done againſt them. Before Rochell, the count Soyſſons lies with an armye: the towne is bold, and out of danger, full of men, victuall and munition; and notwithſtandinge the French kings fleete, they keepe theire porte open, ſo as they haue the ſea to friende; and theire fleete is conceaved to be ſtronger then the kings. The greateſt danger they are in is diſſention amonge themſelues, growen by emulation betweene Monſ. Soubize and Monſ. de Favas, a brave, valiant and experienced gentleman, eyther diſdayninge to be commaunded by the other; what harme hereof may enſue, is much feared; but God, I hope, by the mediation of good men, will ſett them at an accorde. The duke of Bouillon lyes cloſe in Sedan, ſtands vppon his guarde, and keepes himſelfe out of action, with whome the kinge of Bohemia is, at this preſent. This day a reporte is come to London, That the duke of Rohan hath taken the popes nunce, with divers gentlemen of good quallity in his company, in his journey to viſit the kinge at Lyons; but vntill I heare it better confirm'd, I leave it vncertayne. The Valtaline is abſolutely poſſeſſed by the Spaniard, the poore Griſons ether ſlayne or exiled; ſo as nowe the kinge of Spayne hath gayned a fayre and ſafe paſſadge, betweene Millan and Tyrroll, for his armies to march through; heereof I neede ſpeake noe more, becauſe you may haue better intelligence of thoſe parts dayly from Vennice, then can come from Englande; becauſe I conceave, that what is heere done at home, comes plentifully vnto you by relations from our Turkye marchants, who write frequently thereof. I will look no farther back then what hath happened this ſommer.

In June, the lord Say was committed to the fleete, for ſome default he made in the country at the quarter ſeſſions, about the contribution, and is not yet at liberty. Monſ. Soubize came to his majeſtie to pray releife for rhe towne of Rochell; he is departed well ſatisfied, and lies at Plimouth, expecting a wynde to retourne into France. The vicount Grandiſſon, and Sir Edward Conwaye, were ſworne councellors: Mr. Chriſtopher Villers ſworne a gentleman of the bedchamber.

In July, Sir Tho. Beamount of Collhorton was created vicount Beamount of Swords in Irelande; Sir George Hay, made lord chauncellor of Scottland, in the roome of the erle of Dunfermling lately deceaſed. Newes came from Virginia of aboue 300 Engliſhmen ſlayne in one hower, att ſundry places, by the ſalvages. The lord Knevitt and his lady dyed. The lord Morley died. The vicount Doncaſter retourned from his negotiation out of France, which proved fruitleſſe; for the kinge (as yet he doth) contynewed obſtinate againſt the proteſtants.

In Auguſt, Mr. John Murrey of the bedchamber, ſworne a gentleman of the ſame, and created vicount of Annan in Scottland. Sir Edward Cooke, Sir Robert Phillipps, and Mr. Mallery, releaſed out of the Tower. The vicount Falklande departed from London towards Irelande, where he is now landed, and hath receaved the ſworde.

In September, the vicount Doncaſter created earle of Carlile, the vicount Fielding, earle of Denbigh; the lord Digby (yet in Spayne) earle of Briſtoll; and the lord Cranfield, erle of Middleſex. I am ſure you haue hearde of the comittment of the erle of Oxford to the Tower, where he yett remayneth cloſe priſoner: res geſtæ, without comment, you muſt be contented to receave, being the ſafeſt manner of writtinge. Of the proceedinge in the Spaniſh matche I can ſay little; but if I had better intelligence, I would forbeare to touch on that ſtringe, ne forte, I might burne my fingers; but I hope, ere November paſſe, that the buſines will growe to a period; which God graunt, for delayes are preiudiciall to our ſtate. The Hollanders are ſendinge of a brave fleete to the Weſt Indies; God graunt it good

Of Mansfields comminge downe into the Low Countries in the ayde of the States, of the battell he fought with Gonzales de Cordoua neere vnto Gemblours, in the edge of Brabant, where the duke of Saxe of Wymare was ſlayne, and the brave younge duke of Brunſwicke loſt his lefte arme, and of the greate ſlaughter on either ſide, wherein Manſfield had the better, I am ſure you haue beene formerly advertized; ſince which tyme the marqueſſe Spinola (fearing the approach of the prince of Orange, with whome Mansfield is ioyned) is riſen from the ſiedge of Bergen-vp-zome; which ſiedge was attempted with greater fury then ever Oſtende was, and as bravely defended, the enemie never being able to gaine one foote of grownde vppon the defendants, and hath loſt (in many ſallyes made from the towne) aboue 10000 men. The two Engliſh regiments, vnder the conduct of the earle of Argile, and the lord Vaux, what by runnawayes, ſicknes, and the ſworde, are meerly broaken, ſo as they remayne but titulary corronells. The erle of Southampton hath this ſommer beene with his majeſtie, and all diſpleaſures, I hope, well overblowne.

HEERE, vppon our coaſt, the 25th day of September, a ſmall man of Plimouth, loaden with ſalt, fell into a fleete of 25 greate ſaile of Spaniards, who had beene at ſea 100 dayes, to ſeeke for Hollanders, but never mett with any; and what is now become of them, wee knowe not; they came from Gibraltar, where there is 30 ſayle more in readynes to put to the ſea.

NOW that my budgett is emptied, not haveinge any more ware worthy your hearinge, I conclude with my beſt and aſſured affections, both vnto your lady and your ſelfe, praying you to reſt aſſured, that my ſervice ſhall never be fayling in any thinge wherein you ſhall pleaſe to employe

Your Lordſhipps conſtant, trew, and faithful frend,

Superſcribed,
To the right Honorable, my very good Lord,
Sir THOMAS ROE, Knighte, Ambaſſador
for his Majeſtie,
At Conſtantinople.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLTON.

My very good Lord,

BY my letters of the $\frac{19}{29}$th of Auguſt, I gaue your lordſhip an account of yours of the $\frac{17}{27}$th of June; and therewithall ſent your lordſhip the queen of Bohemias anſwear to that which your lordſhip then wrote to her majeſty; ſome weekes ſince which time I haue receaued a double of thoſe your lordſhips letters to my ſelf, with a packett of the like ſubject to the queen: and I muſt now beſeech your lordſhip to accept of my excuſes for ſo long deferring my thanckes, which was cauſed through the multitude of buſines with which I am ouercharged in this place, and my ſettled correſpondences, ſometimes againſt my will, interrupted.

I WILL not looke backe ſo farre as to thoſe paſſages with which I ended my former letters, aſſuring my ſelf that your lordſhip will haue heard by other meanes, what hath bin the iſſue of part of thoſe feares and expectations which then I aduertiſed. But comming to the things which are of freſher date, I will tell your lordſhip, That after the counte Mansfeld had forced his paſſage through the infantas countreys, and was arriued with his army to the ſeruice of the ſtates, ſome time being ſpent in refreſhing and arming his men in the villages abowt Breda and Geertruydenberg, the prince of Orange fell downe from his quarter neare Schenck-ſchans, where he had layen a long time, haueing left Monſieur Lambert Charles, gouuernour of Nimeghen, with a competent ſtrengh to entertaine counte Henry Vandenberg in Cleueland; and marched the $\frac{20}{30}$th of September thorough Breda with 120 companies of foote and 35 of horſe of his owne, and 27 of foote and 57 of horſe of counte Mansfelds, for the relief of Bergen-op-zoóm, where the ſiege had bin continewed 11 weekes by the marquis Spinola, with much loſſe of men on both ſides, but not one foote of grounde gayned ſo much as on the owtworkes of the towne. The prince of Orange being on the $\frac{22}{2}\frac{7^{ber}}{8^{ber}}$ come to Roſendale, an open village within two leagues of the marquis Spinolas quarter towards Steénbergen, the marquis remoued the ſame night to the quarter of Don Gonzales de Cordoüa on the other ſide of the towne, haueing ſent that afternoone 800 horſe to giue a brauado to the prince of Oranges army, whereby to couer his intention of raiſing his ſiege. The next morning they diſlodged in like manner from the other ſide of the towne, in ſuch haſt, that more then 2000 armes, together with their ſicke and wounded, were abandoned to the mercie of the flames which conſumed the quarters. The departure of the ennemy was ſo ſuddaine and unexpected, and the certaine news thereof came ſo late to the prince of Orange, that they were retired firſt into a place very advantageous for them, in caſe they ſhould haue had battaile offered them; and the renforcement they receaued there, by the arriuall of counte Henry Vandenbergs army, was ſo great, that they might well keepe themſelues (as they did) in battalia allmoſt two dayes: but the prince of Orange contented himſelf with the honour of haueing deliuered the towne, withowt further pourſuit of the ennemy; and within few dayes after, he ſent his couſin, counte Erneſt, with part of the troopes, and half the gariſon of Bergen-op-zoóm, to the recouery of Steénbergen owt of the ennemies hands, which was made the place of prouiſions for their camp during the ſiege, and was kept by a garriſon of 300 men, who, after the batteries planted againſt the walls, ſoone compounded for themſelues, and rendred up the magaſin of the beſiegers, containeing a great quantity of meale, unground corne, oates, and beere, into the hands of the beſieged, together with 4 peeces of artillerie brought thither by the ennemy. 1622.

THE honour acquired to the Engliſh and Scottiſh nation, in the defenſe of Bergen-op-zoóm, deſerues a longer relation, then the ſhort time which I haue to write will ſuffer me to make unto your lordſhip. The ennemy began their aſſaults uppon their quarter, and tooke their farewell of them laſt by an aſſault, on the $\frac{19}{29}$th of the laſt; wherein (as allwaies before) they were repulſed with loſſe of abowt 250 of their men, amongſt whome were three captaines, which remained in the place, and not aboue 20 of this ſide ſlaien.

SINCE the leauying of that ſiege, the time hath bin ſpent withowt action, except onely the catching up of priſoners on both ſides; which being kept up withowt ranſom, uppon occaſion of the duke of Saxe Weymars detention by the counte Henry Vandenberg, hath drawen on a new treatie of quarter, which is concluded to the two generalls excluſiue, whereas before it went no higher then lieutenant-colonels; ſo as we ſhall haue here, as long as it laſts, very faire warres. The two armyes are now both diſmiſſed, and ſent into garriſon, much weakened through ſicknes, bred by ill wether, and bad accommodation. The marquis Spinola, haueing had his quarter at Brecht, began to ſend away his troopes on Thurſday laſt, being the $\frac{10}{20}$th of this preſent; and the prince of Orange, who would not be farre behinde him, tooke a ſuddaine reſolution, and roſe the next day from Roſendale, haueing had ſhipping readie, not far from thence, aboue eight dayes before, for tranſport of his foote to their ſeuerall garriſons; the horſe went by land, haueing had a bridge made for their paſſage ouer the Maſe at Creuecoeur, and are gon up towards Schenckſchans, as are likewiſe counte Mansfelds foote: but the ſeaſon being ſpent, there is no likelyhood of any attempt to finde them further employment in the field this yeare.

THERE hath bin lately a ſharpe fight at ſea uppon the coaſt of Flanders, betwixt 4 men of warre of the States, and three ſhips of Oſtend; wherein the admirall of Oſtend fought brauely, being forſaken by his two fellowes, haueing ſuncke one of the men of warre; and being afterwards layde abord by the Holland admirall, and another ſhip of Enchuyſen, found himſelf reduced to ſuch extremities, that he could make no longer reſiſtance, putt fire to the powder, and blew up the ſhip, wherein were 30 pieces of canon, and 150 men, who all periſhed, except only 27, who leaped into the Holland admirall to ſaue themſelues from the fire; and being brought into Rotterdam, haue dyed all by the rope, which is all the quarter wont to be giuen to thoſe men.

THIS laſt weeke here hath bin the counte Mansfeld, ſolliciting of the States an enlargement of their conditions with him; which his men eſteeme very bare, 1622. though as ample as to any pay'd by this State, unleſſe they had the meanes and liberty of ſpoile and rauage, like as they practiſed in Germany uppon the ennemies countrey; but he continewed the offer of the ſeruice both of his perſon and army at the ſame account: and the States of Holland (uppon which prouince matters of this nature do cheifly depend) do aſſemble this day extraordinarily, to take ſuch reſolution herein, as ſhall be found moſt expedient for the good of this State, and ſatisfaction of the counte.

The king of Bohemia arriued unexpectedly in this place on Wendſday laſt, the $\frac{9}{19}$th of the preſent, haueing taken his journey priuatly from Sedan, where he hath ſejourned euer ſince he licenſed counte Mansfelds army, to Calais, from whence he was carried to Fluſhing in a ſhip of warre of the States: he found counte Mansfeld here at his comming, and was immediately followed the ſame day by the duke Chriſtian of Brunſwicke, who hath layen, euer ſince his returne into theſe prouinces, at Breda, to be cured of the wound of his loſt arme, occaſioned by the ſhott he receaued in the battell of Fleury (of which your lordſhip will haue heard); of which he is not yet perfectly recouered, though otherwiſe in good ſtate of health and ſtrength.

The States ambaſſadors in England haue giuen a great alarme hither of a Spaniſh fleete uppon the coaſt of England, bound for theſe parts; with which they are here nothing ſo much terrified, as, on the other ſide, they are comforted by the advertiſement thoſe ambaſſadors giue, of his majeſties refuſing that fleete the liberty of his ports, demanded (according as their letters ſay) by the Spaniſh ambaſſador: withall, they do advertiſe an abſolute reſolution in his majeſty, ſince Sir Richard Weſtons returne withowt ſatisfaction from Bruxells, to breake with the emperor, in the prince his ſonne in lawes quarrell.

Owt of an apprehenſion, grounded uppon many likelyhoods, that the Spaniſh fleete ſhould haue a deſigne uppon Embden, the only hauen in theſe parts fitt to receaue great navies, the admirall of Holland, Monſ. Opdam, is ſent into thoſe parts by the Texell, to remoue the beacons and ſea marckes amongſt thoſe iſlands, through which the paſſage lyes; and all the admiralties are written to, to putt themſelues in a readines.

I haue nothing to adde, ſaue onely to lett your lordſhip vnderſtand, that abowt three weekes ſince, the Duch ambaſſador Van Agas wife went from this place in companie of Monſ. Berck towards Conſtantinople, by the way of Marſeilles, who parts with her at that place, where they meete with ſeueral ſhips, to carrie the one to Venice, the other towards you, who hath vndertaken the deliuerie of your pictures of the king and queen of Bohemia, committed eſpecially to the truſt of an auntient ſeruant of Van Aga; of which I ſhall be glad to heare how well he doth diſcharge himſelf; and allwayes to vnderſtand of your lordſhips health and happines, as one that reſts

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionatly, to doe you ſervice,

Hagh, this $\frac{14}{24}$ of

Dudley Carleton.

Your lordſhip will vnderſtand how Sir Horace Vere is with a handfull of men beſieged in Manheym by the count de Tilly, helped by the canon he tooke in Heydlebergh, and the boores of the Palatinat, whom he forceth to make his workes; yet owr laſt letters from thence ſay the place holdes owt well. My lord ambaſſador Chicheſter is reuoked; and Mr. chancellor of the Exchequer arrived in England, of whoſe report your lordſhip will be aduertiſed from thence: both thoſe are diſcouraged with the proceedings of the Spaniards and Imperialiſts, whilſt our two ambaſſadors in Spain write nothing but placebos. Meane while, I haue ſeene intercepted letters from the Spaniſh ambaſſador in England to the count de Gondamar now in Spain, which ſheweth the Spaniſh frendſhip towards vs to be full of diſſimulation and ſuſpition; and I dowbt, the effects will rather ſute with our Duch ambaſſadors feares, then our Spaniſh ambaſſadors hopes. I want a cyfer to adde more: thus much I could not forbeare, knowing you will long for newes of our affaires.

From Sir H. WOTTON.

My Lord,

YOUR lordſhip hath reaſon, in one of your letters, to chide, and in all of them, to wonder at my ſilence; and therefore I ſhall neede to beginn with ſome deſcription of mine owne evills, that I may bring my ſelf out of your anger into youre compaſſion, though the choice be miſerable betweene thoſe two affections from a frend.

AFTER the feavers of the laſt autumne, (which did laye me, and almoſt my whole familie, all downe together; whereof God tooke three of neereſt vſe aboute me into his eternal reſt) I founde within a while my appetite (which had ever been one of my ſureſt frends) quite overthrowen with a ſtraunge kinde of ſweete humour diſtilling from my head; which my phyſitions (though no mineral men) did correct with the ſpiritt of vitriol: now, whether this left behinde it a bad impreſſion, I knowe not; but, not long after, I fell into ſuch a burning in the ſtomack as hath caſt me behinde, in many privat, and often interrupted even my publique duties, having heald me from the beginning of the laſt winter till verie lately; for which, beſides frequent vexation of phyſique, I was no leſſe then five tymes let bloud; and yet, at laſt, I was more eaſed with familiar then with ſtrong remedies.

I WISH hartily, that as my inwarde infirmitie hath reſembled the external diſtempers and boylings of the chriſtian world, ſo they may imitat me in the maner of my cure, and yeilde rather to gentle treaties, then neede ſharper reſolutions; but litle can I hope that it will ſo fall owt in thoſe broken affayres, which his majeſtie hath hetherto ſought to repayre with ſo bleſſed a ſpirit. For lett me diſcourſe vnto your lordſhip, how we ſtande at this inſtant: the king of Bohemia and elector Palatin, (lett me now give him his tytles, for he hath nothing elſe left but Franckendal and Manheime) after a verie venturous paſſage, in diſguized forme, from the Haghe, thorough Fraunce into the lower Palatinat, is lately from thenſe retired to Sedan, after he had with a formal licenſe left the count Mansfeld, and the braue young duke of Brownſwig to theire owne counſayles and fortunes, who bothe together haue made theire waye thorough the Spaniſh provinces, and after a battayle, whereof I ſend you herewith the trueſt deſcription, ſome ſix leagues from Bruxelles, with Don Gonzales de Cordoa, (who quitted the Palatinat to pourſue them) are joyned with the prince of Orange, who hath imployed them together with the gariſon of Breda, to intercept the convoyes of victual betweene Antwerp and Spinolaes leiger, before Bergen-vp-zome; which action doeth now drawe all eyes vppon it, the prince beeing reſolued to vnſett the ſeige, and the marquis not to riſe; ſo as the glories of two great cheiffs are at the ſtake. I muſt note to youre lordſhip, before I retourne into the Higher Germanie, that at the ſayed ſiege are two Engliſh regiments without, vnder the lords of Argile and Vaux; but, leaſt you ſhould pitie too much the oppoſition of owre owne cuntrie bloud, (which would reſemble a ciuil warr abroad) lett me withall tell you, that moſt of theire men are runn away. Within are at leaſt 9000 defendants, but of them, not aboue 100 doe keepe the walls; the reſt are in the owtworckes, 150 verge from the towne, and euerie verge 12 foote; where haue been hetherto many warme diſputations and ſalies; diverſe Engliſh and Scottiſh captaynes wounded, colonel Hinderſon dead of his thigh broken, and Sir Charles Morgan was ſent thether in his roome. On the Spaniſh ſide many hundred killed in theaſe firſt attempts: two armies volant attending owtward opportunities, the one vnder the prince of Orange, the other vnder the count Henry Von don Berg, with whom the marquis ſeemes to chaunge turnes; for at the ſiege of Juliers count Henry was the beſeiger, and the marquis was volant. Thus ſtandeth that action in apparence, likely to proue a winter warr, vnleſſe incommodities diſſolue it. Now, in the meane while, the Bavarian armie (baptized imperial) hath taken Heidelberg, burnt the ſuburbes, which was the fayreſt piece, ſacked the howſes, and killed all the Engliſh, whom the Dutche (as theire maner is) were contented to lett fight alone; and theare we loſt the noble Sir Gerard Herbert, after he had broken 4 pykes vppon the enimie, whoſe loſſe was the loſſe likewiſe of the caſtel, the next daye. After which, whether they would be ſatisfyed with the capital towne and electoral ſeate, or attempt the remayning pieces, was, I thincke, 1622. rather mater of expectation, then of queſtion; for if owre laſt currier doe not deceaue vs, they haue inveſted Manheime, where God bleſſe Sir Horace Vere; a man abler to recover provinces agayne, then provinces to breede ſuch a man.

I haue now made a curſorie diſcharge vnto your lordſhip of the mater of noiſe; the civil and ſilent part remayneth: Your lordſhip knowes we haue in hand two treaties, the one by the lord Digbie, now earle of Briſtowe, at Madrid; the other by Sir Richard Weſton at Bruxelles, which at what diſtance ſoeuer we may contemplat as perfect relatives, quæ ſe ponunt tolluntq;, or like thoſe auncient twinns, that, how farr ſoever aſunder, were ſicke and well alwayes together; for we heere conceaue, that the ſayed treaties are to proceede pari paſſu, or, in other language, that his majeſties royal meaning is to matche the prince his ſonn, and to redintegrat his ſonn in lawe tout a un coup. But at Bruxelles, after Sir Richard Weſton had ſpent ſome weekes in rectifying his commiſſion, agaynſt which certayn frivolous exceptions were taken in point of formalitie, when he thought to come to the mater, (the forme beeing now ſetled) what doeth the emperor? He removes the buiſineſſe from thence to the diete at Regensburg, contrarie to his expreſſe promiſſe vnto his majeſtie by a ſolemne (nobly treated and ritchly preſented) ambaſſador, who brought vs the choice of three townes where his maſter would finiſh the treatie, Colen, Franckfurt, or Bruxelles. This foule playe beeing expoſtulated by an expreſſe currier, and by the ſharpeſt letter that the king had ever written, (as in truthe the cauſe required) the emperor retournes a replie garniſhed with ſundrie intervenient complayntes, That the Palatine had perſeuered in armes after a ceſſation was ſought; that with his champion Mansfeld, he had ravaged Alſatia; that he had drawen to him the young duke of Brownſwich, laden with ſacrilegious ſpoiles; that he had ſeazed on the perſon of the good prince Ludovicus of Haſſia, vnder the countenance of hoſpitalitie, with ſuch like rhetorical ſtuff; all which he bindes vp in a knott, and by oblique inference retorteth vppon his majeſtie a breache of former promiſſe, that he would reduce his ſonn in lawe to that due obedience which became him towardes his liege lord: notwithſtanding which cauſes of new offenſe, he reinvites the king to ſend his ambaſſador, ad calendas Octobres, to the foreſayed electoral diete at Regensburge; where he will pretermitt nothing, per quod publice conſtare poſſit, quantum ſerenitatis veſtræ (for he beſtowes maieſtie vppon no king but himſelfe) humanitati et amicitiæ merito tribuamus. Thoſe are his verie wordes, which beeing extant in paper, we reckon ſomewhat more then a bare complement committed to the ayre. Whereuppon his maieſtie hath been contented to chaunge, not his inſtructions, but the inſtrument; and in roome of Sir Richard Weſton (who was neerer and more neceſſarie at home) to delegat my lord of Belfaſte to the foreſayed diete; who at this preſent lingreth in Franchfurt till farther certayntie of the emperors approache to the appointed place, which hath been delayed beyonde his perfixed calends, thorough miſlikes taken by Monguntia and Saxonie (though ſhadowed with other excuſes) to the place, as partially choſen, becauſe it lyeth in the verie jawes of Bavaria; who, beſides the contiguitie of his owne dukedome, hath garriſons rounde aboute it in the Vpper Auſtria and Palatinat, enough to force aſſent, if he cannot perſwade it. But the emperor ſeemes to haue overcome in them theaſe reſpects; for my laſt from Vienna tell me, That on the 17 of this moneth (though with ſome circuit) he intendeth to ſett forwarde. And ſo we ſtande at the preſent, having, as I ſayed before, in the meane while loſt Heidelberg, the maner whereof wilbe beſt delivered to your lordſhip by a freſh letter, which I haue receaued from my lord of Belfaſt, even ſince I begann this. Lett me only, ſuper tota materia, aſke St. Paules queſtion to the Romans, Permanebimus igitur in peccato, ut gratia abundet? Abſit, ſayeth he. It were ill divinitie, and, I thincke, as ſtraunge policie, to take townes, that they may ſhowe the more kindeneſſe in giving them agayne. Yet my lord Digbie (who lies at the fountayne of all owre hope, and knowes the bowels of that court) writeth verie confidently bothe to his majeſtie and to his miniſters, touching the ſincere intentions of the Spaniſh king; but his treatie theare (beſides his owne ſickneſſe) hath been (as I conceaue it) retarded by three meanes: 1. The pope had not paſſed his aſſent till of late, and that after no leſſe then ſix congregations. 2. His lordſhip was to proceede according to the ſtepps of the other treatie at Bruxelles, betweene which and Madrid the running of intelligence was a waſte of tyme. 3. The conde de Gondomar was, before his lordſhip could beginn, expected theare, whoſe pace was ſlower then his witt; after whoſe arrival, commiſſioners were immediately appointed, to come to ſome final concluſion with my lord Digbie. And thus much his laſt letters import, full of confidence in the iſſue, or at leaſt in the well meaning (as I ſayed before); but as then ignorant of the German proceedings. And now your lordſhip hath as much as I am able to tell you of owre preſent caſe, as it ſtandeth abroade. Lett me, after this, ſaye ſomewhat of Italie, which is my more proper object; and in truthe (my lord) it is a noveltie of great noiſe that I ſhall relate: "The pope hath publiſhed an edict, the "verie laſt weeke, whereby he prohibiteth the Italian princes to giue reception in "theire townes and ſtates to any of different religion from the Roman; and for-"biddeth Italians to inhabit in any cuntrie, where his catholique doctrine is not "profeſſed, without exception even of marchants." So as the ſayed edict (as we yet vnderſtande it) doth retrenche civil commencement. What it will worcke elſewhere, I cannot ſaye; but I beleeue this ſtate (at which it moſt pointeth) will haue the honour to be the firſt that ſhall laugh at it. For my part, to ſpeake like a playn Kentiſh man, I only feare that it will not laſte; for I obſerue this pope to haue been tranſported therein (I knowe not yet by whoſe counſayles) to a violent variation from himſelf, no tymes having been hetherto more eaſie, nor, as I may terme it, more vninquiſitive into conſcience, then his owne: it is yet ſo freſh, that I cannot acquaynt your lordſhip with the inwarde motives thereof, but in ſuperficie it appeareth a preamble to a warr of religion; in which caſe, for my ſhare, lett me only repeate the wordes of our bleſſed Saviour himſelf; Vende tunicam, et eme gladium. Of the Griſons I ſhall ſpeake in my next; for I feare I haue tired your lordſhip already, and my long ſilence hath ſo caſt me behinde, that hortus ſilveſcit; it will require more weeding then at once, to playne the allies. Weekely, heereafter, your lordſhip ſhalbe troubled with my poore diſcourſe; for the tymes doe promiſe me abundant ſubject. Yet I cannot end the preſent without an humble preſentation, thorough your lordſhips handes, of my willing ſeruice to youre moſt worthie ladie; if this weſtern world may yeilde any thing for her uſe or delight, that the Levant doth miſſe: to which offer I am bounde, by my long deuotion to her owne name, and by that noble curteſie wherewith ſhe was pleaſed to honour me, the daye when your lordſhip attended the king to Paules. 1622.

AND ſo committing you bothe, with your whole familie, to Gods deere protection, I will remayne (as I am confident) in youre lordſhips love, of October, 1622.

From Venice, the 15
ſtile of the place.

and at your commaundes,

HENRY WOTTON.

Poſt-ſcript. Scribitur in tergo nec dum finitus Oreſtes. This piece I reſerue for home news: The vicount Falkland departed for Ireland, Sir John Sucklin controler in his rome: Sir George Calvert and Sir Thomas Wentworthe (who were bothe knights of Yorckſhire the laſt parlament) bothe widoers at a tyme. Vpon the grieff, of the firſt, and withall ſome retirement, ſtrong ſpeeche of a ſeconde ſecretarie; Sir Richard Weſton long ſince, Sir Edward Conawaye more newly, and, laſt of all, Sir Clement Edmundes in ſome voice that waye. The parlamentarie priſoners out of the Towre, with confinement to their owne homes: my lord of Oxford inlarged theare, from cloſe priſon, with hope of intire libertie: my lord of Southampton reſtored to the kings face and fauour, with long and cheerefull ſpeache. Foure earles in proxima potentia, Digbie of Briſtow, Fielding of Denbigh, Duncaſter of Carlile, the lord threſorer of Middleſex. The poorer recuſants (who were mayntayned at the kings charge) ſett at libertie vnder bayle, at the requeſt of the Florentine and Polonian ambaſſadors. Some inſtructions, by regal order, diſpenſed by the archbiſhop to regular young fiery devines. Laſtly, Sir John Aire acquitted by a famous ſentence at the counſayle bord in preſens of the king, whereof your lordſhip now receaues the copie.

Second Poſt-ſcript. I MENTION aboue, a letter from my lord of Belfaſt, which I muſt deferr to ſend your lordſhip till next Saterday, beeing, at the cloſing heereof, I knowe not how, a little miſlayed.

I HAVE receaved all your letters, even the firſt fauour from Meſſina, wherein your lordſhip begann your Turkiſh employment ſo chriſtianly, and ſo honorably:

1622. but that was not the firſt tyme that I heard of your beeing within the Streights; for Sir Walter Aſton told me, you had taken ſome refreſhment at Malaga. Your packetts for England, recommended thorough my handes, had all theire due addreſſe, and, for aught I knowe, are all receaved ſaue one, which ſtill remaynes of dubious fortune, beeing ſent in a weeke when the common budget was rifled: it was at ſtake in the ſecond; but heereafter youre lordſhip ſhall haue a punctual accoumpt by the dates. One to the queene of Bohemia, which came from you this weeke in youre letter to Mr. Simms, I ſent yeſterday to the Haghe, where that incomparable ladie, whoſe vertues doe ſhine thorough her fortune, doeth ſtill remayne; another to his majeſties ambaſſador in Fraunce, I retayne till he ſhalbe theare: the place at the preſent is voied, while that king doeth breathe nothing but jeſuitical flames. By the next currier I will ſend your lordſhip a cifer, that we may the more ſafely interchaunge owre thoughts, and exerciſe owre honeſt freedome. Good my lord, lett me be hartily remembred to my worthie and auncient frend, Sir John Chapman; and ſo I leaue your lordſhip to your owne noble ſpiritts.

The third Poſtſcript. AT this inſtant I receaue a letter from Sir Walter Aſton, under the 19. of September, from Madrid, ending thus: "The buiſineſſes which my lord of Briſtol is treating "in this court goe on well, and I beleeue will come to a ſpeedier accommoda-"tion then is expected.

Monsr.

J'AI receu ceſte ſemaine vn paquet venant de V. E. pour le cheualier Francois Netherſol, et de Veniſe maeſté enuoyée vne lettre appart pour S. M. de Boheme, qui vient auſſi a ce, que je puis imaginer de ſa part le tout ſera enuoyé apres demain a la Haye, Dieu aidant; ou je fais compte que mons^r. Netherſol ſe trouue de preſent. Il partiſt dici le 12. du mois paſſé pour paſſer en Angleterre, et donner relation de l'eſtat des affaires en ces cartiers. Je deuois faire le voiage enuoye par mons^r. le general Veer; mais mons^r. l'ambaſſadeur ne trouua bon que je deuſſe partir, a cauſe que je pouuois eſtre neceſſaire pour les prouiſions d'argent que on attendoit; et ainſi il prinſt le deuant paſſat par la Haye. Il eſtoit bien arriué des le 25 de Settembre en court de ſa negotiation. Nous n'avons encores rien, mons^r. l'ambaſſadeur Chicheſter ayant eſté icy depuis quelques ſemaines attendant l'aſſemblee electorale de Ratisbone ſelon les commandemens de S. M. euſt enuiron le commencement de ce mois ordre expres de retourner en Angleterre ſans paſſer auant, S. M. ſe trouuant extremement deſgouſtée des procedures tenues par l'empereur, et a Bruſſelles par l'infante et conſeil d'Eſpagnie; car ayant traine en longueur un traicté de ſuſpention d'armes au Palatinat depuis le mois de Mai ſur diuerſes ſubtilites, et termes vn peu trop cauteleus, le duc de Bauiere toutes fois ſoubs le titre de l'empereur, voyant que le roy de Boheme a la perſuaſion de ſon pere auoit licentie toutes ſes armees et troupes s'eſtat retiré a Sedan vers le duc de Bouillon, s'eſt ſi bien preualu de l'auantage durant le traicté, qu'il s'eſt rendu maiſtre de Heidelbergh, les miniſtres Eſpagniols et de l'infante affermant en Angleterre, que le ſiege n'eſtoit pas come mons^r. l'ambaſſadeur aduiſoit, aſſeurant S. M. de la ſincerite du traicté, et faiſant apparoiſtre lettres eſcriptes par l'infante au general de l'empereur pour deſiſter du ſiege, s'il l'auoit commencé, donnant ainſi temps a leur perfidie. Le general s'eſt excuſé de n'auoir ordre de l'empereur de ſuiure les directions de l'infante, et preſſant la ville par la couardiſe des Alemans, qui abandonerent les deffences, s'en rendiſt maiſtre par force, vſant toutes ſortes de cruautes, rapts, meurtres, et pilleries, que la grande inſolence d'vn victorieus ennemi peuſt imaginer. Depuis le 9 de Settembre il aſſiege Manheim, et ha reduict mons^r. le general a tels termes qu'il, l'a abandoné. La ville ne ſe trouuant fort aſſes de gens pour la deffendre auecques la cittadelle, il y miſt le feu, ayant premierement retiré tout ce qui eſtoit dedans, tant artillerie que munition, prouiſion, et gens dans la ditte cittadelle, ou il ſe trouue depuis le commencement de ce mois bien pourueu de viures gens et munitions. Jeus hier nouuelles deus par vn ſoldat ſorti ce jour, 8 jours de nuict eſtoyent en bonne reſolution et courage de ſe bien deffendre; je crains la couardiſe Alemande & diſſention; l'ennemi rapporte lui meſme, qu'il ſe deffendent brauement, et qu'ils leur tuent vne grande quantité de peuple. Nous verrons en breff, ce que en ſera; car la ſaiſon ne peuſt pas longuement permettre que l'ennemi puiſſe camper. Je n'ai voulu faillir vous advertir de ce que ſe paſſe, afin qu'elle ſeceuſt la verité, de tout et de combien que S. M. eſt trompée en ſon attente de voir ſon gendre reſtauré par ce traicté. Je tiens qu'elle le ſera de meſme en ce qu'on traicte en Eſpagnie : le temps le monſtrera. Icy il court diuers bruicts, que S. M. ce ſoit declaré : mais ayant lettres d'Angleterre, et n'entendant nen de certain, je veus ſuſpendre de le croire : bien on m'aduiſe qu'il y ha apparence de changement tres grand. Les miniſtres Eſpagniols diſent, que ſur nos coſtes il y auoit 70 ou 80 nauires de guerre poureus, auecques 15000 hommes, pour le mettre a terre. Ils donnent ces bruicts a Londres, faiſant croire que ſont entre Plimouth et les Dunes, et cependant l'eſtat n'en auoit nul aduis. S'il eſt ainſi, ceſt bien prendre peu de regard a noſtre aſſeurance : mais je tiens que c'eſt vn allarme qu'ils donnent aus Hollandois pour radoucir la grande perte qu'ls ont faicte ſoubs Berges op Zoom. Les premieres lettres nous en donneront ample aduis. V. E. trouera eſtrange que je ſoye icy : je fus enuoye par S. M. pour manier les effects et argent que elle enuoyoit a ſes troupes, et en faire les payemens. Je me tins a Manheim auecques mons^{r}. le general juſques au 5 de Settembre ; et vins icy pour quelques proviſions, penſant de paſſer outre : mais come je dis, mons^{r}. l'amb ne le trouua bon. Je ſuis attendant ce qu'on comandera plus auant. V. E. me pardone, ſi je lui donne peine de lire ceſte mal elabouree lettre. Je n'ai voulu manquer de lui baiſer les mains, et la ſaluer de tout mon coeur, lui ſouhaitant du Seig^{r}. toute felicité. Je demeure,

PAR ma derniere, qui ſuſt trois ſemaines paſſćés, vous aures veu la recepice et enuoi de vos lettres a mons^{r}. Netherſol. J'en receu vn autre par le dernier ordinaire, que j'ai incontinent hier deſpeché vers la Haye, ou je crois que il ſe trouue : de lui vous aures nouuelles a ſon temps : le roy de Boheme y eſt auſſi. Par mes lettres la perte de Heidelbergh vous aura eſté notifiée, ſi deuant n'en auies nouuelle, depuis la fortereſſe de Manheim c'eſt auſſi accordee auecques le general de l'empereur, et mons^{r}. Ver en eſt ſorti, prenant ſon chemin par icy uers Bremen pour paſſer en Hollande. La cauſe de la renditions eſt manquement de poudres et de gens, la place eſtant d'vn extraordinairement grand circuit. Franchendall eſt preſentement aſſiege, ſe deffent punctuellement et vaillamment ; ſi ſecours leur ſera aſſeuré, il donneront beau jeu et temps four faire de belles factions, autrement ne pouront long temp ſubſiſter. Voila le fruict qu'a faict et apport le traicté de Bruſſelles, et come S. M. ha eſté abuſeé : elle ha rappelé ſon agent mons^{r}. Dighbie, qui eſtoit a Vienne pres l'empereur deſpeche en Eſpagnie pour auoir la reintegration de ſon gendre ſelon les promeſſes, ou bien paſſage pour vne armee royale. Il faut attendre la reſolution : mais que pouuons nous attendre de bien de lieu, ou tout malheur eſt pratiqué contre nous? V. E. deura ſcauoir mieus que moi ce qui ſe paſſe ; cependant ne manquerai, durant que ſerai icy, lui dire ce que viendra a ma cognoiſance. Le ſeig^{r}. general va tout droict a la Haye ; le lieutenant colonel emmena des le mois de Settembre ou Aouſt le ſieur Barclai ſon neueu en Angleterre, que lui ſervira d'advis ; et moi lui baiſant bien humblement les mains, et lui ſouhaitant du Seig^{r}. toute felicité, je demeure, 1622.

From my Lord of CANTERBURY.

My very good Lord,

I HAVE received from you diverſe letters, relations, and copies of ſundry particulars of occurrents which haue fallen out in that porte, and thereabouts, ſince your departure hence; for all which I give you very harty thankes. And now having fitt opportunity to returne you ſome what, I do firſt recommend vnto you this bearer Critophilus Metrophanes, a Greeke, borne in Byrræa, and ſent vnto mee five or ſix yeeres ſince by Cyrill, then patriarke of Alexandria, and now of Conſtantinople: hee hath remained all his time in Oxford, where I have taken care that hee hath bene well and ſufficiently maintained, and thereby hath attained vnto ſome reaſonable knowledge of the Engliſh tongue, not neglecting his ſtudies otherwiſe. Hee is a learned man, and hath lived in that vniverſity with good report, whereof hee is able to ſhew letters teſtimoniall to the good contentment, as I hope, of that reverend man from whom hee was ſent.

AS for the patriarke himſelfe, I do not doubt but that in opinion of religion hee is, as wee terme him, a pure Calviniſt; and ſo the Jeſuites in theſe parts do brand him. I have heeretofore received from him diverſe letters written in the old Greeke, by which I do perceive that there breatheth in him a ſoule, as, on the one ſide, full of piety and devotion; ſo, on the other ſide, full of prudence and diſcretion. I had publiſhed his letters to the worlde, but that peradventure it might have cauſed him ſome blame, for ſome free, but true ſpeeches, touching the place wherein you live. I do now write vnto him, and do deſire, that by you all good correſpondence betweene him and mee may bee continued.

THE archbiſhop of Spalato at his firſt comeing into England lying long in my houſe, and hearing of the intercourſe that was betweene that patriarke and mee, would needs write vnto him; and ſent him one of his bookes againſt the pope. This man, when you departed out of England, appeered to bee no otherwiſe but ſound; but ſince, hee hath ſhewed himſelfe ſuch a beſtaccio, as that I thinke fitt to give you, in particular, ſome account concerning him: Hee was in England honorably provided for, as having the maſterſhip of the Savoy, the deanry of Windſor, one benefice, and another donative, beſides plate given him every yeere from the kinge, to the value of 200 marks; and wee of the clergy gave him 200 l. a yeere, which, for my part, I continued vntill Chriſtmas laſt; but by meanes of a couple of Italians, the Spaniſh embaſſador did ſecretly worke with him to draw him away: hee promiſed him a penſion of 12000 crownes a yeere, or the biſhopricke of Salerna in the kingdome of Naples, beſides acceptation from the biſhop of Rome, and a remiſſion for his departure from that ſea. And accordingly, by the Spaniſh embaſſador reſident at Rome, there was in ſhew a trafiking for theſe thinges. Theſe baites did ſo farre catche this vngodly man, that hee gave his conſent to bee gone; and vpon the 16 of January laſt, wrote vnto our kinge being then at Newmarket, to crave his leave to bee gone, vnder colour to ſeeke ſome reconcilement betweene the reformed and the Roman churches.

THE kinge marvelled at it, and vpon good adviſe cauſed ſuch queſtions to bee at ſundry times propounded vnto him, as drawing from him anſweres in writing, vnder his owne hand, to declare him to bee a meere worldly man, without conſcience or religion. The Spaniſh embaſſador having gayned this vpon him, and having made him odious both to God and man, to proteſtant and papiſt, did vtterly deſert him, profeſſing openly, That hee did not care if the kinge heere did hang him. And when hee was told by one, That the kinge had greate reaſon to take it ill at his hands, that hee had debauched and perverted one whom hee eſteemed ſo much, the anſwere of Gondomar was, That hee did looke for thankes at the kinges hands, for ridding and freeing him of ſo wicked and vngodly a perſon. Theſe thinges being made knowne ſundry waies vnto Spalato, did ſo farre alter him, that hee would have bene glad to have bene ſtayed in this country, as at ſeverall times hee expreſſed to the deane of Wincheſter and Dr. Goade; but wee did not thinke it fitt to continue ſuch an apoſtata heere; and therefore, in the preſence of twelve counſellors, biſhops, and other learned men, hee was inioyned by ſuch a day to depart the realme, and not to returne vpon his perill.

ONE greate reaſon that wrought vpon him was his pride, who magnifyed himſelfe, and diſeſteemed all other men, expecting that hee ſhould have had the higheſt regiment of eccleſiaſticall thinges in England committed vnto him; yea, ſuppoſing that his owne worth and wiſedome was ſuch, that hee merited at leaſt heere to have bene a privy counſellor. Another thinge that tranſported him, was his ineſtimable avarice beyond the degree of an Italian, raking to him hee cared not what, and living ſo ſordidly and baſely as was a ſhame for any man of quality: beſides, he was by nature and practiſe, a man ſo vngratefull, as that neither to the kinge, nor to mee, nor to any other perſon in England, hee did returne as much as thankes, or a good worde, for all the benefitts that were beſtowed vpon him: theſe thinges are evident in him. But there was another ſecrett that certainly hee apprehended; That by the match with Spaine wee ſhould have had ſome extraordinary reference to Rome, wherein hee thought his miniſtry might bee neceſſary, and therefore hee would begin betimes to make himſelfe an interceſſor betweene vs and that ſea; but God fruſtrated his deſire, and ſo I truſt hee ever will.

I CANNOT but commend your greate care for the compeſcing of the pyrates of Algier, but I can give you no account how that propoſition which you have made, is taſted heere. I do very much like your motion for ſome ſettled courſe to bee taken for the redemption of captives, but there wanteth ſome body to ſollicite it. And true it is, that the whole kingdome is much exhauſted by the affaires of the Palatinate; which cauſe alone, for ſome yeeres that are paſt, hath drawne from mee out of my meanes, which are not greate, above 1000 l. a yeere in mony; and when wee ſhall have an end, onely God doth know. The emperor, by the duke of Bavarias forces, hath gotten Heidelberg, and perhaps by this time is maſter of Manheim alſo; where Sir Horace Vere hath bene forced to burne the towne, and to retire himſelfe into the caſtle; ſo that only Frankendale is free; and how long that may hold out, every man may judge. There is ſent into Spaine an expreſſe meſſenger, to crave the reſtitution of the whole Palatinate; but what will bee the iſſue, no man can tell, ſince the kinge hitherto hath bene nothing but abvſed in the treaty at Bruxelles: I much feare wee can expect nothing but a warre, for which God knowes wee are vnprovided; and yet, if wee do breake forth, there is good apparance, that many princes in Germany, and confining thereunto, will give vs good aſſiſtance, becauſe they do finde, that by the houſe of Auſtria the liberty of the empire is vtterly oppreſſed, and that vnder a colour of civill affaires there is intended an extirpation of the reformed religion.

I KNOW that the Greeks which beg heere for captives, are no better then counterfeits, and therefore they finde litle favor with mee.

BOTH from you and other waies, I vnderſtand the greate change that hath bene in that empire where you reſide; and it is much to bee lamented, that our Chriſtian princes are ſo diſtracted in their affections and reſolutions, that they do not ioyne to invade the common enemy, and to pull that from him which hee hath torne from his neighbours. Certainly that kingdome doth reſt at this time but vpon a weake foundation, ſo few being remaineing of the Ottoman race, and the Janiſſaries, who were the ſtrength of that monarchy, being ſo corrupted in their diſcipline, and growne ſo inſolent, that the grand ſegnor can neither bee well with them nor without them: God hath his worke, which in his owne time hee will accompliſh.

IN theſe parts the Spanyard goeth on, with violence to overbeare, or with craſt to vndermine, all thoſe that bee his neighbours. Hee hath had a hard yeere of this againſt the Hollanders, firſt, by count Henry of Naſau breaking into Brabant, carying away greate ſpoiles and many priſoners, and burning almoſt to the very gates of Bruxelles. Secondly, by the paſſing of count Mansfeild and Chriſtian the duke of Brunſwicke, with their forces, through ſo greate a part of the kinge of Spaines Low Countries, and winning a feirce battle vpon Gonſalvo de Cordua. Thirdly, in that greate troupes ſent into Frizeland were defeated by the States. And, fourthly, that Spinola having planted a long ſeege againſt Bergen vp Zome, was forced to riſe by night, and with ſhame to leave it. The kinge of France, after the loſſe of many of his nobles, and the beſt of his captaines and men of warr, hath bene conſtrained to conclude a peace with the proteſtants, and graunt them ſuch conditions as formerly they had. It is hoped, that hee will turne his armes for the recovery of the Voltellina, which yet remaineth in the hands of the Spanyards, and ſo doth

1622. the greateſt part of the Griſons country; that people being hurt by their owne diviſions, but much more ſurprized by the fraude of the Spaniards in the middeſt of a treaty. Wee remaine at home in the ſame ſtate that you left vs. This is the conſtitution of this weſt part of Chriſtendome. So, by this letter, making you amends for my not writing hitherto vnto you, with remembrance of my beſt love vnto you and your lady, I reſt

Your Lordſhips aſſured loving frende,

G. CANT.

TRUSTIE and welbeloved, we greet you well: Wee haue been made acquainted with what you haue latelie written to our ſecretary Sir George Caluert, and with the relation you haue giuen him of your proceedinge vppon the arrivall there of the ambaſſador from Bethelem Gabor, accompanied with the count de Tourne; and doe ſoe well approve of your diſcreete carriage in that buſynes, and of the care you haue had to divert the Turkes entringe into the quarrell by invadinge of Germany, and of your preciſe obſervinge our inſtruction on that behalfe, as wee haue thought fitt to give you this teſtimony of our good acceptance, vnder our owne hand; and to aſſure you, that wee will all waies be myndfull of it, as occaſion ſhalbe offered for your good.

FROM our ſecretary you will vnderſtand the preſent eſtate of the affaires of our ſonne in lawe. Soe wee bid you hartely farewell.

From Newmarkett,

November, 1622.

Superſcribed,
To our truſty and welbeloued
Sir THOMAS ROE, Knight,
our Ambaſſador
at Conſtantinople.

From Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

My Lord,

I SHALL, in a noate here incloſed, give you an accompt of all the diſpatches I haue receiued from you; and withall, this accompt of my ſelfe; That if I haue not punctually anſwered all the letters you haue ſent mee, the heape and burden of buſineſſes, which haue multiplyed upon mee in this troubleſome time, and when, of late, I haue had diſtraction (God knowes) enough in mine owne private, leaves me not without ſome excuſe. It is not poſſible for a ſecretary to keepe an equall correſpondence with ambaſſadors, but they muſt withall expect ordinary occurrents from their private freindes; for which I haue challenged your freind, my cozen Branthwait, as having neglected you; but hee proteſts againſt it, and tells mee he hath written every fortnight or three weeks at leaſt, whatſoever is become of his letters.

AS ſoone as I receiued your diſpatches of the 24th of Auguſt, and 7. of September, which came vnto mee much about one time, I ſent them inſtantly to his majeſty at Newmarkett, knowing they were ſuch as would give him infinite contentment; as you may perceive they haue, by this gratious letter which hee hath pleaſed to write vnto you. Your lordſhipp could not haue done a more acceptable ſervice, then the diverting of that ſtorme from Chriſtendome, whereby you haue purchaſed much honour vnto his majeſty, and to yourſelfe his miniſter. For the emperors particular, whome it immediately concernes, it is true, that his diſreſpects towards his majeſty at this time, deſerues little; but the conſcience of ſo good good a worke, as it concernes Chriſtendome in generall, is that in which his majeſty takes delight, without looking vpon private ends; and would therfore in any caſe haue your lordſhipp to bend all your endevors that way with that diſcretion wherewith you haue begunne: you cannot then faile of his gratious acceptation.

THAT nacrnsnrtu nucrnrnetrcauenununs nuuanucanrnece. 136. his majeſty doth much deteſt, and you were very happy in the diſcovery of it. I haue, by his majeſties expreſſe commaundement, acquainted my lord of Briſtoll, now in Spaine, with the whole buſineſſe, that hee may there lett that king ſee how heartely and ſincearly his majeſties miniſters doe, by their maſters order and commandement, imploy themſelues for the uniuerſall quiett of the chriſtian worlde, and for the particular good of the houſe of Auſtria, and their neereſt allies. I ſhall neede to ſay no more of this to your lordſhipp: you ſhall now underſtand how the emperour hath hitherto deſerved it.

ABOUT the beginning of the laſt ſpring, when Mr. chancellor of the exchequer was ſent vnto Bruxells to negotiate a ſurſeance of armes with the infanta and her commiſſioners, by vertue of the power given her from the emperour, there was ſome hope to effect it ſpeedily, and to haue come vnto the generall accommodation afterwards by a treaty of peace, which the emperour ever promiſed ſhould immediatly enſue the concluſion of the other; leaving a power vnto his majeſty and the infanta to agree vpon the time and place. But the prince Palatine about the ſame time departing from the Haghe, and falling downe into the Palatinate, putts himſelfe in the head of Mansfelds army, which committed ſuch ſpoiles vpon Leopold in Alſatia, and vpon the biſhopp of Spier, with other the emperors allies; the duke of Brunſwicke proceeding hoſtily on the other ſide with the elector of Cullen, the biſhopp of Wirtzburg, and other eccleſiaſticks, as the buſineſſe was embroyled anew; the prince Palatine, elevated ſometimes with good ſucceſſes, and by the meanes of thoſe that were about him, poſſeſt with an ill conceit of the courſe that his majeſty was in, to procure a ceſſation without an abſolute peace, ſo as diſtraction of councells vpon every accident, and the humors ſharpening in the meane time on both ſides, Mr. chancellor found many rubbes and difficulties every day in his negotiation, which were too long now to rehearſe to your lordſhipp. But the concluſion was no concluſion at all of any ſuſpenſion of armes; for whileſt formality of commiſſions and powers were diſputed a greate while by the commiſſioners on the emperors ſide, and then his majeſty preſt to vndertake for Mansfeld and Brunſwicke, as well as for his ſonne in lawe, which hee could not doe; the prince Palatines armyes fall into diſtreſſe, are ſtarved out of the Palatinate; himſelfe, (to ſay truthe) out of a deteſtation of their inſolencyes, and in obedience to his fathers adviſe, abandons them, and retires himſelfe to Sedan. Mansfeld and Brunſwick march with their troupes through part of Alſatia and Loraine, vnto thoſe frontiers of France that lye neere vnto Sedan; and there hovering a while, and amuſing the world with expectation where they would light, vpon the ſudden, after ſeverall rumors firſt ſpredd, ſometymes of their being entertayned by the French king, and ſometimes by thoſe of the Religion, they breake thorough Henault into Brabant, like the army of Jehu; where being encountered by Don Gonzales de Cordoua, who had followed them out of the Palatinate, a ſore battell was fought, with much loſſe on both ſides. But Mansfeld freed his paſſage notwithſtanding, and gott to Breda with ſome 4 or 5000 horſe; which came very opportunely for the States, thoſe ſuccours being the onely meanes they had to raiſe the ſiege of Bergen vp Some, as it did, which Spinola had ſtrongly beleagered all this ſummer. In the battell with Don Gonzales, the duke of Brunſwicke was ſhott in the left arme, which is ſince cutt off aboue the elbowe, and hee perfectly recovered.

THIS accident, of Mansfelds furious march through Brabant, putt the infanta into ſuch a feare and fright, as diſordered all our treaty at Bruſſells: then was there blame enough layd on the prince Palatine, whoſe interests they would by no meanes ſever from the other; but accuſing them and the duke of Bullion of intelligence together whileſt they lay about Sedan, hee is charged as privy to this attempt, and much coldneſſe growes thereupon in the proceeding of the treaty. In the meane time, the baron Tilly and Leopold doe what they liſt in the Palatinate, there being no army there to reſiſt them; they beſeege the kings garriſons, take Heidelberg by aſſault, and there exerciſe much cruelty: Manheim afterward rendred, vpon compo-

1622. ſition, by Sir Horace Vere, into Tillyes hands, the 25 of October laſt. The conditions were very faire, though, for any thing appeares yet vnto his majeſty, the towne might haue helld out a much longer time; but he is ſo braue a gentleman, and ſo faithfull a ſervant vnto the king, as I perſwade my ſelfe, when hee waits vpon his majeſty himſelfe, (for hee is not yet come) hee will give a good accompt of his actions.

I MAY not omitt one materiall part of this relation, which is, That as ſoone as Mr. Chancellor did knowe that Heidelberg was beſeeged, hee came away by directions from his majeſty, refuſing to treate any longer, when thoſe townes, which were the ſubiect of his negotiation, ſhould be taken peecemeale, whileſt they entertayned him there with hopes of a ſuſpenſion of armes; ſo as hee tooke his leave of the infanta, and returned vnto his majeſty vpon Michaelmas day laſt, refuſing a preſent that ſhee offered him, thereby to declare the ſenſe his maſter had of their proceeding with him.

IT were a long ſtory, to acquaint your lordſhipp with all the circumſtances belonging to this buſineſſe: The infanta for all this, and ſo all the miniſters of Spaine in that court, profeſſe the greateſt deſire in the world to give his majeſty ſatisfaction, with deepe oathes and proteſtations from ſome of the principall of them, that howſoever they are not able to prevent or ſtoppe theſe proceedings of the emperour and Bavaria now at the preſent, yet that vndoubtedly the king of Spaine will by one meanes or other procure his majeſty ſatisfaction at the laſt. There haue been ſome propoſitions made heere by the Spaniſh ambaſſadour, ſince Mr. chancellors coming from Bruxells, and before the loſſe of Manheim, of depoſiting thoſe two forts of Manheim and Frankendale into the infantas hands, vpon good aſſurance to be reſtored againe at the end of the treaty of peece, whither the emperour and the king our maſter came to the agreement or not: but, dum Romæ conſulitur, Saguntum expugnatur; Manheim is loſt in the meane time, and Frankendale is in like danger, beeing now alſo beſeeged, and is not like to holde out long for want of victuall and munition, as it is doubted; though captaine Burroughs, that comaunds there, be a very gallant reſolute gentleman, and will keepe it as long as it is poſſible. Meethincks, by this time, your lordſhipp ſhould wonder why I doe not tell you what the king of Spaine ſaith to all this dealing. You ſhall vnderſtand therefore, that the diſtance being greate betwixt Spaine, and the ſcene where theſe parts are played, advertiſements comes ſlowe, and directions ſlower, whither out of neceſſity or induſtriouſly, I will not iudge; but wee finde very little fruite of any thing that hath been yet ſent; for either it hath come too late, as an order ſent the other day from the infanta to Tilly, by vertue of a warrant from Spaine, for the forbearance of Manheim and Frankendale, which was deliuered him the next day after Manheim was rendred, or elſe Tilly findes ſome reaſon not to obey it, pretending his dependance vpon the emperour, and the duke of Bavaria, and their commaundements; and now, as his majeſty vnderſtands, excuſeth himſelfe vpon Mansfelds falling downe againe into Germany vpon the countryes of the biſhop of Cullen; where, not many dayes ſince, hee hath taken two townes (as they ſay); ſo as that elector being brother to the duke of Bavaria, and Mansfeld firſt taking wing in the prince Palatines quarrell, and (which perhapps adds ſomewhat to the ſuſpition) comming lately from the Haghe, where the prince elector now remaynes, all is caſt vpon the old ſcore, and whatſoever hurt is done, is pinned vpon his highnes ſhoulders. Neverthelеſſe his majeſty ſtill remaines with the ſame patience and conſtancy as before, for a while longer, expecting an anſwer of that which my lord of Briſtoll hath to deliver vnto the king of Spaine from his majeſty, vpon theſe occaſions; which muſt be a direct and ſolemne aſſurance from that king to repaire his majeſty and his ſonne in lawe, by procuring a full reſtitution vnto all that is or ſhall be taken from him: or in caſe that king ſhall not thinck fitt to oblige himſelfe thereunto, his majeſty will inſtantly take ſome other ſuch courſe as ſhall ſtand with his honour. In the meane while, I muſt tell your lordſhipp, that vpon the loſſe of Heidelberg, the king of Spaine did, both vnto my lord of Briſtoll and Sir Walter Aſton, ſolemnely profeſſe, that his majeſty had meritted ſo extraordinarily by his faire cariage in this cauſe, as hee would never leave vntill he had obteyned him full ſatisfaction; and if he could procure it by no other means, that he would doe it by his armes, deſiring his majeſty to be confident in him; for hee would not deceive him. If this were all, it were much, thoughe perhapps not enough; but that which makes his majeſty as yet ſecured, is the likelihood now of bringing the match betwixt the prince and the infanta to a ſpeedy concluſion; the rubbes that have been all this ſummer coming from ſome difficultyes obiected at Rome, which in a manner, by explanations, are removed, inſomuch as, ere it be long, his majeſty expects to haue that buſineſſe at an end one way or other.

THIS is the ſtate of our affaires heere at this preſent, which I haue ſett downe as particularly as I can, though perhapps much of it is knowne vnto you allready, and might haue been ſpared. I cannot but beleeve that you haue ſettled all things well at Algier and Tunys, for the ſafety of the Levant marchants from piratts; for I heare no complaints from them at the boorde now a dayes, ſo as it is to be beleeved that all is well. I am afrayd I haue tyred you with a long ill ioynted narration, and therefore will holde you no longer: but beſeeching God to proſper you with all your affaires, and to ſend you and yours much health and happines, I reſt, &c.

St. Martins lane, 29 Novemb. 1622.

My Lord,

THIS is a coppie of my diſpatch, ſent laſt weeke. This weeke hath produced no other novelty, ſaving, that we heare Franckendale is blocked vp, and ſummoned already to yeild, with many menaces of cruelty. I ſee no reſolution is likely to be taken here, vntill a meſſenger that his majeſty ſent into Spayne returne, whom wee looke for every day. No newes yet of Sir Horace Veres comming into Holland. God keepe your lordſhipp and yours.

Your affectionate frend to ſerve you,

St. Martins lane,

GEO. CALUERT.

To my LORD ADMIRALL.

My Lorde,

I HAUE receiued your lordſhips letter of the 14th June, in the middſt of a great and violent ſickneſs, as a cordiall and baulme (for I had need of both) that you were pleaſed to remember mee at this diſtance. I could not till now (and now with great payne) giue you any aunſwere by myne owne hand, vnwilling to vſe another, hauing for one moneth bene held downe by a diſſentery; and vpon the ſtay thereof, the ſame humour fell into all my joincts, ſo as I had not a hand or foot to feed or goe with; nyne weekes I haue bene in my bedd, unable to help my ſelfe.

THAT your lordſhip requires the modell of the cucanuurcrnr, I haue long ſince ſent it by my kinſman, wherein I doubt not you are ſatisfied in the proportion. The truecanutu cannott be beaten, vntill they know wee are prepared to uutens: thus much I am aſſured, it will be two thirds vnder the cetuuecananatu of catunſtunrnrtuuene; and by coniecture, I think, wilbe bought about 30000 trcrtenrcune, which is not 500 the nunuucuetucc: and for a catunſtunr, in that trtuuenatunuceecacrnr, I think it is not deare. There is no hope nor good to be done in uununrnrnunutune; here are great plenty to ſell, and of exceeding magnitude. Nothing wilbe taken but urcrnrns, nor can it euery day be had, nor in my power to keep it, if any other meanes to putt it off. As yett it is ſafe, and not come abroad; whenſoeuer it doth, if I be not prouided by creditt, it is loſt for euer; ſuch commodities iſſue out of the nucrteuece from the nſcrurtunr in great ſecrecy, and in their neceſſity. Therefore, if either his majeſtie or your lordſhip haue a reſolution to uutens this or any other, you muſt furniſh mee with creditt, and truſt to my judgment and diſcretion: I am not altogether ignorant in this art, and will doe nothing but very warrantably.

FOR trtunuuenrtune, here is one of 100 nunuucuetucene, of good forme, and I think, the greateſt in the world, that is faire; but it is held equall, or not much vnder the truecanutu of the cucanuurcrnr. But if your lordſhip deſire any of theſe, I can prouide you at very good rates, either uecrtenrcu, or trtunrcutunrce from 6. to 30. nunuucuetucene, in perfection; butt theſe 1622. alſo are offered ſodainly in the ſame manner, and I muſt be furniſhed to take them when the ſeller needes. I would have aduentured vpon a cucanuurcrnr for your lordſhip, if I had bene able; it is an nununrnatu uauecrtenrcu nececrnrtu, the cenuuunrtu, as greate as that of Sir P. P. but cenacunrnrtu, of exceeding ſhowe and perfection, about 16 nunuucuctucene; the truccanutu, 5 or 6000 l. when money, ſeene perhaps eaſier. If your lordſhip take any reſolution, I humbly deſire a ſpeedy anſwere and order; for I muſt lay hold of opportunity offered, or not attall.

THESE things are vncerteyne; depending vpon ſo long delay of aunſwere, may be gone in an hower; howeuer euery three moneths produce newe; for in the chaunges here, the beſt things haue bene embezelled away, and will be ſold in the dark, good cheape. I ſhalbe infinitely ſorry if theſe ouertures of myne ſhould any way hinder Sir P. P. who hath long depended vpon his majeſtie: I doe not loue to doe yll offices, though colleterally, and beſides my intention: it hath coſt him deare, as I am informed, (and for noe cauſe would I write vntruth to his majeſtie; for I haue no intereſt in yt, but his ſeruice) firſt penny here, with exchaunges, it ſtood him in 14000 l. and now three yeares intereſt: I beſeech your lordſhip, lett not me be an inſtrument againſt my will of his vndoing.

CONCERNING the accuſation of Sir John Eyre, of words ſpoken by him of his majeſtie, I haue look'd vpon the certificat, which mentioneth not any thing treaſonable, but only of diſreſpect and ſlightneſs; I am loath to be an enuious accuſer, herein I ſhall not, but an expounder. To ſatisfy therfore your lordſhip, I haue enquired, and finde that of moſt conſequence to bee, that when John Chapman, ſent before mee, brought his majeſties letter to diſcharge him, and to ſignify my ſucceeding, he pretended, to ſome, not to beleeue yt, ſaycing he had other intelligence; but beeing told in diſcourſe, by one of the ambaſſadors, (I think the Dutch) That his majeſties letter could not bring a falſe alarum, that he replyed, (as is ſaid) That this was not the nacauenece nrnſtu; the merchants had made him nſuecacetu nuuuuecrnucu; other things were only repetitions of familiar conferences betweene his majeſtie and him, warning him to take heed of the merchaunts, for that they were deuills; and ſuch like vanities and ſlipperyneſſes, as if he had had great priuacy with his majeſtie. This is all in ſubſtance, not worth your trouble. What concerned the lords, I think, if they had known yt, they would not haue cenſured his buſineſs ſo gently; but I conſidered your lordſhips intereſt, and held my peace in many things. And though I could haue wiſhed that he had eſcaped without diſgrace, or much reſtitution; yett if, as wee heare, the merchaunts are condemned, he hath had extraordinary interpretation; and your lordſhip giue mee leaue to ſay, becauſe I know the truth, and could haue enformed yt; the company haue bene many wayes oppreſſed, and their trade is neither able to beare it, nor to keep mee abroad; a generall cauſe, eſpecially of thoſe that mayntenyne the traffieque of the kingdome, ſhould find ſome fauour. I beſeech your lordſhip, lett nothing I write herein, goe beyond your owne noble breſt, nor preiudice either part: I haue no ſuch intention, and what I haue done, is in obſeruance and obedience to you, in whom I am ſafe.

FOR our affaires here, I will preſume on your lordſhip to enforme his majeſtie, (for I am not able, for paine, to write to Mr. ſecretary, nor to be large) beſeeching him to accept of this brieſe. The gouerment is here yet ſo vnſettled, that the ſoldiours take what they will from any in the ſtreetes, and vpon refuſall kill, without puniſhment; for no man dares complaine, or if they did, they knew not to whom; wee liue all in perill, where there is no awe of the magiſtrate. In Aſia are ſome rebellions, of which the court dares take no notice.

THE ambaſſador of Tranſiluania hath purſued his meſſage with all earneſtneſs and meanes, (of which I aduiſed his majeſtie) but as yet to no great effect. The count of Torne, finding the generall jealouſy heauy vpon him, eſpecially for the affaires of Poland, (of which I roundly aduiſed him) to cleare himſelfe of all ſuſpition, that he had any intereſt in ſo foule treaties, hath retyred himſelfe from the other, both in conuerſation and buſineſs. Herein he hath done himſelfe great right, and made himſelfe more welcome to mee and others, that were iuſtly offended. I hope he will conteyne himſelfe in the way of honor, and not make his name as odious to Chriſtian princes, as his eſtate is yet deſperate; he is otherwiſe, in all things, a braue and noble gentleman. He pretends only now to retyre to the P. Elect. Pal. who, I pray God, may be in eſtate to relieue him. The duke of Zbarawsky is now 5 weeks ſince arriued, to conclude the peace for Poland; he hath found a froward tyme, and many difficulties; deteyned from his audience, till twoe daies paſt, forceing him to giue a preſent contrary to his inſtructions. As yet he cannot procure to enter into the treaty: here is nothing butt falſhood and vncertenty, no promiſe nor faith kept, no priſoners deliuered, nothing performed. Nowe they haue him here, they hope to work their ends, and to weary him, who hath 1200 in his traine. Somtyme they threaten to keepe him, and to denounce warre; which they dare not doe. He is reſolute enough, and perhapps too free in braues, which only exaſperate. I haue mediated by meſſage, and twice pieced him and the vizier; but they breake againe. If God had giuen mee health, I had done his majeſtie ſome honor. I will not mention myne owne actions; I am aſſured the king of Poland will acknowledge them to his majeſtie, ſeeing he hath done mee the grace to referre his ambaſſador to mee only, to communicat his inſtructions, and to take my aduiſe in all his proceedings. Hee hath written mee now a third letter, not deliuered vntill wee meete; the copies of all which, with the articles of peace, (if it ſucceed) and other paſſages, I will ſend his majeſtie ſo ſoone as I am able to ſitt vpp, and they growne to any ripeneſs and concluſion. In the meane tyme, I will neglect no meanes for the generall quiett of Chriſtendome, and the honor of his majeſtie, according to his roiall command, though I proceed blyndly vpon my firſt inſtructions, hauing no aduice theſe 20 weeks of any the affaires or chaunges in Germany, nor any letters from any his majeſties miniſters abroad, yett often by mee inuited thereto, which might giue mee ſome light in theſe great buſineſſes. Howſoever, I haue made the emperor and the king of Poland owe his majeſtie thanks, ſtayeing the raſh reſolutions of this port. In this treaty of Poland, the ambaſſador of Beth. Gabor hath done no good offices, butt made offers unworthy his honor, which I feare he will repent. Another from Muſcouia is alſo arriued vnopportunely for this treaty, whoſe maſter beeing moued to moleſt the Poles, by the late ſultan Oſman, vpon promiſe that he would continue the warre ſeaven yeares, and make no peace without their comprehenſion, yet the treaty at Chotyn not mentioning them, he was engaged in a quarrell alone, hauing ſhowed yll-will, (notwithſtanding the peace) and readineſs to ſhare in the ſpoile, if the Turks had preuailed; for which, now fearing reuenge, the great duke diſpeeded his, to perſwade this ſtate to continew the warre, offering to enter Poland with an army, and to deuide the cuntry. Butt they haue found this empire in no enclynation to newe troubles, though they make great ſhowe, vpon aduauntage of the great pledges now in their power, and vpon the vnſeaſonable offers, and vnchriſtian practizes, made with them. Hee hath further order, if he ſee no hope of the warre, to procure to be compriſed in the peace; butt the Turks only care to ſerue their owne turnes, and the duke of Zbarawsky hath no commiſſion to treat thereof, but hath referred aunſwere to the ſtate of Poland. Since, wee heare, the Muſcouites haue made their owne; which, if it be true, will advance the concluſion here, and draw the Turks to better termes, who are now prowder of the fowle offers of ayd from Chriſtians, and their æmulations, then of their owne ſtrength.

THIS is the epitome of all our eſtate, which is all vncertenty: only the Perſian ambaſſador is arriued with his great preſent or tribute, who was vpon his way before the death of Oſman; or elſe, I think, he had not come to flatter confuſion, though the ſophy be excerciſed in a warre on his owne coaſt, againſt the mogoll and the Vsbecque Tartar, wherein he hath ſuſteyned great loſſe.

I BESEECH your lordſhip accept of theſe fragments from a weake hand, and let my long paines excuſe mee to his majeſtie. Vouchſafe mee the comfort of your ſpeedy anſwere, and continue mee in your protection and fauour, as

Your Lordſhips humble ſeruant.

From Sir Dudley Carleton.

My very good Lord,

SINCE the leavying the ſiege of Bergen op Zoom, and the retreate of both armyes out of the field, which enſued ſhortly after, there hath nothing occurred in theſe parts which I could eſteeme worthy to be written vnto your lordſhip; and I am now deceaved in my opinion, which was, that this laſt weeke would have produced matter enough whereby I might have made you recompenſe for my former ſilence: for the prince of Orange being fallen downe from this place to Dort on Wedneſday the 20th of the laſt, where he had appointed the rendezvous to a good part of his foote troopes, whilſt the horſe went to meete him further of by land, was the next day in the evening, being departed thence with his whole fleete, incountred, betwixt that place and Williamſtadt, with ſuch an extreme tempeſt, and froſt withall, that he was very much endangered, and the fleete ſo diſperſed, that for certaine dayes they could ſcarce heare of one another; and yet there was no greater loſſe, then onely of ſome 12 barques, but the men in them all ſaved. That which chiefly brought the confuſion was the froſt, which made ſo much yce immediatly, as the wind caſt up water vpon the hatches, the ſayles, and other tacklings, ſo that the ſhippers were thereby quite diſabled to doe their parts. The prince himſelfe, with ſome other, was driven into Williamſtadt, and the reſt to other parts; but the enterprize fayled by meanes of this diſturbance, and delayes cauſed thereby; ſo that his excellency is returned hether, and the troopes into garriſon. He never went on any exploict with more compleate equippage, having had with him 9000 men, and proviſion as well of flotes, skaling ladders, and petards for ſurpriſe, as canon for batterye, in caſe the ſurpriſe ſhould not ſucceede without reſiſtance. And whatſoever the deſſigne was, as it was kept very ſecret before their going forth, ſo there is no more knowledge of it ſince their returne home; ſo that it may very well ſerve againſt ſome other tyme: but now, vntill the froſt ſhall have faſtned our rivers, and made the yce firme for paſſage over, (which wee looke for every day) there is no great danger to be feared on eyther ſide.

THE count Mansfelt hath taken vp his winter lodging in the countrey of the count of Eaſtfrizeland; for which great lamentation and complaint is brought hether from that poore prince: but Mansfelt excuſeth himſelf, as being preſſed by the ennemy to retire into thoſe parts, which are of ſecurity to himſelf; though in the meane tyme our frends are much incommodated: and though, lying where he doth, there be little perill of the ennemy, yet he is not ſo well, but that his men, wanting pay, runne from him to the baron Anholt, who with his troopes is quartered in Munſterland, and in no better condition for matter of pay, then count Manſfelt; his men, for want thereof, running away even as faſt to Mansfelt. Don Gonzales de Cordoua is lodged in Berck and Marckland, and count Henry Vandenberghs troopes are in their wonted garriſons on the ſame ſide the Rhyne; but, for his owne perſon, he is with the marquis Spinola, and Don Lewis de Velaſco, at Ruremond, where they are ſayd to expect the newes of the taking in of the fort Papenmutz, betwixt Bon and Collen, with which they will appeare in the court of Bruxells: but the alarum of the prince of Oranges being gone abroad, wee now vnderſtand, hath made them ſtirre a little, and ſend over certaine forces into Brabant as far as Dieſt.

BY reaſon of an execution done of 22 at Rotterdam, and ſix at Enchuyſen, of thoſe which were taken in the late ſea-fight (which formerly I have advertiſed) betwixt the men of warre of the States, and the ſhips of Dunkerke and Oſtend, (which never had quarter allowed) they of the other ſide have taken their revenge by hanging up the ſame number of theſe countrey fiſhers, 22 at Dunkerke, and 6 at Neuport; an extremity never vſed before againſt thoſe poore men, who onely labouring for their living, have heretofore eyther bene altogether ſpared, or elſe fairely ranſomed, as well with them as with vs: and I perceave this manner of proceeding is like to bring forth many bloudy conſequences; they here having already given commiſſion to their men of warre to take and bring in as many fiſhers as they can, as well of Flanders, as from the coaſt of Spayne; where, it is likely, they will finde numbers enough, not expecting other then the wonted faire cariage of the men of warre. They are moreover in deliberation to cutt of all ſafe conducts from the other ſide, as likewiſe not to excuſe ſuch jeſuits and prieſts as ſhall come into theſe countreyes, they being ſo many fiſhers of men, and ſuch as are here held a great deale fitter to hang up againſt the fiſhers, then they could iuſtly be againſt thoſe who never had other reckoning made of them then as freebooters.

THE States have publiſhed a new placcart for the advancement of the Weſt Indian company, which goeth forward ſtill, though ſlowly, in regard of the wranglings betwixt thoſe of the Eaſt Indian company, which coole mens courages from adventuring in the other.

I ENTERTAINE your lordſhip with owr occurrents, wiſhing I had ſome better ſubiect worth your knowledge concerning theſe princes; the reuolution of whoſe hard fortune I know you earneſtly, with all other gens de bien, doe hearken after: but, nondum advenit tempus, though they are brought ſo low, that they haue not unde cadant; and that is all theyr comfort, though a poore one (God wot) for priuat perſons, much more for princes.

GENERAL Vere hath commaundement attending him here in my hands, to tranſport himſelf, and his Engliſh troopes he brought owt of Manheim, immediatly into England, withowt making any ſtay in theſe parts, wherby to auoyde giuing the king of Spaine any the leaſt ſubiect of jealoſie; by whoſe affection to the king owr maſter, owr ambaſſadors in Spaine induce a firme beliefe at home, that all will be reſtored in both the Palatinats, as well honors as eſtates. God deliuer me from the ſtone, of which I thought to haue died laſt weeke, till that be effected withowt arms, and ſend your lordſhip euer, with your lady, health, and all happines.

Decemb. 1622.

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionat ſeruant,

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My verygood Lord,

I HAUE not failed, by former letters, to aduertiſe your lordſhip of the ſucceſſe of theſe laſt ſommers warres, which ended in leavying the ſiege of Bergen-op-zoom; ſince which time nothing is arriued in theſe parts worth the writing: though now we remaine in ſome expectation, by occaſion of the prince of Oranges being gon abroad with the greateſt part of his ſtrength both horſe and foote; who was immediatly followed with ſuch a vehement froſt, that we doubt he may haue receaued much hinderance thereby in the execution of his deſigne, (which is gueſſed to be a ſurprize) yf it be not altogether failed.

CERTAINE of your lordſhips letters to Sr. Francis Netherſole, being ſent in the packett of the Calandrini to Monſr. Burlamachi at Franckford, (with whome Sr. Francis Netherſole, at his departure owt of thoſe parts, had left commiſſion to receaue and open ſuch letters as he ſhould meete with for him) were by him ſent unto me in that ſtate, to the end that I might ſee the incloſed deliuered to the queen of Bohemia; to which I returne you herewith her highneſſes anſwear.

SR. Francis Netherſole hath bin ſome weekes in England, where he is like to attend the returne of Mr. Porter owt of Spaine, ſent thither by his majeſty, with letters to that king, uppon the news of the loſſe of Heidleberg. During which courteſie of writing, your lordſhip will haue heard how the Imperialiſts haue aduanced their armes to the ſiege and taking in of Manheim; and now they are before Frankendall, the onely towne that remaines to the king of Bohemia, yf that ſtill holde owt; of which, though the gouuernour haue had good lucke in a former ſiege, yet now queſtion may very well be made, unleſſe with their weake number of men, and ſmall prouiſion for defenſe otherwiſe, they be able to endure longer then is conceaued here; for there is no meaning of ſparing the ſame, that I can perceaue, when there is an earneſt competition betwixt the Bauarians and Spaniards which of them ſhall haue it.

MY lord general Vere ſett forwards, ſome weekes ſince, from Franckford, with his two regiments, the one Engliſh, the other Dutch, to come for theſe parts; but not farre from Frankford the Dutch mutined, and disbanded. The Engliſh beare his lordſhip company by the way of Bremen; and euery day I expect to heare news of them owt of Groning and Friſeland, where they will arriue firſt, haueing garriſons appointed 1622. pointed them in thoſe frontiers, at my interceſſion with the States, there to remaine till his majeſty ſhall diſpoſe otherwiſe of them; abowt which I haue written into England, and looke dayly to underſtand his majeſties pleaſure.

THE queen of Bohemia, after ſhe had cloſed her letter to your lordſhip, tooke time to write to the count de la Tour: and herewith goeth her letter to him, with one from the widow lady Leuiſton. His ſonne, newly arriued here, after his rendring of Glats, (which was giuen vp juſt the day that Manheym parlyed) is gon to count Mansfield into Eſt Friſeland, where that count, with his troopes, quartereth this winter, hauing the baron d'Anholt, with thoſe of the catholique league neere by him in Munſterland; both in that ill ſtate for want of pay, that they entertaine theyre armie, in running from one to the other, and, betwixt both, eating vp the poore peſants.

THUS, wiſhing your lordſhip, with your lady, all happines, I reſt

Hagh, this 5th of Decemb.
1622, ſtylo nouo.

DUDLEY CARLETON.

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT; with advices.

Right honorable,

I HAUE receiued your honors welcome and fauorable letter of the 24th June, now more than twoe moneths ſince. I doubt not that you haue heard, by information from Sir John Finnett, for my excuſe, and long delay of aunſwere, that I was arreſted by a tedious and greeuous ſickneſs; of which, when I thought I was free, the humour, too ſoone ſtayed, fell into all my joyncts, which encreaſed both my miſery and feare; for in nyne weekes I was not able to help my ſelfe. I am (I thank God) ſo well recouered, as to ſitt up and write, though one hand and legge yett faile mee. This alone had bene much leſſe affliction, eſpecially to my diſpoſition, if the vnſeaſonableneſs had not encreaſed my payne; becauſe it fell vpon mee in the chryſis of the negotiations here, wherein I had long laboured, and hoped to haue done his majeſtie good ſeruice: yett did it not ſo oppreſſe or deiect my mynde, as to doe nothing; but that I did and collected ſomwhat, whereof I giue your honor account apart, and in this will only addreſſe myſelfe to aunſwere of that receiued from you; wherein I muſt firſt humbly acknowledge your fauour, in the good acceptance and interpretation you haue made of my beginnings, and the encouragement you giue mee; which as I only haue receiued from your honor, ſo I hope I ſhall neuer goe backward, nor giue you cauſe to diſauow mee.

TO make peace with the piratts, by any treaty or meſſage from his majeſtie, I neuer intimated; butt the contrary, as well in reſpect of honor and contract with Spaine, as doubt of ſcorne and loſſe by truſting them: and I am ſtill of opinion, that there is no ſecurity conſtant, but in their deſtruction. Yett ſeeing the neceſſity and continuall damage of the poore merchaunt, I was deſirous to doe ſomwhat, to gayne tyme, untill his majeſtie tooke a full reſolution. And finding the viziers here, in ſhow, ready to extend their emperours and their owne authority, I preſumed to take that way, and ſo procured ſtrong commands for our quiett trade and paſſage in the ſea, as they were ſubjects, and wee frends to this port. I hope it hath taken good effect: as I am enformed from Aleppo, all the captiues at Tunes are ſett free, and the like expected at Algier; and obedience fully promiſed: which, I doubt not, his majeſtie will accept as a good ſeruice, though I beganne yt before particular warraunt, grounded vpon his majeſties letters of complaint to the grand ſignor, and my generall inſtructions, and for which I receiued preſently order, by a letter from the lords. Of this, as I haue long ſince enformed your honor, ſo I haue made the apology for my haſt, which rather manners than feare drew from mee.

THE French ambaſſador was as much too precipitate in complayning of mee, as he is in all his actions; and though it wilbe tedious, yet giue me leaue to relate the occaſion and circumſtances, that your honor may knowe him. I was not warme here, before he ſent mee a remonſtrance (that was vſeleſs to the Engliſh) of complaint againſt the baſſa of Cairo, written in Turkiſh, in the name of the French, Engliſh, Venice, and Dutch ambaſſadors, and allready ſigned by three of them, (ſo as it nothing concerned the ſcale here) and deſired my ſubſcription, deſſigning mee a place belowe him. I cauſed it to be read; and finding that he would haue ſtollen a præcedency, I deſired to be excuſed; and to avoid declaration of my reaſon, vnwilling to raiſe a queſtion, I aunſwered, I was newe come, and yett ignorant of the formes and wayes of court: but being further preſſed, I ſhowed him, that it became not mee to ſigne a complaint againſt a man that had not wronged mee, hauing none of our nation nor commerce at Cairo. This would not ſatisfy him, but he produced a copy of the ſame from the Dutch ambaſſador, ſubſcribed by Sir John Eyre, and therefore vrged mee, by his example, as my warrant, to doe yt: if I refuſed, he threatened, in my priuat occaſions, I ſhould find the like meaſure. I confeſs, I was unwilling any way to break that vnity which I myſelfe had contracted; and therefore replyed, That I would not forſake them in any generall cauſe, but that I held it vnfitt for the miniſters of great kings and ſtates to ioyne, as in a petition; rather, that euery one ſhould write and ſigne the ſame apart, and ſend all our ſecretaries together with them, which, I thought, would be of more authority. When he had this aunſwer, he perceiued the true reaſon of my refuſall; which wiſedome in him would haue ſmothered, for my good manners: but then he begann to take great exceptions, and ſent the Dutch ambaſſador to diſpute the cauſe with mee, who vrged me with reaſons and examples; which I retorned, reſoluing not to giue away his majeſties right. This allmoſt made a generall breach, vntill I ſent him word, That I deſired to liue in peace with him, and was ſorry he was ſo arrogant to aſſume that, which he ſhould neuer obteyne: wee liued among enemyes, where queſtions ought to be auoyded; which I had determined, for my part, not to raiſe, as his majeſtie had commanded. I offered, neuer to pretend any thing upon him, if he would depoſe all pretence vpon mee; ſo we might both guide ourſelues by diſcretion, giue no offence to our maſters, and liue louingly among our ſelues. This healed the ſhowe of contention; but his heart neuer gaue ouer, hauing often attempted, fooliſhly and vaynly, to gett ſome declaration, but allway to his loſſe. For this, and becauſe he is our great debtor, he beares me enuiouſly; yet I haue aſſiſted him in his troubles, and brought him out of the bryars, wherein he had miſerably entangled himſelfe. Butt no man can ſaue him from ruyne, that hath runne in debt here, to Turks and Chriſtians, neare 200000 dollers; of which our nation, to the undoeing of twoe merchaunts, beares 50000 aduenture in his leaking barcque. Lett him pay vs our money, and then wee will diſpute on equall termes. Briefly; he will daily need mee, (who feares to be pull'd out of his houſe) but I ſhall neuer him; for hee hath no creditt nor reputation in court nor citty, but is the ſhame and diſhonor of his maſter. Of mee he ſhall neuer haue aduauntage nor precedence, (though I will auoid a queſtion) if he will learne that ſobriety, which may giue me cauſe to help to ſupport him. 1622.

OF the concluſion of the treaty at Bruxells, I haue not heard a word; nor any ambaſſador here, except the Venetian, who either deteynes ours, or hath no intelligence: for theſe tenne weekes wee haue had no letters, for which wee mutyne to no purpoſe. I pray God it may produce the reſtitution of his majeſties children to their honor and eſtates, the ſecurity of Gods litle flock, and the peace of Germany. My hands haue bene tyed up here; but if there had bene cauſe, I had opportunity to haue troubled the greateſt enemy: I dare ſay no more. In my relations paſt and preſent, your honor will collect, that the treaties and dependancies vpon this port are not ſo much to be neglected, as if wee were not concerned in them. I will not trouble his majeſtie nor the prince with my letters, preſuming your honor will enforme, and defend mee: I haue taken no other way for addreſs of my publique buſineſs. I muſt confeſs, I committed an ill manners of neceſſity, to vſe your cyphar to my lord admirall, which I muſt now againe borrow: but fearing that therefore your honor may forbeare, ſuppoſing I had written ſecretts of that kind therein, I may diſaduantage myſelfe, if I did not ſignify, that they couer only a priuat pretious buſines; and I am bold to referre his lordſhip to you for the other. I ſhalbe uery gladd to be enlightened in this darke walke, ſomtymes with your honors directions; and will allway rather ſtriue to obey, then erre preſumptuouſly. If there be any miſtake, that I haue at all mingled with buſines here, I beſeech you lett mee know it; and by driving mee to an apology, I ſhall diſcouer more, then I dare cauſeleſſly trouble you withall.

1622. MY wife humbly thanks your honor, and my lady, for your louing remembrance; ſhee hopes to heare that your family is encreaſed, and would be gladd to be at the goſſipping: which ſeeing ſhee cannott, ſhee will meete her in prayers; that conuerſation no diſtance can hinder. I ſhall allway at leaſt ſay, Amen, though I can doe her no other ſervice.

Conſtantinople,
$\frac{14}{24}$ Dec. 1622.

Your Honors, in all humble affection.

Aduiſes ſent to Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

THE mutined ſoldiour, euen in this citty, the head of the empire, is growne to that height of inſolency, that they demaund in troopes, at this court, all offices of gayne, to be ſtewards to the reuenues of churches, which are great; to take the farmes of cuſtomes, and there committ thoſe outrages that are vnſufferable. The viziers dare deny them nothing: they drink in the ſtreetes without prohibition, contrary to their lawe; and ſtand in companyes in the open day, and exact money of all Chriſtians, to pay for their wyne; and being denyed it, ſtabb and murther without any puniſhment. In a queſtion betweene our factors and a ſpahee, now wayter in the cuſtomhouſe, my drogaman ſhowing him the imperiall command, that he ought to take no more vpon a bale of goods, for which he demaunded tenne ſhillings aboue the rate, and deſired him to produce by what authority; he replyed, Am not I a ſoldiour? and drawing his dagger, ſaid, There was his command, and enforced it. Complayne no man dares; or if he doe, to no purpoſe: the vizier anſwereth, That he cannott meddle with them; they haue murthered their owne king, and all the baſſaes; deſiring our patience, and to beare a part with the generall.

THE janizaries in the gallies, vpon a ſlight occaſion giuen by the Venetians, (the capten baſſa ryding before Smyrna) aſſaulted the houſes of all the Chriſtian conſulls; ours eſcaped naked aboord the admirall gally with the Engliſh, to ſaue their liues; they ranſacked the lower part of the houſe, to the loſſe of 2000 dollers; the French more; and the Venetians at leaſt 10000, and cutt one in peeces. The generall had much adoe to appeaſe them by threates or perſwaſions, or to ſaue the liues of all; inſomuch as they miſcalled and threatened him, becauſe he would not conſent to their maddneſs: in concluſion, he was faine to putt off his gallies to ſea; or elſe, we feare, they had finiſhed trade at that place.

IN Aſia are three open rebellions: one at Babilon; the other at Arzerum the border of Perſia, by Tauris; and the third in Meſopotamia. The viziers here diſſemble it, and dare take no knowledge, nor ſo much as to ſend a command thither, for feare to blow the fire, and putt all into combuſtion. They haue held a ſecrett councell lately, and reconciled themſelues, promiſing agreement, to proue if they can recouer this deſperate ſtate; and haue taken reſolution to make Hali baſſa, now the beſt ſoldiour, and moſt beloued, great vizier; in his roome, Daout baſſa, capten of the ſea; and the preſent vizier, chamacan or lieutenant here, in Conſtantinople: and in the firſt of the ſpring, that the vizier in perſon ſhall goe into Aſia, with all the force they can make. To which end, they haue ſent into Greece, to warne all the ſouldioury to be ready at Adrianople, not daring to make the rendeuous here, for fear of more trouble; and ſo to paſſe the Helleſpont wyde of the citty, to appeaſe, if they can, theſe reuolts; and by that way to drawe the mutineers from hence into action, and to reduce them into obedience. Notwithſtanding that there is no ſymptome nor prædiction of ruyne now not threatening this empire; yet were they neuer prowder, nor more ſeeming not to diſtruſt themſelues, though inwardly they quake with feare: their only ſecurity is, they haue no enemy but themſelues.

THE treaſury is ſo farre exhauſted; the reuenew abated, by the oppreſſion of euery baſſa in his gouerment; the ſoldiour encreaſed both in pay and nomber, and ſo impatient of delay; that at euery quarter, beſides borrowing and taking of the farmors of the cuſtome before-hand, there are ſo many intollerable exactions to raiſe money, that it is inſupportable, nor can long endure betweene two extreames: it will not be found; and the janizaries will not be retrenched nor deferred. This is their generall eſtate.

For particular occurrents here; their greateſt buſineſs now lyes with the prince of Tranſiluania, the emperour, Poland, the Tartars, and Muſcouy; from all theſe they haue hopes and feare. 119 hath, as formerly enformed, moued a warre in 116, pretending a neceſſity to auoyd an inuaſion; his ambaſſador hath by all meanes laboured and purſued it, but as yett can gett no reſolution till the concluſion with 136, with whom if he haue not peace, he dares not ſtirre; but if he obteyne that by mediation here, he will, if he can gett any countenance, adventure the recouery of that kingdome. He is allready in armes, and when he made the laſt peace with 102, he took an oath before a ſeruaunt of 50, that he would neuer forſake him, but that he only did ſeeke to wynne tyme to doe him ſeruice.

He hath bene alſo buſy with 135, but finds now it is to no purpoſe; and I thinke rather made vſe of ſuch hopes here to creditt himſelfe, and to aduance his other deſſigne, then in good earneſt; yet this hath caſt him into great ſuſpicion and diſtaſt with 182.

In the treaty here, ſynce the arriuall of the duke of Barasky, who hath yet litle aduanced in his buſineſs, theſe ouertures, and ſome other from Muſcouy, haue giuen occaſion to the vizier to make a great ſhowe, and to deferre a concluſion. At his firſt comming he was coarſely receiued, notwithſtanding he entered with a great (perhaps too much) trayne, conſiſting of at leaſt 1200, whereof many lords, and men of quality; too good a pawne to be putt into falſe hands: he beganne alſo too roughly, which did diſaduantage his diſpatch. The vizier, an old crabbed foxe, at the ſecond viſitt fell out with him, and gaue him baſe words; which he tooke in very ill part; and ſo for a tyme they mett nott, but threatned open warre; which when the duke accepted, they made a newe reconcilement by the mufty, which held not long; for beginning to ſpeake of buſineſſes, the vizier abſolutly refuzed to remoue the prince of Bugdania, or Cante Emir Emirze, from their gouerments; and, to abate that demaund, required a tribute; from that fell to a preſent of 300000 dollers money, as promiſed. The duke denyed it, as not beeing conteyned in the articles at Chotyn, which the Turks could not produce, all copies beeing loſt by the death of Delauir baſſa with Oſman. In concluſion, before he could haue audience, he was enforced to lay aſide the demaund of the remoue of thoſe princes, and to ſhow the articles and his inſtructions, and to giue a preſent of 60000 dollers: and ſo he had his audience, and deliuered his letters with honor; but could not haue leiſure to ſpeake a word; the emperor beginning to play his part, the viziers deſired him to withdrawe. Thus he hath to this day remayned, promiſed euery day to receiue the priſoners, to write the articles, and to haue his diſpatch; but nothing performed. For thoſe, I think, he muſt pay ſome money; for the other, he ſhalbe delayed vntill an aunſwere from 119, who finding that he had offended 135, requires now to be comprehended in the peace, but it is not agreed howe. The vizier would propound it as his vaſſaile, and gouernor, for ſo he eſteemes him, (and there is ſuch a conniuence, though neuer expreſſed in the ſame termes) as the princes of Bugdania and Wallachia are. 182 would haue bene content to haue affronted him, but demaunding aduiſe of another, was diſwaded ſoe to ſubiect a prince and prouince to the preiudice of 102, who had alſo his pretences of right; and of the eſtate of Chriſtendome; for this publique act would haue ſtrengthened the title of 151; nor was it knowne whether 119 were conſenting. On the other ſide, if it were once propounded in thoſe termes, 181 durſt not refuſe it, for feare to diſpleaſe the port; therfore the queſtion was to be avoided wholly. To this end, I think, he hath diſpeeded a currier to his maſter, to perſwade him to be left out, and to make his owne peace, rather then to fall into one of theſe extreames, abſolute ſubiection or diſpleaſure. This ſtayes the diſpatch of the duke, to his great diſpleaſure. What 119 will reſolue on, I cannot foreſee: if he accept of the conditions, I know nott how hereafter he can eſteeme himſelfe a truecanrnutu, nor any treat with him in that condition.

Of the concluſion of peace with Poland there is no doubt, neither ſide being fitt for warre; but the Muſcouite alſo by his ambaſſador, now arriued, gaue ſome interruption, and diſcouered an vnchriſtian heart, preſſing the grand ſignior to continue the warre, according to the promiſe of Oſman, made for ſeauen yeares, offering to enter Poland with an army, and to devide yt. Notwithſtanding the peace made for 14 yeares, yet when the Muſcouite ſawe the great inuaſion of the 1622. Turks, they ſhowed ill-will enough, and readineſs to ſhare in the ſpoiles; but now, ſeeing the chaunges, the grand duke, fearing the Poles would remember the aduantage he offered to take in their warrs, diſpeeded hither to diſwade the peace, or to be comprized in the treaty. This made the Turks ſwell, threatening by 119, the Muſcouite, and Tartars, to ſwallow Poland; but in the inſtant came aduiſe, that the Muſcouite had made their owne peace, and ſo that thredd is broken.

THE Muſcouite hauing made peace with Poland, before the inuaſion of Oſman, for 14 yeares, and beeing enuited by him to breake it, and to inuade the cuntry, vpon promiſe that he would continue the warre ſeauen yeares, and make no agreement without their comprehenſion, to which he was alſo excited by the patriark of Conſtantinople, and abſolued (which the poore man durſt not deny to giue, beeing required by the grand ſignior): firſt, anſwered, That he could not breake the peace, thinking that it was but a flaſh of a young man; but ſo ſoone as he ſawe the Turkes in the field and border of Poland, then he beganne to hope, that he might make aduantage; and therfore promiſed Oſman, on the conditions mentioned, to enter into the quarrell; and to that end diſpeeded an ambaſſador to Poland, with inſtructions to demaund three things: firſt, That the prince of Poland ſhould renownce the title of elect duke of Muſcouia: the ſecond, That they ſhould reſtore a territory in Lituania, taken in the late warres: laſtly, That the peace ſhould be perpetuall: threatening, That if they refuſed theſe conditions, hee would enter the cuntry with an army, and gett what he could. This ambaſſador beeing arriued in the confines, heard newes, That the Poles had repulſed the Turks at Chotyn; that he was retyred, and a peace treated. Whereupon he feigned himſelfe ſick, and ſent back a poſt with this aduiſe, and his old inſtructions; deſiring, in this alteration, new order. The gouernor of the towne where he lay, ſuſpecting ſomewhat, intercepted the meſſenger, letters, and packett, and ſent them to the kinge. The man retorned to his maſter as robb'd, and was againe diſpeeded the ſecond time, and ſent back with another ſtyle, letters of congratulation, joy, and offers of all help, and continuance of the peace. With theſe the ambaſſador went forward to court; and hauing audience, the king aunſwered, that if his meſſage were ſyncere, it had bene very acceptable; but that he knew it to be a ſugred treaſon, and no faith intended from the Muſcouite; and therfore commanded him to depart. The ambaſſador proteſted, vowed, and vſed all meanes to aſſure the integrity of his meſſage, vntill he was confronted by the chauncellor with his owne letter, and his maſters inſtructions; and ſo was diſgracefully diſmiſſed. Hereuppon was this other diſpatcht, to this port, to hinder the peace, and to offer all their help to continue an inuaſion. In the meane tyme, the Muſcouite neglected no meanes to ſecure himſelfe; but by renewing two ambaſſadors, obteyned a peace with Poland, which is now againe confirmed. To which the Poles were the more willing to agree, not knowing what effect his other offer might produce at this court. So now the Muſcouites ambaſſador ſitts ſtill, drinking aquauitæ, and attending weather to depart, and diſſembles the former offer, which was reiected. Thus euery one hath purſued his owne intereſt, as lawfull, regnandi cauſâ; and all concurred to help the Turks in their treaty.

THE count of Torne, finding the jealouſy heauy vpon him, that he was party to the treatyes and offers of 119, which the Turks made vſe of, offering 182 to make him king of 116, on condition that he would aſſiſt 119 to be king of 135, which, I think, 119 neuer propoſed, though there were great preſumptions; but that the vizier made more of things then they were to abate 182, hath retyred himſelfe from all negotiation with his ambaſſador, and made all meanes to be reconciled to the duke of Barawsky, and to cleare himſelfe of that ſcandall. For myne owne part, I beleeue that he was innocent of any practize againſt that kingdome, 119 beeing too ſecrett in ſuch a buſineſs. Againſt 102 he doth not deny that he would doe all the offices of an enemy; but proteſteth, that if 119 hath proceeded ſo farre as is now ſuſpected, that he was ignorant of it; and therfore, not to looſe his reputation with the princes of Chriſtendome, he hath publiquely declared to haue no intereſt at all in the treaty; but, as a freeman, deſires to gett into Germany by Polonia, and I think he will obteyne a promiſe of ſafe conduct from 182. Hee is a braue gentleman, and I am perſwaded, was deceiued by 119, whoſe witt and ſpiritt is as vnknowne as daungerous. He hath no hope, vnleſs the prince elector hath comprehended him in his agreement; and to that end hath preſſed mee to be a ſutor to his majeſtie: but I haue refuſed him with playne aunſwere, That his majeſtie could not take vpon him any mediation in the termes he now ſtood. He had a deſire to come into England, from which alſo I haue diuerted him; and if, vpon the firſt letters, he find himſelfe vtterly forgotten, I think deſperation will force him to retyre to 119, where he may weare out his dayes in a baniſhment, of which he is very weary.

THE offer that was made to 119 from 135, of which I aduiſed in my laſt, came from the mutined ſoldiours after the warr, and was reiected by him, though he was content to aduantage himſelfe therby at this port, hoping the rather to procure aide againſt 102. Now he only aymes at a peace with them; vpon what conditions, my next will declare. I haue ſent the copy of the inſtructions of 182, with the oration which he would haue made, but was enforced to giue in writing.

THE articles of peace, as not yet concluded, wilbe matter for another occaſion. I haue, according to his majeſties order, done him many good offices, which I doubt not 136 and himſelfe will acknowledge to his majeſtie. He had order to communicat all his negotiations with mee, and to take my aduiſe, which he hath performed; and betweene him and the other miniſters of Chriſtian princes, I haue only perſwaded peace, and ſought to reconcile them, becauſe I ſawe a third make aduantage againſt both.

I HAUE not yet viſited him, by reaſon of my ſickneſs; but am reſolued not to deferre it, becauſe he hath a letter from the king, and, as he pretends, other things to communicate with mee, which he cannott doe by meſſage.

THE emperour hath a nuntio, or litle ambaſſador, on the way, and a greater ready to ſett forward. This concourſe will hearten and ſecure the Turke to follow his deſſigne of Aſia: God direct all to his glory.

Decemb. 1622.

To the Lords of his MAJESTY's Council.

Right Honorable, my very good Lords,

ABOUT 4 moneths ſince, I receiued two letters from your honors, wherin you are pleaſed to expreſſe your care of the daily miſerable loſſes of his majeſties ſubiects tradinge the Leuant and Spaniſh ſeas, by the pirats of Algier and Tunes, commanding mee, in his highnes name, to take ſome ſpeedy and expedite courſe, both for the deliuerie of the captiues held there in ſeruitude, and for the ſecuritie of the merchaunts in times to come. And becauſe I haue alreadie ſignified to your honors what I had done before the receipt of yours, in confidence of his majeſties and your lordſhips allowance, ſeeinge the vrgent and preſent neceſſity, which I hope is arriued; vntill the returne of thoſe imployed, being able to giue noe direct anſweare, I haue forborne to trouble you with empty diſcourſes: but now, though all bee not finiſhed, and I haue preſumed, accordinge to my duty, to giue your honors ſome account of the ſucceſſe of that endeauour; your lordſhips wilbee pleaſed to remember, that in my laſt I aduiſed, That I had procured ſtrong commands from the dead and this emperour, ſeconded by all the viziers and great officers of this port, of which I haue ſent you double copies, to reſtraine thoſe theeues, and to keepe them in obedience to the capitulations made with his majeſtie, as vaſſalls to the grand ſignior; which I ſent away vpon an expreſſe gally, by an able and ſufficient Turke, a ſeruant in the court, accompanied with an Engliſhman, that he might ſee the ſyncerity of the others proceedinge, and make a true relation of the concluſion. They arriued firſt at Tunes, and there deliveringe the mandats and letters ſent to the viceroy, baſſa, and other officers, a councell was called, and the pleaſure of the grand ſignior ſignified; which, after ſome remonſtrance and diſputes, were publiſhed, and received with all obedience, and a formall writing drawne and ſigned by them, promiſinge to maintaine, and hold a good and firme peace with the Engliſh in the ſeas, conditionlly, that noe ſhip of our nation begunne fight with them, nor tranſported their enemyes goods. This article, inſerted without my knowledge, ſhalbee againe queſtioned here, and ſettled as well as their 1622. bruit vnderſtanding wilbe made capeable of reaſon; they beinge alway deſirous to finde an occaſion to countenance and continue their proffitable robberies. The viceroy endeauoured to ſett free the ſlaues, which are few in that gouerment, except thoſe that willingly ſerue, and are become theirs; fourteene only were releaſed, moſt of them belonging to the viceroy, gunners, and men of good ſeruice, who are putt into a Venice ſhip, and, I hope, retorned, to pray for his majeſtie. Thoſe of priuate mens he could not procure, they pretending that they bought them with money, wee hauing no proofe to the contrary. Notwithſtandinge, he promiſed to deliuer them one and one to the conſull, by mee eſtabliſhed there, as a pledge on our parts; and, as I am enformed, there are not 20 aboue the voluntaries left in that citty, whoſe liberty I will with all diligence endeauour. I cannot omitt, as a ſigne of ſome good meaninge in them, (though I will nott be a ſurety for knaues) that my agents recouered 1500 chequins gold from the viceroy, of the goods of Mr. Leate; which he might haue kept, if he had not meant ſyncerely to obey, and hold the peace. In this citty, and villages adiacent, are dead aboue 200000, of the laſt ſicknes; which alſo hath helped to deliuer ſome Engliſh, with their capteyne Ward, from their miſery (perhaps into a worſe); and this may be the cauſe ſoe few were found at preſent, and the reſt abroad in the men of warre, who ſtill keepe the ſeas ſoe narrowly, that he threds a needle that paſſeth them. There belong to this port 23 good ſhips well prouided, that carry betweene 20 and 36 peeces of ordinance, full of men, and all ſorts of munition. From thence they proceeded to Algier, and in like manner publiſhed the authoritie brought with them; but, a councell aſſembled, they had not like ſucceſſe; for there the inhabitants pretended, firſt, that the commands were counterfait, or at leaſt, procured for money, in the inſtant of the changes and troubles here; not beleeuing that their emperour would giue any eare to their enemyes without hearinge them: and ſoe would neither promiſe obedience, nor releaſe a man; but by way of recrimination accuſed vs of many loſſes and iniuries, eſpecially by his majeſties laſt fleete, that ioyned with their mortall foes, and (as they ſay) ſhot at the towne. The Turke, from hence ſent, roundly put them to anſweare, Whether they would ſubmitt, or nott, as ſubiects to the grand ſignor? In this ſtraight, as they would not agree to a preſent peace, ſoe they durſt not renounce their alleageance; but reſolued to ſend commiſſioners hither to make knowne their greiuances, and to receiue the emperours pleaſure from his owne mouth. To this negotiation are deputed tenne, the mufty, 7 officers, and two principall Moores, who with my deputies are now arriued. In this citty they found about 800 poore men in captiuity, and neare 400 newly dead of the ſickneſs, which hath deuoured about 60000 of all ſorts; of ſhipping at leaſt 70 ſayle well fitted, the leaſt carryinge 20 caſt peeces, and by degrees to 50. Beſides theſe, they haue more then 500 of our iron artillery, that lie vpon their wharfes vſeleſſe, from falkons to good ſakars. Your honors in your wiſdomes will then conſider how dangerous their encreaſe wilbe to the decay both of trade and nauigation, when alreadie their force is equall to ſome princes, that eſteeme themſelues vpon the ſea. I am not ſorry, that an end was not made at Algier; for here I doubt not to bind them to harder conditions, and in faſter chaynes, then vpon their owne dunghill. As yet wee haue not mett, but I haue prepared their welcome, and procured them a round admonition, at their firſt audience. The viziers pretend to bee conſtant, and promiſe to ſettle all in ſecurity. I beleeue they will deale ſyncerely; for they are not deſirous to enforce his majeſties fleets to ioyne with Spayne, nor to ſee them in thoſe ſeas; but how long it will endure, I dare not vndertake: for though I am confident, that I ſhall lay all the authority of this port vpon their ſhoulders, yet they are a kind of dependinge skirt of this empire, and not in abſolute obedience. And laſtly, I know not by what other trade ſoe many idle villaines, nouriſhed in theft, can liue. Therfore my concluſion is, that the ſureſt way were fire and ſword; which I doe nott thinke difficult, butt for the charge and diſtance: yett, ſeing I am deſperate of ſoe honorable and ſecure a remedie, I will apply this I haue begunne, with your honors command, to the beſt vſe; at leaſt to take breath, if not to a perfect cure.

WHAT conditions they will propound, as yett I know not; but I will make none with them, as with men ſui juris; for ſuch as I ſhall accept from the port in their behalfe, I hope your lordſhips will auow my diſcretion, vntill I receiue your further order and confirmation : the greateſt difficulty will reſt in takinge of the wind, and ſpeaking together, when they meete with any of our ſtout ſhipps ; for theſe being men of warre, ſtand vpon termes: honeſt men, well aſſured in a good quarrell, will not beare vpp; but, as their cuſtome is, they will hold their owne, and come vnder noe mans lee ; but ſhoot, and beginne firſt : which will breede a new quarrell and breache, which theſe fellowes will alway ſeeke vnder ſome faire pretence. But as I will conclude for ourſelues, with ſome moderation betweene both extreames of baſeneſſe and obſtinacy; ſoe your honors wilbe pleaſed, preſently, to ſignifie to the Trinity-houſe, that there may bee aduice of a probability of a faire peace : and that therfore our hardy maſters may haue patience, before they giue the occaſion; and that herafter, when I ſhall haue ſent the conditions, they may be publiſhed and obeyed, that my labour be not fruitleſſe by our owne ſtubborneſſe.

I MENTION this, becauſe in the retorne of the gally, after the peace of Tunes agreed and ſigned, a ſmall Engliſh ſhipp, French-bought, and laden with their goods, and ſome of ours, from Tolon in Prouence, beeing chaced by one man of warre, and ſtriuinge for the winde, ſhott 40 peeces, before they knew whether they were enemyes or freinds; which occaſion the Turkes apprehended to take her, after 4 howers fight, which elſe, they pretend, they would not haue done. Next day they mett with this gally, and my deputies att ſea ; who made complaint to the admirall Sampſon, beeinge at anchor with his fleet, not farre off. Hee confeſſed the peace ; but alleadged, That wee againe had broken it. Soe that, though hee ſett free all the men, except 5 Engliſh and 5 Dutch, which they carried as witneſſes, promiſinge their liberty, yett they made prize of all the goods, only the ſhip and ordinance giuen backe, for a ſmall bribe to him. Your honors, by this example, will perceiue how eaſy they are to accept a quarrell; therefore, if wee deſire peace, wee muſt nott looſe it for a brauery. All other conditions I will looke to with my beſt diſcretion, without diſaduantage. The next weeke wee ſhall meet about the buiſineſſe, and I doubt nott, by the next poſt, to ſend your lordſhips the agreement, and a concluſion to his majeſties honour and content.

I PRESUME your lordſhips will both make of mee a fauorable relation to his majeſtie, and accept my endeauours, it beeinge the firſt tyme that euer wee gott ſoe much ground, as to procure, that theſe men ſhould anſweare perſonally at the port, and there bind themſelues for their obedience; and if this ſtring hold nott, nothinge will bind them, but the miſeries of deſtruction, deſeruedly drawne vpon their owne heads.

SEEING this diſcourſe is drawne into an vnexpected length, your honors will pardon mee, if I referre you, for relation of our great affaires and treatyes here, to another, ſent to Mr. ſecretary, to whom I haue giuen continually a large account ; and for auoidinge repetitions, haue reſerued that for matter to fill my ordinary diſpatch. Your lordſhips will find there, that the negotiations of this place may haue great influence vpon the changes and actions of more import in Chriſtendome, and are not to bee wholy neglected. With humble repreſentation of my ſeruice and prayers for the proſperity of all your honours counſailes and deſſignes, I take my leaue.

Your Honors, in all obſeruance and duty.

I HAD, in this buſineſs of the piratts, forgott myſelfe : I adviſed, in my laſt to your honors, That I had taken this charge vpon my ſelfe, hauing no order from the Leuant company ; nor as yett haue they made allowance of my expence, becauſe they thinke it is not their intereſt alone ; but that the benefitt beeing common with them, to the Spaniſh merchants, and to the fiſhermen, and weſtern ports, who beare the greateſt loſſe, they deferr to take the burthen vpon themſelues. I am aſſured, your honors will not thinke itt fitt, that I ſhould beare itt, who rather expect a reward. The diſburſments paſt, are about 600 l. and if I make a good end, it may coſt, in the concluſion, 3 or 400 more : for this I proteſt, I ſitt at intereſt of the cuntry, 18 per cent. and it will undoe mee, who by this imployment only eat and drinke. What charge I haue beene at for other publique 1622. buſineſſes, commanded mee by his majeſtie, I forbeare to mention, though I feele it; and haue no releife from the merchant, but will rely vpon his majeſties goodneſs, and your honors fauour. But for this ſumme, which I cannot beare, I humbly beſeech your lordſhips, to ſend for the Spaniſh merchants, and others interreſſed, and in your wiſedomes ſet downe ſome courſe to eaſe and diſcharge mee; or els I ſhall want my bread, while I trauaile to feed others.

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

MY laſt letters to your honor, of the $\frac{14}{24}$ December, haue (I hope) excuſed mee, to that date: ſince, I haue forborne to interupt (beeing not preſſed by vrgent buſineſs) your too iuſt cauſe of ſorrowe; and your honour will pardon mee for renewing it, ſeeing wee owe this confeſſion to her memory, that wee ſhould enuy any houſe but yours, that would bee thought to haue borne a greater part therof then wee; but now your owne wiſdome wilbe your beſt comforter.

I HAUE longingly waited ſome new order from his majeſtie, vpon the changes rumored here, of the ſucceſs of the treaties at Bruxells. I know your honor will not miſinterpret mee, nor may I conceale the practizes and offers in this port. I hope I haue a good and baptized heart, as iealous of euery foot of Chriſtian ground, as any honeſt man; yett you will giue mee leaue, and defend mee in it, to make a bare relation; out of which you may collect how eaſy for mee it had beene to haue prepared a great diuerſion, if his majeſtie be enforced by falſhood to a iuſt warre: the oportunity is not wholy loſt, though now interrupted by a breach likely to enſue with the Poles; and might haue beene ſoe guided, that neither danger nor ſcandall could haue beene ymputed.

YOUR honor wilbe pleaſed to remember, that my laſt aduice left the duke of Zbarawsky in ſome trouble and diſcontent with the vizier, who had deferred him in expectance of the arriuall of the baſſa of Caniſia, a man that beſt vnderſtands the borders of that ſide of this empire, in company of another ambaſſadour of Bethlem Gabor, now both come to the port. I will not look back to the cauſes of this delay, but inſiſt upon the preſent condition. The vizier, about 10 dayes ſince, deputed this baſſa to treat with the duke; but they were ſoe farre from agreement, by the obſtinacy of the Turks, who, in confidence of the good pledge they haue in him, and his trayne, vtterly diſauowed the articles made at Chotyn, and would begin anew with inſolent demands; in which the duke hauing noe authority, but only to build vpon that foundation, abſolutely refuzinge, all treaty was broken betweene them, and noe hope of peace; inſomuch as he was reſolued to renounce his legation, and take his leaue. In this extreamity, the Turke hauing another deſſigne in contemplation, to aid the prince of Tranſyluania for the recouery of Hungary, loath to haue ſoe dangerous an enemy vpon their backs, and foreſeeinge that that peace would ſecure both their borders, and aduance their other ends, becauſe in the concluſion they would comprehend Gabor; the baſſa ſent for mee, and gaue the occaſion to renew the treaty, and accommodate the differences. After many diſcourſes he agreed, that I ſhould mediate betweene them. To prepare the way, betweene our ſelues we reconciled many things; and he promiſed to make relation thereof to the vizier, and gaue his word, that he would labour to bring it to a good iſſue. The next day I was ſent for, and deſired to meet the duke at the baſſa's houſe (hauing till then not ſeene him); and there the reſolution of the great vizier and councell was publiſhed, with many complements very reſpectiue to his majeſtie, that for his ſake the treaty ſhould proceed, and, in all diſagreements, that I ſhould haue the concluding voice. Hauinge there diſcuſſed their many controverſies, wee drew them to a few heads: the principall were; That there ſhould bee the ſame aſſurance reciprocally giuen, on the one part, for the Tartars, as the other ſhould giue for the Coſſacques: the ſecond, To interpret the words, Frend to Frend, and Enemy to Enemy, which the Turks would haue explained, for mutuall and actuall aid in any warre begunne by either: but wee moderated it to another ſenſe, That neither ſhould aſſiſt the enemies of the other. This againe the baſſa would haue enlarged, by naming the king of Spaine, emperour, &c. excluſiue. But wee ſhowed them, That were to ſeperate the kingdome of Poland from the community of Chriſtendome, and to expoſe it to enuy and reproach, perhaps into a warre, in which the grand ſignior muſt by the ſame article bee engaged; and to bee preſent, or conſent to ſuch a ſcandall, I utterly refuzed. Wee then tempered, and concluded this point in the generality of words, without mention of particulars; which conduced well enough to the intention of the Turks, beeing only ſtood vpon for the ſecurity of Tranſiluania, to binde the Poles from moleſtinge the prince, or aſſiſtinge the emperour. Thirdly, Concerninge preſents, and an ambaſſadour reſident att the port, for aſſurance of the peace; which (the duke hauing noe power to promiſe) wee ſmoothed, and agreed, That there could bee noe bond more honorable on both parts, then the oathes of kings. In concluſion wee thought all was accorded, and the next day the vizier ſent mee thanks in the name of the ſtate, with aſſurance that it was done; and that on the morrowe, at ſultan Solymans church, all the great officers of the kingdome ſhould meet, where the articles ſhould be written, and in the front of them it ſhould be inſerted, That in the honor of his majeſtie, that peace was made, and there publiſhed. To this aſſembly the heads of the ſouldier alſo came (nothinge now being done without them); and in the inſtant of the concluſion, a captaine of the Spahees interpoſed, and, in the name of that fraternity, demanded that the duke of Zbarawsky ſhould be kept as a pledge, vntill a chiaus were ſent, and retorned from Poland with the kings, and republiques confirmation: this interrupted all, and muſt be obeyed; and ſo the councell brake vpp. What certenty can be expected, where a multitude is conſulted? This meſſage ſent the ambaſſador, putt him into deſperation: they require his letters, which he refuſeth to giue, proteſtinge that he hath ample authority, offering to ſhow his inſtructions, and if they will nott creditt him, to renounce his ambaſſage, and to depart. Hee hath to day ſent twice to mee, and I cannot perſwade him from his reſolution to diſclayme, and hazard all. Thus, in few howers, by the blaſt of a bladder, all our labours are come to nothinge, and I feare it wilbe very difficult to reconcile them againe; notwithſtanding, I will not deſiſt in a good worke, though I know not where to begin, if this really proceed from the ſoldiour; but I ſometyme ſuſpect, the old vizier, enemy to Poland, hath plotted this way of breach, and caſt itt vpon them, that are beſt able to beare the good or ill ſucceſſe. I know not, in theſe intricacies, what to aduiſe: I thinke God hath infatuated this people ſo, as they will giue themſelues noe leiſure to cure their inward wounds; and, I am afraid, all will fall in peeces, and that the Coſſacques will, vpon this bruit, enter the Black-ſea; and then both parts wilbe engaged in a warre, for which they are vnfitt. 1622.

If this treaty had ſucceeded, or ſhalbe renewed to good effect, Bethlem Gabor would haue obteyned good ſuccours; the baſſa profeſſing to mee, that he ſhould not relinquiſh his clayme to Hungary, for which he hath in readines 30 thouſand men; and if this trouble him not, he will attempt it in Aprill, and put all thoſe parts into combuſtion. His miniſters ſtirr now apace, fearing the interruption of that deſſigne (which hath many fauorites); and haue publiſhed an apologie for him, to purge him of the imputation raiſed, That hee would aduance the greatneſs of this empire; which I haue ſeene, but as yett cannot get a copy; and I beleeue by ſome circumſtance in this treaty, that hee only filleth the eares of this ſtate with flatteries and vanities; and if he might bee aſſured of any other freinds, he would firſt ſerue his turne vpon theſe, and then betray them. Hee treats a marriage in Poland, and affects any alliance that may protect him. Whatſoeuer the iſſue wilbe, your honour will pardon mee to ſpeake my opinion: That if his majeſtie be enforced to a warre, hee is as much to be reſpected as any prince in Germany; for he will finde meanes to trouble the greateſt enemy. The Turks will mainteyne him, becauſe they feare he may reuolt to the emperour, and hee ſeekes any refuge, becauſe hee ſtands betweene two factions, an enemy to one, neglected of the other; but it is eaſy to aſſure him, if his majeſtie affect it. I muſt confeſſe, that many offers haue beene made vnto mee, eſpecially by the baſſa at this laſt conference, preſſinge mee to write to his majeſtie to maynteyne the prince electour in his pretenſions, for which they would ſend an army; proteſtinge, that if it were refuſed, they would find another Frederick that ſhould accept it. To which end they haue ſent one Becher chiaus into Holland, who paſſinge by Venice, did not neglect to inuite that ſtate. To theſe I haue giuen noe eare, nor any conſent; reſeruing my ſelfe to a better 1622. warrant, or my firſt inſtructions: but haue euer done good offices to thoſe that (it ſeemes) will not deſerue it.

The emperour hath ſent a nuntio to this port, 4 dayes ſince arriued, with letters proteſtinge, that there is noe meaninge on his part to breake the league; deſiringe the grand ſignor not to giue an eaſy eare to his enemyes, that loue to fiſh in troubled waters; but to reſpitt all ſuſpitions, and præcipitat councells, vntill the cominge of an ambaſſadour deſſigned to congratulate, and with ample power to confirme the amity, who is promiſed to bee at the port by Eaſter. Hee hath yett noe anſwear; but the troubles with Polonia will ſweeten it.

I haue viſited the duke of Zbarawsky, two dayes after our firſt meeting at the baſſa's; which hee hath requited, to the deſpight of the French ambaſſador; who contending with mee for the firſt audience, which he might haue had freely in my ſickneſſe; but noe time would ſerue him but the day before mee, hoping therby to ſteale a ſhow of precedence, which hee chalengeth as his due, by meſſages to the duke: butt it pleaſed him to doe mee the honour to receiue mee firſt; ſoe as yett the French and hee haue not mett. In all other circumſtances hee hath ſtriued to ſhow a gratitude to his majeſtie.

I haue ſent your honor a peece of a letter of the prince of Tranſyluania, whereby you may ſee part of his deſſignes and hopes. Petendius, therin mentioned, is a ſeruant of his, newly retorned from his legation in Holland to the prince electour, for whom he pretends all his vndertakings, though Hungary haue the beſt ſhare. But I will not lengthen this diſcourſe, becauſe I hope by the next poſt to ſee a reſolution; and doe determine to ſend your honour a true relation of the whole negotiation, that you may make your owne judgment.

I haue giuen a particular account to the lords of his majeſties councell, of the ſucceſs of my meſſengers to Tunes and Algier, ſoe that I ſhall not neede to repeat it. But of the Dutch treaty with them, I haue beene ſilent, becauſe I haue no other certenty then their report. Two of their ſhips were in the harbour of Algier, and brought thither a kind of an ambaſſador, in the name of the States, and his excellence, whoſe letters were publiquely read; and as theſe informe, they haue agreed to joyne their fleets yearely to attempt the coaſts of Spaine, or Italy, or the iſlands in the Leuant, ſubiect to that crowne; the ſlaues, and halfe the pilladge, to bee the ſhares of the Moores; the other halfe, with the place, if the Dutch thinke fitt to hold it, to remaine to them.

Your honour will pardon mee this confuſion: I haue ſpent this weeke in action, and loſt my time to write. I put my ſelfe into your hands, to communicat to his majeſtie what you thinke will conduce to his ſeruice; and to ſmother the reſt, as the fumes of this place; beſeeching you to preſerue mee, not only from any miſinterpretation, but to vouchſafe mee a ſpeedy anſweare to direct mee in this darkneſs, as one that euer will reſt

Conſtantinople,
25 Jan. 1622.

Your Honours humble ſeruant.

My Lorde,

I haue with much ioy receiued two letters from you, of the dates $\frac{19}{29}$ Auguſt, $\frac{14}{24}$ October, with other relations, that haue more inſtructed and enlightened mee in this darkneſs where I liue, then all the waſt papers that haue come to giue me an edge and appetite, but brought nothing to fill an hungry ſtomack. I haue trauailed farre enough; but neuer had ſuch cauſe to beleeue there is a place where the ſunne ſhines not, as here: for though I am ſtill in the world, I liue as if I were not concerned, or that this place is not worth the conſideration; ſo litle aduiſe I haue, or any inſtruction, in theſe great chaunges. Yours were the firſt I ſawe from any miniſter of his majeſties abroad; yett your lordſhip will finde, by the ſubſequent diſcourſes, that if the fault, or want of ability, bee not in mee, I might haue had as good a part to play as any; not to introduce a common enemy, but to diuert one much to bee ſuſpected; and to balance the treatyes, that haue proued ſo light on one part.

My laſt to your lordſhip, as I remember, were relations of the chaunges here; 1622 and a litle later, of the arriuall of an ambaſſador from the prince of Tranſiluania, in company of the count of Torne: thither then I muſt looke backe. Att their firſt comming, they both hauing order to communicate all their inſtructions and affaires with mee, and bringing a letter of creditt to that end, had great hope that I would haue ioined and countenanced all their informations and demaunds: butt the firſt face was ſo foule, and his majeſtie, out of a chriſtian affection to the publique peace, had ſo limitted mee, that myne eares were ſtopped to all. And though the great vizier called mee, and preſſed mee to a declaration; yett I could neither auerre things I knew not by the ambaſſador pretended, nor conniue in the motions of breaking the peace in Germany, while I heard that his majeſtie treated at Bruxells with good hope; leaſt thoſe, who euer meant deceipt, could find no better back dore, then to accuſe mee, vnableſt to beare the burthen: ſo that I diſauowed euery thing, and retarded the reſolutions of this port; though I did withall endeauor to preſerue Bethleem Gabor in his owne eſtate, not hauing commiſſion to ſeeke his ruyne, nor thinking it fitt therby to aduance his enemyes. So hitherto I haue directly followed my orders, and haue pulled a thorne out of the lyons foote, into whoſe denne I dare not enter in hope of gratitude: and this ſyncerity of his majeſtie in my ſeruice hath merited ſome correſpondence. But now, the affaires and hopes chaunged, I know not what to doe, nor what to leaue vndone, nothing beeing referred to diſcretion; and I may looſe a faire oportunity, it beeing as eaſy to ſett fire in the neſt of an eagle as of a crowe, where they both build of combuſtible matters: yett it is tyme enough; butt I haue my hands and tongue tyed, or elſe, (my lord) beleeue yt, I could work a ſtraunge diuerſion, without the hazard of one foote of chriſtian ground, to which my baptized heart will neuer conſent. I firſt muſt take away one obiection of myne owne; That the Turks are ſo poore and weakened with theſe diſſentions, that I haue giuen ſentence, they are vnfitt for warre. It is true, vnfitt for ſuch a warre as they were wont, in their glory, to threaten their neighbours with: butt yett they are not ſo lowe, butt that they can ſend ſome aydes, to abate the encreaſe of thoſe enemyes they moſt feare; and rather now affect ſafety by counterpoiſing theirs, then conqueſt. Beſides, euen this mutiny will require ſome ſmall waſt to vent yt, as diſtempered bodyes by a litle fontinella, and therby to drawe from hence thoſe they cannott rule.

I WILL beginne with the count of Torne: Though he may ſtand accuſed and ſuſpected, for accompanyeng the meſſages of Gabor; yett ſo ſoone as he felt his honor ſuffer, as he alway profeſſed that he had no intereſt in them, to the preiudice of Chriſtendome, nor vnderſtood them ſoe; ſoe, the better to cleare himſelfe, he retyred from publique negotiation; and now at laſt, vpon the arriuall of a ſecond ambaſſador, went not to the court with them: yett is not daynty to profeſſe himſelfe an enemy to thoſe that haue forced him into the dirt: and ſo, I thinke, will continue reſolued to ſerve any prince or ſtate that will make warre vpon them. If he can find a cleane way, either by the reſtitution of the king of Bohemia, to whom, in the firſt place, he profeſſeth his fidelity; or by the Venetians, if the interuiewe at Lyons or Marſeilles produce any thing, he will, I am perſwaded, chooſe yt: if none of theſe, then he will not leaue that prince that firſt receiued him, but follow his fortunes, who will not be ſcrupulous what help he ſeekes to aduance his eſtate: briefly, he is a braue and courteous gentleman, and yett verè bellicoſus. This leades mee into a conſideration of him, I meane Bethlem Gabor, whom I haue diligently traced in all his wayes in this court; and I muſt confeſſe, I cannott make a judgment: only I ſay, hee is a man whoſe witt and courage is not knowne; and he will proue a notable inſtrument either of much good or euil. His firſt ambaſſage to the port made a cleare proteſtation, that he would not hold peace with the emperour; and thereuppon opened great pretences of ſeruice, intimating a ſtraunge league, in which he refuzed to haue a part, though offered; his owne cuntry, and the addition of Boſna, after conqueſt, in inheritance, and theſe to be erected into a kingdome: Polonia did not ſcape him. Briefly; hee made all ſhowe of affection and obſeruance to draw ayd from hence, for the recouery of Hungary; and then promiſed (you will not doubt) wonders. All theſe ouertures he maketh to this ſtate, as a vaſſall: what his heart is, Hee knowes that is ſcrutator cordium. Butt, as farre as I can judge, he meanes not ſo well to them; but, to aduance his owne ends, 1622. flatters and fills their eares with vanityes. I leaue his further apology to thoſe that are intereſſed, and will barely tell you what is done.

HIS firſt deſire was a commiſſion plenæ potentiæ, to be ioyned with the baſſaes of Buda and Caniſia, to make the warre in Hungaria and Auſtria at their diſcretion; and thoſe two were his aſſured frends. This reſolution (beeing my conſent and aduiſe was required) I retarded; ſo that the viziers would firſt conſult thoſe vpon the border, and ſtay untill concluſion of peace with Poland (the duke of Zbarawsky not yet arriued, and that buſineſs vncerteyne). Then his miniſters, knowing their maſters purpoſe, ſought to be comprehended in that treaty; and finding that they could not obteyne all, and fearing the diſtaſt of the Polacks might hinder their deſſignes, they procured another expreſſly to be ſent with the preſent, and ordinary tribute, who is now arriued with the baſſa of Caniſia, and whoſe long ſtay hath hindered the expedition of the duke, to his great trouble. Nowe, they treate at this port apart; Beth. not truſting any one with all his inſtructions, nor either of them with the moſt ſecrett, hauing ſent a gentleman of his chamber in plena confidentia. Hee followes the ſuit for this commiſſion anewe, and is ſeconded by the baſſa. As yett it is not reſolued; but my opinion is, that he ſhall haue ayde, and will enter into Hungary in Aprill; where all the garriſons being of that nation, and the Germans ſent out, yt is very likely he will ſoone reduce all there to his obedience; the port beeing reſolued to maynteyne him in that quarrell, and to iuſtify his election, not ſuffering him to giue ouer the purſuit of the full poſſeſſion. To this I haue bene called agayne, and offers made to mee in the behalfe of the king of Bohemia; yea, ſo farre preſſed, That if I would declare, in his majeſties name, that he would not conſent and aſſiſt to his reſtauration, that they would find another ſhould accept an offered crowne. To this end, they haue ſent one Becker-chiaus into Holland long before this arriued with you; and others to other parts, whom I cannott mannerly name without a cyphar, leaſt they fall into enuy, if this miſcarry. Nor can I write you what I would: but by theſe litle ſparkles, your lordſhip may ſee I could doe ſomewhat, which I dare not; and would doe more, were I warranted. If a good fire were kindled neare their home, they muſt retyre thoſe to quench yt, that now blowe yt abroad: butt I will hope of peace; and though I will reſt vntill I haue order, yett I will keepe ſome power to doe ſeruice, if not ſoe much as I could, the oportunity beeing once ſlipped away. I cannot preſage; but I think the king of Spayne will not aduenture to haue ſo many enemyes; for Hungary and Auſtria will want his ſuccours, and Voltaline may bee in great queſtion. The States haue loſt nothing this ſommer; and if his majeſtie be enforced to ſeeke his way into the Palatinate, Flaunders may bee in trouble; and all this for a duke of Bauare without yſſue; for one that ſold his ayd before hand; rather, when I conſider the juſtice of God, who is moſt guilty; he that had no intereſt but ambition, and ambition againſt his owne bloud; I may ſuppoſe, that both the emperour and king of Spaine will retyre from maynteyning a quarrell that ſhall not proffitt them: and the good duke is allready paid; he hath poſſeſſion; the conditions are performed, and lett him keepe it as hee can. Theſe are contemplations; but ſuch as will not giue mee leaue to think other then that he ſhalbee the ſacrifice of the publique peace; Expedit ut unus moriatur pro populo: if not, I will ſell my gowne, and buy a ſword.

THE duke of Zbarawsky hath bene here 13 weekes, and, beginning too eagerly, diſcontented the vizier; which hath hindered his expedition, ſo as yett he can gett no diſpatch, nor, till of late, any entrance into the treaty. Not that the Turks would there haue a warre; but partly, out of froward yrreſolutneſs; partly, at the ſuit of the miniſters of Gabor, who knowing that they had iuſtly offended Poland in their firſt ouerture here, and in ſome practice there, did therefore deſire to be comprehended in the concluſion, that their maſter, with the more ſecurity, might proſecute his deſſigne in Hungary; to which end, their laſt ambaſſador, now arriued, was lately expected; partlye, becauſe the duke depended vpon Daout baſſa, and vnder-meanes, which occaſioned his ſodaine death, as your lordſhip ſhall heare at laſt; but eſpecially, for want of ſome good mediator. Moſt of this tyme I haue bene ſick in my bedd (which hath interrupted my correſpondence with your lordſhip, and muſt bee my excuſe); and though I haue done many good offices, yet the beſt I could nott ſtirre in, till all was allmoſt in pieces; and the duke, in deſperation, ready to renounce his legation. The king of Poland had honored mee with his letter, and referred much to my direction: ſo that, as ſoone as I could walke, I vndertooke the buſineſs: and now, in ſix dayes, all the viziers hauing conſented that I ſhould bee vmpire, I haue concluded yt, the articles drawne, and to morrow to be publiſhed; and, I hope, on Sunday he ſhall haue his deſired leaue. In this I haue found many difficultyes, both with the port, the miniſters of Gabor, and the Muſcouites, who vnſeaſonably ſent an ambaſſage hither to hinder yt, and to make vnworthy offers, while they treated peace with Poland: ſo that you ſee other duller people can treate alla Bruxella. Butt God hath herein bleſſed my labour; and I hope his majeſtie will take it well, beeing his commaund; and in the articles, his name ſtanding in the front, as the cauſe and procurer, acknowledged by both. Hereby I haue not only engaged, but in ſome ſort obliged that nation not to doe diſſeruice to his majeſtie, if he haue occaſion of warre. I haue reconciled Bethlem Gabor, and ſecured him from that perill, without any preiudice to any, that wilbe his maieſties frends, with much to his foes. I dare ſay no more: thus much I thought fitt to communicate, that your lordſhip may know howe thoſe affaires ſtand, and may be conuerted to vſe. 1622.

I WILL trouble your lordſhip with a litle of our Turkiſh eſtate: I doubt not you know from the practicque Holland ambaſſador here, the continuance of our troubles. The mutined ſoldiour ſtill reignes, and is growne to that height of inſolency, that they vſurpe all places of commodity; exact money in the ſtreets to pay for that wyne, whoſe name was formerly odious to them; and beeing refuzed, ſtabb and kill impunè. The magiſtrate dares take no knowledge, nor any man complayne. They ask who are kings and viziers but they?

THERE are three rebellions in Aſia; one at Babilon, the other at Arzerum, the laſt at Damaſcus. The firſt two haue ſlayne and ſent away their prætorian bands, the corrupt Janizaries. They pretend that all theſe here are traitors, for murthering their true king. I am perſwaded their confidence hath ſome ground of ayd from Perſia, or elſe they are aſſured that the ſouldiours will not moue hence from their chymneyes. If theſe outward breaches may be ſtoppt, (of which I ſee no poſſibility; for theſe here are growne blynder, and haue redeemed the Chalcedonians from the oracles ieſt, and cannott or dare not ſee their daunger, leaſt they encreaſe yt) yet the fire is kindled in ſtrawe, and yt will breake out. Though there be no great choice betweene this emperour and a child, for theſe are competitors; yet while twoe woemen ſtriue for maſtery, the mothers of theſe, both ſubtill, ambitious, and regnandi avidæ, at the coſt of the commonwealth, and publique ſtock, both purchaceing frends, and practizing parties; what can be expected but ruyne? When the treaſure is conſumed, which the queene mother hath brought to the bottome, ubi peſſimum remanet, the ordinary reuenewe not beeing enough for the pay of the ſoldiours, and they will neither be abated nor retrenched, then wee ſhall ſee them fall to ſharing for themſelues, et actum erit de imperio. I haue giuen your lordſhip a generall taſt; but could make it euident, that the fatall day is at hand; euery action is a prediction, if there be the ſame courſe in great affaires, (as there is the ſame God) which our forefathers haue lefte us to contemplate. And now, though you may be weary enough, yett I will trouble your lordſhip with our laſt tragœdy; not as a matter of ſo publique vſe, as an excellent glaſſe for contemplation of the juſtice of God in his waies, wherby he will bring his owne councells to perfection. Daout baſſa, brother in lawe to this emperor, and the beloued ſonne of the queene mother, the firſt vizier after the chaunge, (as I enformed your lordſhip) was both the inſtrument and the counſellor to murther Oſman. The preſent vizier, enuyeng his authority within, though depoſed; ſcorning that hee ſhould vndertake to gouerne in his raigne, eſpecially becauſe he countenanced, in oppoſition, the buſineſs of the duke of Zbarawsky, practized his death: but not daring to doe yt by his owne authority, and in vayne to procure it from the court, he ſtirred vpp the Spahees to demaund juſtice of him, for the death of the laſt king. This looked further then the firſt aſſent: the ſoldiour ſoone raiſed, mutined in the ſerraglio, and demaund him. Daout flyes. Now it is on foot, if hee be not found, the vizier himſelfe is in daunger: but the poore man was taken, and brought to the diuan; there, if he be called to publique juſtice, hee muſt excuſe himſelfe vpon ſome greater. Here the emperour and his mother ranne a new hazard: therfore both forſake him; 1622. and, without any tryall, he is brought before the ſoldiours, ſtripped, his turbant taken off, and on his knees, ready to receiue the ſtroake of death; ſodainly the Janizaries come to his reſcue, and carry him away to their chambers. The Spahees, who beganne this, take it in ill part, and follow with great cryes; they will haue him dye: the others demaund, That he may be heard in publique juſtice. Thus theſe two mutined factions are ready to come to blowes; but it is not yet ripe; God hath ſomwhat to doe remarkable: Daout baſſa, now in hope of life, bribes the Janizaries, and that day diſtributes 40000 checq. gold, and they promiſe to protect him. Who would not now thinke, but that he was taken away for ſafety? Butt the Spahees follow their firſt reſolution, and to appeaſe the feare of this diſſention, yt is agreed that he ſhall dye. They that meant to ſaue him, could not, but preſerued him for a greater example of juſtice. Hee ſhall not now looſe his head in the court; that death was too honorable for the murtherer of his prince: God repriu'd him, and mock'd him with falſe hopes. So that now the ſame Janizaries putt him ſecretly into the ſame coach wherein he had ſent Oſman. Twice in the way, dry with ſorrow, he dranke at the ſame conduits, where his laſt maſter begged drink; and ſo is conueyed into the ſame chamber where he had ſtrangled him. The executioners now beginning to tye him, himſelfe ſhowes the very corner where he had committed that foule fact; and deſires, that there he may, if poſſible, expiat it; and ſo hee is at laſt miſerably ſtranguled. Thus he hath his reward, and God is iuſt to and for the wicked. Some others haue ſuffered for the ſame cauſe iuſtly, though not by way of juſtice; for the fooliſh ſoldiours, that were the firſt and moſt forceable cauſe, think they thus acquitt themſelues, by raging againſt thoſe who were wicked only by their occaſion and power: what will ſucceed, wee leaue to prouidence. Though all ſeeme thus quietted, I looke for no ſure weather, while the citty is neare, and, like the ſea, moued with euery winde.

THUS your lordſhip may behold in a dymme glaſſe, our motions; fitt matter for Ben Johnſon. And if I durſt augure, I would, by theſe beaſtes entralls, that are daily butchered, pronounce the imminent ruyne of this great monarchy, now, I think, yrrecouerably ſick. I could wiſh I were further off, to ſitt and ſee it ſafely, and without feare of the contagion; but God hath thus diſpoſed mee, and I will ſtriue with a pious meaning, dijs iratis frui.

I HAUE, by your lordſhips fauour, receiued a letter from her majeſtie, and daily nowe expect to ſee her picture, which I haue long ſollicited, and will, with a popiſh diſtinction, worſhipp: there is no place in my houſe worthy two ſuch ornaments and jewells; but by them euery one wilbee dignified. Monſieur de Haga, our ambaſſador here, is ſett on fire with expectations; and I am very gladd that he ſhall haue ſuch a companyon, to auoyd worſe. Hee makes preparation for her, as if ſome princeſs Dulcibella were to be brought to the emperours ſonne of an unknowne land. Hee hath bought his houſe in fee, trymmed yt, adorned yt, and planted it about, as if he meant to make it his manſion and tombe, and had no feare of a remoue.

WEE agree very well, and he is not ſo fitt for any place as this, becauſe he loues it, and all the faſhions and manners here are to him moſt agreeable, and could paſſe, if he had no allowance by another trade; his aduiſes, I know, are frequent, and applyed to his owne deſires and humour, ſometymes taken vpon truſt.

THE French ſtands vpon great puntoes, and hath loſt by it, with mee. The bailo is a diſcreet gentleman, and a true Venetian; cloſe euen to his kitchen and buttery.

THUS your lordſhip hath an epitome of our affaires, in retorne of your hiſtory; and if I haue any other ſtore, I haue the ſame want which your lordſhip mentions, a cyphar, which you may ſupply, becauſe I liue ſubiect to the more daunger and miſinterpretation. Your lordſhip will accept my thanks, for compenſation of other wants; and with the deliuery of this my duty to her majeſtie, you wilbe pleaſed to enforme them both, of what you think may conduce to their ſeruice, and his majeſties ends, of which I am yet ignoraunt.

AND if you find yt not ill manners, I beſeech you preſent my humble deuotion to his excellence, and prince Henry, to whom, when I haue your encouragement, I will write, that they may not forgett they haue ſuch a ſeruaunt. I doe honor extreamely the noble duke of Brunſwick, and admire the count of Manſfield, who, like another Eumenes, hath maynteyned himſelfe in the diuiſion and ruyne of ſo many great ones; and I may liue to keepe and collect the notes, that may make his ſtory as famous, though Plutarch could hardly find for him a paralell.

SIR Horace Vere, I hope, is long ſince arriued with you, to whom I would offer myne owne ſeruice by myne owne hand, if my ſickneſs had not caſt mee ſo farre behinde in my neceſſary diſpatches, and your lordſhip will conceiue I am now full of buſineſſes; and ſince I haue made a breach into ciuility, I will craue leaue to remember my noble frends, Sir John Bulace, Sir John Banwugh, capteyne Courtney, capteyne Aſhley, capteyne Carey, capteyne Killigrewe, capteyne Roe, and all thoſe who haue ſo honored themſelues, that they neede no other.

THE proceedings of and with Spaine, I will not meddle; they are like Terra del Fuoge, as vnknowne as daungerous: the very mapps of the world, of their making, are falſe, ex induſtria. I only conclude with this wiſh, That I had liberty to requite them, which I would doe as a good Chriſtian.

MY wife thanks your lordſhip for your remembrance, and deſires to retorne the ſame affection to you and your lady; and beeing aſſured you are weary of all this ſtuffe, except of the concluſion, which aſſures your lordſhip, that I am

HERE is arriued a nuntio from the emperour, who taking notice of the practice of Gabor in the port, hath written a moſt earneſt letter, feruently deſiring the continuance of the peace; proteſting that whatſoeuer hath beene deliuered by the miniſters of his enemies, of any leauge or confederacy made agaynſt this ſtate, is utterly falſe; that he deſires and determines to maynteyne the articles made at the laſt treaty, and to giue no cauſe of offence to the grand ſignor; and for farther confirmation, promiſeth about Eaſter to ſend a ſolemne ambaſſadour, to congratulate and renew the frendſhip with the port, deſiring that all reſolution of any breach on this ſyde, or any attempt that may occaſion it, may bee deferred vntill his arriuall, who ſhall haue plenam potentiam in all pretended differences: he is but new come, his letters only ſeene by the vizier, but no anſwere giuen; for which ther ſhalbe a counſultation; but I thincke the miniſters of Gabor, and their owne deſire to reul their cytty, will ouerway him: I am ſure it were in my power to turne the ſcale eyther way.

[The remainder of this poſtſcript, being effectually comprehended in ſeveral of the preceding letters, is here omitted.]

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

THIS dead ſeaſon of the yeare ſuggeſts ſo little ſubject of advertiſement, that I cannot eaſily avoyde the danger of being ſuſpected to fayle in my accuſtomed reſpect to your lordſhip; but I may truely aſſure your lordſhip, that nothing hath or ſhall eſcape my penne, that can import but ſo much as to deſerve knowledge; and yet theſe parts, for the preſent, afford ſo little, that I can promiſe your lordſhip little of that nature.

WEE have advertiſement here of two millions and a halfe of ducatts, made over from Genoa to Antwerp for ſeaven monthes proviſion, beginning with this preſent of February, for the Spaniſh army; and that the marquis Spinola hath already given out commiſſions for 12 new companies of horſe. On this ſide there is no apparence of new leavyes, all conſultation tending how to have moneyes ſtill to content the old troopes, for which a ſufficiency wilbe found; and yf any thing can be advanced eyther at home by rayſing new impoſts, or abroade by imploring the aſſiſtance of other princes, count Mansfelt is like to have his part for maintenance of his army.

HERE is preſent the baron Groisbeck, employed by thoſe of Liege to the States, to ſave that countrey from a pecuniary mulct of 50 thouſand rixdalers, impoſed becauſe of certayne troopes of the elector of Collens, which vnder command of baron Anholt came downe to the ſiege of Berghen-op-zoom; which though the elector 1622. laboured to excuſe, as being onely tranſported a little too farre in the purſuite of count Mansfelts army; yet no excuſe could prevayle ſo much, but that the States were firmely purpoſed to ſend their horſe to doe execution vpon his countryes, vntill his majeſties interceſſion, at the inſtance of the infanta, ſtruck in betwixt both, and mollifyed ſomewhat the ſeverity of the States reſolution, in procuring the buſines to be held in ſuſpence; wherby on the one ſide, not to drive thoſe people into deſpaire, and, on the other, to keepe them in awe, till it bee ſeene what will become of the baron Anholts troopes, which lodge ſtill in Munſterland, neare the frontiers of this ſtate, and are ready to ioyne with the ennemy vpon any attempt, (were it not for this bridle) as they ſhewed themſelves in Brabant; and in this ſtate the buſines is like to remayne, vnles ſome new accident drive the States to new impatience.

COUNT Mansfelt having hetherto wintered in the county of Eaſtfrizeland with the groſſe of his army, encreaſed now with diverſe new troopes, is riſen with part thereof, and hath taken in Cloppenburgh, and ſome other ſmall places in Weſtphalia, whilſt the duke of Brunſwick with other troopes is gone towards Minden; both indeavoring, as much as in them lyes, to aſſure themſelves of the command of the river Weſer, they having impatroniſed already divers of the paſſages thereof.

MY lord generall Vere ſhipped himſelf the firſt of this preſent at the Brill, for England; and Monſ. Burlamachy, who arrived here opportunely two or three dayes before, is gone with him; both of them carying a relation of the preſent condition of Franckendale, ſtill ſtraightly blocked vp, but in ſtate to hold out yet two monthes.

THE troopes come downe out of the Palatinat with my lord generall Vere, having bene embarqued in Frizeland for England, in conformity to his majeſties expreſſe commaund, and once out at ſea, were driven back agayne by contrary wind, which entertayned them in theſe parts ſo long, till a new order of his majeſty arrived, bearing, that they ſhould be licenſed on this ſide the ſea; the newes whereof coming to the troopes iuſt at the tyme when the wind turned faire, their long ſufferance on ſhipboard drave them into ſome impatience, and conſequently into diſorder, ſome of them going about to force their paſſage for England, as was firſt intended; but all was well quieted at laſt by the officers, though my lord generall had ſuch an apprehenſion of the matter, that vpon the firſt notice thereof he went hence in perſon with all poſſible diligence, to Medenblick (where the troopes lay); but at his arrivall there, he found the troopes departed orderly towards the place appointed for their licenſing; which was performed at Harlem the 29th of the laſt, every officer and ſoldier having a proportion of money delivered them ſufficient to defray them home to their countrey; but two ſhipps of them lying at a haven further diſtant from hence then the reſt, took the opportunity of the wind before his majeſties command could come vnto them, and are gone for England. All putt together did not exceed the number of 500; and thoſe licenſed in theſe parts were betwixt 3 and 400, moſt of which take entertaynement vnder the Engliſh commaunders in ſervice of the States.

THE prince of Orange hath of late, for a good ſpace, bene confyned within doores by a long and languiſhing ſicknes; but is now well recovered, and abroade agayne.

I HAUE not heard from your lordſhip ſince your arriual at Conſtantinople; but haue written often, and ſhall continue according to occaſions, aſſuring my ſelf that when your letters begin once to rowle this way, they will in like manner holde on theyr courſe. So I wiſh your lordſhip all happines, reſting

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

THE originall of my laſt, of which the former is a copye, brought a poſtſcript inſerted iuſt at the ſealing, of another mutation and trouble heere; the ſoldiers mutining at the vizier, and procuring his change, ſetting vp in his roome my old enemy Huſſein baſſa. My laſt diſcourſe left then the duke of Sbarawsky in deſperation, the vizier hauing driuen him of, and hoped to weare him out; but being able noe longer to follow that reſolution publickly, was content with my mediation, and therevppon colourably concluded all difference, but with an intent to break agayne, by his owne plott with a Spahee, as your honor will remember. Now ſodainly depoſed, perhaps for that, though the ſoldiers were the inſtruments; this new vizier not only perſecutes and eates vp him, but, as yf there were noe other wiſedome but contrariety, runnes oppoſite to all his deſſignes. Thereby the Poliſh buſines is now called vppon, and in tenne dayes wholy concluded, according to the laſt articles agreed; and to morrow (yf noe alteration interrupt it) the duke takes his leaue, and receaues the emperours ſeale for confirmation of the peace, to the great ioy of the ambaſſador, and his trayne; who therby take themſelves deliuered from captiuity. The three great and noble priſoners are ſett free, and will make a publick acknowledgment of his majeſtyes fauour, to whome both the ambaſſadour and they attribute the beſt part of theyr good ſucceſſe. And I may now with modeſty aſſume, not only to haue finiſhed that buſineſſe, but obliged the ſtate of Poland to his majeſtyes ſeruice. I will leaue theyr profeſſion to themſelues, which they will ſolemnly make vppon theyr returne. Theſe horſe-leeches haue ſoe ſucked them all, that I am afrayd my curteſy is not at an end; but that I muſt ſupply them and the duke with money, which yf I refuſe, I leaue them in extremity, and in feare of another change; for the next vizier may recant all, while they are in theyr power: but I hope I ſhall doe it ſafely, and my nature will not ſuffer mee to ſee them want: they haue ſuffered enough already.

I MENTIONED in my laſt an Nuuatenrec arriued from 102. There is come in his company a Nunutrcenunsurtu and a Nauenunrnucanenununr nauecatuue, that hath bene cenauetutu censurtune in the like uutenecanrtune employed. Hee keepes himſelf in Netunutenrnunt nanuuucace, except among thoſe of his owne coate. Hee hath brought hither nenrnutetune and other truetunetunrcene in name from the uauenunrcu cutenunutunene, mother of 202, and hath inſtructions to treate ſomewhat ſecretly: hee pretends ſome ouerture of a commerce betweene that ſtate and this port; but wee know that the foundation of the cruecutuue of nenrce necetutrnanrer will, nor can admitt it; therefore that, wee are aſſured, is a colour. The 179 and 180 are very ielous, that hee treates a peace for 88. The vizier told mee, That an offer was made priuatly; but named not the inſtruments. I am ſure I know as much thereof as any, and can as yet aſſure nothing but this; hee hath buſines to treate, and bringes not truetunetunrcens, for noe end: my opinion is, That hee is ſent from Nrnutrnrtuns, and paſſed by 210, and mett 183 vppon the way. His negotiation is for 102, yf it goe noe further; and that 88 haue noe intereſt therein. Yf they who vpbrayd all others for any correſpondence with 151, doe now ſecretly practiſe worſe matters, wee are well requited for our charity and care of them. I will yett affirme nothing, though I haue great ſuſpition; but will ſoe attend his wayes, that yf I diſcouer him, as I will ſpeedily informe his majeſtye, ſoe I will requite him heere, while I haue opportunity.

PETENDIUS, mentioned in my laſt letter, ſeruant to 119, and by him employed into 213, and returned from thence with anſwer from 50, is heere arriued poſt; and brought mee a letter from his maſter, ſoliciting mee to ſome aſſiſtance. I haue ſeene the copye of the letters of 50 ſent to him, and aſſurance therein, that his majeſtye would vndertake the warre; but I haue refuſed to giue any anſwer, eyther by writing, or by mouing, vntill I haue order. In the meane time, hee hath ſoe many agents heere, that I am confident they will procure licence; which is now all they ſeek, to trouble 116.

THE buſines of Tunis and Algier hath taken vp all my time this weeke, and I enforced to anſwer to all theyr clamourous obiections. By the laſt, I ſent to the lords as much as was then done, whereof now I ſend a coppy; but becauſe wee are yett in agitation, I haue forborne to mention it; only I deſire your honor to enforme his majeſtye and theyr lordſhips, that I ſhall make an honorable and ſafe end thereof, vppon ſuch grounds as, I hope, may ſecure the marchant in the ſeas from them, and ſett free all the captiues in both thoſe places. Thus farre wee are come; but becauſe the writing is not yett ſealed, and deliuered by the commiſſioners, 1622. though agreed vnto, I will not aſſure any thing, where euery day breedes ſome change, and wee howrely expect the greateſt that can bee in this empire. Heerein I beſeech your honor to bee a ſutor for mee to his majeſtye, and his councell, that ſome order may bee ſpeedily taken to pay mee my expence, which, in the end, wilbee neere 1000 l. eyther by a contribution from all the companies and marchants intereſſed in theſe and the ſotherne trades and fiſhings, or els by an allowance from the collectours of the one per centum, raiſed only for this occaſion. I am confident to finiſh it to your honors and the marchants content: but yf they leaue it vppon mee, that pay 18 per cent. for the money diſburſed, it will vndoe mee.

SOE ſoone as I ſee the duke of Sbarawſky two dayes gone, I will begin to giue his majeſtye and your honor a larger reaſon of all theſe; beſeeching you to bee my excuſe, and to continue my ſuerty, that noe aſperſion or calumnye take impreſſion, vntill I giue mine owne account, as his majeſtyes faithfull ſubiect, and

My very good Lord,

I ADVERTISED your lordſhip by the laſt ordinary, on Munday laſt, of all which was at that tyme worth the knowledge in theſe parts. That very day a notable treaſon againſt the perſon of the prince of Orange was happily diſcovered after this manner. The prince being then at Riſewick, (his accuſtomed place of recreation, to ſee his breede of horſes) two meane perſons, matroſſes, as they call them here, ſeafaring men, deſired to ſpeake with him: which he refuſing, as not willing there to be troubled, they ſtayd notwithſtanding, till he tooke his coche to returne; and then preſſing forward with importunity, they delivered him a writing, which contayned, That they two, with two other theyr companions they left at their lodging here at the Hagh, were hyred with good ſummes of money payd them downe in gold, to doe a peece of ſervice for the good of the countrey; and yf this ſervice were knowne to his excellency, they deſired to receave his commandements; yf it were not knowne, they doubted the intention, and therfore thought fitt to acquaint his excellency with it. Thervpon one of them pulled out of his pockett a handfull of gold, which he ſhewed his excellency, to confirme theyr information. His excellency returning immediatly to this place, cauſed garde to be ſett vpon theſe two men, with theyr two fellowes, who were found at theyr inne; and they conducting theyr garde, with the fiſcall, to another inne, where the partye was who delivered them theyr moneyes, (a certayne joyner of Rotterdam) he was there apprehended, with three more in his company, all ſeafaring men; and a cheſt was there found, by diſcovery of the other fower, wherin were ſome piſtolls, and long daggers; and in the bedſtrawe, where theſe men lay, were hidden certayne poignards: which being ſhewed them, and they asked to what purpoſe they had thoſe armes, they agreed all in one tale, That they had a deſſigne to have broken vp a priſon at Harlem, wherin lye two Arminian preachers, Popius and Born, and to have ſett them at liberty: to which they pretended all to be perſuaded by one Berkle, late ſecretary of Blaſwick, from which place he was deported in the late generall reformation, and hath ever ſince lived at Roterdam. This Berkle was mett going out of that inne as the fiſcall entred, who ſpake with him, he being of his acquaintance, but lett him goe vnarreſted; and he is ſince eſcaped, for which the fiſcall is much blamed. Since theſe mens apprehenſion, they having bene more ſtrictly examined, and the chiefe of them ſhewed the torture, they confeſſe this delivery of the Arminian preachers to be onely a pretence agreed amongſt them, in caſe theyr plott ſhould be diſcovered; which was, to have aſſayled the prince of Orange, and murdered him in his coche in his uſuall walke betwixt this and Riſewick; for which, beſides this money already diſtributed, which was to the valew of 300 florins a man: larger ſummes were promiſed, with aſſurance of maintenance for theyr wives and children that ſhould miſcarry in the attempt, which ſhould have bene exploicted by theſe eight here taken, (of which fower onely knew the whole matter) the ſecretary Berkle, who is fled, and eight more were to come from Leyden. The chiefe contriver of this treaſon, and he that undertooke to give the blow to his excellency, whilſt the other ſhould have ſtayed his coche, and aſſayled thoſe about him, was one Slatius, an Arminian baniſhed preacher, who hath lived cloſely ſince his baniſhment at Rotterdam, and hath drawne into it Barnevelts two ſonnes, Grondeuil and Craningpolder, (both which are fled away from hence vpon this diſcovery); and Vandermyle, Barneuelts ſonne in lawe, is brought hether priſoner from Beuerwick, (a place betwixt Alkmar and Harlem, where he was confyned) accuſed to be acquainted therwith by Slatius, who was lately with him at Beuerwick, in his way from Amſterdam. Proclamation is made for the apprehenſion of Slatius, with Geſteranus and Velſius, (two Arminian miniſters likewiſe) accuſed to be of the conſpiracye; and Berkle, vnder another name he goeth by, Adrian Vandyke, with 4000 florins vpon every one of theyr heads; 600 being promiſed to the diſcoverer of any one of the eight Leyden men, or other complices, and impunity to ſuch as willingly appeare. One Siluius, a doctour of law, and late profeſſour of Leyden, is priſoner upon this occaſion, by whoſe hand ſome of the moneyes were likewiſe diſtributed. Theyr purpoſe was, having done theyr exploict, to have eſcaped, by benefitt of the froſt, over the yce, through the mariſh grounds, towards Tergow; which had bene no hard matter, eyther for the execution, (his excellency going alwayes vnaccompanyed, ſave onely with ſuch as he hath in his coche, and one page on horſeback) or the eſcape, by meanes of their ſwift ſlyding vpon the yce, vnder much covert, which is the nature of that drowned land. The ſummes of money delivered to theſe men, as pretium ſanguinis, in all to the valew of 5000 florins, and the ſeaſon of the yeare ſo proper for invaſion by meanes of the froſt, makes it ſuſpected the ennemy had a hand in this treaſon, but as yet appeares no further evidence then ſuſpition onely: howſoever, they would have reaped the fruict thereof by the death of this worthy prince, whome God doth vndoubtedly protect; he having within theſe few days eſcaped two great dangers, this of treaſon, and another of ſicknes, wherewith, notwithſtanding, he is much broken.

THE treatie in England, touching our Eaſt Indian differences with this ſtate, is ended, after thirteene months diſpute, to the mutual contentment of the commiſſioners on both ſides; though our marchants complaine, as being looſers vppon the whole bargaine. This night the returne of the States ambaſſadors is expected; and I reſt

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My verygood Lord,

I CONCEAVE your lordſhip wilbe deſirous to vnderſtand the proceedings here with the conſpirators againſt the prince of Orange, of whoſe treaſon, and the diſcovery thereof, I advertiſed your lordſhip at large the 13th of the laſt; and therfore would not fayle to advertiſe your lordſhip what is ſince hapned in that ſubject, though here be little elſe worth the writing.

THE 20th of the laſt, ſtylo novo, Grondeuille (Barneuelts eldeſt ſonne) was brought priſoner to this towne; who was followed from Scheueling, (a village a myle diſtant from hence, where he was diſcovered to haue bene) from place to place by the ſea-ſide, till he was taken in one of the iſlands by Texel, the 18th late at night, ſome few howers before he ſhould have ſhipt himſelf for Bremen; for which he had a ſhip prepared, and onely attended the tyde. Since, an other of the proclamed men, Dauid Coorenwinder, ſecretary of Berkel, hath bene brought in, being taken at Ouerſchee, betweene Delph and Roterdam, in a boors houſe, where he had layne cloſe ſome dayes; and they are both with the reſt of the priſoners in the common jayle. Vpon promiſe of impunity made to any participants in this treaſon, that ſhall diſcloſe more thereof then is yet knowne, many of the Arminian faction doe ſecretly preſent themſelues; and by ſome of them is diſcovered, that Vorſtius, who for more then theſe two yeares ſpace hath bene eſteemed to be dead in a village, to which he was retired, neare Hamburgh, hath bene all the laſt ſummer in Vtrecht;

1622. and the like report being made about 3 monthes ſince, of Vtenbogard to be dead at Rouen, here is information, That he was about that tyme ſeene in this towne: ſo as thoſe two men are generally ſuſpected; but I know not how far accuſed, to be chiefe inſtruments in this conſpiracy.

HERE they have already begun with executions of ſome of the conſpiratours, of which 4 were beheadded, and one of them quartered on Munday laſt here, in the common place of execution; which was the carpenter of Roterdam, brother in law to Slatius; and the three matroſſes taken with him in this towne, by the diſcovery of the firſt fower, which revealed the matter to his excellency: they were all men of limmes and countenance fitt for ſuch a ſervice, and having their ſwords and poiniards, which were expreſly prepared for the exploict, broken before theyr faces, dyed ſtoutly and quietly without commotion of the people, notwithſtanding that there were no more then the ordinary gards, which attend common executions. Within an hower after their execution were brought in two more of the proclamed men, (the Blanceerts of Leyden, of which one is a miniſter, by orders ſent him in writing from Vtenbogard ſince his baniſhment) and one Pertye, who fled with them, and were all taken together at Embden vpon the guilt which was there diſcovered in theyr countenance, when the proclamation was there publiſhed againſt them. It was thought that, on Friday laſt the two ſecretaryes, Vandycke and Coorenwinder, ſhould have dyed (one of which hath freely, and the other vpon torture, confeſſed the whole matter); but theyr execution was deferred, to confront them with Grondeuille, who ſtands vpon his innocency; but is accuſed (though he was not to have bene preſent at the exploict, nor is not altogether ſo culpable as his yonger brother) of theſe three points: 1. That the money with which theſe aſſaſins were hyred was, for the moſt part, borrowed vpon his creditt. 2. That he and his brother had ſpoken, in this towne, to certayne chiefe perſons, whome they knew to be diſcontented for being putt out of theyr offices, to be ready, when the blow was given, to putt the people into commotion. 3. That he reſolved ioinctly with his brother, to rayſe the boores and fiſhers in the Venes (which is the drowned land here adioyning) to enter this towne, which lyes open on all ſides, and aſſiſt them in theyr enterpriſe for a new alteration of the ſtate. Vandermyle is ſtill in reſtraint, but not in the common priſon, there being no more layd vnto his charge, then ſpeach with Slatius at Beuerwick; which he freely confeſſeth, but ſayth, It tended to no other effect then that miniſters expreſſing of diſcontentment in generall termes, for the overthrow of theyr cauſe and fortunes. It appeares by the ſentences of the fower which are executed, that Slatius was the chiefe inſtrument of practiſing thoſe 8 of Roterdam. The 8 of Leyden are now all taken, by the accuſation of one of the complices, vpon promiſe of impunity.

THE laſt letters from Embden ſay, That Mansfelts army is in little better ſtate then in a generall mutiny, the ſoldiers refuſing obedience vnto him, (who keepes himſelf cloſe in Stichuyſen) and ſpoyling all the Embdenners lands neare that towne, which hetherto haue bene ſpared; ſo as now thoſe burghers crye out and complayne more then the count of Eaſtfrizeland, who hath ſtill a gard vpon him by Mansfelts men at Ezes. But here is a ſpeach, that Mansfelt hath a mind to match himſelf with one of that counts daughters, who is there preſent with her father; and it is the rather believed, becauſe of this proceeding againſt the Embdenners; wherwith theyr count, conſidering all that is paſt, cannot be diſpleaſed. The duke of Brunſwick, in the meane tyme, doth poſſeſſe himſelf of paſſages vpon the Weſer, where he hath taken a towne called Rentelen, in the countye of Schomburgh; which gives him free entrance into the biſhoprick of Heyldiſheym, and there he lodgeth his men in ſuch lands as belong to the biſhop of Collen, ſparing the reſt, which belong to the duke his brother. In the taking of Rentelen, a count Rhyngraue was hurt; ſo was coronel Knyphauſen; but neyther of them with danger of lyfe.

IT is advertiſed hether, from Hamburgh, That the king of Denmarke is come thether with a ſmall trayne, with purpoſe to goe from thence to Bremen, to inſtalle his ſecond ſonne into that biſhoprick; in the tranſaction whereof the preſent biſhops conſent is haſtened by feare of the armyes, with which on all ſides that biſhoprick is environed.

THE States of Holland are newly aſſembled, chiefly about buſines of finances. The 17 directours of the Eaſt Indian company are now mett in this towne, about accompliſhment of their conditions with our men reſolved of in this laſt treaty.

A FLEETE of 9 ſhipps ſetting out the laſt yeare, and layd aſide for this winter, is now in hand agayne at Goré, where they were vnladen vpon the alarum of the Spaniſh armada. They have the ſame admirall as before, and the ſame equippage; but the deſſigne is ſtill kept ſecret; onely, by proportion of theyr victuall, and choiſe of theyr ſeamen, it is plainly ſeene they are bound for the Weſt Indyes.

I HAVE not yet had the happines of hearing from your lordſhip ſince your ſettling in that charge; but when you are once in a trayne of writing, I make no doubt but your lordſhip will doe as I have done vpon all occaſions, and will not fayle to continue: ſo I committ your lordſhip to Gods bleſſed protection.

May it pleaſe your Grace,

SINCE my laſt letters of September paſt, a grieuous and long ſickneſs hath enforced mee to an vnwilling ſilence; my excuſe hauing bene ſo painful and iuſt, I hope your grace will nott expect another. Betweene theſe dates, ſo many affaires and changes haue filled vpp the tyme, that I cannott look back at ſoe great a diſtance, but as vpon an vnlimitted proſpect at uncerteynty. Some things of moſt eminency I will remember, that your grace may viewe the generalityes; and your wiſedome, by thoſe arch-lynes, will conceiue more then I can expreſſe.

THE ſtate of this empire continues labouring vnder the diſeaſe of mutiny, the ſoldiours remouing all officers, and vſurping to themſelues whateuer they pleaſe; they haue latly made twoe viziers, who at their firſt comming exact and proſcribe, as in the factions of Scylla and Marius, all their enemyes; and tell their frends they muſt fine alſo, to prouide newe donatiues, to maynteyne them in their honor. I haue ſeene now 6 in nine moneths, and doe daily expect another, when the preſent is fitt for the ſtall. They ſpeake the ſame of the king, and wee cannott hope that hee will laſt, butt becauſe hee cannott gouerne. So there is none that is intereſſed in the ſtate, that will aduenture a reformation.

IN Aſia are 3 open rebellions, one at Arzerum, another in Meſopotamia, the laſt and moſt dangerous at Babilon; becauſe an emir, or pretending prince, hath diſmiſſed the baſſa and his ſoldiours with ſcorne and bloud. Here they dare not talke of it, becauſe they knowe not how to amend it: to ſend an army, they are not ſure that the ſoldiour will obey in the field, that is rebelled in the citty, gnari, civilibus bellis plùs militibus quàm ducibus licère; reſoluing rather to diſſemble yt, then to take any courſe of puniſhment, which may blowe the fire the greater; butt hope to accommodate it by faire meanes; which I doe not beleeue, becauſe imperium cupientibus, nihil medium, inter ſumma, aut præcipitia.

WITH Poland the peace is at laſt concluded, and the duke of Zbarawsky departed as content as from a captiuity; for 12 weekes hee was here deteyned with falſhood. Butt becauſe I intend to make a large diſcourſe of that buſineſs for the variety, I will not trouble your grace with any other circumſtance then the concluſion; which was huddled vpp by a new vizier, rather in contrariety to the old, then vppon any ground. There is no article of conſequence but the generality of frend to frend, and enemy to enemy; by which the Turks hope to ſecure Bethlem Gabor from any interruption, and the emperour from any ayd from that kingdome. The mediation of this peace was referred to mee, and the honor, I hope, wilbee acknowledged to his majeſtie.

FROM Tranſiluania, ſince the firſt, are come other ambaſſadours, and ſince them a meſſenger; all to ſollicite ſome ayd, at leaſt, licence for the recouery of Hungary. That prince will not giue ouer his pretenſions; and the Turks, though they will not openly breake with the emperour, will maynteyne him in the quarrell alla Eſpagniola. They pretend that the king of Bohemia will retorne, and all thoſe prouinces reuolt. They haue ſo filled the eares of this ſtate with hopes of keeping the houſe 1622. of Auſtria in action, and recouering ſomwhat from them, that they haue procured letters to the king of Bohemia, to encourage him; and, with conſent of the Holland ambaſſador, to that ſtate: the contents yett I know not, butt I ſhall in few dayes gett the copy. My opinion is, that they only haue procured theſe to inſinuate an aſſiſtance and league from them, that therby they may more eaſily gett ſuccours here; butt whether they will ſend them, or no, as yett I doubt. I haue bene called to ſay ſomwhat in his majeſties name, but I durſt not; butt rather haue done good offices to thoſe, who (as I feare) will not deſerue it. If it had bene lawfull to haue repaid the treaty of Bruxells with the like, I could haue turned the ſcales: butt ſeeing in ſixe moneths I haue had no aduiſe, I haue kept myſelfe ſtrictly to my orders: here might haue bene wrought a braue diuerſion, without diſhonor, if his majeſtie had affected it. Theſe ambaſſadours haue ſo farre at laſt preuailed, as a generall is named with 20000 Turks to aſſiſt Gabor; and the baſſa of Boſna in chiefe; vnder him the Baſſaes of Buda, Caniſia and Temiſuar, to bee in readineſs with their forces on the border, to ſerue occaſion. The vizier proteſted to mee, That they would not enter into the emperours hereditary dominions; but I feare they watch opportunity to doe more then they pretend, though theſe miniſters of Tranſiluania make all chriſtian apologies and proteſtations; and I doubt not but good vſe might be made of this action, without endangering one foot of ground to the enemy. As yett they cannott gett their perſonall diſpatch, though the order for this ayd bee gone before them. The count of Torne will runne that fortune, becauſe he can find no better; otherwiſe, as he withdrawes to meddle in the negotiation, ſo I think hee is weary of that ſeruice, where he ſhall make but a Tartarian warre, and gett no fortune. I ſhall be larger the next poſt, when I ſhall haue tyme and certenty to write to his majeſtie.

THE emperour hath ſent a currier to counterwork with letters, and promiſſes of an ambaſſador, deſiring to reſpitt all reſolution vntill his arriuall about Eaſter. Mee thinks hee ſhould make more haſt, if hee hoped not in their old plott, to wynne tyme. Here is ſecretly arriued a fryar, with preſents from the dutcheſs-mother of Florence: he pretends releaſe of ſlaues, and trade for that ſtate; butt that couering is a figg-leafe; wee ſuſpect a beginning of a worſe treaty, ſuch as hath formerly come from Naples. I dare not yett bee too bold in ſuſpitions, but will attend it warily.

I THOUGHT not to haue drawne your grace into this length; but the matter is ſo abundant, that it confuſeth mee: my purpoſe only was, to enforme you of the jeſuiticall conſtancy, that, whereſoeuer they liue, they muſt, like themſelues, (for no minerall is ſo buſy and ſubtill) bee working ſubuerſion.

THE preſent patriarch, a man ſober, learned, peacefull, not hauing ſought their, nor their patrons familiarity, and in profeſſion of his religion oppoſite, hath ſo farre offended their greatneſs, that beeing but ſeauen, they plotted with a Greeke biſhopp, countenanced by the F. A. to remoue him from his ſea, and to aduance that other their proſelite to his dignity; who ſhould by litle and litle ſowe the Romiſh doctrine, and priuatly ſubſcribe the popes vniuerſality, and in tyme ſubiect the Eaſterne church wholy to his holyneſs. This diſcouered, the patriarch came to mee for counſell and aſſiſtance, which I could not deny him; beſides the vniuſtice of the act, I forſawe it would bee very dangerous for vs to ſuffer that faction to be ſtrengthened with a patriarch; and for the generall, though this bee remote, to ſee that religion gett more diſciples. I ſhowed him how eaſy it were to roote out them that would roote out him; for if the vizier ſhould know, that they crept hither to make any alteration in that church, in liberty vnder them, and to ſteale away, as it were, ſo many ſubiects, to add to the popes monarchy, I am aſſured, as not long ſince they were baniſhed, now they would be whippt away: butt this courſe, for reuerence to the chriſtian name, and for ſome reſpect to one of them, I was not willing to aduance, before admonition. The reuerend good man, in all myldneſs, then reſolued, on the firſt Sunday of Lent, to make a publique ſermon, and to call all the clergy and beſt members of his church, and there to open this honeſt plott, without naming the Jeſuits, as not within his juriſdiction; but to excommunicate and depriue the biſhopp: which he hath, the laſt Sunday, very ſolemnly performed, in his miter and pontificalibus, aſſiſted with 4 archbiſhopps, and all his presbitry. In his lerned ſermon hee gaue modeſt exhortations, and comming to the act of excommunication, hee denounced it againſt him and certeyne other organs and inſtruments, anathematiſing them, and all that ſhould aſſociate or communicate with them. Thus as yett all is quieted; but how my fiery maſters take this bold and ſecrett blowe, I yett know nott: if they proceed, hee will make a proteſt againſt them publiquely, and ſett forth their practize and doctrine, and perhapps, in playne termes, excommunicat them; which may breed ſome buſineſs. If theſe ſpirituall weapons preuaile not, wee are reſolued they ſhall not triumph ouer him.

I BESEECH your grace, vouchſafe mee ſome of your counſell in all theſe: I walk in blyndneſs, without any rule butt myne owne diſcretion, which by too much zeale may erre errore amoris.

YOUR grace, I doubt not, by my generall letters to the lords, hath heard that I haue endeauored a peace with Tunis and Algier, as ſubiects to this port. I am confident to make it perfect by the next poſt, vpon conditions honorable, if there be any honor to haue trade here: neceſſity is now the beſt defence. In this peace I ſhall free 800 ſlaues, but by redemption of ſome fewe Turks ſold by ours; which charitable work, I knowe, your grace will advance by ſome way, if not by that which I was bold to propound formerly, and now would bee of excellent vſe; of which I daily expect your graces aſſiſtance and opinion; and, in concluſion, that you will ſtill affoord mee your wonted fauour, as

To the QUEEN of BOHEMIA.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

INTO what hopes and feares the treaties for your Majeſtie hath putt mee, and the long expectance of ſome good newes, my laſt, of the 25th of January, haue, I hope, enformed you. What might haue bene done from hence, I am loath to mention, ſeeing no vſe hath bene made of it: and now, hauing receiued your Majeſties letter of December, I am equally amazed with wonder and griefe. All that I can doe, is, to pray to that mercifull God, who will doe more for your Majeſtie, when you are at the loweſt, then the arme of man is able to doe: then is his tyme to ſhew himſelfe a God, and to reiect Gedeons 30000, and with three hundred to effect his owne counſailes. I haue, under this beleefe, an aſſured confidence in his majeſtie, both as a father, and the wiſeſt of kings: I am perſwaded he giues place to the tymes, not to the cauſe; there is ſomwhat for him to doe, which wee inferior creatures ſhall enioy and admire, though wee are not worthy to foreknow the counſell.

Moſt excellent Lady, be your owne queene; baniſh all deſpaires and feares: be aſſured, the cauſe in which you ſuffer, cannot periſh: if God had not planted it, it had long ſince bene rooted out. Vouchſafe to remember the motto of our laſt eternally glorious Elizabeth; This is done of the Lord, and it is wonderful in our eyes: ſo ſhall the day of your retorne bee, to thoſe honors, which you, aboue all princes, meritt.

I HAUE heard of the ſucceſs of the treaties, though very late; and yet I heare thoſe hopes are renewed. I haue no further liberty, though I haue written largely, if nott too boldly, of all the aduantages might bee made from hence.

THE count of Torne is yett here, as weary as of a gaile: I ſhall not need to write you the ſucceſs of the negotiations of the miniſters of the prince of Tranſiluania, ſeeing from him your Majeſtie will haue moſt particular information, and there bee ſome things vnfitt for mee to know; as there is an ouer-buſy knowledge, ſo there is a diſcreet ignorance. Thus much only as publique; if it may bee any comfort to you, I will not omitt, That Bethlem Gabor will not leaue his pretence, and your Majeſties enemies, to enioy their tryumph; hee pretends this only to doe you ſeruice, otherwiſe hee might liue in peace; hee hath procured ſome ayd, not to make a breach with (   ), but vnder couler of aſſiſting Hungary, as in league with the port, to repay them in their owne mettall. The count of Torne is reſolued to runne the fortune of this warre. I dare ſay no more; but if his majeſtie would not be offended, much more might bee done; but ſo great is the ſyncerity 1622. of his chriſtian heart, and the care of his roiall honor, that hee will not vſe ſcorpions to heale with. I beſeech Almighty God ripen and direct his councells to his glory, and the benefitt of your Majeſtie, in whoſe ſuffering all honeſt men are tortured. How ſoone this attempt will bee begunne, I cannott ſay; for this court is ſick of miſgouerment, and nothing is done but for lucre, and according to the humour of the viziers, of which I haue ſeene 6 in 9 moneths, and this the worſt; for though he be content with the action, yett he deferres the diſpatch, and courſely handleth the ambaſſadours.

I WOULD faine leaue this ſceane, and change to a merrier; and am extreamely gladd that your Majeſtie can yett think of the golartiſme of our emperour: now he is fallen ſo lowe, that all my relations of him will ſmell; there is no more hope of his wiſdome, it is now enough to keepe him cleanely: but becauſe my letters ſhall not leaue your Majeſtie melancholy, you ſhall heare the ſtory of the entry of the Dutch lady ſent hither.

BUT before I mention ſuch things, I humbly beſeech your Majeſtie to accept my thanks for the greateſt jewells and honors I poſſeſs, in yours and his Majeſties pictures, which all nations haue come to ſee. Among others, the emperours agent beeing with mee, I forced the ſight vpon him: when he had well beheld them, hee asked mee, Whoſe they were? I replyed, The king and queene of Bohemia; and are not theſe worthy to haue a kingdome? Hee anſwered mee, Par que nom? and ſo roſe and departed, as if hee had broken a tooth. I will not flatter your Majeſtie; your picture here doth conquer hearts; and I am infinitly ſatisfied, that no aduerſity hath power to baniſh thoſe ſmiles which yet ſmile vpon vs; euery day wee honor them; they make my houſe a court, and my chamber a preſence.

TO retorne to our hiſtory: The Dutch ambaſſadors lady, which ſhalbee, when hee may eat fleſh, for yett it is Lent, beeing arriued within 2 miles of this citty, hee ſuffered her not to come priuatly, which her diſcretion did affect; butt firſt ſent her two ſlaues, that had often kept him warm, damoſeills about the age of 16; which the good woman was ſorry to receiue as her firſt preſent. The next day he procured a Turks gally, with all their barbarous muſicque; and ſo brought her, not the next way, in tryumph through Perſepolis, butt about, by the face of the whole citty, thence 4 miles about, accompanied with ſome Francks, and 1000 Greeks, merry Greeks indeed! Att his dore hee made an arch, with leaues of paper and copper, ſo vpp the ſtayers; the hall carpetted with cloth of gold, the houſe ſett all about with garlands, like a pageant; briefly, my lady maioreſs, at the ſpittle, neuer made ſuch a ſhowe. Hee hath prouided jewells for euery member, diamonds like pibbles, pearles like St. Martins ware. The mariage is not yett ſolempnized for want of a chapleyne, which myne may haue the honor to ſupply; ſo as yet one houſe hath Hero and Leander; the ſea is only a great hall that devides them. The lady, as I heare, is as modeſt, as the lord is vayne. The l'enuoy is, he hath made a rumour, that gott her nothing but curſes of Turks, and an enquyry of the Chriſtians, what princes daughter ſhee was, and no man could tell. Wee are here good frends, and though I partake to your Majeſtie our houſhold mirth, you will vſe it ſoe, that it ſhall not hinder the reſt wee expect here. I conclude; the loue betwene them is like a ſtory in Amadis: I wiſh there may be no Gall in the end. Now I haue leaſure againe, to pray for your Majeſtie; alas! I can doe litle elſe; but that ſo feruently, that I hope fire will come downe from heauen to conſume your enemyes: ſoe prayeth

20 March, 1622. Your Majeſties moſt humbly deuoted.

My poore wife weepes at your Majeſties letter, and proteſts her teares ſhall ſerue for weapons: if both of vs could dye for your Majeſties aduantage, it would be an eternall life of fame.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON: Giving Sir THOMAS, at Coſtantinople, an Account of the Tranſactions in Chriſtendom.

My very good Lord,

I SHALL begin this letter with that I conceave your lordſhip knoweth already from ſome other hand; yet I had rather give your lordſhip that trouble, then leave any thing vnadvertiſed.

HERE have bene certaine agents, long expected out of France, to treate with count Mansfelt, who arrived here the 12th of this preſent, and went towards the count the day following; one of them being Montero, cornet to the duke of the Neuers, who was employed by that duke to treate with Mansfelt the laſt ſummer, when he lay with his army neare Mouſſon in the frontiers of France; the other is de Beauſſe, a gentleman belonging to the duke of Sauoy, in whome that prince hath much confidence, a man formerly acquainted with Mansfelt. They were accompanyed with Tournon, who had fetcht a new poſting iorney into France, employed thether by Mansfelt: and they have commiſſion (as they here gave out) ioinctly to treate with Mansfelt to take him and his army into the ſervice of the league, for the recovery of the Valtoline; but vpon what conditions, they did not diſcover here in theyr paſſage: and though they pretended to have abſolute power to conclude with Mansfelt, I have reaſon to believe they goe onely to hold him in devotion, till it be ſeene whether that warre of the league goe on or not; for ſure I am they cary him no money, which is the onely engagement on both ſides; and his army is in that diſcontent for want of pay, that it will hardly be entertayned by fair words.

THE Embdenners have drawne vp theyr ſluces, and therby drowned the whole countrey of Eaſt-frizeland as high as Aureck, wherby to ſave theyr poſſeſſions, which lye, for the moſt part, in a higher land betwixt theyr towne and Griet, from the ſpoyle of Mansfelts cavalry, which wilbe forced to ſeeke new paſture; and having the ennemy ſo neare at hand maſter of all Munſterland, will have no place to retire into but frends countreyes; which makes all arme againſt him, as againſt a common ennemy; the princes of the Neyther Saxes countreys having declared theyr intention to ſtand vpon theyr garde; and the elector of Brandenburgh newly returned from Dreſden, putting his whole countrey into armes, to reſiſt the paſſage of that army, which he apprehends it will take that way into Sileſia.

WEE vnderſtand from Ratisbone, that the emperor, notwithſtanding the direct oppoſition of the ambaſſadors of the temporall electors, and the perſwaſion of the eccleſiaſtiques, to delay the tranſlation of the Palatine electorat, went through with that worke the $\frac{15}{25}$ of February, and, with much ſolemnity, conferred that dignity vpon the duke of Bauier: which being foreſeene by the two electors, Saxe and Brandenburgh, when they were together at Dreſden, they expreſt, inter pocula, much diſcontentment, determining not to aſſiſt after that tranſlation ſhould ſucceede in the electorall colledge, and threatning ſomtymes to joyne with Mansfelt, but without reſolution or concluſion: ſo as Tilly being now vpon his march towards Weſtphalia, (for which the laſt letters from Franckford ſay he had there provided horſe for his canon, and demanded paſſage of the landgrave of Heſſen through his countrey) and the emperor leavying men in all parts for the increaſe of his army, though they ſhould hereafter bethincke themſelves better of the neceſſity of their affaires, there wilbe no reſource for them; vnles the king of Denmarke, who is now hovering about Hamburgh, to ſettle his ſonne in the biſhoprick of Bremen, ſeeing the common danger, ſhould make himſelf head of a party; which is not to be promiſed of a prince ſo cautious in his proceedings, though he hath of late dayes ſent and written curteouſly to Mansfelt, and preſented him with a faire jewell of diamonds, and helped forward a treaty concluded with the duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick, for a tranſmiſſion of his troopes into his elder brothers charge and pay; which are arguments of ſome matter of moment he hath in haud.

MANSFELT hath converted his making love to the count of Eaſt-frizelands daughter into counſell to the father, whome he wiſheth to putt himſelf and his countrey into the protection of the king of Denmarke; of which kings proceedings I find the States are jealous, who believe his drawing dependence upon him, is onely for the pur-

1623. ſuite of his privat pretentions, without any publique ends; and that he will give way to any deſſigne of the houſe of Auſtria, ſo they touch not vpon him or his.

THE drummes doe now beate in this towne, as in the reſt of Holland, to take vp men for the States fleete, I have formerly advertiſed your lordſhip, is now ſetting out hereby, at Goré.

THEY haue here an unwelcome newes of the fayling of a voyage of theſe countrey ſhipps, to the number of 60 ſayle made lately, as they vſually have done of late yeares, to Porto del Rey in the Weſt Indyes, to fetch ſalt; many of which are returned empty, in regard they found forts caſt vp by the Spaniards with artillery planted vpon theyr places of landing and lading; but 35 ſayle, which were all that had ordinance in them, (the reſt belonging to the Anabaptiſts of Northolland, being, as theyr vſe is, vnarmed) remayne in thoſe ſeas vpon adventure to repaire the loſſe of theyr voyage.

HERE is a whiſpering of ſome ſecret handling, about renewing the truce betwixt the Spaniards and the States; which is ſayd to be conducted by the baron of Groiſbeck, who was lately here for the affaires of the biſhop of Collen, and being returned to Liege, went immediately from thence to Bruxells, where he writes hether to the agent of Collen, he will make no long ſtay without returning to this place; but withall adds, there is no apparence that the truce can be renewed upon the wonted termes, without ſome alterations for the Spaniards contentment; but it is apparent in three great buſineſſes now on foote, that is, the reſtitution of the Palatinat and the Valtoline, and the truce of theſe countreyes, the houſe of Auſtria having peace and warre in theyr hands, playes vpon the advantage; and the iſſue is like to be, (as wee ſee by the actuall tranſpoſing of the electorat) that the weakeſt muſt goe to the wall, and the beſt armed wilbe leaſt harmed. Theſe men therfore, doubting of the ſucceſſe, vſe all poſſible meanes of rayſing money for theyr army, which was never ſo ill payd, in opinion, that yf the buſineſs of the Valtolina (which already they heare is like to be putt in depoſito into the hands of the pope) be no better ſuſtayned then that of the palatinat, they ſhall have, before this next ſummer ends, the whole force of the king of Spayne, the emperour, and catholique league, vpon their backs.

THEY are putt in hope out of France, by their ambaſſadour Langrac, of an ayd of 400 thouſand crownes by way of payment of arrerages for the entertaynement of theſe French troopes; but withall he advertiſeth the conſtables loſſe of creditt and authority with that king, on which they chiefly relyed. They are here in diſcourſe of ſending an extraordinary ambaſſage thether; but cannot agree about the perſons, in regard they will not employ Arminians; and their oppoſites are obnoxious in that court.

Slatius, the Arminian miniſter, one of the chiefe contrivers of the conſpiracy againſt the prince of Orange, was brought in priſoner hether, the 12th of this preſent, being taken in a ſmall village neare Coevoerden, the vtmoſt frontiers of Overyſſel; where being in the ordinary inne in the diſguiſe of a poore ſhipper, with a boy he had hyred for his guide, a ſmall partye of the States ſoldiers comming caſually into the ſame houſe, he tooke a fright, and departed ſodainly, leaving a pott full of drinck by the fire vntouched; which the ſoldiers ſeeing, being all Duch, ſuſpected immediatly, that no man would leave his drinck ſo ſlightly, vnleſs he had ſomewhat in his head extraordinary; and therfore purſued him as one of the ennemyes ſpyes, and brought him to Coevoerden, where by letters he wrote ſecretly to his wife and his ſiſter, widow to the joyner of Roterdam, who was here lately executed, he was diſcovered and conducted to this place; but would not confeſſe his name or condition, vntill, being here in priſon, he was confronted by ſome of his familiar acquaintance. The 16th, was likewiſe brought in a ſervant to Barnevelts yonger ſonne, who was taken in a bote on Cleueſide, neare to Skinckſconce, where he had landed his maſter in company of Vanderduſſen of Roterdam, who are both eſcaped to Goch in Cleueland, where the ennemy hath garriſon, but ran a great hazard in being ſearched for by the ſoldiers of Skinckſconce, in a ſmall houſe at the foote of a wind-mill, whilſt they were gott vp into the mill, and there remayned a whole day, till, having the miller for their guide, they gott to Goch by night. Thoſe two onely excepted, it is thought they have here all the principall of this conſpiracye in hold, with thoſe that are already executed; and they are none of them ſparing in their confeſſions, though at firſt ſome of them were ſilent, till they were brought to the torture; yet, to have cleare evidence, their execution is deferred, till all may be had out of them, which belongs to this buſines: in which, though they are all free in condemning themſelves, they are very cloſe in accuſing of others; which, according to the vſe of this countrey, cannot be wrong from them by torture.

I GOE on like a blinde man with your lordſhip, not yet ſeeing what becomes of my many letters; and ſo will continue in hope they come well to your handes: and when you are once in the way of writing hether, you will purſue it as conſtantly. Of our princes hazardous jorney with ſmall companie into Spain, I ſay nothing, knowing your lordſhip hath all our domeſtique affaires from the fountaine. So, with my beſt wiſhes, I reſt,

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON: Relating to the Executions in Holland of the Conſpirators againſt the Prince of Orange.

My very good Lord,

ON Wedneſday laſt, here was another execution in the publique place of juſtice, of three more of the conſpirators againſt the prince of Orange; the firſt of which was the heere van Grondeuelt, Barneuelts eldeſt ſonne, who much deceaved the world, in that being knowne to be meticuloſus, heard his ſentence pronounced, and tooke his death with good aſſurance, ſaying, That deſire of revenge, and ill counſell, had brought him to his end; which were all the words he vſed. He had the favour to haue his head and body buryed in the French church, and in the ſame vault with his father: the other two, ſecretaryes of Berkel and Bleyſwick, dyed boldly likewiſe, and vſed more ſpeach, both to the ſame effect, asking forgivenes of the people for the ruyne they had brought vpon them, yf their enterpriſe had taken effect, for which they confeſſed well to have deſerved death. They were both beheadded as the former, and after quartered, their heads and their right hands being ſett and hung vp on gibetts betwixt this and Riſewick, and the reſt of their limmes in the three chiefe auenues of this towne. This execution was garded by two companyes of ſoldiers more then the former, by reaſon of the multitude of people come to be ſpectators from all parts. The next weeke Slatius, the two Blancerts of Leyden, and Pertye, are like to goe the ſame way as the two ſecretaryes, for being chiefe perſons both in the conſpiracy, and for the execution; which will give me new ſubject of ſaluting your lordſhip. Meane while I reſt

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionat ſeruant,

DUDLEY CARLETON.

To the Lords of his MAJESTY's Council.

Right honorable, my very good Lordes,

WHAT hath bene the ſucceſs of the commands ſent to Tunes and Algier, procured by your lordſhipps order, my laſt of the 25th January hath fully informed; your lordſhipps will then bee pleaſed to remember, that I aduiſed of the arriuall of tenn commiſſioners from Algier, and two aſſiſtants from Tunes, deputed to declare and diſpute their owne cauſe at this port: wee haue had many meetings, and many controuerſies, vnfitt to recite; the ſubſtance your lordſhipps will collect by the encloſed papers, which, I hope, haue finiſhed that buſineſs, and will ſettle both a trade in thoſe parts conuenient for the merchant, and peace in the ſeas, if his majeſtie accept thereof, and your lordſhipps vouchſafe your helpe and countenance, before theſe good inclynations coole, and leaſt, by any delay on our parts they may find occaſion to auoyd the commands which nowe oblige them. Your lordſhipps wilbe pleaſed, in your fauour, to conſider with what people I here treate, that eſteeme themſelues without equality; and yett, I hope, you will finde, that I haue made no condition diſhonourable to his majeſtie, nor really any thing

1623. newe, butt with reference, on our part, to the antient capitulations; nor that I haue treated any thing with them as a free people, but with the commiſſioners of this ſtate, appointed by the grand ſignor; nor haue ſigned any thing, butt, in generall, promiſed to liue in peace with them, as with ſubiects of this empire. Two things only may raiſe ſome ſcruple, vntill they bee explayned; the firſt, about the ſettling a conſull and commerce there, which is not contracted on our part, butt conditionally, that wee may haue priuiledge to doe it, without which they will neuer keepe their words, butt lay the breach on vs, as if wee intended not to hold with them. The trade wilbee very beneficiall to thoſe that ſhall vndertake it, the retornes all money, the vent of our commodities in good proportion, and it wilbee the only ſeale and aſſurance of peace, becauſe wee ſhall haue good ground to demand juſtice, when wee ſhall engage our people and goods vpon the faith of the grand ſignor, and his miniſters. Therfore, when I deſired order from this port, I could not auoyd to make ſhowe of a reſolution in vs, of reciprocallity and trade, as with other the vaſſalls of this empire. Wee ſhall haue this in hand, that vpon the arriuall of the conſull, and a ſhipp, from England, hee ſhall haue deliuered 800 of our poore cuntrimen now in ſlauery, and the ſtrength of their ſhipping. The condition on our part is, That the conſull ſhall receiue a liſt of ſuch as haue bene taken by our ſhipps, which ſhalbee ſent to his majeſtie, that by his authority their freedome may bee procured: their nomber cannott exceed 40; they muſt proue their taking, and finde where they are; and then it will not bee difficult to redeeme them by his majeſties letters, or by money, the greateſt part whereof will bee raiſed from the frends of thoſe that ſhalbee ſett free by the conſull, who muſt haue inſtructions to draw it from them, according to their ability; and the exchange is of great aduantage, if only the nombers bee conſidered, 800 for 40, beſides the weakening of the fleet which now raigneth in the ſea. If I had receiued any encouragement or authority, I had ſent from hence; butt now I muſt humbly referre it to your lordſhipps directions and order, beſeeching you not to lett this beginning periſh; which, I hope, may redound to the great eaſe of the poore fiſhermen and merchants, and to the generall good of the common-weale. The ſecond is, That wee ſhall not lade the armes and goods, nor protect their enemyes. Your lordſhipps will in favour waigh, with what difficulty I haue beaten it to the tearmes agreed on, conſidering our fleete, the laſt yeare, did countenance their aſſertion; yett it is only concluded, That if any doe tranſporte ſuch goods, it ſhall bee at their owne perill, without prohibition abſolute, or breach of peace: and this is incident, and included in all treaties, That enemyes goods are lawfull priſe. Neither could I refuſe to agree to that which is right in it ſelfe, neither demand to bridle them; if I did not promiſe, that wee would liue with them as ſubiects to a prince with whom his majeſtie hath peace. It was as much as could bee expected, that I auoided an abſolute contract, and left it to the aduenture of thoſe, who, for their owne gayne, would hazard it; and haue giuen no other aſſurance butt according and with reference to our old capitulations, which bynd vs to more then theſe, if they, as ſubiects, obey the command of their emperour. And if his majeſtie and your lordſhipps think fitt to maynteyne theſe Leuant trades, the peace with them, and perhapps the trade, is of neceſſity; and to make warre vpon them, is an vtter breach and diſſolution of all, if they conforme themſelves to order.

THE obiections they haue made againſt vs for ſelling their ſubiects and paſſengers, are not wholly to bee denyed, though they augment them; butt I haue anſwered all, and haue wrought out the effect, which I here preſent to his majeſtie, and your lordſhipps, with hope of yonr good acceptation, and that you wilbee pleaſed to ſettle it, ſeeing in all the diſputes publiſhed of the decay of trade, this of piracy makes ſo great a part: and I am of opinion, there is no remedy for the preſent, butt a treaty; and, I preſume, no treaty could haue leſſe diſhonor, and more equality, then this.

I WILL not boaſt of my paynes; but, with your lordſhipps fauour, I will preſume to ſay, that the iſſue hath bene beyond myne owne hopes, God directing it. And though I dare not become ſuerty, I am confident it wilbee maynteyned, at leaſt my tyme, if your lordſhipps order a confirmation from England. Such directions for the ſettling whereof, as I am able to giue, I will ſend, for your lordſhipps eaſe, to the Leuant company, who muſt bee the inſtruments of your honors reſolution.

I MUST now bee an humble ſuter to your lordſhips for myſelfe, that I may bee reimburſed my expence. From the Leuant company I haue not receiued a penny; nor doe they ſeeme to vndertake it alone, beeing the benefitt is common to the weſterne ports, and all ſoutherne trades. It hath coſt mee neare 1000 l. the account made by the factors here, and the charge allowed by publique conſent. I would not gett by reckonings, nor falſe bills: butt if your lordſhipps conſider, that I ſent an officer of this port, with tenne ſeruants, and an Engliſhman, a gally on purpoſe, nyne moneths on their voiadge; that I releaſed there diuers maſters of ſhipping, and about 20 others; that I haue bene forced to procure at leaſt 12 commands, and 20 letters, and their ſtile is not ſhort; laſtly, to preſent the capten of the gally, and the generall of the ſea, who hath vndertaken this buſineſs with ſo much affection, that I could not bee vngratfull; I hope you will not think mee waſtfull, nor leaue the burthen vpon my pouerty; ſeeing there is an eaſy way out of the pirat money, proper to this, that may diſcharge it: which I propound with reſeruation and dependance vpon his majeſties and your lordſhipps fauour; proteſting it is more money then this imployment will euer affoord mee, and for which I now ryde at high intereſt; referring myſelfe to your honorable protection, in all humility,

Conſtantinople,
4th Apr. 1623.

Your Lordſhipps, at your Lordſhips command.

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

I HAUE receiued your honors, with double copies of the 29th Nouember, with another of grace from his majeſtie, and a note encloſed of the arriuall of myne to the 7th September. I muſt acknowledge to your honor, and to your good relations made of mee, this fauour and acceptance of my ſeruices from his majeſtie, aboue my meritt; which I will owe you, without hope of any retribution butt of a gratefull heart. I haue this weeke bene preuented to write my humble thanks to his majeſtie; the Venetian bailo hauing warned us two dayes before the ordinary, vpon ſpeciall occaſion to diſpatch to the ſtate, aduice of a ſecretary of theirs and his, taken, and ympriſoned, at his requeſt, in the Black towers: his offence was, a practize to make himſelfe a prince of Walachia, and reuealing ſome ſecretts, and affronting his maſter. I think hee ſhall dye for it, either there in ſecrett, or elſe by the juſtice of his owne cuntry, if they ſend him home. This haſt, and the many tranſlations and copies concerning Tunes and Algier, haue forced vpon mee to beſeech your honor to make my excuſe, and to preſent this preſent relation of our affaires, vntill the next poſt.

I FINDE by your liſt ſent, all myne are ſafely arriued to that date; ſince what I haue directed to your honor, are here encloſed; with thoſe alſo receiued from your honor, and the lords of his majeſties counſell: for which large aduiſe and relation I haue no matter of countervalue; butt your honor will accept of ſuch as this place affoords.

CONCERNING the conſpiracy formerly mentioned, the ambaſſadors of 119 haue giuen ſatisfaction to the duke of Zbarawsky, that hee did reiect it; and that it proceeded only from thoſe mutined troopes, which, your honor hath heard, refuſed to depoſe armes, and foraged the proper lands of 136.

SINCE the change of the laſt vizier, this preſent beeing the frend of 119, his miniſters haue preuailed to procure aſſiſtance, in couler to recouer 116. What their ſecrett intent is, I cannott iudge, for the variety of report; and they haue endeauoured to make it a ſecrett to mee: butt that his majeſtie may know the reſolution, I haue ſent the copy of 151 his commiſſion to his generall the uununeneuu of nuuauecanu; and whatſoeuer it ſhowes, the force cannott exceed 20000. I heare of no canon, nor foote; ſo that I beleeue it will proue but a warre of ſpoile. They pretend to ſettle 119 in his election; and after to aſſiſt, if he pleaſe, 50, for the recouery of all loſt: and though theſe here profeſs no other end, nor no aduance of the eſtates of 151, yett it is much doubted, that ſome townes are promiſed; which beeing giuen, hee wilbee lord, in effect, of all 116,

1623. and the other ſhall only have the name. Theſe miniſters of 119 forſweare it, and make all chriſtian profeſſions: butt it is very ſuſpitious, that ſuch aſſiſtance is not giuen for loue. 119 is remoued to Caſſouia, where hee hath in readineſs 30000 attending the comming of theſe aydes, appointed to meet him about the end of this moneth. 181 haue their diſpatch, and haue taken their leaue of 151; butt 152 doth yett deteyne them, and deferre their licence. About 8 dayes ſince, they procured the vizier to ſend for mee, who demanded what his majeſties intentions were: recommending to mee the affaires of 119; offering mee to write to his majeſtie, and to moue him to ioyne in aſſiſtance of 50; profeſſing great matters, with ſome words ſharp, and of too much preſſure. To which I replyed only in generall termes, That my maſter had peace with 102, and 88; and that I had no commiſſion to meddle in that buſineſs, nor to giue any promiſe; but was aſſured his majeſtie would be offended, hauing ſent mee hither to mayntеyne the publique quiett of all Chriſtendome, and his frends. I will not write your honor what anſwere I receiued, ſuch as wee muſt beare; butt hee declared a reſolution to maynteyne 119, and the prouinces in league with the grand ſignor, againſt their greateſt enemy. I durſt not declare too farre, leaſt I putt our owne affaires in hazard; butt directly, in his majeſties name, diſauowed it. I muſt confeſs, that vntill the receipt of your laſt, for three monethes, I ſtood neutrall, and did nothing, beeing neither called, nor that buſineſs in queſtion, untill the peace made with Poland. Beſides, I ſawe no cauſe, in diſcretion, to take too much care for them, that ſoe abuſed his majeſties goodneſs and ſyncerity; butt now I perceiue God hath directed mee to auoid temptations, that I haue done nothing contrary to the conſtancy of his majeſties reſolution: neither had I creditt to preuaile to reſiſt, as in former tymes, beeing this vizier my enemy, a man willfull and ſingular in his opinion, and hath vndertaken this, contrary to the judgment of all the wiſeſt men of this empire, who know they are not in caſe to prouoke an enemy, when all is on fire in their owne bowells; in Aſia the rebellions at Babilon and Arzerum encreaſing and proceeding, ſo that all the army on that ſide is diſpeeded with no great hope: neither is there any certenty of the conſtancy of this reſolution; for the next vizier (and this cannott laſt) may, and is like to reuoke all; ſo vncerteyne is this gouerment, and all that depends vpon it. This is the ſumme of all that I knowe; and I beleeue there is ſomwhat kept from my knowledge, becauſe there are letters ſent from 151 to 50, and to 214, the contents whereof their miniſters hyde from mee: butt I doubt not his majeſtie ſhall haue knowledge from themſelues; and if theſe were departed, I could procure the copies. I will performe by the next poſt my laſt promiſe, to ſend your honor the whole relation of the Poliſh treaty, and the mixture with this, which yett I cannot finiſh. In the meane tyme, I haue ſent you the copy of the duke of Zbarawsky's laſt letter to the vizier ſince his departure, wherby you may iudge of the proceedings of this ſtate. Your honor will call to mynd, that my laſt aduiſed, that the peace was huddled vpp in the firſt twenty dayes of this vizier; the articles, before agreed on, accepted without examination, and promiſed to be ſealed. The duke, haſty to gett free, ſent firſt his coaches and baggage before; and himſelfe reſting tenne myles from this citty, ſtayed for the receipt of his capitulations concluded and promiſed. So ſoone as they came, hee tooke horſe; and, whether hee had no man that could read and enterprett them, or loath to looſe ſo much tyme, made ſuch expedition, as it ſeemed rather a flight, then a retraict: it appeares hee neuer opened them vntill hee came to Tergouiſta in Wallachia, where hee found hee was deceiued, and that the vizier had ſent him others cleane wyde, and contrary to the agreement, as you may perceiue by his letters; the copy of theſe alſo I haue gotten, butt as yett I cannott gett them tranſlated. I haue diſputed this for him, but I ſee no intention of remedy; and I beleeue the king and ſtate of Poland will not accept them, nor thank the duke for his truſt and haſt. At Tergouiſta hee heard that the Tartars had taken his coaches, and ſlayne his ſeruants, and lay in wayt for him: wherevpon he changed his courſe, and with the like haſt recouered Kronſtatt in Tranſiluania, of whom ſince wee haue not heard. But this inſolence of the Tartar was prouoked by the laſt vizier, his enemy, as I informed, who is ſince baniſhed; not for that cauſe, but as obnoxious to this, and one likely to retorne; opes, omiſſi geſtique honores pro crimine. In reuenge of this, the Coſſacks are entered the Black-ſea, and haue taken prizes, and aſſailed a towne; and this day the councell 1623. brake vpp in rage and haſt, to ſend out to preuent their further inuaſions: and I may iuſtly feare, either that peace will wholly breake; or, if neither ſide fitt, as they are not, for open warre, they will winke at their two freebooting vaſſalls, to ſpoile one another; which, in tyme, will engage both to more trouble.

YOUR honor will then iudge in what vncertenty wee liue, and in what danger: for my ſelfe, I haue loſt part of my creditt, in retyring from the miniſters of 119; and by the vizier am taken for a ſpy, and a pentioner of 102. If any change, I ſhall haue the retorne of tide on my ſide.

I BESEECH you communicate theſe briefes to his majeſtie: the next weeke I will pay a full debt; and in my name giue humble thanks and aſſurance, that I haue no vnderſtanding nor will, butt in obedience to his commands. And ſo, in confidence of your continued protection, I committ your honor to the keeping of the Diuine Majeſtie.

Conſtantinople,
5th Aprill, 1623.

Your Honors humble and faithfull ſeruant and frend.

CONCERNING Tunes and Algier, becauſe I haue written in generall to the lords, I will bee bold to referr your honor to your part therein; only beſeeching you, that ſo good a work, now allmoſt perfect, may not periſh for want on our parts, who complayne, and yett doe nothing; leaſt I ſay to the merchants, (whoſe ſlowneſs I know) I have piped, but yee danced not.

From my Lord CAREW.

My Lord,

I MUST acknowledge ſome errour of overmuch ſilence: but by that tyme this ſhall come vnto your handes, I haue retourned as many as I haue receaved from you, which in all are but two; my firſt, I perceive by Mr. Brainthwaite, you have received; your laſt bare date the $\frac{10}{20}$ of February, which came to me the 16th of Aprill followinge.

YOUR lordſhip may not expect other then vulgar newes from me; for letters (to remote places) runne many hazards in the paſſadge; and in this tyme wiſe men ought to be wary, wherein matters of conſequence are carried with more privacy, then in former times. Sir John Bennett, whoe, in the laſt convention of parliament, ſtoode accuſed of many briberies, was, ſince my laſt vnto you, fined in the 20000 l. Starr-chamber in November, committed to priſon, where he remayneth, and cenſured for evermore vncapable to beare any office. The next moneth enſuinge the lord of Abergeny died. The 19th of January, Sir Edward Conway was ſworne ſecretary, in the place of Sir Robert Nanton. The next enſuinge moneth, the carle of Exceſter died, whoſe greate eſtate he devided into ſo many parts, betweene his younger ſonnes and his widdowe, as that the now earle is not advanced in his eſtate 4000 l. per annum. Within twoe dayes after his death, the marques of Hamilton was elected knight of the order. A little before which tyme, your wifes vnckle, the vicount Grandeſſon, and the lord Chicheſter, were ſworne Councellors. Sir Horace Vere is retourned from the Palatinatt, and ſitts in a cloude. The towne of Frankendale (by his majeſties order) is to be delivered in depoſito to the archduches; in the defence whereof, captaine Bourroughe hath worthely deſerved extraordinary reputation, haveing defended it beyonde all hope; and would ſo haue done, vntill the beſeedgers had beene wearyed. The archdutches is to hould it for a yeare and halfe; and then to reſtore it in ſtatu quo prius, if our ſoveraigne and the emperour doe not accord, for the reſtitution of the kinge of Bohemia to his territories and electoratt: in the meane tyme, both he and the queene remayne at the Haghe. The duke of Bouillon is deade. France is quiett; no rumour of armes: but the contynewance of this bleſſed peace is much feared, vnleſſe the league betweene the French kinge, the duke of Savoy, and the ſtate of Venice, do proceede according to theire articles of agreement, for the reſtoringe of the Griſons to theire ancient libertye. Then the proteſtants of France may ſleepe ſecurelye; otherwiſe, it is to be feared, that this active kinge, by the inſtigation 1623. tion of the Jeſuits, will purſue the extirpation of the reformed religion within his dominions. From Venice I receaved this encloſed paper; whereby it appeares, that the two monarchs of France and Spayne have accorded to render the Valtellina into the popes hands in depoſito, vntill farther order be taken: ſince which tyme, it is ſayd, that this accorde will not hold, and that the league proceedes. What judgment to make of it, I knowe not; but leave it to tyme: but hereof I am ſure, that the French kinge hath made a ſtrickt amity with the Vnited Provinces; he contynewes 4000 French (as his father did) in theire ſervice, and hath of late ſent vnto them ether fower or 500000 crownes.

The kings of Denmark and Sweden, the electors of Saxe and Brandenbourgh, and moſt of the princes of the Lower Saxe, with ſondry of the Emperiall Townes, doe raiſe greate forces, proteſtinge againſt the diett at Regensbergh, wherein the duke of Bavaria had the electoratt of Rhyne conferred vppon him. What will be the yſſue of theſe greate leavies, a few monethes will diſcouer. Mansfields armie is ſayd never to be ſtronger then at this preſent; and withall, report goes, that he ſhall marry the daughter and heyre to the earle of Embden; and likewiſe it is thought, that the States of the Vnited Provinces will entertayne him in theire pay this ſommer. The younge duke of Brunſwicke is likewiſe very ſtronge both in horſe and foote; and reported, he is to be employed by the kings and princes of Germany aforeſayd. So you ſee how the ſtate of Germany ſtands, threatninge farther calamities to fall upon that diſtempered ſtate: but ſuch is the varieties of theſe tymes, as I am not confident of any thinge, vntill I ſee they be entred into action.

Of the affayres of Auſtria, Bohemia, and the provinces annexed vnto it, or of that little parte of Hungary which the emperour poſſeſſeth, I forbeare your trouble in readinge what is heere related; your lordſhip havinge better notice of them in the port, then London can afforde.

Now wee are come to Spayne, which would contayne a lardge relation, if all were ſpoken which might be diſcourſed of: but I will only acquaint your lordſhip with rebus geſtis. Your lordſhip is not ignorant of the long treatye, for many yeares paſt, of a match intended betweene our prince and the infanta Maria, ſiſter to the Spaniſh kinge that now is: this greate affayre was evermore ſo carefully and cloſely carried, as few or none were acquainted with the proceedings therein; and now at laſt it was concluded by his majeſtie, (whereof I knowe not any one had any notion of it, but the prince and the marques of Buckingham) of the prince his goeing into Spayne. At Dover the prince and the marques, diſguiſed, embarqued themſelves the 19th of February, and the ſame day they arrived at Bollogne. Mr. Francis Cottington, now Sir Francis Cottington, knight and baronett, and the prince his ſecreatary, went for the beſt man in the companye: the prince went vnder the name of John Smith; and the marques, of Thomas Smith, his brother: Endimion Porter attended the Prince, and Mr. Creame the marques: the whole conſiſting but of five perſons. At Parris they ſawe the kinge, the queenes, and the princes in that court, at a ball; came, and departed vnknowne. Two dayes after they left Parris, the king vnderſtoode that they were paſſed, which did much amuſe him; and theire poſt was ſo ſpeedye, as of theire comminge into Spayne, themſelves brought the firſt newes. Vppon the 7th of March they arrived at Madrid; the kings ambaſſadors, the earle of Briſtoll, (knowne to you by the name of the lord Digby) and Sir Walter Aſhton the ambaſſador leager, dreaminge of no ſuch thinge, much leſſe ſuſpected by that kinge, or any Spaniard. That your lordſhip may knowe at full the manner of the prince his reception, I ſend you heerewith a relation printed by his majeſties commaundment, brought hether by Mr. Greiſley, ſervant to the earle of Briſtoll. Some three or fower days after the prince his departure, the firſt that was diſpatched to followe him was the earle of Carlile, who went from hence the 22th of the ſame monthe; ſince which tyme there hath paſſed by land through France the vicounts of Rochford and Andever, with ſondry others. After them, the lord Cary, the lord Vaghan, with ſome 140 in theire company, were ſhipped for Spaine, of whoſe ſafe arrivall wee haue had intelligence. The laſt (who were ſent for by the prince) are Sir Henry Riche, lately created baron of Kenſington, and Sir George Goringe, who are yett ſcarcely arrived at the Spaniſh court. Two dayes paſt a poſt came from Spayne, and brought comfortable newes of the prince his health; and, God be thanked, wee heare the like of his attendants, and reports that his retourne will be very ſhortly; whereof there is good apparance, for he gave commaundment for the ſtay of his greate horſes, armours, pavilions, and other proviſions fitt for triumphes: and farther, he required, that the 10 greate ſhipps of his majeſties royall navy (which weare prepared to bring him home) ſhould be haſtened for Spayne, and they will be ready by the laſt of this monthe. The earle of Ruttland goes admirall of the fleete, the lord Windeſor vice-admirall, and the young lord Morley reare-admirall. What change may be before theire goeinge, I knowe not, nether yet have I heard the names of the captaynes. Vppon Mounday in the Eaſter weeke, ſtilo novo, the prince, the kinge of Spayne, and the infanta, were long in diſcourſe, beinge the firſt tyme that ever he and his miſtris had any conference; but what it was, I am as ignorant as your lordſhip. Wee likewiſe heare by the poſt aforeſayd, which was Peter Killigrew, that the diſpenſation is graunted by the pope, and dayly expected in Spayne. For a farther approbation of the prince his ſpeedy retourne, he hath given order, that all his houſhold ſervants belowe the ſtayres ſhould preſently retourne for England, he haveing (as it ſeemes) no vſe of them there.

THE earle of Oxford his releaſe out of the Tower is dayly expected, and is to marry the lady Diana Cecill, daughter vnto the earle of Exceſter that now is; the dowry is agreed on, which, in land and money, is very greate. Mr. Chriſtopher Villers, the marques his youngeſt brother, is lately created earle of Angleſey. Mr. Thomas Murrey, who ſometymes was ſecretary to the prince, and of late prouoſt of Eaton, in ſeekeing reamedy for the ſtone in the bladder, was cutt, and dyed vnder the chirurgions handes: many ſue to be his ſucceſſor; but it is thought it will not be diſpoſed of vntill the marques of Buckingham his retourne. I cannot ſend you a liſt of all the men of quallity that are now attendants vppon the prince in Spayne; but to give you ſatisfaction in parte, heere incloſed are the names of the titulados. God be thanked, his majeſtie is in perfect good health, and is now at Windeſor, where he holds St. Georges feaſt.

THERE is of late a great controverſie fallen out in the Virginian company, and that counſell is factiouſly diſturbed. The erle of Southampton the governour is oppoſed by the erle of Warrwicke; many ioyne with him: the differences have beene diſputed before the kinge; referred to the counſell board; complaynts on either ſide have beene heard at lardge: the lords, for theire better information, have confined certayne commiſſioners (authorized vnder the great ſeale) to enquire how the buſineſſes of the plantation have beene carried; what ſommes of money have beene leavyed; how diſpoſed of: and this accoumpt is to looke backe from the firſt of Sir Thomas Smiths goverment, vnto this preſent hower. It is ſuppoſed, that great faults will be found in ſome; and likewiſe feared, that the diſſention now on foote, will goe neere to overthrowe the plantation.

WHEN I was thus farr gone in my letter, and ready to ycloſe it, the newes of the Palatinatt is, That capten Borough, according to his directions, hath rendred Frankendale: the generall Tilly (in the behalfe of the archduches) receaved it, and placed therein ſome of his troopes.

MY packe is now emptied; nothing left for me to ſaye, but to preſent both vnto your ſelfe, and to your lady, the remembrance of my affectionate loue and ſervice; whereof I will make cleere and ample demonſtration, whenſoever you ſhall have occaſion to make vſe of

of Aprill, 1623.

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionatt, trew, and humble ſervant,

G. CAREW.

YF your lordſhip would pleaſe to write oftener, your payne would haue no loſſe; for vntill I do heare thatt myne is comme to your handes, I purpoſe to be ſilent, but never to fayle to make anſwere to all thatt I ſhall receve. A little fyne Turkie dogge would be an acceptable preſent to my wife, who remembers her love and ſervice to your lordſhip, and my ladye.

POSTSCRIPT. My letter being fully finiſhed, That the Weſt India company in the Vnited Provinces is dayly advanced, and the adventurers (as they have ſubſcribed) bringe in theire adventures with much alacrity.

1623. THERE is alſo another fleete prepared, and ready to ſett ſayle; whether this voyadge is intended, is yet unknowne.

THE count Mansfields army is yett in Eaſt Frizeland, and the duke of Brunſwicks in his biſhopprick of Halberſtatt.

From the QUEENE of BOHEMIA.

My Lord,

LETT theſe few lines giue you thankes for diuers letters I haue receaued from you by the ambaſſadour heere; I am ſure you haue particular anſwere of all. Your laſt was, of the arriuall of Dulcinea del Toboſa; her reception was verie rare: I heere her beautie is but courſe. I pray lett me haue the end of her mariage, which dout is like beginning; for, though I haue cauſe inough to be ſad, yett I am ſtill of my wilde humour, to be as merrie as I can in ſpite of fortune. I can ſend you no newes but that which will make you ſadder, and I ſee you haue no need of it. All growes worſe and worſe, as I know you vnderſtand by honeſt Sir Dudley Carleton. My brother is ſtill in Spaine. The diſpenſation is come, but I know not yett vppon what conditions. My brother is ſtill louing to me: I would others had as good nature. He ſent Will. Crofts to ſee me, from Spaine, with a verie kinde letter and meſſage. But my father will neuer leaue treating, though with it he hath loſt vs all; for poore Frankendal he hath deliuered to the Spaniard, and now would make a truce for 15 months, till a peace be made; to giue our ennemies time to ſettle themſelf in our countrie. My yong couſen of Brunſwick is ſtill conſtant. He hath a faire armie of twentie thouſand men. He was forced to leaue Mansfeld by his euill vſage. Mansfeld is a braue man, but all is not gold that gliſters in him. I am glad you like our pictures. The king deſires me to tell you, that he wiſhes all were of your minde; and that he intreats you to be aſſured of his loue. I pray commend me to the count of Tour; I will anſwere his letters by the firſt. I would the Turkes payed the emperour ſoundley, for it is a hard choiſe which is the worſer diuell. I need not deſire you to doe all the good you can, for I ſee you doe it; which will make me euer to be conſtantlie,

The Hagh this $\frac{19}{29}$ of May.

Your moſt aſſured frend,
ELIZABETH.

I pray recommend my loue to your wife: farewell, honeſt Thom.

To Sir THOMAS ROE, his Majeſties Ambaſſadour, at Conſtantinople.

Extract of a Letter to the Archbiſhop of CANTERBURY.

What precedes, being contain'd in the Diſpatches to Sir G. CALVERT, is omitted.

—NOW I haue runne ouer theſe theames, I ſhall returne to the jeſuiticall plott laſt mentioned, agaynſt our reverend patriarch: your grace will call to mynd, that I enformed, his mildnes tooke vp firſt the ſpirituall armes of excommunication; but thoſe are not weapons to bee oppoſed to the teeth of wolfes, and fires of Ignatius. The ſame anathematized ſciſmaticque, with the help of his organes, haue, by the force of 40000 dollars, ſuddenly ſurpriſed the good man, impriſoned and depoſed him, without a ſynod, by the authoryty of this vizier, agaynſt whom no man dares open his mouth. They haue ſlandered him with crymes not to bee named; but when his good life gaue them the lye, they inuented, That he would haue giuen vp an iſland in the Arches to the Florentine. Euery man knowes the falſhood of theſe accuſations, but they ſerue to couer the corruption of this vizier. He hath ſcaped narrowly with his life, but as yet he is ſafe in the keeping of a guard. The Greeke church for feare haue accepted, at leaſt dare not refuſe, this excommunicated Machiuell; nor yet doe they acknowledge him well made, nor capeable of the place; for if the church haue any power, he is no member, then he cannot bee the head; and I am ſure a Turke cannot abſolue him: our hope is, that he will not bee able to performe the mony promiſed; if he doe, it comes from Rome; for his inſtruments haue beene the Jeſuitts, his patron the French ambaſſadour, dour, a jeſuited man. This wee know, and may haue our turne to make uſe of yt, 1623. that the pope nouriſheth a Greeke church in Rome, who are his emiſſaries into theſe parts, as his Jeſuits are into Europe. This man hath promiſed ſubmiſſion, or at leaſt good correſpondence with yt; and the whole plott is, that by his meanes the metropolitan ſeates ſhalbe, in few yeares, filled with thoſe of the Romiſh faction, and by degrees, that doctrine ſowed in the church, and finall obedience in the end. Your grace may now ſee the vniuerſal practice of thoſe engines; no church ſhalbe ſafe, that is not theirs; Germany, France, Bohemia, hath lately felt it; Greece is now in project, and God defend thy little flock in England. Who is ſo blynd as not to diſcerne theſe miners? Here it may bee my happines to repay them; for if any change, and this vizier cannot laſt in good tymes, much leſs in theſe, I am confident to reſtore him; and may then dare to tell truth of them that haue belyed the truth. It is happy for the Greeke your grace hath bred in Oxford, that he came not in this vnſeaſonable tyme; yet I would haue receiued him, though I beleeue he would haue beene a ſadd gueſt to ſee his church and her gouerment bought and ſold. I beſeech your grace, acquaynt his majeſtie with this ſtorye, that he may ſee the generall working; it is not one kyngdome, but an vniuerſall monarchy, that is the ayme of Antichriſt. I haue not mentioned it in my letter, as more proper to your relation. It may bee, this generall perſecution is good phiſicque for the church; for which a wiſe heathen gaue thancks, Benignitati deum gratiam referendam, ne ritus ſacrorum inter ambigua culti per proſpera obliterarentur. Yet I may haue leaue to pray for the peace and proſperitye of Syon; becauſe tranquilli ſint amantes tui. As ſoone as I can obteyne ſpeech with this good perſecuted man, I will comfort him with your graces good wiſhes; and, I doubt not, he will beſt write you his owne ſtorye.

I KNOW no more that is fitt to trouble your grace withall; nor preſume I on the woorthines of matter, but of your fauorable acceptance of the vowes and affections of

To Sir GEORGE CALVERT, with Advices.

Right Honorable,

I HAUE preſumed to write to his majeſtie ſomewhat largely, of our affaires in this court, which I beſeech you to preſent with your wonted fauour; and if I haue bene defectiue in any particulars, you wilbe pleaſed to ſupply it from the encloſed. And becauſe, in that letter, I haue mentioned two letters written from the grand ſignor to the prince elector, I will not omitt, if his majeſtie ſhould bee curious to know the contents, to enforme you, and to explayne myſelfe in that I ſaid, I hoped his majeſtie ſhould ſee the copies; that I haue gotten the tranſlate of one of them from the count of Torne, with this condition, not to ſend it, to preuent the prince, whom he hath promiſed ſhall communicat both with his majeſtie; which I thought very neceſſary, aſwell to ſhowe his reſpect and dependance vpon his majeſtie, as to iuſtify himſelfe, that there is nothing conteyned in them, that can accuſe him of any practize, on his part, againſt the publique peace. The contents are, to encourage and perſwade him to come vp into Bohemia with the armies of Mansfield and his allies, and ſuch helps as are pretended here to be giuen him from Holland; which, I think, are but ſhowes, to draw the grand ſignor to the aid of Gabor. Butt there is no intimation, nor collection to be made, that his highnes had mooved any thing; but theſe letters were procured by the miniſters of Tranſiluania, to prouoke, or at leaſt to countenance, his owne deſignes: I write you nothing in apology of either ſide, but relate res geſtas, which I could not hinder, nor diſcreetly meddle in. I will referr your honor for larger diſcourſe of this, and all other our occurrents, to the encloſed; and direct this only to one buſineſs betweene mee and the French ambaſſador, which I deſire your honor to enforme his majeſtie, and procure ſome letter to Monſ. Bizieuze, ſuperintendent or ſecretary for the affaires of ambaſſadors abroad, that there may bee ſome rule alſo giuen to this here, that wee fall not into foule termes, or actions that may diſgrace vs. The caſe is this: Vpon his complaynt to Monſ. Bizieuze, that I refuſed to ſeale an arz

1623. with him to auoyd any confeſſion of precedency, of which I haue written you the truth at large; it ſeemes he hath receiued order to conteſt, and ſeeke occaſion; for ſo he doth, vpon this pretence, That Monſ. Bizieuze hath anſwered, That there is command giuen mee from his majeſtie not to innouate any thing, butt that I ſhould conforme myſelfe to the example of others his majeſties ambaſſadors in the courts of other princes, where he pretends that precedence hath bene yielded; and that he found himſelfe in poſſeſſion here, of ſuch vſe. I haue hitherto auoyded all occaſion of the queſtion; butt it ſeemes that he is netled at the viſitt of the duke of Zbarawsky; and vpon beleefe that I haue order to yield to him, he troubles and confounds all our affaires. In theſe diſordered tymes, when all nations ſuffer many iniuries and oppreſſions, wee haue no refuge but to ioyne our ſelues, which is a litle bulwark; but that wee cannot doe, but either by going together, or by ſigning ſome writing, in both which he will haue a ſuperiority; butt can gett none of mee. There was a late occaſion, that hath renewed this controuerſy: A baſſa of Cyprus hauing taken at leaſt 50000 dollars from the Venetian and Dutch, vniuſtly, and to the vtter breach of their capitulations, they ioyntly made complaynt at the port to the vizier; who was ſo wide of doing them right, that hee hath giuen the ſame man the baſſa-licke of Aleppo, where is our greateſt trade: and not only by not puniſhing, but by words of more iniuſtice, hath encouraged him to doe as much there, ſaying, before their faces, That when he had eaten 100000 more at Aleppo vpon vs, hee ſhould pay the former reckoning. The bailo and the Dutch ambaſſador falling into conſideration of this anſwere, and fearing that this fellow would beginne where hee lefte, came to mee, and ſhowed mee the common intereſt; that if ſuch a man were ſuffered to goe to Aleppo with ſuch encouragement, it was very ſuſpitious he would lay ſome oppreſſion vpon vs all, and beeing once purſed, there is no hope of reſtitution. So miſerable is our caſe, that wee know euery gouernor goes as a wolfe, poore out, and retornes fatt vpon our ſpoiles; and therfore deſired mee to ioyne, at leaſt, in a proteſt with them and the French, againſt him. I could not refuſe, butt deſired them to conſider the way, that I might doe it without preiudice. Wee reſolued to meete at the French ambaſſadors, and to conſult of our courſe, promiſing, that if he would not cauill, and raiſe pretences, I would find ſome meane, without diſaduantage to either; and that I would not ſeeke any occaſion vpon him, if he conteyned himſelfe in the ſame modeſty. Wee mett, and it was propounded to goe together: I, to declyne the queſtion, ſhowed, that in this tumultuous tyme it might cauſe offence; and that a man of his quality was not worthy of ſo much honor, as to be viſited by 4 ambaſſadors; butt moued to make this proteſt in writing, and to ſend it by our Janizaries. To this wee agreed, and becauſe in the writing I would auoid all ſcruple, I offered to draw it, which was alſo conſented vnto. This I did, becauſe I would not name one before another; and therfore, hauing repeated the iniury done to the Venetian and Dutch, as a preface, I added, in their names, that beeing now ioyned with the two ambaſſadors of the moſt powrefull chriſtian kings reſident at the port, all wee fowre were reſolued not to beare ſo great iniuries, and therfore made that proteſt, &c. To this forme no man of temperance could taſte exception; for the ſealing, I was content that the French ſhould ſett his where he pleaſed; I could find a place that ſhould not offend him, nor wrong my ſelfe. This the other two were gladd to ſee, and hoped all would paſs currant; and ſo ſent the copy to the French, to take his allowance. At the firſt hee liked it very well, and conſented; but before it was engroſſed, the French humor poſſeſſed him, and hee recalled his agreement, inſiſting vpon it to haue his maſters name firſt, and his ſeale acknowledged in the firſt place. The Venice bailo, knowing my reſolution, and confeſſing I could offer no more reaſon, went vnto him, and diſputed the cauſe, preſſing him to know why hee, for a common good, would not conſent that the king of England ſhould be ioyned with his, in equality, ſeeing that I deſired to ſhunne any pretence? His anſwer was reſolute, That hee would haue his maſters name inſerted by the title of emperour of France, which is vſed in their capitulations. The bailo replyed, That neither I, nor hee, could acknowledge nor ſigne to ſuch a ſtyle; and though the Turks gaue it ignorantly, in Chriſtendome wee knew butt one; that rather, my maſter ſhould clayme that greatneſs, as king of many crownes; and that it would be abſurd to name him emperour of France, and, in the ſame lyne, his majeſtie king of France; which hee could not prohibitt mee to doe. Theſe and many other reaſons he vrged, butt none could preuaile, nor any other declynation accommodate the buſineſs, butt the title of emperour, and a declared precedency: ſo that he was forced alſo to diſauow ſuch a ſubſcription. The next day the bailo ſent to mee to conſult what now wee might doe to preuent our common oppreſſion, and deſired mee to make ſome offer, if it were poſſible, to doe our buſineſs. I replyed, I was ſorry; butt could not conſent to my maſters preiudice: butt I deſired him to tell the French, my order was, to auoyd the queſtion; which was manners enough: That this was no fitt theatre to decide it on; butt that I was willing to leaue the controuerſy to our maſters, in a fitter place. And therfore, becauſe I would not bee the occaſion of a publique breach, I moued, that the ſame writing might bee drawne ſeuerally, in our ſingle names, all to one effect, and ſo ſent together by 4 ſeruants; then hee might aſſume to his maſter what titles he fancied beſt, without offence: it ſhould be none to mee, if hee called him lord of Florida and Braſill. The bailo retorned againe with this medium, butt it was alſo reiected; becauſe, to write apart, was an innouation, (cleane contrary, for this ioint ſigning is not three yeares old, there beeing no occaſion in former tymes) which he pretended I was commanded not to bring in, nor hee to ſuffer. In concluſion, he inſiſted vpon it, That I had order, in effect, to yield; and hee would not declyne his firſt way; for euery declynation, on his part, might bee a weakening of his title. Hee pleaded, that hee was in poſſeſſion of the precedency yielded by Sir P. Pindar actually, and by Sir John Eyre, by ſigning a complaynt againſt the baſſa of Cairo, where the French king is firſt named, and Sir John Eyres ſeale in the ſecond place. This he produced as teſtimony of his poſſeſſion; and hee would not looſe it, nor change the forme: thus our buſineſs brake off, with much diſcontent. Your honor will now bee pleaſed to know, that wee cannott liue here thus diuided. I haue wittneſs of my ſide from both ambaſſadors, (who condemne the other) of my temperance. The French and I cannott auoyd to meet in the fields, or in the ſtreets, except I ſhould make myſelfe a priſoner, which I will not doe for a French army, nor yield him any tittle, except hee wynne yt: if wee meete, ſome inconuenience will happen, which I cannott auoyd, if hee ſeeke it. If wee continue thus, though wee neuer meete, yett all our affaires will ſuffer for it; and therfore I humbly deſire you to moue his majeſtie, that as hee hath complayned of mee, you may doe ſoe of him; and that, the truth of this faireneſs in mee being declared, there may bee ſome order ſent him to conforme himſelfe to ſuch a correſpondence, as wee may liue like diſcreet men; and that Monſ. Bizieuze will enterprett his Laconicall ſentence, that nothing bee innouated; and declare directly and playnly what hee intends; and accordingly, that your honor will ſend mee warrant how I ſhall behaue my ſelfe: if ſome courſe bee not taken herein, wee ſhall wrangle to our ſhame. In the meane tyme, we will doe our beſt not to meete, and lett our buſines ſuffer. This quarrell hauing filled the proportion of a letter, I will conclude it with this burthen, that you wilbe pleaſed to continue mee in your good opinion and protection, as one of Advices ſent Mr. Secretary, Conſtantinople, $\frac{3}{13}$ May, 1623.

VPON the complaynt made by the duke of Sbarawsky, of the abuſe in altering the capitulations, and the entring in of the Coſſacques into the Black-ſea, as formerly aduiſed, the vizier and this ſtate (hauing nothing more in care then to ſhutt vp that back port, wherby they ſuffer much loſs and diſhonor, and cannot reuenge it vpon a fugitiue people; which deuides their nauall army, beeing forced to ſend a portion of gallyes to defend the trade, the beſt part of releeſe of the cytty comming from thoſe coaſts) reſolued to giue content to the Poles, and to aſſure the peace, that they might with more ſecuritye attend their affayres in Aſia and Hungarie, which action is fauored vehemently by the preſent vizier. To this end he ſent anſwere into Poland, with promiſes of fayth, and reparation for the injuries committed by the Tartars; laying the fault of miſwriting the treaty vpon the chancelor; which though they amend not, yet they explayne and enterprett yt; and for the better 1623. eſtabliſhment and ſecuritye, on their behalfs, of the peace, they haue reſolued to depoſe Jehan-Begh, prince of Tartaria, and haue ſent to take poſſeſſion of his dominion, Mehmett Gheray, his coſen-german, and firſt of the blood, lately priſoner in the Rhodes, who hath vndertaken to quiett and reſtrayne the people: he is departed, 8 dayes paſt, with 13 gallyes. The captain baſſa hath entreated mee to ſignifye into Poland, the cauſe of this change is only for the performance of the treaty on their parts (which may bee amongſt the cauſes, but the vizier hath another more ſecrett); and to require and councell the like prouiſion for the Coſſacks, for the full ſecuritye of the peace. If this new created prince bee quiettly received, it is out of doubt that all things are ſettled on that ſyde; but it is a great queſtion whether Jehan-Begh, that hath been in long poſſeſſion, and a ſouldier, will ſurrender and giue place for ſo little force, or for the threats of them whom he knowes haue not power to gouerne their owne citty: if he reſiſt, it may occaſion a ciuill war, whoſe contagion may reach to the gates of Conſtantinople; for after the Ottoman line, that race of the Tartars, by agreement, are to ſucceed in this empire: and it is not long ſince, that this ſame prince, whom this raſh vizier now attempteth to depoſe, was feared that he would ſett afoote a pretence for him ſelfe, the preſent emperor beeing a foole, and the nephewes children; and now ther is miniſtred to him iuſt occaſion.

THE inſolencyes of the ſouldier continew: this day, within the Seraglio, the buſtengies haue riſen agaynſt their cape, and depoſed him. The rebellions in Aſya proſper; the vizier maynteynes his authoritye by continuall donatiues to the Janizaries, and hath compounded twice with them in 14 dayes; which he gathers vp agayne by confiſcations and oppreſſions intollerable.

ABOUT 10 dayes paſt, he diſplaced Halil baſſa, the captayne of the ſea, a good and honeſt Turke; and putt into his roome Regit baſſa, for mony; who alſo aduanced 50000 doll. to make ready the fleete for the Leuant ſeaes. The gallyes of the port wilbe about 30, of the iſlands and out-ports neare as many more: the new captayne baſſa hath diſpeeded a ſeruant to Algier, to procure ſome of thoſe rouers to ioyne with him; and I am perſwaded he will make ſome attempt vpon the chriſtian coaſt, beeing his firſt tragedye, to gett him reputation with the ſtate and ſouldierye.

FOR the depoſing of Halil baſſa, the beſt beloued vizier, and the moſt ancient, the Spahies haue twice mutined in the cytty; but quieted with mony, and promiſe of offices, they now vndertake to farme all the reuenewes of the crowne and church; and yet there is not mony found to content them.

THE ſultana mother, with this vizier, fynding it impoſſible to prouide for the next pay by the ordinarie entrata, haue reſolued to chandge the mynt, and to remooue it into the Seraglio; wher they now giue out all the ſaddles, bridles, bitts, ſtirrups, chaynes, and ould plate of ſiluer and gould that can bee found, to make coyne. Thus they hope to patch vp their quiett for a tyme, without any care of the generall, or of the future.

THE ambaſſadors of Bethlem Gabor are returned, haueing obteyned their deſires; that is, a commiſſion to the baſſa of Agria as generall, to take the army of the border, in name 20000, in effect a third leſs, to aſſiſt the prince of Tranſiluanya, and to obey him.

THEY procured the vizier to preſs mee to write to his majeſtie, to vndertake the reſtoring of the prince elector into Bohemia; who vrdged this ſo far, as he declared a reſolution to maynteyne the leauge made with Hungarye and that kingdome, and the prouinces dependent, agaynſt the houſe of Auſtria. To this purpoſe, the grand ſignor hath written letters to the count Palatine, and others to the States of Holland; from whom they expect ſome ayd, promiſed here without any great ground, to countenance the deſſigne of Gabor, who is enterred into Hungarie, vpon aſſurance, that all the garriſons will reuolt, and open their ports to receiue him; and that the count Mansfield will attempt Sileſia. If he proſper in Hungarie, he will not ſtay there, but aduance his armyes into Bohemia, wher he hopes alſo to fynd a party ready to aſſiſt him, hauing ſome intelligence with thoſe of the religion oppreſſed: and this pretended for the reſtoring of the prince elector.

THE count of Torne is returned with them, with a reſolution to dye in the quarrell, or to recouer his inheritance: he hath a great confidence, that the Morauians will receiue him, and that his preſence will cauſe many to decline. I am perſwaded, if he could haue found any honorable retrayct, he would haue 1623.

accepted it. To this end he treated with the Venetians, who gaue him good woords, and ſome hope; but the leauge of the Voltaline grew cold, and was like to be decided at Rome; therfore he reſolued, omnia & ultima tentare.

In this enterpriſe of Gabor, he hath ſought to giue ſatisfaction of his integritye to all the miniſters of the chriſtian princes in this port; that he will not giue one foote of ground to the Turkes; that he might liue in peace, and, hauing no iſſue, ambition were madnes; but that, in thanckfullnes to God, who hath aduanced him to this dignitye, he cannot but uſe his power for the reſtoring of their liberty and religion to thoſe prouinces, with whom he had made leauge, and for the ſeruice of the count Palatine, as his ally. They haue viſited the French and Venetian, and made ther this proteſtation.

The grand ſignor, notwithſtanding this ſuccours giuen to Gabor, declares not warr agaynſt the emperor; but as protector of the kyngdome, bound to maynteyne their priuiledge of free election; yet the iſſue wilbe no leſs, for wee heare no more of the ambaſſador expected from Vienna, who will not truſt thoſe as frends, nor eſteeme them as newtralls, that actually, though couertly, invade them.

My opinion is, that this fire will turne to ſmoke; for they march not with canon, nor many foote; they may doe much ſpoyle, but hold nothing; except ther ſucceed a generall reuolt in all the prouinces, which is much ſuſpected.

To the KING.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

In this ocean of troubles and diſorders wherein I liue, I haue receiued your Majeſties gratious letter, as a cordiall and antidote, both againſt diſcontents and temptations. I euer vowed to your Majeſtie obedience and faithfullneſs, and you haue crowned my unworthy endeauours by your roial acceptance, which at once cheriſheth and rewardeth. I haue nott omitted to giue Sir George Caluert continuall account of the mutations in this court, where all things are ſo vncerteyne and vnſetled, that a wiſer man then I ſhall hazard his diſcretion to make any iudgment. I will nott preſume to trouble your Majeſtie with all particulars, referring to larger relations ſent Mr. ſecretary, who will abbreuiat and ſelect ſuch as wilbee moſt for your Majeſties ſeruice; ſome generalities your Majeſtie will accept, as occaſions to introduce the reſt, if your majeſtie uouchſafe to know them. Some moneths paſt I aduiſed your Majeſtie of the concluſion of the treaty, and peace made with Poland; which, after many difficulties, was ended, beeing aſſiſted with the authority of your roiall name, to the content of both, weary and unfitt for warre; which the duke of Zbarawsky hath, by his letters, acknowledged to your Majeſtie, and this ſtate daily promiſeth, as the only mediator and vmpire of all their differences. The priſoners vpon the concluſion ſett free, whoſe owne thanks, I hope, are long ſince preſented to your Majeſtie; the articles, as they were agreed, I diſpeeded the laſt poſt. Since, I haue ſeene a letter to the vizier, ſent to mee to tranſlate, complayning that the miniſters here haue changed many, and inſerted newe articles, contrary to the treaty, and preiudiciall to the ſtate of Poland; which made mee looke about for their copy; and I finde it true, hauing examined and compared them. The duke, while he was here, was uery reſolute and ſtiffe, and would yield to no diſhonor nor diſaduantage; butt gladd to eſcape out of the feares and dangers of this ungouerned ſtate, aſſoone as they were agreed, hee made ſo much haſt, that he truſted the vizier with the writing and ſigning; attending the deliuery about tenne miles from the citty. After three dayes he receiued them ſealed, and without further examination tooke horſe, and ſtaied not untill he arriued at Tergouiſta in Wallachia; where he had leiſure to find his error, and from thence wrott for reparation. I haue ſpoken with the vizier, who layes the fault uppon the chancellor; and though I perceiue not that they will alter, but rather expound thoſe additions, yett, I preſume, they are reſolued to keepe the peace for neceſſity. The Tartars, during the Treaty, and ſince, haue made ſome roades into Poland; and now the Coſſacks requite it in the Black-ſea, which both mutually ſeeke to preuent; and to that purpoſe the vizier hath ſent 13 gallies to change the prince of Tartaria, upon promiſe to deteyne that nation; and haue written and ſollicited mee

1623. to ſecond it, that the like prouiſion may be made to reſtrayne the Coſſacks; which beeing effected, there is no other occaſion of quarrell, the Turks affecting nothing more then to ſhutt upp this back-dore, that they may looke into Aſia and Hungary ſecurely. The doubt then only reſts in this, Whether either ſide haue authority ſufficient, beeing both thoſe nations liue upon ſpoile and robbery? And it is thought, that the former prince, now in poſſeſſion, longa dominatione obſirmatus, will not yield and ſurrender his dignity for feare of thoſe that are mutined at home, and cannott gouerne their owne ſoldioury. If this begett a ciuill warre in thoſe parts, it will ſecure the Poles, and perhaps infect theſe, who are apt to take any fire; and the Tartar hath a pretenſion upon this empire, for the murther of the laſt ſultan Oſman.

BETHLEM GABOR, ſince his firſt ambaſſadors, and upon the change of two viziers, hath ſent twice to the port other miniſters; they haue brought ſome offers and rumors from the States of Holland, and haue ſo farre preuailed with this, that they haue obteyned an ayd, in couler to recouer Hungary, contrary to the aduice of all the wiſeſt and antienteſt of the bench, who in this ſeaſon would not prouoke an enemy. The copy of the command to the baſſa of Agria, I ſent by the laſt poſt, wherby your Majeſtie may ſee the reſolution. Theſe miniſters are departed tenne dayes ſince, full of hope, that that kingdome will reuolt from the emperour upon the firſt alarum; and that all the prouinces united in that league, will follow the example. The motiues for this action were the danger of the encreaſe of the houſe of Auſtria, by their proſperity in Germany, the league made with thoſe cuntries which were taken into protection of the grand ſignor in the laſt Bohemian warres; the ruine of the count Palatine, and the prouocation of the States of Holland, and ſome promiſes vnable to be performed on their ſide, only giuen to kindle fire. To this reſolution and councell I was called, and urged to write, or receiue a letter, to your Majeſtie, to take part for the recouery of thoſe dominions loſt by the elector, preſſed thereto with ſo much ſharpneſs, that I dare not write it; concluding, that they would find another Frederick, that ſhould accept their offers. All theſe motions, though I had no power to diuert, yett I utterly diſauowed, and refuſed in your Majeſties name, to the loſſe of my creditt with this viſier, and the ſtate, who hold mee ſuſpected as a pentioner to their enemyes. The miniſters of Gabor endeauored to reconcile mee by all waies, with many apologies and proteſtations from their maſter, that hee would not ſubmitt one foot of chriſtian ground to the common enemy; as hauing no end butt the freedome and liberty of the religion, oppreſſed in thoſe parts; but I could not diſobey, nor rely uppon myne owne judgment, though their reaſons were forceable and probable, and the ill dealing with your Majeſties goodneſs and patience in your treaties might haue tempted mee, vntill I ſhould receiue your Majeſties further order, which now hath confirmed mee. God will recompence upon your roial head, your moſt chriſtian conſtancy, ſo much the rather, becauſe they who enioy the benefitt thereof, ſoe litle meritt it. I hope your Majeſtie will pardon mee this zeale to your ſeruice. I cannott obſerue, that the prince elector hath any knowledge or mixture in this treaty; butt his name is brought in, as an help to the deſignes of the other; yett there are two letters written to him from the grand ſignor, which rather prouoke him to retorne into Bohemia, then intimate any deſire, or motion from him. The count of Torne is gone back to Tranſiluania, beeing hopeleſs of any imployment from the Venetian, with whoſe ambaſſador hee treated heere, loath to looſe the opportunity to doe ſomwhat, upon the delayes of that ſtate. I perſwaded him to auoid any jealouſy or imputation eaſily caſt upon the prince, his profeſſed maſter, as priuy to theſe deſignes; to procure the copies of theſe letters to be ſent to your Majeſtie, which he hath counſelled, and I doubt not your Majeſtie ſhall receiue them. The ſubſtance only are encouragements and promiſes of ayd to reſettle him in Bohemia, if he will aduance with the pretended forces of the count Mansfield, and States of Holland, to whom are other letters written of the ſame tenor. This beeing the ſumme of what is done, your Majeſtie will giue mee leaue to deliuer my opinion of the true end of this enterprize: Bethlem Gabor feared, that the greatneſs and proſperity of the emperour would endanger his ſtate; and therfore tymely reſolued to procure ſuccours, and raiſe enemyes to trouble him: hee is aſſured of the reuolt of Hungary to his party. The grand ſignor is gladd to maynteyne him in the quarrell, for the election, that hee may break that chayne of ſucceſſion, now almoſt eſtabliſhed in the family of Auſtria: to this end, they would be gladd to bring back the elector, with his allies and frends. Butt if he appeare not, they will try their chance alone; and if Gabor proſper in Hungary, hee will aduance for himſelfe into Bohemia, and the prouinces dependent, who are as ready to ſhake off the yoake putt upon them by force, as euer: and I am perſwaded, the count of Torne, though concealed, was procurator for thoſe ſtates, to moue the Turk to relieue them, according to the league made with their commiſſioners, now two yeares paſt. I dare not giue my word, that Bethleem hath promiſed nothing to this ſtate, in preiudice of the common liberty; butt I know hee profeſſeth the contrary, ſo much, that I will not ſuſpect his faith, butt his neceſſity. The ayd of the Turk will bee of great uſe to him, though of no great danger, to ſubiect any part to themſelues, except by his owne default; for they haue no order to march with canon, nor yett with many foote; ſo that they expect not to enforce places unwilling to receiue them. But Bethlem hopes all will open to him, and ſhutt out the Turks, who haue order to obey him; and they ſeeme to affect nothing butt his eſtabliſhment, and acknowledgment by ſome tribute, which they pretend is due. All this is vndertaken on this ſide, without declaring to break with the emperour, as in protection of their allies: which yett hath ſtayed the ambaſſadors expected from Vienna; ſo that I iudge they will not eſteeme thoſe frends or neutralls, that actually offend them. What will enſue, I muſt referre to God, in whoſe hands are the hearts of princes; and to your Majeſtie, to make ſuch uſe thereof, as may beſt conduce to your owne moſt chriſtian reſolutions.

ACCORDING to command receiued from your Majeſtie, by letters from the lords of your Majeſties councell, I haue long ſince endeavored to reſtrayne the piratts of Tunes and Algier from the robberies on your ſubiects in theſe ſeas, as vaſſalls to this port; and to that end, procured commands and letters, the copies whereof I ſent your Majeſtie, and haue, from time to tyme, aduiſed of the ſucceſs; which now hauing brought to ſome concluſion, I humbly preſent to your Majeſtie, in a letter from Halil-baſſa, capteyne generall of the ſea, and in capitulations by him ſigned, as commiſſioner of the grand ſignor in this buſines: the originalls are ſent by the Roiall Exchange; the tranſlates and copies, by the laſt, and this poſt. And ſeeing I haue giuen a particular account hereof to the lords, I will not importune your Majeſtie with repetitions; only I will take the boldnes to beſeech your Majeſtie, for the common eaſe of your merchants and fiſhermen, that ſome preſent order may bee taken to confirme this peace on our parts; which if timely and really undertaken by ſuch as ſhallbee willing to aduenture, I am perſwaded it will bee held to the great aduancement of trafficque. And for myſelfe, that I may haue ſome order to pay my expence, by thoſe that ſhall receiue the benefitt, or otherwiſe, as your Majeſtie, in your wiſdome, ſhall allott it mee; my priuat fortune beeing too weake to beare the publicque charge.

THE generall ſtate of this empire rather declynes to utter ruyne, then riſeth to any hope of reparation. The rebellions in Aſia ioyne and proſper; the ſouldiour is ſtill mutined, and daily changeth the great officers; they ſhare the reuenue at their pleaſure; which not being enough to pay them, (and they will not be retrenched) exactions and confiſcations are neceſſary medicines to preuent a generall ſacke. There is no care of the publicque. The emperour is an innocent, or worſe; the nephewes, children: the viziers, at the deuotion of the janizaries, mainteyne themſelues by force of daily donatiues, which they exact againe of the ſubiect: ſo that there wants nothing butt ſome ſtrong hand to puſh this tottering wall. God, for his glory, turne the eyes of the ambitions of Chriſtendome, that ſtriue for acres, in compariſon of this great monarchy, this way, where there is fuell and matter enough, expoſed and eaſy.

I HAUE ſcarſe courage to ask your Majeſtie pardon, when I looke back upon myne owne tediouſnes: butt it was a fault not purpoſed, and therfore your Majeſties wonted grace will excuſe it. I beſeech Allmighty God bleſs and proſper your Majeſtie, and all your purpoſes, to his glory, and your eternall renowne.

Conſtantinople,

Your Majeſties moſt humble and faithful ſeruant.

Extract of a Letter to my Lord of ARUNDELL. Conſtant. $\frac{1}{10}$ Maij, 1623.

My Lord,

I HAVE receaued from your lordſhip two fauours, in that you pleaſe to command mee any ſeruice: and though theſe tumultuous tymes hinder mee from an exact performance, and ſuch as might giue your lordſhip full aſſurance of my readyneſs; yett I doubt not you will accept of what I can, and, in your wiſdome, conſider, that the diſtractions here breed feares, and needleſs jealouſies; and the daily mutations of officers giue vs ſome frends, ſome foes, all ſo full of trouble, that I ſcarce liue ſafely, much leſſe in power to doe your lordſhip, or the generall, ſeruice. To giue you accompt of ſomwhat: The command you required for the Greeke to be ſent into Morea, I haue ſollicited two viziers, one after the other; butt they both reiected mee, and gaue anſwere, That it was no tyme to graunt ſuch priuiledges: Nor, if I had obteyned them, would they haue bene of any vſe, where there is no obedience, nor eſtimation of their kinge; butt euery pety officer exacts, and makes vſe of his place, to gett money. The reaſons giuen mee, were grounded vpon needleſs ſuſpitions, that ſuch a command might bee vſed to view the ſea-coaſt, and to take ſome aduantage vpon the diſcouery. And I haue found they are very fearfull of ſome reuolt in theſe parts, or, at leaſt, of ſome enterpriſe from the Spaniards: ſo that, not without ſome offence, the motion was receiued.

NEARE to the port they haue not ſo great doubt, and therfore I haue preuailed for another, ſent Mr. Markham, aſſiſted with a letter from the capten baſſa, whoſe juriſdiction extends to all the iſlands and ſea-ports; the copy wherof I herewith ſend your lordſhip, that you may ſee it is ſufficient, though not ſo large as was mentioned by a copy ſent mee: but hee hath ſo good experience in this cuntry, that hee knowes how to make vſe of it; and that ſome things by him required, were impoſſible to obteyne, as beeing againſt their law and cuſtomes: ſuch as it is, I beſeech your lordſhip to take in good part; and to beleeue, that it was very difficult to procure ſo much; and I hope the effects therof will content you.

ANTIQUITIES in gold and ſiluer, of the antient Greeks, from Alexander downward, and many Romans more antient, are here to be gathered; butt ſo deare, by reaſon the laſt French ambaſſador made great ſearch, and ſome Italians are ready to buy, that I know not whether your lordſhip will eſteeme them at ſuch rates. The meddles of gold, or olde quoyne, if they bee faire, and the inſcriptions ledgible, are held at twice and thrice the waight. Some, for curioſity, I haue bought, with others pretended to be Ægiptian, Armenian, and Arabian: but my skill is not great, I iudge only by the eye; theſe ſhall ſerue your lordſhip, if you like them.

I MAY alſo light of ſome pieces of marble by ſtealth; as now I am offered a lyon to the waſt, of pure white, holding a bulls head in his clawes; butt the very noſe and mouth is defaced, the reſt very faire, and, they ſay, a l'antiqua: I haue not yett ſeene it, butt expect it howrely, if the ſhipp meet it not: it was taken vp at Lampſacum in Natolia. On Aſia ſide, about Troy, Zizicum, and all the way to Aleppo, are innumerable pillers, ſtatues, and tombſtones of marble, with inſcriptions in Greeke: theſe may be fetcht at charge and ſecrettly; butt yf wee ask leaue, it cannot be obteyned; therefore Mr. Markham will vſe diſcretion, rather then power, and ſo the Turks will bring them for their proffitt.

I KNOW the worth of Mr. Markham, now our conſull, ſoe well, that I ſhould wrong my ſelfe, if in all things I gaue him not his due: butt beeing recommended as one your lordſhip reſpects, it ſhall oblige mee to all particular offices of frendſhipp; and therof, I hope, hee ſhall in tyme giue teſtimony. ——

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON: Relation of the Affairs of Chriſtendom continued to Sir THOMAS ROE at Conſtantinople.

My very good Lord, Hagh, this 26th of May, 1623. ſtylo vet.

WHILST the depoſition of Franckendale, and ſurceance of armes for the Palatinat, have bene treating in England, wee haue had here a ſurceance of affaires, and haue ſpent part of this tyme of leyſure in two merry iorneyes: one, to ſee a fleete ready to putt to ſea in Gorreys Gatt, an haven on the other ſide of the Brill iſland; the other, to viſitt Breda in Brabant, the prince of Oranges chiefeſt ſeignorie; in whoſe caſtle the king and queene of Bohemia, with theyr whole trayne, were lodged and defrayed by his excellency for the ſpace of five dayes; which tyme they ſpent in viſitting the new fortifications, and places of pleaſure, within and without the towne, vpon which great coſt hath bene of late beſtowed; wherby it is made one of the ſtrongeſt and fayreſt townes of warre in Europe.

THE fleete, to which the king and queene were conducted likewiſe, and defrayed by his excellency, who lodged them one night at the Brill, was the ſame of which I aduertiſed your lordſhip long ſince to have bene prepared to have ſett out of the Texel the laſt yeare; but looſing the ſeaſon for want of fitt proviſions, hath wintered in the new haven at Helford-ſluce; and after many changes in the equippage, is finally putt out, and by this tyme, we thincke, as far as the coaſt of Spayne, conſiſting of ſeaven men of warre, three victuallers, and one pinnaſſe; in all which are 1500 men, ſoldiers and maryners, proper for both ſervices; the ſoldiers for ſea, and the mariners for land; and ſo are they conditioned with to be employed according to occaſions, being victualled for 30 monthes. Their deſſigne is not yet divulged; and becauſe the admirall l'Hermite and the vice-admirall have chiefly traded into the Eaſt Indyes, the common opinion is, their voyage lyes that way: but I have many reaſons to beleeve they are bound for the Weſt Indyes, there to ſeeke their adventure both by ſea and land; and by la Mers paſſage, yf they find nothing to ſettle vpon in the Weſt, to returne and take in lading at the Eaſt Indyes; from whence here are newly arrived two ſhipps, not over-richly laden, as will appeare to your lordſhip by the note I ſend herewith. The newes theſe ſhipps bring are of no great moment; onely wee heare of five ſmall frigatts the Duch have taken and burnt about Malacca; and have loſt a great ſhip going betwixt Banda and Amboyna, in which were 75 men, and thereof 43 were drowned. Our Engliſh company hath likewiſe loſt a fayre ſhip, called The Triall, vpon the coaſt of Jaua, ſent out of England with her full lading, and in her 97 men: in recompence whereof they have a ſhip from thence, which came in company of theſe two Duch, laden with peper, mace, and nutmegs. This Duch company doth now begin to performe the accord made lately in England, having payd to the Engliſh factor at Amſterdam 200 thouſand gylders, in part of that was agreed for reſtitution of our mens loſſes: the reſt will ſpeedily follow.

THE ennemy hath made an invaſion, theſe few dayes paſt, into our rivers of Zeeland, with 14 ſhalopps, in which were about 300 men, maryners and ſoldiers; which parting from Blackenburgh, paſt without impeachment on the outſide of the iſle of Walkeren, and by Serickſea returned through the Scheld to Antwerp; in which voyage they tooke divers fiſhers and paſſage botes, and out of all 36 priſoners.

WEE begin here to take the alarum of the ennemyes ſtirring, here being newes of theyr preparation for laying theyr bridge over the Rhyne, about Berck: yet want of money makes the States ſlow in taking on theyr garriſon holders, which is the firſt ſtep they make towards the field, though they have bene long in hand with that leavye, and augment it this year 2000 men above ordinary. Some helpe, notwithſtanding, is come out of France; from whence the States ambaſſador, Monſ. Langrac, hath exchanged hether 400 thouſand florins, as part of 200 thouſand crownes now to be furniſhed by that king; and Philip Calandrini, newly returned into theſe parts by Paris out of Italy, hath vndertaken the reſt of the 200 thouſand crownes: ſo as the whole ſumme wilbe payd to the States by the end of July next.

1623. HERE arrived out of France, the laſt weeke, de Beauſſe, the duke of Sauoyes agent; and Dolbier, the count Mansfelts marchant; who with Soiran, this reſident of Venice, did firſt addreſſe themſelves to du Maurier, this French ambaſſador; and together went afterwards to the prince of Orange, and the States, to declare the order they have to take the count Mansfelt, with his army, into ſervice of their league, with an entertaynement of 60 thouſand crownes a month, to be furniſhed by the three confederats pro rata; of which they have preſent order for two monthes advance: and thereof 20 thouſand florins are delivered in France for leavyes of 4000 foote, which are to be about this tyme at Bullen. And theyr concluſion with the States was a demand of ſhipping for tranſport; which the States refuſed to give, but left it free to them to hyre for money; which they are not to diſburſe till de Beauſſe hath bene with the count Mansfelt, to preſent certayne conditions vnto him; which he is to accept, before they can goe any further. And though he be not a man to refuſe any conditions, when there is queſtion of receaving money, and the money is ready; yet in ſuch diſtance of place, and difference of tyme, and diverſity of perſons, which have theyr hands in thoſe affaires, I doe not ſee how they can goe on without much confuſion.

COUNT Mansfelt, in the meane tyme, prepares for his departure out of Eaſt-frizeland, to which countrey he hath propoſed a payment of 500 thouſand florins for a farewell; otherwiſe he threatens to ſell the ſame, as his owne proprietye, au plus offrant, having already tendred it to the king of Denmarke for that ſumme after he was refuſed by the count of Eaſt-frizeland, and the countrey; who ſaying in paſſion, He was not to give money to one who vſed him like an ennemy; count Mansfelt thereupon declared, He would be his ennemy; and accordingly tooke his ſervants priſoners, and made priſe of his wagons, which he ſent for his proviſions out of Norden, whether the count of Eaſt-frizeland is retyred, and in protection of the States garriſon: but vpon a civill meſſage carryed by one of the States officers from the count of Eaſt-frizeland to the count of Mansfelt, That what he ſayd, proceeded onely out of ſenſe of his owne loſſes, not out of diſaffection to count Mansfelts perſon, he ſet his ſervants at liberty agayne, and ſent him word, He was his ſervant. And now the States ſend a deputy thether, to be preſent at Mansfelts remove, with inſtruction to aſſiſt the count of Eaſt-frizeland; but chiefly to have an eye, that the ennemy take no advantage of ſuch confuſions, as are like to happen in that countrey. Since the count Mansfelts ſodaine warre and peace with the count of Eaſt-frizeland, he hath a breach with the count of Oldenburgh, about the paſſage of a dyke in his countrey; in the diſpute whereof 17 of count Mansfelts men were ſlayne: whervpon he hath ſent 1000 horſe, and ſome foote, to take his revenge.

THERE hath bene much labour to reduce the duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick to the emperours obedience; for whome the king of Denmarke had procured the emperors pardon: and that being ſent by a herald to Wolfenbuttle, with condition, that the duke ſhould preſently diſarme, and licenſe his troops; and an addition vnder the emperors owne hand, that unles he did readily accept the pardon, with the conditions, he would never graunt it to him agayne; the herald, for feare, durſt not preſent the pardon himſelf, but he delivered the ſame to the dukes brother, and his mother the dowager; who ſending it to the duke the firſt of this preſent, he tare it in peeces, and ſtamped it in the dyrt; ſaying, That he would abyde all extremity before he would diſarme, till he ſaw the king and queene of Bohemia, for whome he firſt entred into armes, reſtored to theyr eſtates, and then he would be content to receave his pardon with theyrs. The duke of Brunſwick and ducheſſe-dowager are gone to the king of Denmarke, now in Holſteyn; whither they would have drawne with them the duke Chriſtian; but he excuſed himſelf, becauſe he would not be preſt by the king of Denmarke againſt his minde.

THE States ſhipps lying before Lyth in Scottland, to garde an Oſtender from comming out, have aſſayled and fyred the Oſtender, which was run on ſhore, attempting a new way to putt to ſea; which was done in that ill manner, that I am well aſſured, his majeſty wilbe much offended thereat: and, by way of proviſion for ſatiſfaction, I have moved the States with ſuch menaces as belong to the buſines; for which I am ſufficiently authoriſed to putt the captaynes of theyr ſhipps in priſon, who have committed the fact, and to withdraw the like garde they hold before Aberdene.

NOW I haue done with all affaires within my knowledge, worth your lordſhips, 1623.
I muſt beguin with my thancks for your lordſhips letters, (of which the laſt were of the 22 March / 2 April) which haue no whit deceaued my expectation of the returne I promiſed my ſelf of my aduenture into thoſe remote parts; and now your lordſhip may exſpect continually from hence, what theſe quarters afford, ſince we are ſo well in the way of a ſettled correſpondence. Herewith I ſend your lordſhip a letter from the queen of Bohemia, which was written for the laſt ordinarie, but came too late to my hands. The ſtorie of Hero and Leander drew it from her, the ſequele whereof ſhe much longues after; and, I hope, we ſhall haue it with your next. Your lordſhips remembrance of the prince of Orange, and count Henry, is kindly accepted by them both; and your other frends, mentioned in your former letters, are glad to finde your mindfulnes of them at ſuch diſtance. Courtney, with his fonde wife, liues here in towne. Burrows, hauing kept Frankendale with honor, and rendred it in obedience, is gon with his Engliſh troopes into England. Harwood ſhall be coronel of my lord Liſles regiment. Cooke is lately dead of ſicknes. We buried here, the laſt weeke, the old count Solms, chiefe counſellor to the king of Bohemia, and granmaiſtre of the Palatinat; whoſe faire daughter, Amely, is count Henries miſtres, and it is belieued he will marrie her, though ſhe hath nothing but herſelf; but he hath enough for both. Here hath bin lately Sir Will. Crofts, ſent expreſly out of Spain from the prince, to ſee the queen of Bohemia; which was no ſmall comfort vnto her. He is returned by England, and is like to finde the prince againe in Spaine, whoſe buſines drawes into more length then were to be wiſhed; the chiefe cauſe of his jorney being (as his highnes himſelf hath written vnto me) to cutt of delayes in his match: which God make proſperous vnto him. Theſe princes are well in health, (thancks be to God) and otherwiſe, as well contented, as ſo hard an eſtate as theyrs can ſuffer. Your lordſhips affection, which you expreſſe ſo fully, is not loſt; for I know none hath more intereſt in theyr fauours. Thus I kiſſe your ladies hands, and wiſh you both health with all happines.

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionat ſeruant,

D. CARLETON.

To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON, Conſtantinople, May 30. 1623.

My very good Lorde,

I CANNOTT confeſſe the receipt of 5 late letters from your lordſhip, from the dates of Feb. 6. to the 3. Aprill, without accuſing myſelfe of too much lazineſs; for I cannott impute any omiſſion to want of matter, when this citty daily brings forth monſters, and ſo much ſubiect of contemplation. Yours haue filled mee with the knowledge of occurrents with you, and neare you; of conſpiracies, treaſons, frends, and enemyes, alike ſpoiling or threatening one another; ſo that, when I conſider the parts, and rotten members, I am enforced to change my prophecye of the ruyne of this ſtate, to beleeue the whole frame of this vniuerſall theatre is ready to diſſolue; for I ſhall retorne you nothing butt diſſeaſes, tyrannyes, defections, rumors of warre, and deſolation. Butt firſt I muſt cleare myſelfe from that accuſation, which all the poſtſcripts of your lordſhips letters lay vpon mee; that you haue not receiued any from mee, and that you ſowe ſtill in a barren ſoyle, in hope of ſome retribution. I acknowledge that your lordſhip ſhall looſe by mee in quality, and ſhall ſcarſe reape your ſeed againe; but ſuch as this ſoyle yields, I haue not bene ſparing of, either grayne or weeds. I am confident, by this tyme, your ſelfe will acquitt mee; for I haue June 17.
written your lordſhip thoſe whoſe dates ſtand in the margent, and allwayes ſent July 1. ſecond copies, for more ſecurity. Since my laſt, wee haue ſuffered great variety; Sept. 20. Jan. 25.
I will adventure with you, res geſtas barely, and omitt any cenſure or comment; Mar. 22.
becauſe wee liue vnder a vizier, whoſe conſcience and guiltineſs keepes him awake, ſo that hee hath a ſquint-eye vpon all wayes; and our letters of May were intercepted, and ſold in the citty to wrapp pepper. This hath made vs more wary, though Engliſh bee a kind of character: yett, becauſe I would not looſe the freedome of communication of thoughts, as well as of acts, and that it may fall out that ſome of them wilbee dangerous to aduiſe, I haue ſent your lordſhip one, to vſe as a ſpectacle, when I ſhall haue occaſion to write in darkneſs. I muſt looke backe

1623. then to the diſpatches of the ambaſſadours of Tranſiluania, who departed this court about the 20th Aprill, hauing receiued full content of their negociation, by the fauour of this vizier. The prince is in Caſſouia, the Turkiſh ayd gathered to the frontier; butt neither vſe to take the field, till the horſes haue eaten graſſe, and 20 dayes after enſeamed; which will finiſh June.

I DOE not heare that their force ioyned wilbee very greate, though diuerſly reported; nor that they intend to march with canon, to beſeege any place at firſt: but Bethleems hope depends vpon theſe two ſtrings; intelligence in Hungary, where he expecteth a generall reuolt, and that all the garriſons will open to him; and vpon the retorne of the king of Bohemia, or at leaſt of count Mansfield, into Sileſia, where hee hath alſo correſpondence, and is not in deſpaire, that vpon the firſt apparance of an army, Morauia, by the fauour of the count of Torne his frends, will follow the example. This is his true deſſigne, and if it proſper in Hungary, hee may offer his ayd to our frends; butt, if they refuze, I am perſwaded hee will vſe his firſt aduantage for himſelfe, euen as far as Prague. The count of Torne is retorned, reſolued to runne that fortune, and to dye in the quarrell (for his thoughts to Venice grewe deſperate, aſſoone as the Treaty of Voltaline made that rumor cold); and I haue ſtill collected from his confidence, that they had ſome great aſſurance from all the prouinces, to ſhake off their preſent yoake. To this end they haue procured diuers letters from the grand ſignor to the king of Bohemia, and to the States of Holland; and, which is moſt ſtrange, the Turks profeſſe the giuing of theſe aydes, for the releaſe and protection of the proteſtant princes and religion, oppreſſed by the houſe of (Auſt.). The Turks take vpp our quarrell! I know they haue other ends; butt what end God hath, who can foreſee? Butt this enterprize hath many weak foundations; for if this vizier bee changed, who is vniuerſally hated, thoſe ayds wilbee recalled. If the hopes of a reuolt, or chriſtian ſuccours expected, fayle, they wilbee diſcontent and weary; laſtly, if the emperour bee able to make any good ſhowe in the field, thoſe that now wauer wilbee afraid to declare. In the meane tyme, wee heare no more of the haſty comming of Cæſar Gallo, who houers about the border, butt dares not come in, while this tirant ſitts at the helme; butt vpon the firſt change hee will come poſt, with offers of peace, which will not bee refuſed.

THE duke of Zbarawsky arriuing at Tergouiſta in Walachia, had leiſure to read the articles of peace giuen him; for he truſted to the agreement, and tooke them ſealed: there hee found, that they had altered many points, and inſerted newe, to the preiudice of the honor and eſtate of Poland. Of this hee hath complayned by letter, butt as yett can procure no ſatiſfaction; and whether the king his maſter and the parlament will accept them, as they are, it is yett doubtful. The Coſſacques haue entered the Black-ſea, and giuen many alarums to the citty: whereupon letters were diſpatched into Poland, that this yeare they would make the beſt interpretation; butt if in the next, when they may haue tyme to ſuppreſſe and keepe them in, better order bee not taken, according to the treaty, they will take it for an actuall breach. And to giue both example and aſſurance of their parts, the grand ſignor hath ſent twelue gallies to eſtabliſh Mahomet Gheray prince of the Tartars, and to diſplace Gean Begh, who hath bene in long poſſeſſion. Many did thinke, that hee would not ſurrender his eſtate for a letter, and ſo ſmall force, nor for feare of thoſe that are mutined at home; butt that this would proue an occaſion of a warre, that would ſpread itſelfe to the gates of Conſtantinople: for thoſe princes of Tartary are, by agreement, to ſucceed the Ottoman lyne, of which the remnant is the preſent emperour, a (   ), and children diſeazed or young, and vncapable of gouerment; and it is not long ſince it was feared here, that hee that is now diſpoſſeſſed, and therfore had good occaſion, would pretend for himſelfe preſently; as the right beeing deuolued vpon him for the murther of Oſman, the true prince. Butt this man hath obeyed, and is come hither to liue vpon a penſion, which is as ſtrange as any thing in theſe confuſions. They pretend to haue made this alteration, to ſecure the treaty with Poland, by reſtrayning the incurſions of that vagabond nation; and haue entreated mee to aduiſe as much, and to counſell a reciprocality in care for the Coſſacques. I find really, that this ſtate (howſoeuer it juggleth) affects nothing more then to maynteyne that peace, to ſecure the back-dore of the Black-ſea; which doth them more affronts, and giues them more feares, then a greater enemy; for hereby the reliefe of the citty with victualls is much diſturbed, and their force of gallies diuided and the enemy a fugitiue, from whom they can neither reape honor nor benefitt: ſo that the Polacks may haue aſſured peace on that ſyde, if they giue not the occaſion. The gallyes are gone out, in nomber about 45, from all ſorts, yll armed, rather to maynteyne cuſtome, then in hope to attempt any thing with ſoldiours, that obey no command; for 14 dayes before their departure, they committed ſo many inſolencyes, that no ſhopp was open in the citty nor ſubburbs. They robbed in the ſtreets, brake open houſes, exacted moneyes euen of the magiſtrate; and no man durſt oppoſe them, for feare of a generall ſack. Beeing ariued at Gallipoly, a citty of Greece in the Helleſpont, they thought to continue the like outrages; but the inhabitants roſe, reſiſted them, and beate them out; and with the loſſe of 10 or 12, ſlewe 60 of the Janizaries. Thus they are proceeded into the Leuant, your lordſhip will judge with what probability of any action.

THE rebellions in Aſia continue, and a newe raiſed, at Van in the frontire of Perſia, where they haue refuſed the baſſa ſent from the port, and ſeazed the Carauan of ſilke paſſing for Aleppo. Wee heare of an army raiſed, rather to treat then to enforce them; butt as yett of none effect.

ABOUT 12 dayes paſt, the Spahees mutined in the ſeraglio againſt the aga of the Janizaries, for doing juſtice vpon one of their order, who was forced to fly into the diuan, or counſell chamber; where, the vizier hating the great treaſorer, layd the fault on him as the promouer; clapt him in priſon; confiſcated his eſtate, which was a great one, and all the fault hee had; and with this money, quieted the ſoldiours. Since, hee hath ſent the poore man, they ſay, into baniſhment; butt wee think, a fiſhing.

FOWER dayes ſince, the vizier raſhly beating a caddee, or judge, with blowes on the feete, from which puniſhment thoſe of his coate are priuiledged, as beeing all a kind of churchmen, all thoſe of his order roſe; and ioyning with the diſcontented Spahees, ranne to the churches, ſhutt vpp the dores, and prohibited canonicall howres, to cry to Mahomet, and demanded the viziers life, as a tranſgreſſor of the lawe, and a tyrant. This vprore putt us all into feare: it endured two dayes, and at leaſt 20000 on both ſides ready to come to blowes. The churchmen tooke their prophetts banner, and proclaymed, That all good Muſſelmen ſhould follow them. The vizier caſt himſelfe into the protection of the Janizaries, and procured his act to bee auowed by the emperour, made himſelfe a brother of their order, (whoſe fauour hee acquires by daily donatiues, which hee exacts from the innocent) and, in the night, ſetts vpon the mutineers, and with the ſlaughter of 12, diſbands them. The next morning they reaſſemble, and it was thought impoſſible to decide this controuerſy without more bloud; but mediators preuayled; peace is made; and the vizier new ſettled, and hardened in bold attempts. Since, hee hath catched many churchmen and Spahees, and ſent them to Charen, and followes the reſt ſo vehemently, that moſt of the caddees fly the citty, and the Spahees hang the head. This day, at leaſt 200 are departed into Aſia with mynds ſwollen with reuenge; and, I am perſwaded, wee ſhall heare of them againe with more noiſe then they departed. The vizier purpoſeth to augment the nomber of the Janizaries as his guard, and to ſuppreſſe the other; yett the reuenue allready will not pay the ordinary the treaſure exhauſted, and no man will forbeare his ſtipend a day; but exactions and confiſcations, as neceſſary euills and remedyes, to preuent a generall ſack, are now allmoſt iuſtified by cuſtome.

THIS (my lord) is our eſtate; the canker breeds within, that muſt eat this tree; and they that profeſs themſelues their greateſt enemyes are their beſt frends, by whoſe vnproffitable ambitions they have tyme to breath. To make vpp a heape of miſery, wee haue a generall dearth of corne and fodder, in which I ſhall haue my part.

From Sir GEORGE CALUERT.

My Lord,

AS often as your letters come into my hands, his majeſtie is made acquainted with them, who doth continually approoue well of your endeavours; and as often would I advertiſe your lordſhipp of the receipt of them, and of ſuch occurrences as happens heere, if I were not hindred by the multiplicity of other buſineſſes; but having not that leaſure nor occaſion, I muſt intreate you to excuſe my ſilence, and the rather, becauſe, I ſuppoſe, you receiue from the hands of your other friends, the paſſages of all things heere, wherein I hope my coſen Branthwayte is not wanting to furniſh your lordſhipp plentifully and frequently. There is the leſſe therefore remayning for mee to ſay, for matter of newes; and for buſineſſe, vnleſſe the occaſion proceeds from thence, there is as litle; in both which I ſhall not giue you much trouble at this time.

THE great loſſes our merchants haue lately receiued by the pirats of Argier and Tunis, whereof there hath beene ſo many complaints, haue made your ſervice the more acceptable vnto his majeſty, and the lords of his privie councell, in indeavoring by the meanes and power of the grand ſignior, to free our merchants from the future danger and ſpoyle of thoſe wicked people, and, to redeeme diverſe of his majeſties ſubjects taken priſoners by them. In the perfourmance whereof, as ſoone as I vnderſtood that you had diſburſed ſome moneys, I acquainted their lordſhipps with it, who haue giuen directions, that the Leuant merchants, and the reſt of the Engliſh traders into the South-ſeas, ſhall preſently take order amongſt themſelues for the rayſing of ſo much money as will ſatisfy your demaunds; and what power ſhalbee wanting in them to effect the ſame, their lordſhipps will ſupply; which I ſhall bee carefull to ſee perfourmed.

ALL the letters that are ſent by you to the ſtate and the merchants heere, are not only deteyned a long time in Venice, but alſo there cutt and mangled moſt diſgracefully by ſuch long inciſions made in the ſides of the pacquetts, as that all the looſe and vnſealed papers within thoſe pacquetts may bee eaſily taken forth and read. What vſe or advantage may bee made at Venice by this vnkind vſage of the letters, I knowe not; but I am ſure it is a greate diſcourtiſy, and vncivill part, ill beſeeming the amity and good reſpect that ſigniory would ſeeme to beare to his majeſty; whereof I haue lately complayned in his name to the Venetian ambaſſadour heere reſident, and to Sir Henry Wotton, telling them how ſenſible his majeſtie is of this, and deſiring a ſpeedy reformation; which the ambaſſadour heere tells mee, I ſhall heereafter find, ſo as there ſhalbee no further cauſe of complaint.

THE notice of the princes journey and ſafe arrivall in Spaine, in company of the lord admirall, together with the greate entertainment his highneſſe hath receiued from the king of Spaine, you haue heard long ſince: they are yet at Madrid, negotiating the concluſion of the marriage, whereof wee do expect the advertiſement every hower, by the comming of the lord viſcount Rochford, who (as I vnderſtand) is appointed the meſſenger of the day aſſigned there for the celebration of the marriage, as the erle of Denbigh is afterwards to followe, with notice of the conſommation thereof; and then the lord viſcount Andouer, to bring word of their departure from Spaine towards England; ſo that, it is hoped, the prince will ſafely returne hether with his faire princeſſe by the midſt of July next at the furtheſt; and for this purpoſe there are ten of his majeſties beſt ſhipps (whereof the prince royall is one) prepared, and now ready in the Downes attending the commodity of a winde, vnder the commaund of the erle of Rutland, whom his majeſty hath made admirall of theſe ſhipps, to tranſport from the Groyne his highneſſe with all his company, vnto Southampton; for there it is expected they will land: vnto which place his majeſty hath ſent, within theſe three dayes, diverſe of the lords; as the lord treaſorer, the lord ſteward, the lord marq. Hamilton, the lord marſhall, the lord chamberlain, the erle of Carliſle, and Mr. treſorer of the howſhold, to giue order for all things fitting for the reception of the prince, aſwell there, as in other places in his paſſage to London.

CONCERNING the affayres of Germany, they ſtand thus: His majeſty perceiving the emperours violent proceedings, by transferring the electorall dignity vpon the perſon of the duke of Bauaria in the late diett at Ratisbone, and ſeeing no meanes left to releeue the towne of Franquendal, blocqued vp on every ſide, did thinke fitting, about two monethes ſince, by a treaty betwixt commiſſioners appointed by himſelf, and the infanta, to depoſite and ſequeſter that towne in the infantaes hands for eighteen monethes, to bee then reſtored againe to his majeſtie. This being done, the ſame commiſſioners beganne a new treaty for the ſuſpenſion of armes in Germany, which is not long ſince agreed, to continue for fifteen monethes; and the citty of Collen appointed the place of treaty for the generall accommodation, where commiſſioners on all ſides are to meete on the fowrth of Auguſt next, to reconcile all thoſe vnhappy differences in Germany, which concerne the prince electour Palatine; the ſucceſſe whereof I ſhall heartily pray may be anſwerable to his majeſties juſt and peaceable intentions.

I CAN write of nothing elſe worthy your lordſhipps advertiſement, ſaving that it hath pleaſed his majeſty, a fortnight ſince, to conferre the dignities of erle of Newcaſtle, and duke of Richemond, on the lord ſteward; and of erle of Couentry, and duke of Buckingham, upon my lord admirall: And ſo wiſhing your lordſhipp much health and happineſſe, I committ you to Gods protection, and reſt

Your Lordſhipps aſſured freind, to do you ſervice,

GEO. CALUERT.

I MAY not forgett to kiſſe my ladyes hands, whoſe ſervant I ſhall ever be, aſwell for her owne vertues and meritt, as for her ſake, that, whilſt ſhee lived, loved her dearely, I am ſure.

I RECEIVED your diſpatch yeſternight, of the 5 of Aprill, miſerably vſed at Venice, the cover quite torne open, and the letters opened; whereof I have made a freſh complaint to the Venetian ambaſſador, who acknowledgeth it to be a great iniury, but caſts it vpon the inferior officers of the juncta, and will write againe earneſtly to haue it reformed.

THE beginning of this next weeke my lords will meete, and not before; at which tyme I ſhall acquaynt them with your lordſhipps carefull proceeding in that buſyneſſe of Algier and Tunis, and his majeſty in the meane tyme.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

THE much buſines I have had of late with the prince elector, about his ſubſcribing a ſuſpenſion of armes for 15 monthes, concluded betwixt his majeſtie and the infanta, and ratifyed by them both, and with the States, touching the burning of an Oſtend ſhip at Leeth in Scottland, with other croſſe matters at ſea, hath forced me to make a new breach into our wonted correſpondency; which I beſeech your lordſhip to excuſe. In both theſe affaires, the ſmall ſatisfaction eyther his highneſs or the States give me in theyr doings, makes them addreſſe themſelves directly to his majeſty by theyr letters; the one requiring interpretation of ſome points of the treaty, which he thincks prejudiciall to himſelf, his frends, and cauſe in generall; and hopes that, vpon better conſideration, his majeſty will not preſſe him to ſubſcribing: the other diſavowing the action at Leeth, and other accidents, as done without their order, and intreating pardon, with due ſubmiſſion: but I believe neyther of theſe buſineſſes will ſo end.

THE emperor hath already made vſe of this ſuſpenſion of armes, having given notice thereof to the elector of Saxe, as a thing already done by the prince Palatin; wherby to divert him and Brandenburgh from entring into armes. And, no doubt, he will take the like courſe with Bethlem Gabor, to hinder his ſtirring anew; as he did further his laſt peace, by the newes of the prince electors ſubmitting himſelf to his majeſty for reſignation of his intereſt in Bohemia. He hath further required the elector of Saxe to ſend deputyes to the treaty, which is to be held during this ſuſpenſion: but the elector refuſeth to yeald thervnto, vntill he be made acquainted upon what points they ſhall treate, and what princes, or whoſe ambaſſadors and deputyes, ſhalbe preſent.

THE duke of Bauaria hath preſt the emperor very earneſtly by letters, to free themſelves of ſo troubleſome an ennemy as count Mansfelt is, by graunting vnto him his pardon. Wherupon the emperor hath written to the king of Denmarke, and the 1623. count of Oldenburgh, to preſent a pardon to Mansfelt, conditionally, that he will preſently diſarme: which he was never further from, he having accepted the conditions propoſed unto him by the French king, and the other confederats, for the warre of Valtoline; which are, That he muſt mayntayne 20 thouſand foote, with betwixt 4 or 5000 horſe, at the rate of 60 thouſand crownes a month; of which 30 thouſand are furniſhed by the French king, 20 thouſand by the Venetians, and 10 thouſand by the duke of Savoy: for which the two firſt monthes payments are here advanced, the payment having courſe from the day of his marching; which, after the two firſt monthes, is aſſigned to be receaved at Baſil: the duchy of Burgundy being the place appointed where he is to render himſelf, the way being left to his owne choiſe; about which he comes hether within a day or two, to conſult with the prince of Orange of his beſt meanes of marching, now his French troopes are come into theſe partes, to the number of 4000, in ſeverall companies, and already gone towardes Eaſt-frizeland, but in much diſorder, a great part of them being halfe famiſhed for want of victualls betwixt Bullen and Dort; in which paſſage they ſpent fower dayes with one meales proviſion onely: and two ſhipps full of ſoldiers, wee heare, are caſt away in theſe laſt tempeſts neare Encuſen; others run aſhore about Harlinghen: which is a rude welcome to thoſe ſtrangers, and will doubtles much diſcourage them; ſo as with the hard fare they will meete with in Eaſt-frizeland, where all, in effect, is conſumed, it is thought, few of them will ſtay by it.

THE duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick hath intercepted letters paſſing from Tilly to Anholt and Cordoua, wherin he advertiſeth them of the treaty betwixt his majeſty and the infanta, of ſuſpenſion of armes: but doubting that the duke Chriſtian will not ſubmitt himſelf thervnto, adviſeth them to draw vp towards him, that they may ioinctly give him battell. For which the duke will not be vnprepared, he being 20 thouſand foote, and 5000 horſe; for part of which he wanteth armes, but is now ſupplyed from Amſterdam, by helpe of the States, with armes for 5000 foote, and 2000 horſe, and ſome canon, with canoniers entertayned by this ſtate, and munition: ſo as it is expected wee ſhall heare of ſome encounter betwixt thoſe armyes before long; the duke Chriſtians tyme, during which he was in his brothers oath and pay, being expired the firſt of this monthe; and being free to himſelf, his nature is to ſeeke occaſions, and Tillyes not to refuſe them.

HERE is yet no ſtirring betweene theſe armyes, both being held in for want of proviſion of money: but now wee heare from Antwerp, that the Eaſt Indian fleete is arrived with nyne millions; wherby want will ſoone be ſupplyed on that ſide. Withall, here is advertiſement come from thence, that the ſame courrier who brought the newes from Spayne of the arrivall of the fleete, hath brought the infanta likewiſe power to treate with this ſtate, and conclude a renewing of the truce: one of which advertiſements ſeemeth to croſſe the other; becauſe peace betwixt ſuch ennemyes doth ſeldome or never procede but of neceſſity: but the Spaniard hath too many yrons in the fyre at once, and, it may be, wilbe contented to have this which burnes his fingers moſt, cooled for a tyme.

HERE they have finally removed all difficultyes touching the Weſt Indian company; the conditions whereof are here agreed betwixt the Bewinthebbers and the participants, and ratifyed by the States General the $\frac{11}{21}$th of this preſent: ſo as now they will ſpeedily goe on with equippage for that voyage, unles a truce prevent it; as it did when that buſineſſe was heretofore treated, but never till now concluded. The Spaniards themſelves have contributed much to this concluſion, by fortifying at Porto del Re, where the North-hollanders were wont to fetch ſalt; and would never, as long as that trade laſted, be induced to give theyr conſent to this company. Now the ſtopping thereof doth drive theſe men to the Weſt Indye, after the ſame manner as the forbidding the trade of Spayne heretofore, made them firſt ſeeke out the Eaſt.

THEYR late treatyes with the pyrats of Algier and Tunis are divulged in print, little to the reputation of this ſtate, for ſo ſcandalous a ſociety, and not much to the benefitt of theyr trade; becauſe, vnder ſearch for Italians goods, all theyr Leuant ſhipps are ſubject to ſpoyle; and the Venetians, theyr new confederates, will doubtles take it ill, that no diſtinction is made betwixt them and other Italians.

1623. THE laſt I have from your lordſhip, is a duplicat of your letters of the 22. of March, ſtylo vet. with an addition of the $\frac{3}{13}$ of Aprill. Other matter I haue none worth your lordſhips knowledge, ſaue onely that a French free-booter, with his excellencies commiſſion, hath lited on a marchant ſhip of the Weſt-Indian fleete ſtraggling from her fellowes, by reaſon of a broken rudder, and brought her into Vluſhing; which towne hath gotten the title of a yong Algier, by reaſon of the many ſhips it ſetts out vppon aduenture: but this is the firſt goode priſe I heare of ſince the warres; yet no gold or ſiluer is ſpoken of to be fownd in her, but ſugars and ſtag-skins, which are goode marchandiſe.

THE king and queene are well, (thancks be to God) with theyr three little ones, now going to his excellencies houſe at Leyden, (where they are to be vnder Monſ. du Pleſſen and his ladies gouerment) to make roome here for another comming into the world within theſe two months. God ſend her highneſs ſafe deliuerie; to whoſe holy protection I committ your lordſhip, and all yours; euer reſting

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionat ſeruant,

To Sir JOHN FYNNETT.

SIR,

I HAUE receiued yours of the 9th Aprill, and find in the very preface, that you are ready to quarrell with mee vpon euery miſcarriage, or perhapps idleneſs of myne: I enterprett it a zeale of loue, and conclude, wee muſt bee ſtill good frends, that ſome of my excuſes come in the very inſtant, not to requite, I confeſſe, butt to pacify you.

THE ſtable you haue graunted mee, diuers former [letters] haue accepted, and with my beſt heart thanked you: if all they miſcarry, both to Sir Henry Roe and you, yett this is as authenticall as any I can make, (for I haue no vſe of a lawyer here) to confirme that bargaine, vpon which you ſhall receiue your bond; and I am your tenant for the tyme, with thanks, thanks, thanks. I will not looſe my neighbourhood for Crosby-place. This is, I confeſſe, butt my 5th letter: the more I owe you, the more intereſt you haue in mee: if I pay you not in ſpecie, as they who pay money with lands, I will pay you treble in affection.

I HAUE followed your counſell; and becauſe you ſhalbe a a wittnes of my obſequiouſneſs thereunto, I haue troubled you with the deliuery of this to Sir Ed. Conway, that you may make my induction, as your loue to me ſhall enſtruct you: I truſt myſelfe willingly with you. What I ſhall write him now, is, and will appeare, fragments, and without dependency, vnleſs hee knewe all the former paſſages, of which I haue giuen Mr. ſecretary Caluert contiguous account, and to whom I will continue yt; for I haue found him fauorable and iuſt to mee: yett theſe, ſuch as they are, will point both backward and forward; as beeing, as it were, the medium of this long treaty and juggling of the port and Gabor.

THE ſtraung ebbing and flowing of the Thames, if it bee not a wonder, yt is yet a warning; for ſo are many of natures works. Security would not perhapps obſerue it. Our feares make rare things more remarkable: Plura alia, rudibus ſæculis, etiam in pace obſervata, quæ nunc tantùm in metu audiuntur. And haue wee not great cauſe to feare, our jewell, our only precious jewell, beeing expoſed to dangers? I would to God, the firſt newes of his voyage, and of his enterteynment abroad, had alſo told mee how he was mett at Black-heath by the maior and citty in chaynes of gold, to welcome him home: this had bene to mee better newes; for I loue not Spaniſh courteſies, nor guilt march-panes. I doubt not, the councell, that gaue him leaue, had as much good aſſurance as could bee giuen in humane affaires and reaſones; yett meethinks the tryalls are too great. Wee know a diamond is the hardeſt ſtone, and hardeſt thing in the world; yett it is too much proofe to bring it vnder the anuile. O my frend! many things depend vpon it; a ſoule, a multitude of ſoules, the proſperity of the church of God. I care not, if I erre, to whom I confeſs it; I am certen it is within; an error of abundance of zeale and loue both to his perſon, our kingdomes, and religion: but I ſhall ſhutt it vpp: Fac, Domine, in ſapientia tua. They haue releeued for vs. Frankendale from another enemy, and 1623. wee haue giuen vpp our ſtrongeſt fort to them. I hope yet, hee hath about him Jacobs army at Machinaijma.

I HAUE receiued your aduice vpon my quære; butt I am not therby ſatisfied in the particular, though I take my frends rule in the generall, not to wander vpon diſcretion any whitt, a verbo ſcripto; my meaning was not, how my proceeding in the treaty with the Turks and Poland would bee accepted; for in that I had ample warrant: butt ſeeing our treaties at Bruxells failed, and my poore witt, beſides aduiſes from abroad, ſaw no refuge butt a iuſt warre, my demand then was, how in this treaty it would bee taken, if I gott in Gabor, and ſtrengthened him on both ſides; who was then apt, and offered to make a diuerſion. In this I had no inſtruction; and I feared I might looſe a good opportunity of doing ſeruice, without any hazard of honor: butt I doubt it is now too late, though I haue done him good offices; and I did beleeue hee would haue ſett new fires in thoſe parts, and pretended all this for the king of Bohemia; yett I allwayes ſuſpected him for a man indulgent only to himſelfe, vpon ſpecious coulers, and ſo I ſhall now find him: for, whether he firſt ſtirred here for ſuccours, to counterpoiſe his feare of the emperor, which hauing now obteyned, hee neuer meant a warre; or whether the truces, and ſlackneſs of the German princes, haue altered his reſolutions, I cannott judge: butt ſure I am, hee now againe treates with the emperour, by his commiſſioners; and the emperor with him and his eſtates aſſembled, by the biſhopp of Vienna, receiued at Alba Julia; and in the meane tyme ſends another ambaſſador hither to procure ayds. By which I conclude hee will make peace, beeing better able to deceiue the Turks with ſhowes then the other ſide, who hath an army ready on the border to puniſh him, and the Turks very loath to riſe, and beginne a warre. Butt if I had had order in tyme, I could haue changed the proſperity of their affaires, who now, as wynners, ſmyle at vs.

Nitrien-ſis.

I MUST not conclude without ſomwhat from this diuiſion of the world: You remembre I haue long threatened, and prophecied of the fall of this empire; now perhapps it beginnes. The baſſa of Arzerum, whom I haue often mentioned, ioyned with diuers others, and a great army, is in his march towards Angria (the direct way to this citty, Babilon reſting in rebellion); his pretence is reformation, hee takes nothing by force, butt the treaſure of the emperour; profeſſeth that hee is no rebell; butt that hee holds, and moues, in defence of the ruyned Ottoman empire; that therfore hee will haue a generall counſell held in that citty, demanding the preſence of the mufti, caddees, baſſas, and antient beghs, to take knowledge, and to puniſh the traytors that murthered the laſt king; and to ſettle a newe, lawfully, that ſhalbee able to gouerne: to reduce the mutined citty ſoldiour to obedience and diſcipline, and to place about the king ſome great vizier, choſen by the ſtate, able to direct and apply remedies to the diſeaſes, now growne to chryſis, complayning, that euery three or 4 moneths, by the change of the vizier, the prouinces are deſtroyed; for they chaunge the gouernours according to their owne factions, and ſo contrary commands and orders are ſent abroad daily, inſomuch as no man knoweth who is king, nor vizier; nor whom to obey. Theſe are his pretences: if the preſent ſtate will not conſent to this aſſembly, hee then reſolues to come hither, and ſettle all things ad libitum, by the ſword.

THESE here, in poſſeſſion of the emperour and gouerment, are loath to bee called to an account by a ſoldiour, and therfore haue taken the worſe reſolution, to make a warre. A generall, Ciga la baſſa, is named; hee refuſeth it vpon the ſame pretence; that in his abſence, alterations are ſo frequent, that hee ſhall doe well or yll vncertenly, and according to enterpretation: therefore hee will haue an abſolute dictator-like power, pro tempore, equall to a great vizier, or elſe hee will not ſtirre. This is graunted him; and money giuen out, and order to paſſe the water ſpeedily. Hee hath enrolled for his army 15000 Janizaries, and 30000 Spahies; butt now theſe demurre, they ſay, it is a warre againſt their owne bretheren, and ſeeke any excuſes, rather then to come to blowes. Butt the ſecrett is; it is now Ramazan, or their holy Lent; at the end of which (now within 8 dayes) they are to receiue their pay; and therfore they are quiett, or diſſemble. Butt wee beleeue, the next day after, when they ſhould march, they will ſhowe themſelues; for they haue had many conſultations, and will not moue, vnleſſe the emperour, or great vizier; goe in perſon. Either way wee are like to bee ſubiect to troubles, and the empire to daunger. The bell is now tyed on the catts neck.

HERE is yeſterday arriued, from Poland, another nuntio, with letters to ſignify the acceptance of the peace, in behalfe of that kingdome, on condition of the reſtraynt of the Tartars, or elſe they will not aſſure the Coſſacques.

MORE I cannott tell you without danger; nor doe I think you take much pleaſure in theſe things, haueing ſo neare cares at home. Vpon them I direct my prayers, ſeeing I can doe no other ſeruice: Concilium inierunt animis paribus, contra te fœdus pepigerunt. Fac ut Midianitis, ut Siſeræ: qui dicunt, hæreditario jure poſſideamus nobis habitacula Dei. Deus mi, pone eos velut rotam, ut ſtipulam coram vento. And ſo I conclude, in all true affection,

Conſtantinople,
$\frac{11}{21}$ July, 1623.

Yonr faithfull frend and ſeruant.

MY wife, with due reſpects, ſalutes your noble lady, and honeſt Sir John.

From Sir THOMAS ROE, to Sir DUDLEY CARLETON, Conſtantinople, $\frac{12}{22}$ July, 1623.

My very good Lorde,

MY laſt letters of the 30th May, with tranſcripts, haue, I hope, both diſcharged mee, and informed your lordſhip of our occurrents to that day. Since, wee haue had no great changes; our expectations beeing bent vpon the actions of the prince of Tranſiluania, and the ſuccours giuen him. Wee haue heard, by good creditt, that hauing aſſembled his ſtates at Alba Julia, they haue refuzed to enter into a warre; and that thereuppon they haue diſpatched commiſſioners to treat with the emperour, who hath retorned to them the archbiſhop of Strigonium, with ample inſtructions to conclude a peace; the prince pretending, that hee will enter into league with him and the king of Poland; and to ſtrengthen himſelfe, doth ſollicitt the marriage of the daughter of the later, beeing neice of the firſt, to aſſure himſelfe of both, and ſo will forſake this party, and adhære wholly to the other. His brother is lately made an earle of the empire. Theſe aduiſes, and ſome other circumſtances of the affaires and truce in Germany, makes many thinke that hee neuer purpoſed a warre; butt by countenance of this port, to ballance his owne feares, and to promoue his other ends. While wee were diſcourſing of theſe things, here arriued another ambaſſador from him, generally giuen out, to haſten the aydes, with ſome other alteration of circumſtances; and this is beleeued fully of the States ambaſſador, as in confidence deliuered him, and by order from his maſter. Butt I haue had ſome ſuſpition raiſed to mee: firſt, it was vnneceſſary to renewe ſuch a command, which was abſolutly before graunted for winning tyme, though it bee true that the Turks are loath to ſtirre: beſides, hee hath treated apart, and ſecretly; and I haue bene informed by one who profeſſeth to haue ſeene his inſtructions, that his order is, to procure commiſſions, to recall the ſuccours, or at leaſt to haue power to ſtay them, that they proceed no further then hee pleaſeth; and that he intends not any breach, butt worketh on both ſides for his owne aduantage. I haue aduiſed thus much to the Dutch reſident: at firſt hee was much ſtarted at it, and cannott deny the treaty; butt yett will not beleeue but hee meanes to deceiue the emperour, and will proceed in his reſolution, though hee alſo feare, that if hee haue noe encouragement by a diuerſion, that he will ſaue himſelfe at another mans expence or hazard. What judgment to giue your lordſhip, much diſtracts mee: I will auerre nothing vntill the next poſt, when I ſhalbee enformed with more certeynty; butt I enclyne to beleeue, that hee will make peace, and bring on the Turkiſh forces, only to accommodate his owne concluſions. I thought fitt to aduiſe your lordſhip thus much in precaution, that the confidence of Monſieur van Haghen, who is ſometyme deceiued by the opinion of his experience, and a certeyne naturall outre-cuidance, doe not beguiſe our frends; nor would I haue this my aduiſe, vntill ſeconded, cauſe any declared jealouſy; but you may pleaſe to conferre that with your owne intelligences, and then ſo farre acquaint the kyng of Bohemia, as may conduce to his ſeruice.

Biſhop of Nitria.

ONE circumſtance I cannot omitt, that the duke of Sbaraſs, when hee was here, was a vehement enemy to the prince; which I mollified aſmuch as I could, and brought them to a good underſtanding. After his departure, and paſſing through his cuntry, Gabor made great preparation to receiue him; butt hee haſted away ſecretly, without conference; which was yll taken. Since, the duke hath written mee a ſollemne excuſe, which is againſt his nature, if there were not ſome alteration of intelligence.

HERE is newly arriued a nuntio from Poland with letters of confirmation, and acceptance of the treaty and peace concluded; only ſolliciting a rectification of thoſe articles that were changed by fraud, after the firſt agreement; and that expreſſe order may bee taken with the Tartars: which beeing done, the king and ſtate doe engage their faith for the Coſſacques, reciprocally; and for mayntenance of the peace; and no otherwiſe.——

[The remainder of this Letter, being fuller expreſſed in the preceding, is here omitted.]

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

THE laſt poſt, diſpeeded the 11th preſent, I aduiſed your honor of the occurrents to that day, the copy whereof I muſt deferre to the next ordinary, beeing ſurpriſed by a ſodaine warning from the bailo of Venice, with diſpatch of an expreſs with new aduertiſements. The morning knowes not here what the euening will bring forth, nor can any man warrant any thing butt the inſtant. My laſt left your honor in the contemplation of the new ambaſſage from Bethlem Gabor, whoſe miniſter is, 3 dayes ſince, diſpeeded with his content; that is, as hee pretends, with a command to the frontire, with all the Turkiſh forces, to march, and to attend their generall, the baſſa of Boſna, at Peſt, neare to Buda; whither by the ſubtilty of Gabor, or from ſome falſe alarum from the border, the vizier, euer conſtant to his owne raſhneſs, two dayes before the departure of the ambaſſador, made a publique proclamation in the citty, That all the ſoldiours deſſigned for Aſia, ſhould follow their generall within 3 dayes after the Biram, then at hand; and all thoſe of Greece and Hungary ſhould ſpeedily repaire to their rendeuous, and attend the command of their generall; becauſe the enemy was armed, and ready to make ſome inuaſion: ſome ſay, the emperour was named; butt moſt, the contrary. Howſoeuer, in effect, it was a publication of warr againſt him; for the next day, a chiaus was diſpatched for Poland, in playne termes to aduiſe the king, That the grand ſignor hauing reſolued warr with the emperor, hee ſhould obſerue the capitulations newly contracted, not to aſſiſt his enemyes, and to help his frends. This made mee almoſt amazed, becauſe I knewe there was a treaty, and that the biſhop of Niria (for the name was formerly miſtaken) had had audience with the prince, ſent from the emperour, and was diſpatched in two dayes. Beſides, the ambaſſadour of Poland, newly arriued, did conſtantly auerr to mee, That there was a ſtrict league made betweene them, wherein Poland was comprehended; and that either now Gabor muſt abuſe the Turks, or many chriſtian princes. But the confidence of the Dutch ambaſſador, and the proclamation, made mee miſtruſt myne owne reaſon; and feare, I was in my laſt miſtaken. Butt this morning is arriued a poſt from Buda, with letters; That the emperors ambaſſador is come to Comora with 250 attendants: That hee hath ſent before to the baſſa, to ſignify it, and hee to the port. And this meſſenger, for that good newes, was veſted and rewarded with a double pay. Soe gladd the vizier and this ſtate is, to haue occaſion to embrace a peace, that I doubt not they wilbee gladd that Bethlem hath couſened them, if hee doe no more. Upon this newes, the Dutch ambaſſador hath changed his ſtyle, and it was tyme; and all the others reſolued to giue this aduice to their maſters, as of a ſodayne alteration, which is the occaſion of this preſent diſpatch. I will giue ouer to make any coniectures, though I haue ſtood alone in this opinion, That all wilbee compounded, and the emperor ſett at liberty for a tyme; and that the prince of Tranſiluania will make the beſt bargaine, who hath drove all to his owne ends.

IF I err, or that the warre proceed, I ſhall allway giue a better reaſon of my error, then any man of his hitting a blynd marke.

YOUR honor wilbee pleaſed to acquaint his majeſtie, that if any thing may conduce to his ſeruice, I may bee diſcharged of my duty. Theſe buſineſſes haue many other concurrent circumſtances, which this opportunity giues mee no leiſure to enlarge. I haue aduiſed briefly into Holland, to his majeſties ledger, leaſt any of our frends there ſhould bee deceiued; and now am called vppon to conclude.

20/30 July, 1623. Your Honors.

To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My Lord,

THER is no alteration ſince the date of the former; but all men ſay ther ſhalbe no warr with the emperour; that the vizier excuſeth now the proclamation to bee entended only defenſiue, vpon report of great preparations. If the prince of Tranſiluania haue any quarrell of his owne, he may purſue it; but wee beleeue a generall peace will for a tyme end all rumors here, the aduice of the comming of the emperors ambaſſador beeing ſeconded; but to bee direct, there is no certayntye of any thing.

YOUR lordſhip will then compare my matter with the place, beeing able to make that good excuſe, which one of the beſt hiſtorians did, that he wrote not of the woorthy tymes, nor the heroicque acts, of the flouriſhing eſtate of Rome: Nobis in arcto & inglorius labor, mœſtæ urbis res. Wher ther is no rule, and things, euen the greateſt affayres, are done by chance, and not by councell, no man can giue account, nor take pleaſure in the conſideration, and that your lordſhip ſhall know our owne eſtate. Beſides that, the ſouldiers, with extreame inſolence, doe putt us to fine, at all their ſports and feaſts, and take our mony by force in the ſtreetes. This day wee are commanded to keepe our houſes, not ſo much libertye left as to take the ayre, and that with threatening woords: but this is nothing; they haue broken open the priſons, and no magiſtrate dares puniſh them. I beſeech your lordſhip then to pray for the deliuerance of old ſtile.

All ambaſſadors.

Conſt. 26 July,

Your Lordſhips, et cæt.

To my Coſen THO. ROE. 26 July, 1623.

Coſen,

I HAUE receiued your kind letter, and kinder offer to come a long iourney to eaſe your frends; and I ſhould very ill requite ſo much loue, if I did accept it, ſo much to your preiudice. There could not bee to mee a greater comfort then your company, if it concurred with your good: butt I muſt deale clearly; all things affarr off haue ſtraunge ſhapes, at leaſt not their owne. My tyme is concluding apace; halfe is allready ſpent; and before you could arriue here, I ſhalbee prepared, and at liberty to retorne: then, aſſure yourſelfe, no conſideration ſhalbee of force to keepe mee in a baniſhment. For others perhapps think that this imployment is honor and proffitt to mee: they know it not; and the world often miſcalls both good and badd things. I aſſure you, I eſteeme it a puniſhment for the vanity of my youth, for my prodigality, that now I muſt repaire myſelfe in continuall diſcontents, troubles, and feares. Therefore, if I had more tyme to ſtay, there is no way here that I can conſider, nor no end to bee propoſed, worth your paynes to goe to Graueſend: learning here is none; vſe of leſſe; leaſt of all, religion; yett ſo many, that Egipt nor Amſterdam neuer had more. What will you then doe here? waſt your thoughts? for you ſhall find no man fitt to vent and eaſe yourſelfe vpon. Notwithſtanding, I will not bee wanting to requite your loue with a litle of my councell. Yf I once perſwaded you to the miniſtery, and you confeſs it the beſt courſe, can you refuſe to follow it? Video meliora, proboque, deteriora ſequar, is not want of iudgment, butt of goodneſs. Now is the fitteſt tyme to prouide ſome very honeſt men of that function, ſuch as may ſtand in the day of triall. Preferrment will ſeeke good men in that courſe; and none that I know hath ſo good preferrment. Butt you haue diuers reaſons that diſwade you: beleeue them not; they are ſhadowes, and falſe ſhowes of reaſon. Doth any where appeare better arguments, then ſome of thoſe of Jobs bitter counſellors? yett they were all reproued. Moſes and Jeremiah made ſuch excuſes; yett what prophets in their kinds excelled them? Try only this: Giue yourſelfe to God in a full purpoſe: fall downe vpon your knees; deſire him to accept you vnfaynedly (that is a true vocation); and vndoubtedly you will heare a voice within;

1623. then ſay, Lord, here I am. If then you feele nothing, try it three tymes. If yett you gett no anſwere, then beleeue God hath another purpoſe in you, and committ yourſelfe to him therein. When you haue giuen him the firſt offer, if hee refuſe it, yett he doth not refuſe you: hee will ſhow you what hee would haue you doe; you ſhall not want many helps. And ſeeing you haue putt yourſelfe ſo farre into my boſome, as to bee myne, I will take care to aduiſe and aſſiſt you. I am now farr off; yett lett mee know which way you will bend, and you ſhall ſee mee ſtrayne all the intereſts of my frends for you. Law and phiſick you reiect with myne owne nature: I would not take phiſick, but to purge away corruptions; nor vſe lawe, butt to keep myne owne: butt to doe that for other men, is againſt my ſtomack. I know the profeſſions are honorable, butt they haue temptations on the right hand, and on the left. What then? Mee thinks you affect trauell, which is a preface to a ſtateſman. Worſt of all: they come indeed to the greateſt preferrments; butt they are butt fewe, and fewer ſtand. I will tell you a paradox: It is very hard to thriue, and bee an honeſt man, in that courſe; and though I know many doe both, yett tenne for one miſcarryes. I will then ſett you an example, and giue you an inſuperable argument; you ſhall not looke farr for it: Follow your owne fathers ſtepps; your meanes are not much leſs then his; hee thriued vpon his owne, and prouided, by the dewe of heauen, for many of you. Marry then, and liue at Tring; you know not how one grayne, well ſowen, will multiply: Ad manum eſt quod ſufficit; Wealth hath no other meaſure then enough. I knowe this counſaile will diſlike you, yett it is good to propoſe it; I am ſure it is a ſure and a good one. If your thoughts ſoare higher, bee ſure of good wings, and a good end. Into whatſoeuer God ſhall direct you, I will promiſe all my help, as I doe here my vnfeined affection.

Your truly louing kinſman.

MY wife commends her to you, and to honeſt Will. and his wife, and to all your brothers. I pray acquaint Robin, that I haue written him twice within two moneths, in anſwere of 4 of his. I know your eldeſt brother thinks hee is neglected: butt lett him not miſiudge mee; I will diuide my tyme with him, as I doe my true loue.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

WHILST the two armyes, of the king of Spaine and the States, in theſe countreys, remaine quiet in garriſon withowt attempt, for want of moneys to giue contentment to eithers ſouldiers; whilſt Cordoua and Anholt on the one ſide, and Mansfeld on the other, keepe ſtill in their wintering quarters, they in Munſterland, and he in Eaſt-friſeland; a great alteration is fallen owt in the affaires, aſwell of Germany as theſe parts, by reaſon that the princes of Nether Saxe Creys, haueing lately not onely diſclaimed all approbation of the proceedings of the duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick, but really and de facto ſubſtracted from him by ſeuere prohibitions, and otherwiſe, not onely part of his men, but likewiſe all meanes requiſite for the ſuſtaineing his army, the ſayd duke is conſtrained by neceſſity to leaue Germany, in the midſt of the great expectations rayſed of ſo powerfull an army, and to retire downe into theſe parts to ſeeke ſuſtenance and entertainement of the States. Of this we haue had aduertiſement here, firſt, by a gentleman of the duke Chriſtian, diſpatched in great diligence by his maſter, and now againe by the elder duke of Saxe-Weymar, come himſelf in perſon.

THE neceſſity of this retreate was, in regard that Tilly, being lodged with his army (inferiour in ſtrength to the duke Chriſtians) on very advantageous grounde in Eiſchfelt, a countrey bordering uppon Brunſwick and Heſſe, where behinde him he had a plentifull countrey open to bring in his prouiſions, and before him the defenſe of hills and ſtrong intrenchments, could not be brought, through the diuers checks and affronts giuen him by the duke Chriſtian, (at one of which the duke cutt of the wholle regiment of horſe of the duke of Saxe-Lawenbourg) to putt himſelf and his army to the hazard of a battayle. And the duke Chriſtian, not haueing any frend left to aſſiſt him with victualls, found no other recours but to the

of this preſent at Reés; whither they haue allready ſent up a bridge for him, to the end he may the better accommodate his army, haueing both ſides of the Rhyne free to forrage: he commeth downe aboue 18 thouſand ſtrong, of which 4000 are horſe. Thoſe troopes which tooke their leaue of him in Eiſchfelt, were not very many in number: they retired to ſeuerall princes of the Nether Saxe Creys, who entertaine them, and ſtill keepe themſelues ſtrong, not diſmiſſing any of their forces as yet, but ſtanding ſeverally uppon their owne defence.

THE arriuall of this powerfull army of the duke Chriſtian into theſe parts, as it was very little expected by either ſide, ſo will it not be unwellcome to this; and, in all likelyhood will ſoone drawe more armyes into the field, and with other deſignes, then paraduenture haue hitherto been projected. What will become of Tilly, now the duke Chriſtian hath left him, a little time will ſhew.

I SUPPOSE I haue heretofore aduertiſed your lordſhip of the bringing in of 4 ſhips of the Braſil fleete well laden, which were taken by certaine free-booters of this countrey; at which time there were two of the ſame fleete carryed away by pyrates. Now here is aduertiſement, that Hermite, admirall of the States fleete which went to ſea in April laſt, hath likewiſe taken 4 ſhips of the Braſil fleete on the coaſt of Barbarie, laden with ſugars; of which he ſends two hither with 1200 cheſts of ſugar, and other marchandiſe, to the valew (as the common report goes) of 300 thouſand florins, by a man of warre of the States, whome he found in hard ſtate, the captaine thereof being impriſoned by his companie, which were in mutinie; of which Hermite hung up 4 of the cheif, tooke 4 more along with him to ſerue withowt wages in his voiage: uppon which he went forward from Saphia the 25th of June, taking with him the other two of the Spaniſh ſhips to ſerue him in place of his pinnace, which he hath returned backe, as ill of ſayle, and unſeruiceable; the reſt of the fleete being in good ſtate.

WE heare of a great buſines at Dantzick, betwixt the two kings of Poland and Swede; the former of which was receaued into that towne with much ceremony as prince protector, whilſt the other lay before it with a fleete of 23 ſhips of warre; of which he hath left 19 to command thoſe ſeas, being returned himſelf with other foure. I heare of two Engliſh ſhips ſtayde by thoſe of Swede to ſtrengthen that fleete; which ſo farre exceeds any the king of Poland can make, that he cannot appeare at ſea: ſo as unleſſe ſome peace or truce be treated betwixt thoſe princes, the towne of Dantzick, which conſiſteth cheifly of trade, will ſoon be ruined.

I AM now to render your lordſhip ſhort thancks for a large letter, accompanied with a cyfer; of which I cannot accuſe the date, becauſe it is in the queene of Bohemias hands, who hath at this preſent goode companie with her; the lady Hatton, and her daughter the lady Purbec, being come expreſly to ſee her. My lady of Arundel was as far as Gant, in her way owt of Italie, to the ſame purpoſe; but was there ſurpriſed with the ſicknes of her eldeſt ſonne, the lord Matreuers of the ſmall-pox, wherof he died; and herſelf is in ill ſtate of health, but hath, abowt this time, the comfort of my lord her husbands comming to her. I believe this accident will change her jorney, and carrie her directly home. Thus I reſt,

Hagh, this 7th of
Auguſt, 1623.

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionat ſeruant,

DUDLEY CARLETON.

To Sir GEORGE CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

BY 3 late letters, dated 11. 20. 27. of the laſt moneth, I cleared my debt; ſince which wee haue had no great alteration; the generall for the warres of Aſia beeing gone ouer the water, and part of the army: butt the lagge yet torments the citty and ſuburbs, no ſhopp hauing bene open in 20 dayes, nor ſcarce a markett kept. They haue allmoſt ſackked, at leaſt, no man hath walked without paying a ranſome, or all the money about him; murthers and rapes ordinary in the ſtreets, houſes broken, and no juſtice dares ask the reaſon.

THE baſſa of Arzerum growes ſtrong, and it is now doubted he hath ſome intelligence with the Perſian. The baſſa of Siliſtra, a prince of the Tartars bloud, 1623. beeing, by a command, remoued from his gouerment, for making incurſions into Poland, contrary to the treaty, refuſeth to obey, proteſting hee will hold it with his ſword; inſomuch as the vizier is forced to yeeld to conſent, that the Coſſacques may aſſiſt to root him out by force, to ſecure the peace on that ſide: to which end, Stephen Tomſha, prince of Bugdania, is diſplaced, and Radula of Wallachia aduanced in his roome, whoſe ſonne ſucceeds the father in the later. This diſcontent breeding on the mayne, and neare the citty, is of much more daunger then all the reuolts of Aſia, as lyeing nearer the head and heart. Notwithſtanding, there is noe actuall reuocation of the order giuen to beginne the warre in Hungary, neither are wee able to make any iudgment for the contrariety of circumſtances. The vizier hath ſent a chiaus and a ſeruant to Buda, with a command to receiue the ambaſſador of the emperour: which ſhowes a deſire of peace; who, it is not likely will giue himſelfe to reſt as a pawne, vnleſſe armes may bee firſt depoſed, or at leaſt reſpited. On the other ſide, the agent of Gabor giues out, That if hee bring no tribute, hee ſhall find a cold enterteynment. Tribute is now demanded for Hungary, and intimated for Bohemia, and the prouinces; who, when they made league with the port, ſending a preſent, (which they miſcall) but once giuen, euer pretend the like; ſo daungerous it is to giue any aduantage in that kind; and therefore the ſtiffneſs of the Poles in that particular is well grounded and maynteyned.

THE ambaſſadour of Tranſiluania, beeing preſſed by mee concerning his princes purpoſe in this warre, how ſcandalous it would bee, and impoſſible, that the electors of Saxe and Brandeburgh (as hee pretended) ſhould fauour it: in concluſion, I drew from him a confeſſion, that at this tyme the emperour had ſent his maſter the picture of his daughter, (and that hee himſelfe had ſeene it) to offer her in marriage; but that hee had refuſed her, and that now hee treated alliance in Poland; and that I ſhould not miſdoubt, that hee would doe any thing to the preiudice of Chriſtendome, if a good peace could bee obteyned: comparing theſe with a warning lately, very ill, giuen by the duke of Szbaraſs to the vizier by letter, that hee ſhould beware, leaſt the mouer of theſe troubles did not deceiue him, and leaue him engaged, (which clauſe, with ſome other, I copied out of the originall) I ſhould reſolue Gabor doth abuſe the Turks; and though hee make all ſhowe to the contrary, becauſe hee dares not yett offend them, yett hee may fayrely enough come off, if hee be conſenting to the coming of the emperours ambaſſador, who may eaſily obteyne a peace; and then he will iuſtly diſcharge himſelfe vpon the port, as done without his conſent, and that hee cannott make the warre alone. Thus hee ſhall compaſſe his owne ends in Hungary, and make the emperour beholding to him for the concluſion here, and free himſelfe from the ſuſpect of theſe groſs-heads. This is one of our diſcourſes; butt the other part hath alſo reaſons oppugning; That the vizier deſires the entrance of the ambaſſadour cautelouſly, and ſpeakes of tribute. There is no doubt hee wilbee content to receiue him, to keep him as a pledge either of the warre or treaty: butt in the meane tyme the army marcheth to the rendeuous; and ſome act may bee done to beginne a warre, before they meet here to compound it. And, laſtly, the agent conſtantly affirmes, that his maſter hath engaged his honor, to meete with Chriſtian duke of Brunſwick att a place betwene them appointed. Your honor may conferr theſe with your owne intelligence out of Germany, which, doubtleſſe, will gouerne the reſolution of Gabor, and make your own judgment.

I CANNOT omitt to aduiſe you of a rumour here, come both from Venice, and ſent to the vizier by the prince of Tranſiluania, for a truth, that the king of Fraunce hath made a league with the electors of Saxe and Brandeburgh, and with diuers other princes and ſtates of Germany, to make himſelfe emperour; that, to that end, thoſe princes haue raiſed armes, and hee vndertaken the pay of Manfield and his troupes; that the Voltaline hath the name, but the effect will fall into Germany on the one part, and Milan on the other; that the duke of Sauoy and ſtate of Venice are confederates, and ſhall haue their ſhares. This, howſoeuer vnprobable, hath bene deliuered the vizier from the prince, and his conſent and aſſiſtance required; who hath anſwered coldly, nott deſiring ſo powerfull a king, backed with ſo ſtrong a party, ſhould bee their neighbour.

I KNOW your honor will think ſome of this paynes might haue bene ſpared: butt there is no corne without ſome weeds; you may pleaſe to ſeparate them, and not blame the laborer, who is

9 Aug.* 1623.

Your Honors.

From my Lord Archbiſhop of CANTERBURY.

My very good Lord,

YOUR letters of the 2d of May, together with a duplicate of the ſame, are two ſeuerall waies come vnto my hands: and thereby I perceive your opinion of the ſhaking of that empire, which ſtandeth at this time vpon ſuch tottering termes. It is a title that God taketh to himſelfe, to ſett vp and to deſtroy kingdomes; and it is hee that giveth beginnings and periods vnto the greateſt empires: his will be done, who determineth all thinges vnto his owne glory.

IT ſeemeth that Bethlem Gabor intendeth ſome greate matter in Hungary and Bohemia, and the rumour thereof is diverſely brought vnto vs. Hee is like to have greate aſſiſtance from this ſide of Germany, many armies being rayſed againſt the emperor by the yong duke of Brunſwicke, by the count of Mansfeild, to whom the French kinge hath ſent 5 or 6 thouſand good ſouldiers, and by the princes of the lower circle of Saxony, to whom much wrong hath bene offered by Tilly, the generall for the duke of Bavaria, as alſo to the lantgrave of Haſſia, and almoſt all the proteſtant princes. The emperour remitteth nothing to the count palatine, but onely giveth ſome ſhew of words; and in the ſame waies do the Spanyards walke, whereby wee are ſtill deceived and deluded. This cauſeth ſo greate exaſperation in the empire, and the oppreſſion of the liberty of Germany, that it is not to bee wondered at, if there bee a ſtronge combination againſt the houſe of Auſtria and the duke of Bavaria, as wee truſt in Almighty God, it will ſhortly appeere. And the Auſtrians, within theſe two or three yeeres, have ſo ſpred their feathers, and poyſed vp their ſailes on every ſide of France, that the kinge thereof by good counſell is awaked; and having ceaſed the ſlaughtering of his owne ſubiects, hath vnited himſelſe in a ſtraight league with the Venetians, the duke of Savoy, and the Hollanders. Onely wee remaine where you left vs; but leſſe able now to ſtirre then formerly wee were, by reaſon of the princes continueing hitherto in Spaine; from which wee beſeeche Almighty God to bringe him fairely of; for ſuch a thinge was never in the worlde before.

I HAVE acquainted his majeſty with the oppreſſion and violence which is offered to that patriarke, and how the Jeſuits have bene the boutefeux in that buſines. His majeſty willed mee to write vnto you, that you ſhould give him ſuch aſſiſtance as is in your power; and I will hope, that if his life bee preſerved, there may come another turne, although it bee to the ruine of that viſeer, and the diminution of that reputation which the Jeſuits aſpire vnto both there and elſewhere. If you ſee the patriarke, commend my love vnto him, and let him know how affectionate and compaſſionate I am in his ſufferings; wiſhing, with all my hart, that I were able any way to releeve him and comfort him.

THE Grecian, Critopylus Metrophanes, hath taken his iourney very lately into France or Holland, pretending from thence to go by land to Conſtantinople. I bred him full five yeeres in Oxford, with good allowance for diett, cloaths, bookes, chamber, and other neceſſaries; ſo that his expence, ſince his comeing into England doth amount almoſt to three hundred pounds. Whiles hee was in that univerſity, hee carried himſelfe well; and at Michaelmas laſt I ſent for him to Lambeth, taking care that in a very good ſhippe hee might bee conveyed to that port, with accommodation of all thinges by the way. But by the ill counſell of ſome body, hee deſired to go to the court at Newmarket, that hee might ſee the kinge before his departure. His majeſty vſed him well; but there hee was putt into a conceite, that hee might gett ſome thinge to buy him bookes to cary home to the patriarke. The meanes that hee gaped after were ſuch as you can hardly beleeve; at firſt, that hee ſhould have a knight to bee made for his ſake; and then, after that, a baronet, wherein a proiector ſhould have ſhared with him: after that, the kinge was to bee moved to give the advowſon of a benefice, which a falſe ſimoniacal perſon did 1623. promiſe to buy of him. I cauſed my chaplaines to diſſwade him from theſe thinges, and I interpoſed mine owne cenſure in it, as thinking theſe courſes to bee vnwiſe, vnfitt, and vnworthy. But, to ſatisfy his deſire, I bought him new out of the ſhoppe many of the beſt Greeke authors, and among them Chryſoſtomes eight tomes. I furniſhed him alſo with other bookes of worth, in Latin and in Engliſh; ſo that I may boldly ſay, it was a preſent fitt for mee to ſend to the patriarke of Conſtantinople. In the meane time, ſince Michaelmas laſt, I lodged him in my owne houſe, I ſett him at my owne table, I cloathed him, and provided all conveniences for him; and would once againe have ſent him away in a good ſhippe, that hee might ſafely have returned: butt hee fell into the company of certaine Greeks, with whom wee have bene much troubled for collections, and otherwiſe; and although I knew them to bee counterfeits and vagabonds, (as ſundry times you have written vnto mee) yet I could not keepe my man within dores, but hee muſt bee abrode with them, to the expence of his time and mony. In breeſe, writing a kind of epiſtle vnto mee, that he would rather looſe his bookes, ſuffer impriſonment, and loſſe of his life, then go home in any ſhippe; but that he would ſee the parts of Chriſtendome, and better his experience that way. I found that hee ment to turne roague and beggar, and more I cannot tell what; and therevpon I gave him ten pounds in his purſe, and leaving him to Sir Paul Pindares care, at my remooving to Croydon, about fortnights ſince, I diſmiſt him. I had heard before of the baſenes and ſlaviſhnes of that nation; but I could never haue beleeved, that any creature in humane ſhape, having learning, and ſuch education as hee hath had heere, could, after ſo many yeeres, haue bene ſo farre from ingenuity, or any gratefull reſpect. But hee muſt take his fortune, and I will learne by him to intreate ſo well no more of his faſhion. Onely I have thus at large acquainted you with the vnworthy cariage of this fellow, which though it bee indecent in him, yet for the patriarks ſake I grudge it not vnto him. I trouble you no farther, but wiſhing you health, and your harts deſire, I remayne, Croyden, Aug.

12. 1623.

Your Lordſhips very loving frende,

G. CANT.

Superſcribed,
To my honorable good frende, Sir THOMAS ROE, Knight; Lord Embaſſador for his Majeſty of Greate Britaine, at Conſtantinople.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

SINCE the duke of Brunſwicks late overthrow, the prince of Orange at Arnhem, and the States here, have bene chiefly buſied in recollecting the ruynes of that army, and making proviſion to ſuſtayne the remainder thereof, which conſiſteth of 3000 horſe and 2500 foote; and thoſe the States take into theyr ſervice for two monthes and a halfe, beginning the $\frac{10}{20}$th of this preſent; for which they allow 22000 florins by the monthe, and give the duke 50000 florins under the tytle of impreſt money, to putt him in heart and ſtate to appeare agayne in the field; of which he hath no ſmall neede, being left by his frends and followers, ſtript of all he had, and quite diſcouraged. Tilly is marched as far as Rhen vpon the Ems, towards Eaſt-frizeland, where hee remaynes attending ſuch further order as ſhall come to him vpon this vnexpected victory from Vienna, Bauier, and Bruxells, to all which places he hath ſent, being ſtrengthened with 5000 Coſacques brought downe into Munſterland by the count Colalto.

MANSFELT herupon, filled with doubtfull reſolutions, is fallen to his wonted ward of treatyes, on that ſide; and on this, to his accuſtomed ſetting men vpon the rack, according to theyr neceſſityes: having demanded of the States quarter for his caualrie in theyr provinces of Frizeland and Groning, which they have abſolutly refuſed, as vnfitt to be graunted to men without pay, (for the Valtoline league furniſheth no more money) diſcipline, or deſſigne. And count Erneſt is ſent into thoſe parts to prevent the invaſion, eyther of Mansfelts men, or the imperialiſts.

THERE is another buſines in thoſe parts of no ſmall conſequence: the king of Denmarke having had his ambaſſadors at Embden this fortnight paſt, treating with that towne, to take it into his protection ; which bargayne is ſo farre driven betwixt them, that it is vpon the point of concluſion ; and an ouverture is made hether, by the Embdenners themſelves, deſiring the States to approve of this courſe, to which they are preſſed by their preſent neceſſityes ; and withall, to ſend deputyes thether to meet with others, which ſhall come from the king of Denmarke to treate of theyr affaires, as well for removing of Mansfelts army, as other things which ſhall concerne the welfare of that towne and province ; wherevnto the count of Eaſt-frizeland doth conſent likewiſe, but with reference to the approbation of the emperour, as being a prince of the empire. This is a thing of hard diſgeſtion to the States, who much apprehend the increaſe of that kings greatnes, and approaching vpon them, he having, ſince theyr diſputes about the Sondt, gotten the commaund of the Elb, by his protectorſhip of Hamburgh, and his new towne and fort built right over-againſt Stoade ; of the Weſer, by the coadjutorſhip of the biſhoprick of Bremen, he hath for his ſonne ; and now, being in apparence to have the like of the Ems ; which are all the entryes by ſea, and paſſages for trade, in Germany. But theſe men are not in ſtate to diſpute things as they were wont, and therfore are like to give way to that kings proceeding, which, were it not for the alliance his majeſty hath with that king, were no leſſe conſiderable, in regard of his kingdomes, then theſe provinces.

WHAT is done in the aſſemblye of Brunſwick, where the States have theyr ambaſſador, as yet wee heare not ; nor much is expected from thoſe princes, who doubtles will accommodate themſelves to preſent accidents, and comply with the emperour to ſave their countreyes from invaſion ; of which they are much apprehenſive, when Tilly ſhall returne into Germany, who hath lett ſlip a fayre opportunity of ſervice vpon this ſtate, by entring the Velu croſſe the Iſſel, which was paſſable in many places not above knee deepe, neare thoſe parts where he gave Brunſwick the overthrow ; but now the raynes begin to fall, and winter drawes on, which is a favorable ſeaſon for the defence of that quarter.

WEE doe not heare that the marquis Spinola ſtirres as yet, more then that he went out of Bruxells one day towards Maeſtricht, when he heard of Brunſwicks deſcent out of Germany into theſe parts, and returned the next, when he mett with the newes of his defeate. Cordoua is croſſed the Rhyne, and lyes at and about Burick, right over-againſt Weſel, with 10 or 12000 men. Count Henry lodgeth at Emmerick, on the other ſide ; one wayting vpon the other. All the troopes which roſe out of theſe parts with the prince of Orange, had their rendezvous at Arnhem and Nimmegen, and are lodged moſt in thoſe townes and therabouts, attending occaſions of ſervice, which are onely for the defenſive. Thus, without further ceremonye, I reſt,

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionat ſervant,

To Sir GEORGE CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

THE coppy of my laſt here incloſed, I ſhall begin with this, where I ended with that : your honor will not blame mee, if I write you all ; my office is explorator, non index : The prince of Tranſyluania hath ſeconded his aduice of the French kyng to vndertake a war agaynſt the emperor, allyed with many princes of Germanye. Now it is reported, that he intendeth the election of his brother ; but wee thincke, that all was made in hope to pleaſe the vizier, who diſtaſting that neighborhood, and reuiling Bethlem Gabor for the motion, they are now fallen lower in their deviſes.

THE army of Aſya, with their generall, are 7 dayes ſince departed, hauing done the woorſt of inſolencyes ; for 20 dayes all trade intermitted, and almoſt all converſation of men. Now, aſſoone as quiettnes begun to appeare, and ciuill commerce open, the vizier, Huſſein baſſa, ſent priuatly to ſtrangle Halil baſſa, late captain of the ſea, Georgi and Muſtapha, the two laſt viziers ; whither this gave the occaſion, or that his wickednes was ripe for revenge (for of ſuch a tyrant, I thincke, no age nor kingdome could lament). The Spahies in the cytty revolted, 1623. and tooke armes; the vizier retyred to the Janizaries, his faythfull guard; and it was very likely to bee tryed by the ſwoord; but the Spahies, the weaker in number, keeping ſome companies on horſe, ſent their reſolution (as the diuell himſelfe hath peace-makers for curſed ends); which preuayled, that they would haue another vizier; or if the Janizaries would obſtinatly defend this, lett them keepe him Greece and Conſtantinople; that they would depart, and diſpoſe of Aſya. Your honor, from this boldnes, will, as from an aſcent, ſee all below yt. The poore emperor is forced to obey, and the ſeale is giuen to one Aly-baſſa; a man reputed quiettly honeſt, but of vntryed, and therefore ſuſpected abilytye for ſo great a chardge, which all the old and experienced officers of this ſtate refuſe. The accuſations agaynſt the laſt vizier (the infinite number of priuat grieuances omitted) are the waſt of the treaſurye, to maynetayne his faction; the warrs mooued by him in Hungarye; and the troubles of Aſya layd vpon him. Whervpon it is thought, the army ſent thither ſhalbe recalled, and the baſſa of Arzerum, if he will accept it, pardoned. He is not yet brought to tryall, this beeing the third day; ſome ſay he is fled into Tartarye, to ſtir the new prince to innouation; others, that he lurkes in the cytty, to watch aduantage, the Janizaries hauing rather forſaken him for policye, and preſent quiett, then in earneſt: howeuer, if he eſcape aliue, he will kyndle new fires. The cauſe of the affection of the Janizaries to ſuch a woolfe, is their priuat intereſt, to whom he gaue away all thè reuenew of the empire; and, to fynd meanes to pleaſe them, he coyned both the gold and ſilver baſe at leaſt one third, but payd them at a low valew, which they uttered at a far greater, and no man durſt refuſe to take yt. But in generall, Greece and all the cyttyes neuer rejoyced ſo much at the reſtauration of their liberty by Flaminius, as all ſorts of men doe for their deliuerance from this bloody ſucking theefe; and wee ambaſſadors hold our ſelues freed from a captiuitye, in which we haue ſuffered many inſolent indignityes.

WEE now breath agayne, but how long wee ſhall enjoy our hopes, no aſtrologye can aſſure us, where canicular ſtarrs are only predominant. The baſſa of Siliſtria is reuolted, all Aſya in combuſtion, the emperor vnable to gouerne, the ancient baſſaes affrayd, the ſoldier reſolued to keepe his rude authoritye, the prince of Tartars in jealouſy, euery priuat member ſicke, or ready to flye the furye.

THIS change is likely, firſt, to alter the affayres and reſolution to make the war in Hungarye, wher though Bethlem Gabor hath yet done nothing, nor the Turkes riſen, and I am confident he hath another purpoſe then warr; yet, the laſt night, an aduiſe is come from thence, That the nobilitye of Sileſia are in the feild, and haue encountred the emperors troopes, and taken his canon. This, I ſuppoſe, is made to fill the eares of the new vizier, ignorant at firſt, to make ſome impreſſion in him of the uſe and ſeruice of that prince: the truth I cannot know, but I am ſure that the laſt vizier, by a conſultation with the mufty, hath ſent a ſafe-conduct to the emperors ambaſſador, whom wee weekely expect; and wee beleeue that all thoſe rumors will vaniſh to ayre, and a peace bee concluded to the prejudice of the port, by the cunning of Gabor; or els he hath deceiued the Poles, who, to requite him, haue vnſeaſonably aduiſed hither of his deceipt. Yet many are ſtill confident he will follow the war, and that his intents are ſincere with his profeſſion; which if they bee, the withdrawing of ayds from hence will retyre him. The ſeaſon of the yeare will ſhortly cleare us, and by the next poſt I hope to aduiſe your honor of certaynty what is done, of which wee haue here ſuch varietye of opinion.

MY concluſion is, utraq; deteſtanda vota; inter duos, quorum bello ſolum id ſcires, deteriorem fore qui viciſſet. Your honor will doe mee the fauor to acquaynt his majeſty with whatſoeuer may tend to his ſeruice, and my excuſe; and continew that to mee, which hath made mee

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

AT the ſealing of the former, I receiued yours of the 6. June, by which I not only perceaue the vncurteous vſage of my letters from hence, but the detention of thoſe hither bound; for all my packetts are longer on the way, by two poſts, then thoſe of the merchants: and this makes mee doubt, that ſome are pickt out, becauſe I neuer heard one word whither his majeſtie did receiue the letters from the duke of Sbaraſs, and thoſe other lords who were here in captiuitye, in acknowledgment of his majeſties countenance and fauor, as well for the concluſion of the peace, as for their liberty; they were foure in number. And as I would not looſe my creditt and paynes, ſo ſome of them may bee of good uſe to his majeſtie, if he haue any relation to that kyngdome; for the duke is powerfull in the parlaments, and with the people; and Coneſpolsky made generall of the army, and the firſt in grace with the kyng. Therfore, if they miſcarryed, I beſeech your honor, at leaſt, acquaynt his majeſtie that ſuch were ſent; wherof I ſtill keepe the coppies.

THIS day a man of great truſt (though a Turke) is come from the prince of Tranſyluanya with ſome ſecrett inſtructions, apart from his agent reſident here. He hath beene with mee, and after ſome diſſimulation, diſcouered an inclination in that prince to peace; but protests, one of the conditions he will require of the emperor ſhalbe the reſtitution of the Palatinat; the reſt, for liberty of conſcience in Hungarye, Bohemia, and the dependant prouinces; the laſt, for his quiett poſſeſſion of all which he now holds, and had granted by the laſt treaty, with confirmation of all priuiledges, bountyes, and honors, by him conferred while he had the title of kyng; and theſe to bee ſealed vp by a marriage. But as yet, it ſeemes, the emperor is not brought to all theſe; and the prince is now marched, 20 dayes ſince, into Hungarye. None of the Turkiſh troopes were then mooued; but, before this tyme, wee doubt they are. Notwithſtanding, I am of opinion, ther wilbe found wayes of pacification; I am ſure I could change it any way. The Duch ambaſſador preſſeth the war by feyned aduantages, and no man els to contradict yt. I perceaue by your honors mentioning the affayres of Germany, the violent procedure of the emperor, the deſperate eſtate of the Palatinat, without any direction or intimation vpon the purpoſes of Gabor, though I haue often inſinuated the uſe might be made of him, that from that ſilence I muſt picke out a leſſon not to meddle any way; which I will follow, except only if I bee called vpon; and then I will keepe to my firſt rule, to doe vngratefull ſeruice for thoſe who meritt little; but the generall intention of his majeſties moſt chriſtian hart will in tyme condemne them. I humbly thancke your honor for all your aduices, and I ſhould take it as a great fauor, if you would alſo pleaſe to enforme mee what I ſhould doe, rather then what others haue done, in which ther is ſo little comfort and content. And I am very diffident of my diſcretion in theſe tymes, and therefore reſolue to ſytt as quiett as I may. I thancke your honor for his majeſties grace, and for the allowance of my expence in Tunes and Algier treaty, which I hope may take good effect; and for all other your fauors, which I will lay vp in a gratefull heart, vntill it haue better meanes to ſhow the affection of

Your Honors humble ſeruant.

MY wife thanckes your honor for your ſo kynd remembrance, and bidds mee ſay ſhe loued yours ſincearly; and will euer loue you and all yours, for both your ſakes.

To Sir GEORGE CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

MY laſt letters were large of the 23. preſent; a greater occaſion hath called vpon mee to write this, yett it ſcarſe affords mee tyme. If your honor will looke back, you ſhall ſee the cauſes and operations of this dayes effect, of which I haue bene a part of a prophett. The affaires of Aſia beeing in extreames, and the baſſa of Arzerum violently proſecuting his revolt, principally coulered vnder the faire name of reuenge of the death of Oſman, his true prince, which hee executed generally vpon all the Janizaries which fell in his power, as the only authors thereof; which boldneſs of his gaue others occaſion to the like attempts in other parts; ſo that all was in rebellion: this hath awakened both baſſaes and ſoldiours here, with a viſible euidence of the deſtruction of their empire. Wherfore, yeſterday, they held a councell, and therein concluded to ſend for the emperour ſultan Muſtafa, and to demand of him certeyne queſtions publiquely, at the gate of the ſeraglio, and 1623. and according to his anſwere to proceed. This morning they all mett in the ſeraglio, an infinite concourſe of all ſorts, et togæ et armorum, who ſent in, to deſire the emperor to come out; but hee refuſed (knowing his diſability); deſyring them to take his throne, and diſpoſe it. Then they ſent in other deputies, to know if hee did voluntariſy renounce it; which hee did, they ſay, with much joy; and I beleeue hee neuer tooke great contentment in it. Vpon their retorne, the vizier called before him ſome heads of both orders of the ſoldioury, and demanded, if they would haue Morat emperour, whom they accepted with great acclamations. Then hee ſhowed them the neceſſity of the empire and ſtate: that all the treaſure was exhauſted, many enemyes abroad; and therfore mooved them to remitt their donatiue, vſuall vpon euery change, and their encreaſe of pay, which is 25 checquines gold, and one aſper the day. They, with generall conſent, renounced both, and haue promiſed quietneſs. Wherupon ſultan Morat is this day proclaymed emperour, and ſatt out vpon the throne generally accepted: hee is ſonne of Achmatt, brother to Oſman murthered, nephew to Muſtafa depoſed, to whom they haue allowed 1000 dollars a day for his expence, and a quiet life. They will not feare him, beeing a (   ), nor take his life, whom they eſteeme a ſaint.

THIS new emperour is of the age of 14 yeares, of ſufficient ſtature, ſome ſay, ſubiect to the falling ſickneſs, bredd vpp allway in feare; therefore, as yett, no aſſurance what hee will proue. Their hope now is, hereby to appeaſe Abaſſa, baſſa of Arzerum, and thoſe others out in Aſia; and that they will obey this prince, as brother to their pretended beloved maſter. They haue reſolued to maynteyne, if they can, an vniuerſall peace, to recouer treaſure; what will ſucceed, I leaue to the God by whom kings raigne. Yet my opinion is, That this, for a tyme, may ſhowe a flattering quietneſs; but I beleeue not, that ſo many great breaches can bee thus made vpp with a youth vnexperienced, and a mother whoſe gouerment will bee equally inſupportable, of whom they had experience in the tyme of Achmat. I deſire your honor to acquaint his majeſtie ſpeedily; though I doubt my letters, firſt written, ſhall ſtay at Venice.

Conſtantinople, the laſt Auguſt, 1623.

Extract of a Letter to Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

[The Beginning of this Letter, which contains the ſame Facts with the preceding, directed to Sir GEORGE CALVERT, is therefore omitted.]

——SULTAN Moratt, ſonne of Acmat, brother of Oſman murthered, nephew of Muſtafa depoſed, is this day proclaymed emperor, and is ſate out vpon the throne. By this change (their laſt refuge) they hope to appeaſe the reuolts in Aſia; and that thoſe who pretended their riſing for loue to Oſman, will obey this prince as the true heyre. Hee is of age 14 yeares, bredd vp in continuall feare, ſubiect to the falling ſickneſs, ſo as yett there is no ſhowe of his ability; butt he wilbee gouerned by his mother, who gouerned his father, a man of ſpiritt and witt; and that may giue cauſe of juſt diſcontent. I remitt to God, who ſitts in the hearts of princes, and directs them as a chariott to cary abroad his purpoſes, all judgment of the future. Butt it appeares not reaſonable to mee, that a youth vnexperienced can make vpp ſo many breaches, which are popular, and like the ſea. Peace vniuerſall, to recouer treaſure, they reſolue to haue, vntill the king bee a full man. Six dayes before, when this was working, there was ſent a command to ſtay all the ſuccors giuen to the prince of Tranſiluania, not to ſuffer one to moue into the dominions of the empire. In much of theſe I haue bene a prophett; and if I had tyme, I could diſcourſe lardgly, and not unproffitable, of the workings and laborings of this ſick ſtate; butt I haue ſcarſe afforded mee this, to lett you know res geſtas. By the laſt I wrott to her majeſtie, and by the next I will renew it: And euer reſt,

Conſtantinople,
31 Aug. 1623.

Your true affectionat ſeruant.

1623.

To my Lord GRANDISON.

My Lorde,

I HAVE bene now long in your lordſhips debt, for the honor I haue receiued in your ſecond letter of 27. March laſt; which though it had a long paſſage, it came to mee as a refreſhing rayne to the withered vallyes, bringing the plentifull aſſurance of your lordſhips fauour, of which my enemyes may make mee haue vſe; though conſcia mens recti ſeldome feares any accuſation.

I WILL firſt repreſent to your lordſhip the apprehenſions I haue taken from ſome of our Leuant companyes letters, that his majeſtie makes ſome difficulty to confirme the treaty made with this port, in the behalfe of thoſe of Algier and Tunes; and that ſome others murmur, as if either I had exceeded inſtructions, or proceeded without them, making ſiniſter conſtructions of ſome words, as if they preiudiced the ſtate of Spayne, which is not once named in all the articles. If they will make inferences beyond the text, it is ſcandall taken, not giuen. I would write myne owne defence to his majeſtie, and the ſtate, butt that I will not accuſe myſelfe, hauing had no diſlike from them expreſſed: ſo I am vnwilling any yll impreſſion ſhould ſettle, which is more eaſily preuented then remoued.

I WILL not trouble your lordſhip with long apologies; what I haue done, is by treble order: and I will giue this generall anſwere to a generall obiection, which, I beſeech yonr lordſhip, make for mee, if there bee occaſion; That I haue bene ſo wary, foreſeeing a cloud, as to conclude nothing but with reference to his majeſties confirmation, and that without the tyme of the laſt contract with Spaine for three yeares expired. What I haue done, is not new; nor haue I made any agreement, butt with relation to our old capitulations, made three tymes in the bleſſed raigne of queene Elizabeth, and fower tymes in his majeſties; only I haue applyed thoſe dead remedyes to the places where wee needed them. I haue not articled not to aſſiſt the enemyes of this port, (which is the exception) which yett is incident to all treatyes; butt only declared, that they which ſhall doe ſoe, doe it at their owne perills, without breach of the publique peace. And who knowes not, that ſuch are ſubiect to their fortune in the beſt leagues? and thoſe of Spaine, who take it yll, will doe it themſelues vppon any of his majeſties ſubiects, that either aſſiſt the Turks, or carry them munition; and of this poore merchants haue had experience. If there bee cauſe to ſay more for mee, I haue iuſtifyed myſelfe at large to Mr. Leate the merchant, who gaue mee the aduiſe: and your lordſhip may be pleaſed, by Mr. Branthwayt, to ſend for that letter, or a copy of that part: or, to giue your lordſhip more eaſe, doe mee the fauour to make this generall proteſt to his majeſty, that I will giue him ſo good accompt of my proceedings, and of my warynes, not to offend or giue ſcandall to any of his majeſties allyes, that all the tenne counſells in Spayne ſhall not bee able to lay one ſpott vpon mee, except it bee, that I haue done them too much ſeruice. Perhapps all this needs not; yett I am ſo iealous of my reputation, and loyalty to his majeſtie, not for hope of preferrment, but for loue of honeſty, that I would not the leaſt taynt ſhould lye vpon mee, for (if I may boaſt) my good ſeruice.

MY laſt letters to your lordſhip were of the 26. July, which haue troubled you with the relation of our occurrents to that tyme. Since, wee haue endured many inſolencyes from the ſoldioury ſent into Aſia, which I then mentioned: the proſperity of which rebellion, and the litle meanes to force obedience, hath cauſed greater chaunges; of which, becauſe I would eaſe both my hand and my head, I deſire your lordſhip to accept, in way of a diſcourſe, ſent your lordſhip, and ſome other of my frends; wherein you will find our condition, and, all circumſtances, as they lay, ſet downe, enough to make your lordſhip wonder, that emperours are here made with leſs noyſe then a proctor in Oxford; to which I wilbee bold to referr you, and myſelfe to your patronage and fauour, as

To Sir GEORGE CALUERT.

HAUING by the laſt two poſts aduiſed of the great mutations in this port, I am not furniſhed with any new matter; all the actions and thoughts here beeing intent upon recouery of money to ſatiſfy the ſoldiour, who will neuer bee content. I haue not preſumed to write to his majeſtie; becauſe a large relation of theſe alterations, and their reaſons and cauſes, would exceed the proportion of a letter: butt if your honor find it fitt to trouble him with more then the bare newes, I haue, by way of diſcourſe, ſent Mr. Branthwait, for your honor, and ſome other frends all the circumſtances and intrinſicque motions that I could diſcouer, which you may pleaſe to peruſe and diſpoſe of. I cannot make any iudgment of the ſucceeding tymes; though there appeare a great calme, yett the mayne ſynewes are ſhrunke, mony and armes; the one ſo abaſed, that it will baniſh all foraigne commerce; the other ſo corrupted and fallen into yrrecouerable diſobedience, that ciuil gouerment hath loſt all awe and authority. The baſſa of Arzerum proceedeth victorious: but whether the knowledge of this new emperours ſublimation bee come to him, or not, is yett in queſtion; and conſequently, whether his actions bee againſt the ſtate, or, as hee pretended, againſt the laſt gouerment. If hee will continue, moſt of Aſia is like to obey him; for the quarrell is made and conuerted into a faction betweene the horſe and foote, the Janizaries and Spahees; theſe taking part with him, and perſecuting the other; and it is allmoſt declyned into a deadly feude. I am perſwaded, generally, the intention of the ſtate is peace; and I am therein confirmed, becauſe the emperours ambaſſador, that hath long houered on the border, is now come to Belgrade; his lodging prouided here, and his arriuall ſpeedily expected. Of Gabor wee haue no newes: like a new ſtarre, no aſtrologer can iudge of him, till hee bee worne out. I will preſume to referr your honor to the diſcourſe mentioned, and myſelfe to your fauour; deſiring you not to ſuffer any ſiniſter conſtruction of ſuch, as, vpon no ground, beare mee a generall yllwill, may preiudize mee with his majeſtie. I will ſay no more; but Mr. Branthwayt knowes where I am payned. If I could not giue a reaſon of all my actions, and ſhowe the rule by which they haue been guided, I ſhould bee aſhamed to ſee my frends, much more to challenge their protection. I haue a thowſand teſtimonyes within, that I am his maieſties loyall, obedient ſubiect, and Diſcourſe of the Changes of the Emperor MUSTAFA: The Placing of MORAT: The Remove of HUSSEN Baſſa; and the Troubles in Aſya: With other Occurrents, September and October 1623.

From Conſtantinople, $\frac{20}{30}$ September, 1623.

OUR relations from this citty, which paſſe into other parts, through the courteſy of the ſtate of Venice, find, for the moſt part, ſo heauy paſſages, (they beeing ambitious to honor their owne miniſters with the firſt aduiſes) that I ſeldome hope to write newes: therfore, ſuppoſing that in generall it is none, that ſultan Muſtafa, brother to Achmat, who hath bene twice emperour, was depoſed the laſt day of Auguſt, and ſultan Moratt, ſonne to Achmatt, brother of Oſman, the laſt yeare murthered, placed in the throne of his anceſtors; it will not bee vntymely nor vnproffitable to relate and diſcourſe of the cauſes and reaſons of theſe great mutations, which are the intrinſicque part and ſoule of action.

THIS ſtate, for 15 moneths ſince the death of Oſman, hath bene a ſtage of variety; the ſoldioury vſurping all goverment, placeing and diſplaceing, more vulgi, as the wynd of fauour or diſaffection moued them. In this tyme, I haue ſeene three emperours, ſeauen great viziers, two capten baſſas, fiue agas of the Janizaries, 3 treaſorers, 6 baſſas of Cairo, and, in proportion, as many chaunges of gouernours in all the prouinces; euery new vizier making vſe of his tyme, diſplaceing thoſe in poſſeſſion, and ſelling their fauour to others; ſo as the whole empire hath, in a manner, fyned 4 or 5 tymes: ſuch is the eating, for a welcome, of euery baſſa to their gouerment. Huſſein baſſa, the laſt vizier, (a tyraunt, hated of all men) conſumed the publique treaſure ſo faſt, and exacted money from priuat men ſo violently, to maynteyne his faction with the Janizaries, that euen the receiuers were afraid and weary, and the wiſeſt of them foreſawe their owne ruyne in the generall conſumption. 1623. When there was any murmur againſt him, hee preſently ſyleneed it either by guifts or bloud. Aſſoone as hee had diſpatched away the generall Cigala baſſa with the army, for the ſuppreſſion of the great rebellion in Aſia, which hee did rather to disburthen himſelfe of feares, by ſending out of the way the Spahees, who were his oppoſites, then for any loue to the ſtate, (which army, what inſolencyes they committed here, for 30 dayes before their paſſing the water, euen in the face of iuſtice, is as incredible, as impoſſible to relate); hee ſent priuatly to ſtrangle Halil baſſa, Georgi, and Muſtafa, late viziers, now hoping hee had remoued all concurrents. Whether this gaue the occaſion, or that his ſynne was ripe for reuenge, the Spahees ſodaynly gathered head, and the old woolfe fledd to his truſty guard the Janizaries. The citty was almoſt diuided: butt the Spahees ſent their reſolution playnly, beeing the weaker in nomber, that they deſired not to come to blowes with their bretheren; butt if the Janizaries would protect him, lett them keepe him, Conſtantinople, and Greece; butt they would depart, and diſpoſe of Aſia: which was a bold profeſſion, but eaſy, the forces of the rebells beeing of their ſociety. The wiſeſt foreſawe the perill, and they all agreed to chaunge him; and ſo the ſeale was giuen to one Aly baſſa, a man reputed honeſt, but melancholy, and vntryed for ſo great a charge. Euery body ſawe theſe outward wheeles of motion; butt the ſpring within, that moued them, was not ſo ſoone diſcouered. The army mentioned for Aſia, arriuing at Ezmitt, fiue dayes iourney from this citty, ſhowed litle obedience, many disbanded, and the reſt no deſire to fight with thoſe of the ſame profeſſion, both in religion, and perhapps in humor. The newes came daily, like Jobs meſſengers, of the taking of forts by Abaſſa baſſa, the head of the rebells, of other defections and combuſtions in thoſe parts; and that this quarrell was taken vpp againſt the Janizaries, and the preſent gouernment, of whom hee ſlewe all that fell in his power, as guilty of the bloud of Oſman. This ſodaynly awakened and ripened the proiect of thoſe who had plotted ſecrettly this alteration. Herevppon the newe vizier, with the counſell of the mufti, and ſome captaines of the ſoldiours of both orders, laid their foundation; they ſhowed the eminent perill and difficulty to reſiſt or preuent it by armes. The Janizaries ſawe, that they alone muſt, as the mark of enuy, beare the whole burthen; and therfore all reſolued, that the eaſieſt and ſafeſt way to appeaſe their troubles, was to reſtore the true heyre, the preſent emperour; hoping that thoſe who pretended theyre ryſing for the loue of his brother, and in reuenge of his cauſe, would obey this prince, and quiett themſelues. Vpon this reſolution, they aſſembled at the Seraglio without much tumult, and deſired to haue ſultan Muſtafa come forth, and ſpeake to the ſoldiours, and to anſwere to ſome queſtions. Which hee refuſing, (as truly vnable) they tooke out ſultan Moratt, and declared him king with vniuerſall ioy and acclamation; inſomuch as the Janizaries (yeſterday his oppoſites) beeing ſhowed the want of treaſure, and the neceſſity of the ſtate, were content to remitt their donatiue, and encreaſe of pay, vſuall at euery chaunge, (a wonder not like to laſt 9 dayes; for many ſince repent, and demand it freſhly). The preſent emperour I ſawe the next day at his ſollemne entry into the citty, a youth of 14 yeares of age, fatt, and of a liuely countenance, and good ſtature, a prince of too faire hopes for ſuch a people: his actions ſince, though vnder gouerment, ſhowe, hee will ſoone knowe himſelfe, and proue of a ſtirring nature. At the retorne of the gallies from the Black-ſea, who brought ſome Coſſacques priſoners aliue, and ſome heads of the deade, hee would ſee them all brought before him, a cuſtome vnuſuall. This, and ſome anſwers hee hath giuen, makes vs iudge him actiue. As yett all ſeemes ſerene and quiett; neuer appeared ſo great a chaunge, euen in affections, if not diſſembled. The moſt diſordered aſſume a face of obedience, (which I once thought baniſhed this citty) and chooſe rather ſubmiſſion to lawes, then threatened deſtruction; the calme is as violent as the ſtorme: the firſt actions ſhowe peace; butt ſo, as to prepare for neceſſity of warre. They ſeeke out, and daily finde, the treaſure, plate, and iewells, giuen and conueyed away by Huzen, which retorne apace, and many voluntarily tender it. The laſt aga of the Janizaries, who was 1623. butt 3 moneths paſt caia, or lieutenant, and now made baſſa of Cairo, hath, for his part, receiued and reſtored 800000 dollers, to buy his place and peace. Euery day makes newe diſcoueryes; only the author, that foxe, is fledd; a price ſett on his head, butt as yett hee cannott bee taken; whoſe apprehenſion would accuſe many, and bring back a great treaſure.

ASIA, in this ſearch for money, and new ſettlement of the affaires here, is now quite forgotten; ſince theſe mutations, wee heare no newes from them: the army is ſtayed from proceeding, and I beleeue they depend vpon the hopes of ſubmiſſion to this emperour: butt, in my opinion, they haue advanced too farre, to truſt to any ſafe retraict; and though they haue bene the indirect occaſion of the riſing of this emperour, yett the way was not warrauntable in the rule of monarchy, nor perhapps ſincere in the intent. Kings ſeldome pardon thoſe that are able to bee traitors, and haue but ſhowed a will: Nam qui deliberant, deſciverunt; and that power is neuer ſecure, which is too much. Sometymes they make vſe of traitors forces: Munimentum in præſens, in poſterum ultionem. And this maxime Hali baſſa, in the laſt great Aſian defection, approued with the price of his life, beeing taken into the fauour of Achmatt in all priuacy, made baſſa of Buda, and within 4 moneths ſtrangled, vnder couler of putting on a veſt of honor. Therfore I may reaſonably doubt, that they who haue diſcouered ſo high thoughts, and haue exaſperated the Janizaries, will not ſoe eaſily depoſe armes, by which only they may bee ſafe: and it is feared they haue intelligence with Perſia. There reſts yett one great difficulty, to introduce that awe of majeſtie, which hath bene trampled under foote; and it is a great one, when a people, like the ſea, haue made a breach into antient reuerence, and proſpered; the taſt of wickedneſs is not ſo eaſily loſt. What effect theſe changes will worke upon the parts of Chriſtendome intereſſed, is vncerteyne, becauſe vndeclared: butt, in generall, I think they intend peace vniuerſally, to recouer money, and a habitt of obedience, and ciuill gouerment. All that is yett done, is a letter written to the baſſa of Buda, to follow his diſcretion in the mouing of armes againſt the emperour, as a man experienced on the border, to doe what ſhall moſt conduce to the ſafety and proffit of the ſtate. Vpon his opinion the concluſion will depend, and hee is a fauorer and pentioner of Ferdinand: yett many beleeue, and nott without great circumſtances of probability, that there ſhall neede no other mediator of the peace, then the prince himſelfe of Tranſiluania, who, though aduanced with his army, will bring home another conqueſt then was expected. The Poliſh agent hath renewed and corrected his articles of treaty; on that ſide nothing appeares cloudy or troubleſome, both affecting a conſtant peace; yett they haue declared, that they will not ſuffer the Tartars to paſſe their dominion in ayd of Bethlem, to the preiudize of Chriſtendome, as not bound thereto by their treaty.

IN the middſt of this appearing calme, the Janizaries, ſome repenting, ſome denyeing their conſent to remitt their donatiue, and encreaſe of pay, haue anewe ſharply demanded it, with threats of innovation, ſo as they are forced to content them: butt this hath diſcouered the great ſcarſity of mony; euery other order of men and officers, that are not of the ſword, are forced to contribute to it. The vizier ſent ſolemnly to the fower reſident ambaſſadors to borow 30000 chequins, as the frends and allyes of this port, to whom in confidence they durſt open their ſecretts. Many old officers, experienced, miſliked this demaund, as diſhonorable, and vnlikely to take effect: and our neceſſities beeing as great in our proportion as theirs, forced a refuſall, the mony beeing ſo abaſed, and our trades ſo poore, as they affoord us no full purſes. The newe emperour, to ſerue this turne, hath giuen out 400000 dramms of gold, beeing his beſt veſſell, to make coyne; which wee feare ſhall not bee too good, to meet with the inſolency of the ſoldiour, who will take no ſiluer, as baſe mony; and I ſee no hope of reformation in the mynt, which will deſtroy all forayne trade in a ſtate deiected, and driuen to ſhifts: ſo this ſea is not quietted; butt wee rather take breath, then are at reſt.

THIS day is arriued a currier from the emperours ambaſſador to his agent here, bringing newes of the haſt of his maſter, now at Belgrade: his comming wee daily expect; and it aſſures us, that the baſſa of Buda enclynes to peace, by his admiſſion; and that Bethlem Gabor is not contrary: butt the motion muſt not proceed from him, leaſt hee diſcouer the innſyde of his garments: hee beganne the warre, and will make the peace follow his own deſſignes; and I am of opinion, it is not tyme for this ſtate to ſee it.

FROM Aſia wee heare afreſh, that Abaſſa baſſa proceeds victorious, butt vſeth it againſt none but the Janizaries. Wee are vncerteyne whether hee hath heard of the newe emperour, butt beleeue hee will not bee quietted with the name only: if hee continewe, he will endanger all Aſia.

SINCE the former, the donatiue hath bene paid to the ſoldiours, moſt in gold, to ſome a 4th or 5th in dollers, for more they would not take in ſiluer, nor that in the ordinary coyne of the cuntry. The Janizaries only receiued for their preſent about a million of checquins, beſides the Spahees, and other orders. This guift hath nowe bene twice exacted in 15 moneths, twice more within two yeares before. The treaſure is long ſince exhauſted, and by force ſupplyed. For the preſent, the gold is abaſed one third; which though it ſerue the inſtant occaſion, it cauſeth murmuring, and will cutt off the ſtreame of money at the ſpring, which is trade; for the merchaunt ſtraunger muſt leaue theſe parts, if it continue, coyne beeing ſo baſe in the quality, and yett riſen in the value aboue another third, that really hee hath butt one third of his antient price for his commodity.

BUTT, except in the ſearch of money, the ſtate and city appeares quiett; though two dayes paſt the late baſſa of Cairo, Buſtangi baſſi to Oſman, newly made baſſa of Buda, ambitiouſly ſeeking the dignity of great vizier, by the guiſt of 100000 checquins, his offer was ſeemingly accepted, part of the money paid, and hee ſent for priuatly into the Seraglio, as to receiue the ſeale. Butt the emperours beſt counſell within ſawe howe daungerous it was to giue way to ſuch innouations (beſides a priuat grudge, this man beeing the inſtrument to ſtrangle the queene mothers eldeſt ſonne, when Oſman went to the Poliſh warre); where, inſtead of aduancement, a hangman was ready to take off his head, and his houſe and goods (infinitly rich, if it bee found) ſeazed. The emperour Ferdinand will not bee ſorry for his death, beeing loath to change Mehemett baſſa vpon his frontire.

CIGALA baſſa ſent generall into Aſia, moſt of his army hauing forſaken him, and Abaſſa baſſa aduanceing apace towards him, hee tooke Angria in Natolia for his refuge, and winter garriſon, ſending to the port for a ſupply. Whereupon a councill was held of all the antients, in which it was reſolued to ſend out the aga of the Janizaries preſently, and againſt the ſpring to make further prouiſion. For Cantemir Mirze, baſſa of Siliſtra, who was alſo in diſobedience, whom the laſt vizier attempted to diſplace, and gaue order to the prince of the Tartars to remoue him by force; it was thought fitt not to thruſt him further out, and ſo make him a daungerous enemy: wherefore a confirmation of his gouerment is ſent him, a ſword and veſt in all honor; which wilbee yll taken of the Poles, hee beeing their mortall enemy, and remoued, at their inſtance, in the laſt treaty: this may occaſion new troubles on that ſide. The reſt of the councill ended in the ſearch of money.

But they refuſed to admitt him, and Abaſſa baſſas men had entrance.

SINCE which the diſpatch of the aga of the Janizaries is ſtayed, aduice beeing come, that Abaſſa baſſa is retyred to his owne goverment of Arzerum; butt whether hee will abſolutly obey or not, is yett vncerteyne. I am of opinion, hee hath proceeded too farre: Eſſe privatis cogitationibus regreſſum, & prout velint plus minuſve, ſumi ex fortunâ: imperium cupientibus, nihil medium inter ſumma aut præcipitia. And it is thought hee hath affected a conqueſt for himſelfe, and Trabizond for his regall ſeate. There is no doubt butt hee may haue his pardon, if he dare truſt it: but, Facilius univerſos impelli, quam ſingulos vitari. This winter wee expect to heare no more of him.

THE emperours ambaſſador arriued at Sophia is daily expected; a gentleman ſent from him to the vizier had audience with the agent, and were both well receiued, and veſted: which confirmes mee in the opinion of peace, though the prince of Tranſiluania bee aduanced into Hungary, and ſome skirmiſh about the taking or reliefe of a caſtle. Wee heare not of any preparation of the emperour to reſiſt him, as if hee were confident hee meant not to offend him.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

WEE have had here lately a publique miniſter amongſt vs, of whome wee heard when he was at Colen, (where he went vnder the name of the emperors ambaſſadour) and of his intention to come hether. From thence he came to Weſel, where the States could have bene content he would haue ſtayed without paſſing further; and being iealous of his arrand, or at leaſt of the fame which might be ſpread thereof, tending to peace or truce, (which might ſlack the ſuccours they here receave, and expect further, from their frends) ſent to their deputyes at the camp to ſtay him at his entrance, and there receave his commiſſion, and returne anſweare; and writt likewiſe to ſuch townes as are on the way, in caſe he ſhould not come at the camp, to entertayne him where he ſhould be firſt found, till new order from hence. This could not prevent his deſcending downe the river; which way he came, without ſetting foote on land any where, till he arrived at Dort; where that towne, in regard of the commerce it hath more then others of theſe provinces with the empire, would not ſtop him, but ſuffered him to come forward the $\frac{19}{29}$th of this preſent, in a coche of his owne, and a Hollands wagon, which contayned all his trayne of 13 perſons. He paſſed by Roterdam and Delft, (as he was counſelled at Dort, for feare of Peckius ſalutations) and arriving here by night, the $\frac{19}{29}$th, betwixt 10 and 11 a clock, lodged in a blind inne, without knowledge being taken of him by the ſtate, till he demanded audience the next day. Whervpon the States deputed two of their aſſemblye to take information of his commiſſion; and finding his letters of credence ſuperſcribed, fidelibus dilectis noſtris, they tooke exceptions againſt them, as proper onely to ſubjects of the empire; and ſent him a meſſage by Valkenburgh, one of the clarkes of their aſſemblye, That they would not give him audience, nor enter into any communication with him, vntill he could procure letters of credence from the emperor, by which it might appeare that the emperor had no pretention of ſuperiority over the ſoverainty of theſe provinces: which he accepted for anſweare, and went away towards Hamburgh the 23th of this preſent, ſtilo vet. having obtayned paſport from the States to goe and returne; and the night before his departure, he putt certayne points concerning his negotiation into the hands of Valkenburgh, reduced at large in writing vnder theſe five ſeverall heads: 1. Quoad reductionem feudorum. 2. Quoad negotiationem civitatum Hanſiaticarum, &c. 3. Quoad redemptionem captivorum. 4. Quoad primarias preces. 5. Quoad curiam Aquenſem. Deſiring Valkenburgh to acquaint the States with thoſe writings, to the end they may be the better prepered againſt his returne from Hamburgh (which he promiſed ſhalbe within theſe three weekes) to treate with him; and meane while, he vndertakes to procure from the emperor letters of credence not ſubject to exception, becauſe they ſhall have the like addreſſe as to the ſtate of Venice, excuſing theſe he now brought as an error of the ſecretary, who guided himſelf by the ſtyle of the emperors vſuall writing to the cantons of the Swiſſe.

IN the whole courſe of theſe pieces left behinde, his labour hath bene to remove ſuch prejudicate opinions as may hinder his negotiation. As for the firſt point, touching feuds; to aſſure the States, His purpoſe and charge is no other, then to enquire into ſuch particular feuds within the precinct of this ſtate, (as ſome there are) which depend properly on the empire, without touching eyther townes or prouinces. For the ſecond, concerning mart-townes, That he hath no intent to incommodate the commerce of theſe parts, but rather to free it from many incombrances it doth meete with both by land and water, betwixt this and Germany, more of late dayes, by reaſon of the warres, then formerly. In the third, touching priſoners in the Turks hands; That he would not employ the money which ſhould be here collected for their redemption, otherwiſe then for ſuch as ſhould be natives of theſe countreyes; of which, any who would enter into the new order of militia ſacra, erected by the count of Altemp, might be admitted; becauſe no chriſtian religion is excluded. The 4th is not well vnderſtood by the States; but conceaved to concerne the donation of certayne eccleſiaſticall livings, as Rhynsburgh, (an ancient rich abbey within ſight of this place, vpon the old Rhyne) and others

ſayth, the emperor will accommodate himſelf to the change of goverment here vpon the change of religion, and onely requires to have his right acknowledged. In the 5th, touching Aquiſgrane, he onely ſtands for right of appeale concerning ſuch places as heretofore had reſort vnto that court of iuſtice; as Nimmegen, (in which place he doth inſtance) and other townes in Guelderland.

In all theſe points, he pretends to require no more of this ſtate, then the emperor doth demaund of the king of Spayne and the infanta, in the reſt of theſe 17 provinces vnder their goverment; and ſeaſoneth his whole diſcourſe with profeſſions of the emperors peaceable diſpoſition, and deſire of the common good, as well of this lower as higher Germany, after their many ſufferings by the warre; which he would perſuade them they may here enjoy ſub umbram alarum of the imperial eagle; and that is the ſtyle of his commiſſion, which (with theſe particularityes of his inſtruction) he likewiſe left in the hands of Valkenburgh, and is therin qualifyed, Johannes Baptiſta Grammey, juris utriuſq; doctor, protonotarius & vicarius apoſtolicus, primatus Arnemenſis conſiliarius, et elemoſynarius imperatoris, in Imperium & Belgium expeditus.

Vpon the whole matter of this employment this iudgement is made, That it hath a double face, like Janus, one looking towards the warres, and ready to blow out a defiance vpon the fore-mentioned grounds, in caſe the armes of the emperor and catholique league, ioyned to the Spaniſh forces in theſe parts, may, in likelyhood, make any notable effect againſt this ſtate; the other having an aſpect vpon peace or truce, in caſe the terror of theſe many armyes, more then ever environed this ſtate, can reduce theſe provinces to admitt thereof vpon thoſe termes as were preſented by Peckius, and here skornfully rejected, at the expiration of this laſt truce; and becauſe in eyther of theſe events his majeſties ſervice is much intereſſed, I have thought it neceſſary to enlarge my ſelf the more, without omitting any circumſtance in this ſubject; which I foreſee will afford hereafter much matter of advertiſement.

Meane while it appeares, Tilly, like a wiſe captayne, and provident as he is fortunate, will not adventure the breaking of a victorious army, by engaging it in an ill countrey, vpon doubtfull enterpriſes: for wee vnderſtand by letters of the $\frac{18}{28}$th of this preſent, from one Virry, (who commaunds for the States at Sparenburgh in the countye of Rauensberg) that Tilly hath quitt the countye of Oldenburgh, and is returned with his whole army towards Germany, as far as Minden vpon the Weſer, where he intended to ſtay 14 dayes; in which march his men cutt in peeces two troopes of horſe belonging to the Neyther Saxes Creys, which diſputed a paſſage; and whether from thence he will goe into Halberſtat or Heſſen, to lodge this winter, Virry doth doubt, but one of them he eſteemes likely; wherby to ſettle the emperors authority in Germany, and not be farre from theſe parts, yf there be occaſion of his returne.

There is a generall ſpeach rayſed vpon Tillyes remove, that he is called back by the emperor to anſweare the alarum given by Bethlem Gabor in Hungarye; which is the more credited, becauſe Colalto followeth him with his troopes: but yf this were true, I ſee no reaſon for his lodging ſo long as he intends at Minden, and therfore truſt more to Virrys report of his purpoſe.

Lipstat (which hath bene beſieged this month) holds out better then was hoped; from whence here are letters of the $\frac{15}{25}$th of this preſent, written by Hatzfelt, the governour, That the ennemy hath quitt their trenches, by reaſon of water in that low ground; of which thoſe of the towne have ſerved themſelves by a new invention in drawing it into pooles by mills, and then letting it out agayne by ſluces, wherby to hinder the ennemyes approaches; who, to prevent this inconvenience, are buſye about a new worke, in ſtopping vp the lip, and turning it another way; in which they employ the boores of Munſterland, Paderborne, and Colen. Whervpon the States doe now write to the biſhop of Colen, and thoſe countreyes, to ceaſe that travell, or to make account to pay a large fyne hether, which wilbe exacted from them vpon breach of neutrality.

The prince of Orange went abroade the 18th of this preſent, with 3000 men, vpon an exploict to ſurpriſe Goch in Cleueland, beſides part of count Henryes army, which ioyned vnto him; but fayling of his enterpriſe, returned the day following 1623. to Arnhem; from whence (having firſt returned his owne troopes to the frontier townes in Guelderland, where they lodged before, and count Henryes to their wonted quarter) he is gône to viſitt Zutphen, Deuenter, and other townes vpon the Yſſel. Wherupon the marſhall Chaſtilion, with moſt of the French voluntaryes, deſpairing of any doings this ſummer, are returned this way into France. By example of the chiefe men of quality of that nation vnder Chaſtilion, our Engliſh lords caryed pykes in the march to Goch vnder generall Vere.

DON Gonzales de Cordoua hath removed his camp to another quarter beyond Weſel, where his preparations by entrenchment, and other proviſion, ſhew as yf he would winter, or at leaſt ſpend a great part of the ſeaſon.

COUNT Mansfelt being in all extremity of want, and forſaken by moſt of his French, which were the chiefe of his foote, receaves a new reliefe out of France; from whence here is come order for 30000 crownes, as halfe a monthes pay for his army, according to the quota of the Valtolina league; the other halfe being to be furniſhed by Venice and Sauoy. And he hath further promiſe, that the ſame ſhalbe continued by the French and Venetian ambaſſadors here reſident, who both had audience on Tueſday laſt in the aſſemblye of the States general, where they deſired the States, by way of proviſion, to continue the furniſhing Mansfelt with neceſſaryes for his army.

I HAUE receaued your lordſhips letters of the 26. of July, with all the precedent, of which theſe laſt were in part a duplicat. We are here filled with rumor of Gabors warre in Hungarie; but I am at a nonplus for that exſpectation, and ſo are others, whom your lordſhip knoweth it moſt concernes.

As yet, we haue not the newes of our princes arriual in England, though we are certaine of his departure from the court of Spain, withowt conſummation of his match; but the treatie thereof, it ſeemes, continueth, and will be drawne into length, which is peſſimum malorum. God ſend vs more comforts then we haue ſeene of late, and haue you, with all yours, in his holy cuſtodie.

Hagh, this 29th of
September, 1623.

To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My Lorde,

YOUR lordſhips laſt letter of the 7th Auguſt, winged with yll newes, made more than ordinary haſt; I hope, what you haue related of the heroicque duke of Brunſwick bee the worſt; for which though I am infinitely ſorry, yett ſince, wee haue receiued, that Monſ. de Tylly, following him vpon the Rhene, hath broken all his army, taken his cannon and munition, with the life of many noblemen, among whom the young count of Torne, which will at one blowe kill his valient father. Yett, ſeeing yours did aduiſe mee, that hee was, by computation, expected at Rees within 3 or 4 dayes, and no newes of danger, or an enemy ſo neare, I will reſiſt the rumour both within and without, where at this inſtant it may doe much harme vpon the treaty of the emperors ambaſſador, daily expected to enter, and may make frends coole, and newtralls enemyes; for the name of Brunſwick was all the encouragement and hope of equall ballance: ſoe I will not beleeue that, which were ſo much griefe to knowe. I thank your lordſhip for the knowledge I haue of any chriſtian affaires, and ſhould take it for a great fauour, if you would vſe the freedome of your nature, ſometyme to diſcourſe, as well as to relate; and to light mee a candle before, aſwell as behinde, that I may ſee what is like to enſue, as what is done. In part of recompence, I haue ſent your lordſhip my meditations vpon our changes and occurrents here, which I pray preſent her majeſtie.

THIS letter ſerues only to tell you, that I haue omitted no poſt, and that you
May. 30. ſhould haue receiued, ſince the laſt catalogue, thoſe of the date in the margen;
July 12. 20. which beeing arriued, this will take vpp the ſtory, like John Halls journall; yett
27. ſomwhat I haue fitt for a priuat letter. You may remember the diſgrace and diſ-
Aug. 24. placeing of our reuerent patriarch Cyrillus, who ſince hath ouercome many dangers frends in his priſon of the Rhodes, ſo that no treachery could preuaile vpon his life: now, in theſe newe tymes and changes, hee is reſtored both to his liberty and his ſeate. Aſſoone as wee had a new vizier, the Dutch ambaſſador, by force of money, (and ſomwhat elſe more deere) ſecretly procured his liberty; I meane, ſecretly from his oppoſites. The noyſe of his ſodayne coming hither ſtartled the newe patriarch, and his fewe adhærents, who hauing left his metropolitan ſea of Adrinople, (for the firſt excomunicate Romiſh proſelyte, his owne carriage had ſoone degraded and ympriſoned) feared, that Cyrillus would ſeeke to be reſtored, as beeing vniuſtly thruſt out, without any ſentence of the ſynode, degradation, or cryme proued againſt him, or any voluntary reſignation, without which hee knewe, by the rules of his owne church, no other could enter, but tanquam fur et latro; and therefore, in pretium reconciliationis, made a voluntary ſurrender. The French ambaſſador, hearing thereof, ſent for him, Anthemo, into his houſe, and offered him his protection, and ſo farr preuailed with him, as hee ſent him back to the patriarchall ſea, and cauſed him to bee proclaymed in the citty, and threatened all that would not obey him. Cyrillus was retired to the Dutch houſe, and ſent to mee; what aduiſe I gaue him, hee beſt knowes; butt all the Greekes of quality, as well laicks as clergy, flocked to their old paſtor in ſuch multitudes, and with ſuch reſolution, that Anthemo agayne wauers and repents, that hee hath entred into this conteſtation; and ſodainly, (by perſwaſion of ſome, that hee would bee too weake, and indeed hee is a ſeely old man) without the priuity of his patron the French ambaſſador, comes, ſubmitts, acknowledgeth his error, and reſignes his dignity to Cyrillus; and ſo hee is with a generall conſent preſented to the vizier, confirmed patriarch, in more grace then euer. Butt hinc illæ lachrymæ; it hath begotten and left a breach betweene theſe two ambaſſadors. The French takes himſelfe affronted by his inferiour, (indeed hee declared himſelfe too farre engaged by a proclamation) and ſent the other word by an angry ſecretary, that hee would perſecute Cyrillus with the laſt dropp of his bloud, a meſſage wyde of the ſtile of il legato chriſtianiſſimo. The Dutch defends himſelfe vpon priuat neceſſity, for this publique oppoſition, that this faction did owe him the beſt part of his eſtate, at treble intereſt, with which hee eates vpp the poore church. But this is not all the yll conſequence of this contraſt: they may bee frends; butt the violence of the oppoſition, the one as protector of the churches chriſtian, the other of his owne lent checquins, hath opened a dore to theſe rauenous tirants to enter in, and deuoure the bread vpon the altar; for the church was eſteemed before poore, and gaue an ordinary fyne; but now they haue reuealed an arcanum, That they can giue 60000 dollers for the admittance of a patriarch, which, I feare, euery vizier will make vſe of, and fine it ouer anewe: ſo that I doubt all the troubles of Cyrillus are not at an end. I am ſure, for the poore churches ſake, it had bene better, both they and their pattons had ſacrificed their ambitions and intereſts to the publicque peace. And of this the Dutch ambaſſador hath bene the worſt inſtrument, and liues by it. Your lordſhip will now giue mee leaue to end, not doubting but, like the players, you ſhall haue mee ſhortly with a newe matter. I leaue your lordſhip to the protection and bleſſing of God.

Conſtantinople,
$\frac{4}{14}$ Oct. 1623.

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionat, to ſerue you.

To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My Lord;

THE encloſed, and the former, I hope, you may throw in the fire, as ſtale copies: I ended with promiſe of new matter, which, without preface or prologue, I will performe. Abaſſa baſſa, of whom wee promiſed our ſelues peace, hath ſhowed hee hath further intents then to ſett vpp the bretheren of Oſman; ſuddenly, pretending obedience, hee aſſaulted and tooke the caſtle of Tocatt, which is the mynt of Aſia. Seauen beglerbeghs, and 16 ſanſacks, are ioyned with him; all that part of Aſia obeyes him; for hee oppreſſeth none, only executing his wroth vpon the Janizaries. This aduiſe, brought by a capten of that order, hath made much rumor here. The ſouldiours in tumult in the Seraglio haue demanded to bee lead out to fight, and to haue thoſe of Aſia declared rebells. A counſell to this end was 1623. held, where they receiued ſo cold an anſwere, (for what reſpects is a ſecrett to mee) that they grewe into ſome rage, accuſing two baſſas, by name Halil and Georgi, to haue correſpondence with them, and ſeeming to doubt, that the whole eſtate did conniue with this action, to proſecute the firſt deſſigne of Oſman to roote out that corrupted order, which now diſorders all gouerment; inſomuch that they openly proteſted, If wee bee true Muſſelmen, and the emperors ſlaues, lett us goe out and fight with his enemyes and ours; if not, and that you maynteyne them againſt vs, wee are reſolued to dye together, and not to bee waſted by peeces. There was much likelyhood of ſome ground for this ſuſpition, butt that Abaſſa baſſa hath proceeded too farre; therefore to ſatisfy the ſoldiour, the banner was ſett out at the gate of the court, and of the aga of the Janizaries, and warr proclaymed; that all the force of this empire ſhould bee ready to march within 4 dayes. When they ſawe this reſolution in the great ones, whether diſſembled or en bon ceant, I know not, this day the Janizaries and Spahees haue held a conſultation, and are changed; alleadging, that winter approacheth, no prouiſion made, and they will not moue. The viziers are gladd, and willingly accept their eaſe. And thus all Aſia is at the curteſy of the rebell; and my opinion is, it wilbee very hardly recouered; for Babilon, beſeeged, holds out on the other ſide; and this winter will giue other frends leiſure to declare, of which the Perſian is moſt doubted. The miniſters of Tranſiluania ſhew letters from their prince, that he hath taken aboue 20 walled places in Hungary; that is, as I ſuppoſe, that they are reuolted to him; that no enemy appeares; that all proſpers on their ſide; that hee hath 20000 Turks in his army; and that hee will winter there, which wilbe very troubleſome, and cauſe much diſlike to his party; for his authority cannott bridle them that only goe for ſpoile: that the count of Torne is gone into Morauia with 8000 Hungars lent by the prince to ſhuffle anewe the cards there. How much of this to beleeue, I know nott; butt whatt is done here, I can gueſſe: the emperors ambaſſador lingers within fewe dayes journey of this citty, for newe inſtructions, (as wee ſuppoſe) ſince the aſſurance of the ouerthrowe of the duke Chriſtian, and will come in with high demands. Here hee may bee a litle abated; for the prince of Tranſiluania, beeing aſſured that he will obteyne a peace, ſetts out his owne victories and purpoſes att the higheſt, butt with inſtruction to labour, that ſeeing at the port they cannott knowe vpon what termes to conclude, ſo well as hee and the baſſas vpon the border, eſpecially theſe beeing novi homines, vnpractized, that this ambaſſador may bee reteyned with delayes, and all his demands ſent to the prince, with ample authority for him, aſſiſted with the baſſa of Buda, (an imperiall pentioner) to make and conclude yt, knowing well, if it bee treated here, they will only reſpect their owne ends, ſatisfying him with a bare comprehenſion as a ſubiect; but if hee can obteyne the power of making the conditions, hee will not forgett himſelfe; and this, I think, hee will compaſſe, beeing too hard at this weapon of witt, for all the Turks, and ſo hee will aſſure himſelf both wayes.

THE other ſyde omitts not to ſett out the proſperity of the emperor, and to proclayme the laſt vnfortunate rout of that braue prince; it hath abated much the feruency of the Tranſiluanians, and there will bee much adoe to keep the Turks from an ouer-haſty embracement of any conditions of peace. I muſt ſitt ſtill, yett ſome aduice I will giue, to keep them from too precipitat reſolutions, not to make no peace, but in the conditions to remember our frends. I am ſorry I can doe more, and dare not. Her majeſtie will this poſt alſo pardon mee; the next, I ſhall not faile to ſay ſomwhat of certenty, becauſe wee expect the emperors ambaſſador wilbe arriued; and I cannott write to her, vntill I haue ſomwhat, that may at leaſt not diſpleaſe her.

I HAUE not omitted to write your lordſhip euery poſt of late, and ſhalbee gladd to know how they paſſe, which I will continue till you bee weary. And ſo I committ your lordſhip to Gods gratious bleſſing.

Your Lordſhips affectionat frend to ſerue you.

GIVE mee leaue to remember my ſeruice to Sir Hor. Vere, Sir Edw. Cecill, Sir John Borrows, and all my worthy frends.

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

MY laſt letters, of the 20th September, left the emperors ambaſſador about Belgrade, who, the 30th October, entred this citty with a convenient trayne, mett by the ſeruants of all the reſident ambaſſadors heere, (except mine, who attended at his houſe) to bidd him welcome; which I choſe to doe, to auoyd any ſtrife with the French, which thoſe publick occaſions of meeting might miniſter. Hee is a baron of Sileſia; his name Courcy; in apparance, a diſcreet and able gentleman: hee hath brought on his back a quotidian feuer; ſoe that as yett hee beginnes not any treaty, nor ſeekes audience. I haue offered him, according to his majeſties order, my ſeruice and aſſiſtance in all occaſions of the emperour, and for the publick peace; and receaued againe, in generall termes, a faire and courteous anſwere: but I ſuppoſe noe inward correſpondence will ariſe betweene us, the French hauing bene ambitious to ſeek him, and they already court one another. As I will not intrude my ſelf, ſoe I will not faile in my duty to his majeſtie, yf hee or his occaſions require me. His negotiation is not yett knowne; but that wee ſuppoſe hee comes to make offer, or rather to confirme the antient peace, and to expoſtulate the actions of Gabor, whoſe miniſters heere advance his victoryes in Hungary, as the others doe thoſe of Tillye in Germany. They ſay, hee hath taken 34 walled townes, and that all that kingdome hath ſubmitted to him, except 5 places. Somewhatt wee beleeue hee hath done, becauſe the emperor hath noe army to reſiſt; that the count of Torne is gone vp into Morauia with 8000 Hungars, to rayſe alterations there. But wee think the moſt are made of theſe things; becauſe, in the heate of this brauery, heere is expected an ambaſſador from him, to aſſiſt in the treaty of peace; to which hee profeſſeth not to bee averſe, but labours to draw the concluſion and reſolution thereof to himſelf. To this end, his agent deſireth, that all the demands and propoſitions of the emperours ambaſſador may bee ſent to him, that hee may conſider them, with the baſſa of Buda, (an emperiall pentioner) vppon the frontire, as being vppon the place, and more experienced in thoſe partes, of which the miniſters heere are wholy ignorant. Thus they hope to keepe this gentleman as a pledge to drawe the treaty in length, thereby to work ſome advantage, or to enforce the emperor to yeeld to ſuch conditions, as theyr maſter hath, in all this action, aymed at, ſoe that the peace may bee in his power, and, as it were, his guiſt; which, without queſtion, hee will make much for his owne advantage, and ſecure himſelf betweene theſe two empires, at the coſt of both. The Dutch ambaſſador, in like manner, workes uppon them, propounding many conditions to interrupt the treaty, and to hinder the peace; that the emperour may bee enforced to draw vp his forces, with thoſe of his champion, the duke of Bauare, to defend his frontire, and to eaſe his maſters of the terror now threatning them. But this ſtate is not in caſe to make a warre (howeuer, neuer more inſolent); and I am perſwaded all wilbee compounded, and Beth. Gabor comprehended on both ſides: a few dayes will diſcouer theyr intentions; though, I think, the winter will not finiſh the treaty. Abaſſa baſſa in Aſia hath taken Tocatt, the mint of Aſia, and arriued before the citty of Angria; they opened theyr gates; all yeelds to him. It is reported, that hee calles himſelf the poore Mahomett, deputed to reforme the world, by the great God; that hee weepes to the people, and tells them, that hee is the true ſlaue of the preſent emperour, but that hee muſt execute his commiſſion, to reuenge the bloud of ſultan Oſman, who appeared to him in the night; and not thereby encouraged, his great prophett deſcended, and commaunded him to take armes. Hee doth harme to none, but invites thoſe that are willing to take his part, licencing all others to depart in peace; only, yf hee take any Janizaries, hee ſacrificeth them to the ghoſt of his dead maſter. His army is very great; the aſtrologers publickly augure his proſperity; euery mans diſcourſe is of him, rather with fables, as in ſuch caſes, then with feare. It is ſaid, hee is marched towards Bruſcia, the ſeate of the Ottomans, before they paſſed the Helleſpont. Others report, hee directly marcheth to Scutary, ouer againſt this citty, being within 6 or 8 dayes iourney, and noe preparation to oppoſe him, except ſome few Janizaries, lately ſent out, as ſome think, rather to deuide them, then to other effect. His intention is vnknowne, and diuerſly diſcourſed: many ſpread abroad, 1623. that hee will directly come before Conſtantinople, and demand, that the quarrell betweene him and the Janizaryes may bee tryed by lawe: yf hee bee condemned for a rebell, that hee will ſubmitt his head; but yf they haue bene traytours, for the murther of theyr prince, hee will execute the reuenge. It is generally thought, ſeing the coldneſs of the emperor, and the ſlow preparation againſt him by the viziers, that hee is ſecrettly maintayned by the ſtate, and proſecutes the deſſigne of Oſman, to wreſt the vſurped gouerment out of the hands of the mutined ſoldiers, and to roote out that order. Certainly, all the men of the law (that is, of the church) ſmile, and rather reioyce then feare. And this opinion is confirmed by many circumſtances: Firſt, That at the inſtance of the Janizaries the mufti would not declare him a rebell; which had like to haue bred a great rumour. They accuſed ſome viziers to haue correſpondence with him, by letters intercepted; and theſe were clapt vp 2 or 3 dayes, till the fury was ouer, and ſince ſett at liberty. Many times the ſtate hath made ſhew to ſend ouer the great vizier, and the aga of the Janizaryes, to giue them battle; but it is ſtill deferred, as yf they deſired his approach, to ſett them at liberty from the inſolency of theyr owne ſlaues. Yett, though I know not what to beleeve, in my opinion, hee hath proceeded too farre, to make beglerbeghs, and that the truſt is too great: beſides, hee took armes in the time of ſultan Muſtapha, to whome hee was doubtleſſe an enemy; and it was hoped hee would haue retyred, and obeyed, at the enthroning of this emperor. But whatſoever the miſtery is, hee proceeds ſoe farre, that yf hee bee in earneſt, and pretends for himſelf, hee will deuide this empire, and take the better half. Yf hee come, as hee pretends, for reformation, it may proue bellum ſervile, which may endanger the whole; for the Janizaries will not lay theyr necks vppon the block. In the meane time, wee poore ſtrangers ſuffer all manner of iniuryes, and all oppreſſions; noe capitulations obſerued; double and new cuſtomes exacted to gett money: and when lately I pleaded mine, a baſe cuſtomer tooke them away, and pronounced them counterfait. The vizier hath returned them with fayre wordes, but noe reparation of honour, noe reſtitution of money, noe iuſtice; all is anſwered, The emperour wants. I haue enformed the merchants, yf they will alwayes beare theſe burthens, they may at laſt runne rieſgo of theyr whole eſtates. I will doe my duty to reſiſt, and to enforme your honour the truth; which, I humbly beſeech you, may bee referred to his majeſtye, and that I may haue rule how to carry my ſelf with a ſtupid patience. Much of this wee might reforme heere, yf wee were vnited. Not many dayes ſince the ambaſſadors had a conference; wee were agreed euery man to write his complaints, and to carry them firſt to the vizier, and, in want of iuſtice, to the king; when the French ambaſſador began with his wonted demand, that wee might goe togither, to draw from mee a yeelding of precedency, preſſing it as abſolutely neceſſary, to ſhew an vnion; which hee could not conceaue to bee in the center and end, not in the beames or circumference; that it was the antient courſe; to go ſingle, was innovation, which his maſter had forbad him, or els that hee would not moue: in as much as I was enforced to tell him, hee miſtooke the rules of this place, and that I would auoyd all occaſion of ſuch a diſpute as might enſue. Then he cytes hyſtories, precedents; proclaymes to the other ambaſſadors, that in all the world it is yeelded, that I had order to doe it; and ſoe wee break of all good correſpondence, and ſubject our ſelues to the iniuryes and skorne of the Turkes. I deſired your honour, 8 moneths paſt, to take ſome courſe to regulate vs, and to find a meane in this buſines, which, in the end, will begett ſome ill effect, but I neuer had any anſwer.

I WILL not further importune your honour with our affayres; but deſiring you wilbee pleaſed to enforme his majeſty and the lords of as much as may diſcharge my dutye, I committ your honor to the protection of the Almighty.

Righte Honorable,

IT is nowe a full monthe ſince his majeſties ambaſſador, whome I haue ſerued here with my beſte abilities, hathe lefte me in qualitie of a publique ſeruaunte, till his lordſhip, or ſome other, retorne; wherein I finde my ſelfe tied in a newe obligation to ſerue your lordſhip with what occurrents of conſideration this place maie afforde; which within it ſelfe is ſoe little ſubiecte to alteration, that it will ſeldome miniſter matter for your content: howſoeuer, I wilbe bolde, either of this, or anie other place, where it maie be for your lordſhips vſe, make you the beſte collection I can; and therefore, for this time, I will begin with that which merits the firſte place. Oure prince (bleſſed be God) is ſaſlie arriued in Englande, hauinge (as it is here verie current, and muche wiſhed) lefte bothe his miſtris and the place with muche diguſte. The newes of his arriuall I had vpon Thurſdaie laſte from Mr. Trumball, from Bruxells, without anie other circomſtance at all; wherin, by my nexte to your lordſhip, I hope I ſhall giue you full ſatisfaction. The ſounder ſorte of oure religion, I thinke, are ſuer well pleaſed with this; but the craked liue in hope, that there is ſoe muche life lefte in the treatie, that the marriage will yett be broughte aboute. I praie to the Almightie, turne all for the good of oure poore ilande, that hathe beene ſoe muche aimed at by that nation.

FROM the Lowe Countries it is verie likely your lordſhip will vnderſtande what is done there, by this adioyned letter, which, I thinke, comes from Sir Dudley Carlton, and broughte to me vpon Thurſdaie laſte.

THE newe pope hathe alreadie begun to treate with this republique for theire proceſſe againſte the Jeſuits, that he maie ſe with what iuſtice or iniuſtice they haue beene baniſhed out of this ſtate; and (as they ſaie) intendethe to be a ſutor, that, if not all, at leaſt theyre owe naturales maie be reſtored.

HE dothe likwiſe will them to licence all theire commaunders in warre, that be heritiques, but namlie counte Mansfelte, who is their penſioner.

FOR the States of the Lowe Countries, he treatethe, that they wolde diſolue the league, ſende theire ambaſſador home, and renounce all good correſpondencie with them.

THAT they ſholde not proceed with that monimente which is nowe almoſte finiſhed for padre Paolo di Serui, that moſte learned and well diſeruinge man of this ſtate, and he that nowe is well knowne to be the penman of the Councel of Trente. It maie be, Iniquum petat, ut æquum ferat. Howſoeuer, I cannott heare, that theſe liſten to anie of his propoſitions, but goe conſtantlie and ſtoutlie forwarde in all thoſe courſes they haue formerlie helde; and onlie doe ſacrifice to his holines, as ſome of the ancients did to theire gods, not that he wolde doe them good, but that he ſhould doe them noe harme: howſoeuer, he maie proue another Paulus Quintus. And this is all that I can finde worthie of your lordſhip for this time. Thus, with the rememberance of my beſte ſeruice, I humblie take leaue, kiſſe your lordſhips handes, and reſte

My Lord,

I CANNOT give your lordſhip a particular accompt of the diſpatches which I haue receiued from you ſince my laſt vnto you; becauſe, as they come to my handes, I ſend them to the court, for his majeſties peruſall, and they are not allwayes returned vnto me againe. The laſt I had from your lordſhipp was within theſe fewe dayes, and advertiſed the depoſition of the emperor Muſtapha, and the inauguration of the young prince Amurat. Perhapps, the empire being now fallen into the right line of ſucceſſion againe, the reverence to his perſon, though he be but young, will ſettle that gouernment, and you will haue a calme againe after your many ſtormes, wherein your conſtancy hath ben meritorious.

1623. THE letters of thancks from the Poliſh lords vnto his majeſty for their liberty, were deliuered, and his majeſty thought his favor and mediation well beſtowed. I haue long expected from France ſome ſuch ſatisfactory anſwere concerning their embaſſador reſident at Conſtantinople, and his comportment with your lordſhipp, as might giue an end to theſe differences betweene you about precedency; and to that purpoſe did inſtruct Sir Edward Herbert fully, and informed him of your lordſhipps whole proceedings in that buſineſſe, which were very diſcreete, and without iniury to the honor of either king: but I perceiue, by the dilatory anſwers given by Monſ. de Puiſieux, and the chancellor, that they haue no minde to give any other directions, then to ſtand peremptorily vpon their firſt punctuall vniuſt claime. In which reſpect your lordſhipp ſhall doe well to avoyd all occaſion of conteſtation as much as may be, and to keepe his majeſties honor entire, though it be with ſome inconvenience another way; wherein they haue their part, it ſeemes, as well as you.

To the vniverſall ioy of all this kingdome, the prince is returned out of Spaine ſafe, thancks be to God, and in perfect health: he was long at ſea, by reaſon of contrary windes, though not much fowle weather, coming from St. Anderas, and landing at Portſmouth the vth of the laſt moneth of October. The deſpoſorios, or contract, was not made before his departure out of Spaine; but power is left, by a proxie, which his highnes hath made vnto the king of Spaine, and his brother Don Carlos, to performe that for him per verba de præſenti, as ſoone as the benediction comes from Rome, which was expected every day. Vpon the concluſion of this match depends all treaties and councells concerning the Palatinate, and not any reſolution yet taken what to doe; ſo as I cannot giue your lordſhipp any particular directions from his majeſty, how to carry your ſelfe in thoſe affaires, which, in that court, haue relation to the empire, or howſe of Auſtria: but the ſafeſt way, in my opinion, will be, to doe as you haue done, vntill you haue order to the contrary. His majeſty is at this preſent in ſome paine of his feete, an vſuall thing with him, of late yeres, in this ſeaſon; otherwiſe (thancks be to God) he is in health, and is expected to come this day from Roiſtone to Theobalds, where two Spaniſh embaſſadours are to haue their audiences; the one, whoſe name is Don Diego de Mendoça, came along with the prince out of Spaine, and hath no other errand but thancks vnto his majeſty, from his maſter, for the honour he did him, in ſending his highnes to his court; the other is called Don Diego de Mexia, and comes from the infanta at Bruſſells, attended with a traine of 130 perſons, many of them of the prime nobility of Flanders, and thoſe provinces, to congratulate his highnes ſafe returne into England. For all other occurrents heere, your lordſhipp, I preſume, vnderſtands them weekely from your other freindes: and therefore, with my ſervice remembred to my lady, for whoſe health and contentment I ſhall ever pray, as ſpecially obliged, for the loue and affection ſhe bore vnto my deare wife deceaſed, I ceaſe from further troubling you, and reſt

Right Honorable,

YOUR honour, before the arriuing of this, may haue ſome deſire to vnderſtand of the proceedings of Abaſſa baſſa in Aſya, and of the negotiation of the emperours ambaſſadour in this court, and the actions of the prince of Tranſiluania in Hungarie, of which I left you in expectation by my laſt letters, and am now ready to giue you an account.

To preuaile by armes for the ſuppreſſion of the firſt, is eyther held a doubtfull courſe, or perhaps vnfitt for the preſent condition of this ſtate; and the hole purpoſe is converted into a gentle meſſage, a ſword, veſt, and letter, ſent to him from the emperour, giuing thankes for his loue and zeale ſhewed to the bloud of his brother; but deſiring that hee will heereafter leaue the reuenge to him, to whome it doth belong; and that hee will deſiſt from further attempts, and returne in peace to his gouernement of Arzerum, vntill occaſion of other ſeruice. This humility is ſtrange to vs, the eſtate is not ſoe extreame lowe, (yf there bee noe ſecrett vnknowne) that the prince ſhould ſeek for peace of his owne ſlaue, precariò. What effect this courſe and gentlenes will produce, wee can make noe judgement, but by conference of his preſent actions with the neceſſitye of the times. Hee comes not on hither directly, and in ſuch a frett as was expected; butt is turned aſide, to ſecure and take in all the ſtrong places, which would then bee on his back; which is an ill preſage of his meaning; yett hee deſiſtes not to cutt of the Janizaries; and to pretend that only to bee his ayme and reſolution. Hee makes beglerbeghs of the places in his obedience; and it is reported, that hee hath ſent one to Aleppo; which yf it bee true, hee can diſſemble noe longer that he affects the monarchy. In the meane time, heere in the citty, hath been diuers changes of councells; when they reſolued to goe out to fight (yf it were not a feigned reſolution) the Janizaryes refuſed to moue, for feare of being betrayed by the Spahees (theſe two orders being now fallen into faction); but rather maintayning an intelligence among themſelues, they retyre all hither in ſuch multitudes as were neuer ſeene in the citty, as yf they ment heere to trye theyr laſt fortune; where they keep half watch, armed in theyr chambers, which are as colledges, or ſeminaries, ielous to bee ſurprized, knowing that all ſortes of men are become iuſtly theyr enemyes. They publickly boaſt, that ſhortly they will ſhew themſelues, and ſell theyr skinnes very deere: that they dipped theyr handes in the bloud of theyr true king, for a ſuſpition only, was a fault; but now they are in, they muſt maintayne it: what will they not doe againſt thoſe that are theyr declared enemyes? Therfore that they will attend the approach of Abaſſa baſſa, to diſcouer all his adhærents and fauorites, whome they firſt threaten with death, eſpecially the lawyers and churchmen, theyr greateſt oppoſites; and ſoe, firing the citty, they ſay they will goe out, and fight for theyr liberty. This bold reſolution, in my opinion, (the emperour and the whole citty being in theyr power) hath bene the cauſe of this change of adviſe, to divert Abaſſa baſſa for a time, yf hee haue intelligence with the court, leaſt his comming putt the Janizaries into deſperation; and therefore it is diſſembled, vntill perhaps the kyng can make an eſcape to him. But on the other ſide, there is much probabilitie, that hee hath ends of his owne greatnes, and that this ſtate wilbee driuen at laſt to a warre, which will diuide, or diſſolue yt. Yf neyther of theſe, and that hee ſhould obey this letter, yet the inſolency of the Janizaryes is ſuch, that an army of ſtones will riſe againſt them; and as long as they continew in power, it may bee already ſayd, Heere is noe more empire, where there is noe juſtice nor gouerment; for euen in this extremity, thoſe few ſent to make garriſon in Burcia ſoe oppreſſe the inhabitants, that they flye hither, and wiſh for the rebell inſtead of theyr defenders. Euery great officer makes haſt to gett money by all kind of injuſtice, as yf he layd vp for a day of flight or affliction. In the middſt of all theſe feares, few ſeeme to bee ſenſible; but rather ſmyle, whiſper, and reioyce, as yf they were in hope to bee ſett at liberty from a tirranye, then which there can bee noe worſe; and that there were ſome refreſhing in change of miſery.

THE emperours ambaſſadour hath had his firſt audience of the great vizier, and deliuered his letter: theyr meeting was more priuate then ordinary, and theyr diſcourſe ſhort; and the anſwer was, to as much as was propounded, very cold. His meſſage in generall is (for I think hee will communicate noe particulars with mee) an offer, and a requiſition of a mutuall ratification of the antient league, and to expoſtulate the actions of Bethleem Gabor, and to procure that eyther hee bee recalled or diſavowed, or els to declare, that the emperour will make warre vppon him, without intent of breach with the port.

THE miniſters of Tranſyluania, on the other part, report, That theyr maſter hath reduced all Hungarie to his obedience, except ſome few places reſtrayned by garriſons. The laſt weeke arriued a poſt, and letters from the prince, adviſing, That hauing ſent his vantgard to take in a citty called Nachſonbach, 4 dayes ſhort of Morauia, whither hee intended to march; that they preuented an imperiall garriſon goeing thither, who then entrenched themſelves, entertayning skirmiſhes, vntill the prince came vpp with his whole army, who then forced them with the death of 700, and taking priſoners 2000 with all their munition; wherevpon, the next day, the citty opened theyr ports, and receaued him as theyr king: That hee intends to winter thereabouts; and yf the ſuccours ſent him had not bene ſoe delayed, hee ſayes, long ſince hee would haue lodged them in Prague, which hee promiſeth to 1623. doe in the next ſpring; but yf the grand ſignor encline to peace, that hee will obey his commaunds. Therefore, that ſeing hee took armes only for the ſeruice of the port, and could now make his peace alone, vppon great conditions of advantage to himſelf, being offered the daughter of the emperour, in aſſurance of the future, hee deſired that this imperiall ambaſſadour may bee diſpeeded preſently with a generall anſwer, and directed to Buda, where commiſſioners, practique in the eſtate of the frontire, may meete; and that hee may receaue plenam potentiam, joyned with the baſſa of Buda, (an imperiall pentioner, which makes all the trayne ſuſpected) to treate and conclude the peace at theyr owne diſcretion, preſſing to draw this power to himſelf with many reaſons of his owne meritt, and euen taxing and diſabling the preſent miniſters of ſtate, as ignorant in theſe affaires. To ſtrengthen this motion, and to bring the preſent to the new emperour, hee ſayes, hee hath ſent an ambaſſadour with ample inſtructions, who is now daily expected. This is the ſubſtance of his laſt letters, and of the labour of his agents heere; which I beleeue they will obteyne; and the ambaſſadour ſhall haue a ſodaine diſpatch here, and a long arreſt at Buda; where wee ſhall diſcouer truly the inſide of this prince, who theſe two yeeres hath caryed himſelf ſoe ſubtilly, that his owne neereſt ſeruants haue not bene able to diſcerne him. The truth is; hee hath gotten a great advantage vppon the emperour, which hee may vſe to his honour, and the profitt of his frends, yf hee had not rather enioy ſomewhat els. Hee makes noe ſhew of a will to accept of peace, but in obſequiouſneſs to this court, to which hee giues great promiſes; but in a ſeaſon when hee knowes they are not in eſtate to preſſe him to his word. To theſe hee pretends nothing but the advancement of the Ottomans, his maſters; to vs, the liberty of the kingdomes of Hungarie and Bohemia from the title of ſucceſſion layd vppon them, and the freedome of oppreſſed conſciences. With the emperour he entertaynes, at the ſame time, treaty of peace and mariage, with his army on foot. To the Poles, that hee will compoſe all differences, and ſettle the border in quiett and ſafety; and after, ſhew himſelf a good chriſtian. Now hee wilbee brought vppon the teſt, and unmasked; for I am perſwaded, that the concluſion wilbee referred to him; wherein yf hee haue diſſembled with his allyes, hee hath fayled in his art, to draw ſoe much power into his owne hands; wherby hee can haue noe excuſe of being awed or conſtraynd, except hee purpoſe only to oblige the emperour to him, and to make that allyance, and to ſecure himſelf betweene thei two: but as hee profeſſeth the contrary, and that hee will make noe peace, but with due regard of his honour, I haue putt his miniſters in mind, in mine owne name, that hee ought to remember the prince Palatine, and in him his oath and reputation in Chriſtendome; that at leaſt, the reſtitution of his territorys may bee facilitated by his profeſſed conſtancy: which though done without order, I hope his majeſtye will not take in ill part, becauſe it can doe noe hindrance to the generall peace of Chriſtendome, that in this treaty his oppreſſion bee conſidered and countenanced; for whether they determine peace or warre, his cauſe will not ouer-ballance theyr reſolutions; and yf his majeſtye haue any hope of reſtitution by a treaty in Germany, that the grand ſignor and the prince of Tranſyluania ſtifly required yt, may bee ſome advancement. But they, of themſelues, goe further, and vow in theyr maſters name, yf hee bee enforced to make peace, that yett hee will harken to noe conditions, but the liberty of thoſe kingdomes, the title of king elect to bee acknowledgd in right to him, and the quiett enioying of all places which hee hath obteyned by his ſword, and are willing to obey him; and for the prince Palatine, that hee may bee at leaſt reſtored to his owne inheritance. To which they add other conditions, rather, I think, of oſtentation, then effect. I haue concealed nothing of the truth, and had rather erre, and bee chidden, then diſſemble any thing with my maſter; and beſeech your honor, acquaint him with the eſtate of theſe affayres; and, yf any alteration, I will by my next adviſe it; and alway reſt,

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

OUR harmeles warres are ended on this ſide for this yeare. Count Henry being returned to this place, and all his troopes, with thoſe likewiſe which were left in the frontiers by the prince of Orange, retired to their wonted garriſon.

A CERTAYNE band of mutiners from the ennemyes ſide, about 400 foote, and 20 horſe, which have bene long ſupported by the States in Cleueland, and now laſtly in their fort on the other ſide of the Rhyne, againſt Reés, was ſeparated by count Henry before he brake vp his camp; of which, the elector with 90 Italians, 4 Iriſh, and 6 Wallons, all old ſoldiers, are here ſuters to be entertayned in a company. The count Henry Vandenbergh hath done the like to a ſmaller ſquadron of the States men, mutiners at Goch; and Spinola hath renewed the neutrality of Moeurs for a yeare.

WEE doe not yet heare that Cordoua hath broken vp his camp. The count of Embden Ritbergh, ſince his taking of Lipſtat, is ſett downe before Sparenburgh, a ſmall caſtle, which is all that remaynes to the elector of Brandenburgh in the countye of Rauensbergh, where one Virry commaunds for the States with a company of men of 120, and is a man like to find the count ſome worke; though the place cannot hold out long, for want of victualls.

COUNT Mansfelts affaires are full of garboyle, he having written hether, about a weeke ſince, to the prince of Orange, that he could not ſtirre out of Eaſt-frizeland as yet theſe fower monthes, where he required the 300000 florins promiſed him by the inhabitants of that countrey conditionally, ſo he would depart, to be furniſhed him for his maintenance during his abode there; which being vnderſtood by the Embdenners, they in deſpaire ſett open their ſluces, drowning a great part of the countrey about them; and armed 5 or 6 ſhipps to lye vpon the entrance of the Ems, and hinder all tranſport of victualls betwixt Delfzile and Grietzile, and taken on 1200 men, with which they make warre by land vpon the Mansfeldians, as they find any of them ſtraggling amongſt the boores; which hath brought ſuch a penurye into that camp and countrey therabouts, that wee heare many, both ſoldiers and inhabitants, are dead of famine. Now other letters are come from Mansfelt by his treaſurer Dalbier, diſpatched hether to the prince of Orange, and the French and Venetian ambaſſadors, advertiſing, that he prepares to march, ſince the duke of Brunſwicks ioyning vnto him with his troopes, and requiring for that purpoſe the promiſed 300000 guilders of the Embdenners, and two monthes pay for the army, (which he accounts 20000 men) of theſe ambaſſadors. The Embdenners money wilbe in readines, the States hauing ſent their deputyes thether to furniſh the ſame conditionally, ſo as he quitt the countrey, and leave them in poſſeſſion of the places he holds, till they be remburſed their money; but the ambaſſadors, both of them, recoyle; the French, vpon pretended ill vſage of that nation, whome he hath procured that king to recall; and the Venetian, by example of the French.

COUNT Mansfelt in the mean tyme, uſing his accuſtomed artifices, hath ſett the French coronells one againſt the other; ſo as yf Monterau (the chiefe of them) retire, as he concurres therein with this ambaſſador, there is another ready to ſtep into his place; and Mansfelt flattly refuſeth to obey this ambaſſador, in ſending back the French; which, he ſayth, were his owne leavyes, with the money of the league; over which the French king alone, much leſſe his ambaſſador here with the States, in whoſe ſervice that army is not, hath no authority. And in this confuſion thoſe troopes remayne, vpon the point to part they know not whether, or periſh for famine; which is onely profitable to the poore countye of Eaſt-frizeland, that army being genus demoniorum, not otherwiſe to be chaſed out but jejunio; but where that calamity will fall, yf they can ſubſiſt and remove, whether on Weſtphalia, or the countye of Oldenburgh, is equally doubtfull; Oldenburgh having ſtrongly beſett all paſſages with ſome troopes of the king of Denmarke, and others of the countrey; and a good part of Tillyes army lying in Weſtphalia, vnder the commaund of Lentelo, one of his coronells, who was on foote with 40 troopes of horſe, to cutt of the duke of Brunſwicks horſe in their paſſage; but came too late.

1623. THE States have given order for ſhipps to goe immediatly from Amſterdam, to drive in the Embdenners, who lye vpon the paſſages; and inſtruction to their commiſſioners at Embden, to procure count Mansfelt reſtitution of his artillerye and bagage, (which the Embdenners ſtill detayne) and favour, all they poſſibly may, his marching, or at leaſt ſave him from periſhing.

TILLY lodgeth as yet with the chiefe of his army in Heſſen; which countrey he hath eaten vp ſo cleare, that there reſts little for man or horſe: ſix of his regiments, commaunded by Holſteyn, Lawenburgh, Colalto, Shawenburgh, and de Tour, being in pay of the emperor, after ſome diſputes about pay, before they would march, are finally gone (as I vnderſtand by letters from Franckford of the $\frac{7}{17}$. of this preſent) to the emperors ſuccours; in whoſe place he hath called back others he had ſent abroad, to winter in the duke of Wirtenburghs countreyes; which are therby eaſed of that ſmart.

WEE vnderſtand here, out of the Palatinat, that the elector of Mentz, ſince his returne from Bruxells, hath taken into his poſſeſſion all the Bergſtrate; the inhabitants whereof have done him homage, by order of the king of Spains miniſters, in whoſe hands the Bergſtrate remayned; which alienation being made during the tyme of the ſuſpenſion of armes chiefly negotiated at Bruxells, confirmes the prince electors iealouſyes, that the Spaniards poſſeſſing other princes of part of the prey, is with deſſigne the more to engage them in the quarrell of maintayning what they have gotten, without any intention of reſtitution. Further wee heare, that the Spaniſh miniſters about Crutzenach and Oppenheym have leaſed out ſuch lands as were formerly manured by the prince electors officers, for 10, 12, and 15 yeares; which manner of proceeding, ioyned to the putting another prince into the poſſeſſion of ſo rich a part of the prince electors territorye, with homage done by the ſubjects to a new lord, is reall and viſible to all the world; and the reſtitution, of which the duke of Bauier, as well as the Spaniards, can be content to talke, (for ſo wee are here advertiſed he doth ſomtymes) onely pretended hetherto, and imaginary.

IT may very well be, the progreſſe Bethlem Gabor makes in the vpper countreyes, may change the face of affaires; of whome wee vnderſtand here, by letters from Vienna of the firſt of this preſent, ſtilo novo, that having taken Terna, and augmented his army to the number of 40000 men, by the comming of the baſſa of Boſnia to ioyne with him in perſon, he marched towards Presburgh, making ſhew as yf hee would there paſſe the Danube; but preſently ſtrooke back agayne towards Skalitz, a place in the confines of Morauia and Hungary; where the count Montenegra was lodged with the emperors army, with deſſigne eyther to force the imperialiſts, being farre inferiour in number, to battell; or to beſiege their camp, and cutt of their victualls. Which cauſed much terrour in Vienna, by reaſon of the danger of loſſe of that army, before ſuccours could come vnto it, the way being long for Colalto, and the reſt of the regiments which are gone from Tilly, and impoſſible for the Italian troopes deſſigned for theſe parts, but diverted (as is ſayd) vpon this occaſion, to aſſiſt the emperor to arrive in tyme; ſo as no hope remayned, but that the Turks would retire out of cuſtome, contrary to the Hungarians; the one naturally ſhunning, the other chuſing, to ſerve in winter.

I FORMERLY advertiſed (yf I doe not much miſtake) of certeyne letters come hether by the way of Venice from Bethlem Gabor; by which he gave the States notice of his intention to breake with the emperor: it is ſince come to my knowledge, that he hath required confederation with this ſtate; to which the States have made an officious anſweare, That by way of divertion he already reapes the fruicts, and ſo ſhall continue, of a ſtrict confederation; which they enlarge by expreſſing how they entertayne the Spaniard by ſea and land, and the army of the catholique league in Germany by Mansfelt and Brunſwick; but goe no further in anſweare of that demand.

THE States haue had their deputyes a long while at Amſterdam, as vmpires betwixt the Bewinthebbers and participants of the Eaſt-Indian company, touching the account which they have brought from the firſt erection of the company to the yeare 1618; but are there at a ſtand, by reaſon of new diſputes in the point of cargaſon out of the Eaſt-Indyes hether, which the Bewinthebbers refuſe to be anſwearable for, onely yealding to charge themſelves with their equippages and returnes here:

wherupon they are all come hether, to be over-ruled by the Statesauthority. Meane 1623.
while the new Weſt-Indian company goeth roundly forward with their preparation, in which, I am informed, there is already vnderwritten by privat men, for 80 tunne of gold, which were almoſt incredible, conſidering their publique wants, but that wee ſaw here in the Hagh, very lately, vnderwritten, in one day, for 132000 florins. The firſt voyage is putting in readines to ſett out this winter, before the froſts, which wilbe of 32 ſhipps, of which 12 (each betwixt 600 and 800 tunne) belong properly to the company; and 20 (betwixt 300 and 500 tunne) are to be hyred for 10 monthes, with condition to provide victualls for 40 mariners for the whole tyme, and 50 ſoldiers for fower months; there being to goe 1600 land-men, over which coronell Dort (a gentleman of Guelderland, who hath bene here formerly employed by that province as deputye, both with the States generall and counſel of ſtate, and hath ſince commaunded both horſe and foote in Germany, firſt for the Hans-townes, and after, vnder the duke of Brunſwick and count Mansfelt; a man of good courage and abilityes) doth commaund: and over the ſhipps, one John Wilkis, an old ſeaman of Amſterdam, who hath bene twice with commaund in the Eaſt-Indyes, but without any great name or fame, is admirall.

HERE is a ſhip of Horne of 400 tunne newly come out of the Weſt-Indyes, laden with ſalt, which he found in an iſland about 12 myles on this ſide Porto del Rey, where the Spaniards having fortifyed, drave the Hollanders from their vſuall trade. But this man of Horne relates, that in the iſland where he tooke his lading, there is more then ſufficient quantity for them to renew that trade; which before was vnknowne, by reaſon the ſalt lay covered with ſand.

THE emperors commiſſary, Grammey, about 3 weekes paſt being at Amſterdam, (whether in his returne from Hamburgh, or hidden there ſince his departure from hence, is not knowne) wrote hether to the States chiefe clarke, Valkenburgh, to know whether, as primat of Afrique, he might not be admitted to treate with the States generall touching priſoners in Turkie; which the States refuſing, vnles he had new letters of credence from the emperor, he cauſed the prince of Orange to be moved, that he might come and repoſe at Riſewick, and there have ſome privat conference with his excellency; which his excellency communicating with the States, they did diſallow of that courſe, by reaſon of the diſcourſe would, in all probability, be rayſed thervpon; yet I vnderſtand he came privatly to Riſewick, and after three dayes ſtay, in the darke of the evening, embarqued himſelf, with his coch-horſes, and all his trayne, at the halfe-way bridge betwixt this and Delft; and from thence went directly to Antwerp, without ſpeaking to his excellency, or any body elſe.

ALL mens eyes and eares being open vpon this man, I give your lordſhip the more particular account of him.

I HAVE receaued your lordſhips letters the 24. and 31. of Auguſt, with theyr duplicats; which brought the firſt newes hether of the great mutations of that place, which come ſo thick, one in the neck of another, and are withall ſo ſtrange, and beyond exſpectation, (ſaue that your lordſhips letters did, in a manner, prognoſticat ſome ſuch euent of the violence of the late viſiers proceedings) that they ſeeme no other then romances.

THE queen thancks you for your often letters; and her ladies returne you theyr kinde remembrances.

OF Bethlem Gabors proceedings, notwithſtanding your great changes, I can ſay no more then what I haue obſerued in like caſes, where politique affaires haue a contrarie courſe to natural motions; the maxime in the one (ceſſante cauſà ceſſat effectus) not holding allwayes in the other; for when armies are ſett on foote, (as Gabors was by the incouragement he had from your late vizir) theyr progres doth not ceaſe by ceaſing of theyr firſt motiue.

I HOPE, in my next, to diſcourſe with your lordſhip of affaires in which we haue more intereſt, though theſe, by conſequence, concerne vs much; for now the treatie of Colen is like to goe on, which, by the proſperitie of the emperors affaires, was layde aſide; and the Spaniards defie all which ſpeake againſt owr match; ſo ex fortuna pendet fides, with thoſe we haue to deale with. I wiſh your lordſhip, with your lady, all happines, and euer reſt

From Sir EDWARD HERBERT.

My very good Lord,

ALLTHOUGH the incommodityes of holding intelligence with your lordſhip bee ſuch, that I may better excuſe my ſelfe for not writing at all, then for writing that which muſt allready haue come vnto your eares, by ſome more knowne and familiar way, then I can yett find out; yet, that I may giue your lordſhip thankes for 2 of yours I haue receiued here ſome 6 monethes after their date, aſwell as to giue you an account of the preſent frame and conſtitution of this countrye, I thought fitt to tell your lordſhip, that the treaty of Montpellier hauing giuen an end vnto the miſerable confuſions of the ciuill warres about religion, this ſtate hath euer ſince enjoyed a conſtant peace: but ſeeming now to grow impatient of ſo long a reſt and quietnes, the princes font les malcontens, fall into factions upon ſmall occaſions, complaine of the preſent gouerment, and that their penſions are not payd; while the poore people groane vnder new edicts and impoſitions, et ne peuvent plus, which hath cauſed diuers mutinyes and tumults at Lions, Rouen, and other places: which though they are appeaſed for the preſent, by the execution of the moſt ſeditious, yet the ſeeds and cauſes of them ſtill remayne, and may in tyme produce moſt dangerous effects. Thoſe of the religion complaine of diuers open contrauentions and inexecutions of the edict of peace, and particularly of the continuance of the garriſon in Montpellier, (wherby the poore inhabitants are ſo miſerably oppreſſed, that they haue intreated the king to build a citadelle there, ſo they may bee freed from the garriſon) beſides the fortifying (inſtead of demoliſhing) of the fort of Pompé Targon before Rochelle, and the building of a new one at Marans on their other ſide. To which they adde, that there are diuers ſecret meanes imployed vnderhand to ruine them; and that euen the good that is done vnto ſome particulars amongſt them, is vſed only as an arte to winne their leaders from them; that being ſo diuided, they maybee the more eaſily ſupplanted. Notwithſtanding which, for my part, I beleeue, that while the chancellier and his ſonne continue their creditt with the king, thoſe of the religion may liue in ſafety; though otherwiſe as farre from grace and imployment, as they themſelues can imagine. The French troupes that were ſent vnto count Mansfelt in the ſpring, are now recalled home againe: but the league betweene the French, Venetian, and Sauoyard, which was vpon the point of diſſoluing, is made vp againe, and Mansfelt generall of it, vntill the reſtitution of the Valtolina, and the other territoryes of the Lighe Griſe; which being depoſitated into the hands of the pope, the deciſion of the buſines is referred wholy vnto him.

WEE ſpeake of nothing more here, then of the happy progreſſe of Bethlem Gabor; and beleeue, that between his forces at the one end of Germany, and thoſe of Mansfelt and the duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick, now re-vnited, at the other, the emperour will find enough to doe; eſpecially if your new grand ſignor continue the deſignes of his vncle Muſtafa, who whether hee did willingly reſigne his charge, or were forced to it, is ſo diuerſly reported here, that I doe not yet knowe which to beleeue.

THERE hath been but litle done in the Low Countryes this yeare, allthough there neuer were greater forces in the feild ſince the firſt beginning of the warres; there being counted aboue 70 thouſand men (of which there were 200 troupes of horſe) in the ſeuerall armyes on the Spaniſh ſide; only Lipſtat, a towne in Weſtphalia, of large circuit, but ſlenderly fortifyed, hauing been beſeeged ſome 2 moneths by the Spaniards and Emperialiſts, was yeilded up at laſt vpon compoſition.

I HAUE ſpoken to Monſ. le chancellier and de Puiſieux about the monney due by the French ambaſſador vnto Mr. Loe, and the other Engliſh marchants, and am promiſed another letter, and that I ſhall haue the coppy of it; which aſſoone as I can obtayne, I will not fayle to ſend vnto your lordſhip; and ſo I reſt

Your Lordſhipps ancient friend and ſeruant,

EDW. HERBERT.

I HAVE diſputed your behavior with the Tunes ambaſſador; and though they vſe here to lay hold on no more then will ſerve their turne, yet do I hope they have giuen order in ſecret to their ambaſſador, not to be ſo rigorous and peremptory as he hath beene hetherunto.

MY ſervice to your noble lady, yf you pleaſe.

In haſt. Paris, this 27th of November, 1623; which day I receiued the duplicat of your lordſhips former letter.

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT: With Advices.

Right Honorable,

THE diſpatch and anſwere of the emperors ambaſſador beeing allmoſt at concluſion, I was uery deſirous to write to his majeſtie: butt the reſpects of the matter requiring the ſecurity of a ciphar, I humbly beeſeech you to make my excuſe, and to preſent the ſubſtance for mee. I haue not at all medled further then I haue related, but offered my ſeruice to the emperour for the generall peace. But the Turks carry ſo iealous an eye vpon his ambaſſador, that none of the reſidents haue either yett viſitted him, nor ſcarſe haue had leaue ſince the firſt to ſend him a complement. Whether his majeſtie may make any vſe of the profeſſed firmeneſſe of the prince of Tranſiluania, that hauing taken armes for the ſeruice of the prince elector, hee will not lay them downe without ſome effects, I leaue to his roiall wiſedome. I can ſecure nothing, butt I haue related the truth to my knowledge; and as I ſuppoſe a peace wilbee made, ſoe I think that the treaty may aduance the hopes of the reſtitution of the Palatinate, if there bee any left: for in the beginning of the warre Gabor hath great aduantage in readineſs and ſuccours.

OUR Turkiſh affaires I will aduenture, nothing beeing here a ſecrett: Abaſſa baſſa hath ſettled himſelfe in Angria for his hybernation, about 120 miles from this citty, where hee hath done ſuch iuſtice, as if hee meant to conquer hearts, rather then bodyes of men. Att the entrance of the towne, his ſoldiours hauing made ſome ſpoile, hee called the looſers before him, and made ſatiſfaction of his owne purſe, to the value of 12000 dollers, to euery mans content. The laſt newes wee heard from him, was, that hee excuſed his retraict vpon the incommodities of winter, promiſing to liue in peace vntill the ſpring, and then to retorne to his gouerment. Which fewe beleeue, but rather ſuppoſe it is not fitt for him, nor his deſſignes, nor confederates, to march hither directly, vntill ſome impediments bee remoued, or a better opportunity, leaſt hee putt the citty and his frends in hazard of the ſodaine rage of the Janizaries, att whoſe diſcretion all things ſtand here. Hee hath lodged and quartered all his followers in the citty and the confines, payeing for whatſoeuer they take: ſo that, but for the trouble of ſuch gueſts, the place is as quiett, and in free trafficque, with more ſecurity, then before hee took it.

IT is reported, that the king of Perſia, by his agent newly arriued, hath made ſome harſh demaunds concerning his old title to Babilon, which is recouered from the rebell, fledd to him for ſuccour; and yeſterday it was aduiſed, that the emir of Tripoly hath ſeized Damaſcus to his owne vſe. Thus euery day brings vs rumours of more trouble, from which I pray God ſoone deliuer mee. Your honor wilbee pleaſed to continue mee your wonted fauor and affection, as

Your Honors humble ſeruant.

THE emperours ambaſſador, in the ſecond audience, made a motion for a peace to bee treated betweene Spaine and this port; for aduancement whereof, hee offered 2000 Mahometan ſlaues to bee ſett att liberty from the Spaniſh gallies. Hee ſhowed the neare intereſts of the houſes of Auſtria one with another, and that theyr 1623. cauſes were inſeparable; therefore, that a common peace to them all would bee moſt proffitable, and moſt ſecure; ſetting forth the greatneſs and power of that kinge. This ouerture, beeing ſo contrary to their old profeſſions, made many doubt the Spaniards had ſomwhat in deſſigne, wherin to ymploy the ſauing of ſuch money and forces as they haue bene compelled to maynteyne pro terrore Turqueſco: for a peace with the grand ſignior would eaſe them of the charge of 60 gallies, of 10000 ſoldiours, and 18000 ſlaues on the ſea, and of at leaſt 20000 in garriſon on the coaſts of Naples, Sicily, Sardinia, Corſica, and the iſlands adiacent, which are now kept for defence; who liuing there, doe neither good nor harme; butt once yearly make a brauado in theſe ſeas, without effect: in oppoſition of whome, and for the like reſpect of feare, the grand ſignior is enforced to keepe as many more; ſo that thus they doe well ballance one another. Butt the great viſier ſoone ſhut upp that propoſition, wiſhing him firſt to finiſh his owne maſters buſineſs, and then to take care of other mens: and I heare not that ſince hee hath preſſed it. For the treaty betweene the emperour, the grand ſignior, and Bethlem Gabor, his miniſters haue ſo farre wrought, that the commiſſion is giuen with full power for the prince of Tranſiluania, ioyned with the baſſa of Buda, to make the peace, or continue the warre, att their diſcretion, and the conditions wholly referred to them. Wherein the prince hath gotten ground, and the emperour not loſt; for if they had treated here, their ambaſſadours had bene upon much diſaduantage; the one almoſt reſtreyned liberty, and in feare; the other ſtanding-by as a ſeruaunt: nowe they ſhall diſpute on equall termes; and I am perſwaded, Gabor will not forgett himſelfe in the end. To this purpoſe, the German ambaſſador ſhall haue a quick diſpatch, and a generall anſwere to repaire to Buda for a full concluſion. What iudgment to make hereof, is vncerteyne for mee. Some are of opinion, that the Tranſiluanian hath gotten this power to wynne tyme to deceiue the emperour, and is reſolued to proceed in the warre; others, that hee doth it to deceiue the port, and to make his owne conditions. My opinion is, that they will agree on peace; though the agents of Gabor profeſſe conſtantly, and ſay, That ſuch clauſe is inſerted in their commiſſion, that they ſhall make no peace without reſtitution to the prince elector, att leaſt of his owne territories; the aunſwer to the emperor beeing to no other effect, then, If you deſire peace, ſend your commiſſioners to Buda, where the elect king of Hungary and the baſſa ſhall haue full power to treat and conclude with you. The brother of Bethlem, left gouernour in Tranſiluania, ſent hither a freſh poſt, with aduiſe, that hee feared an inuaſion from the Poles to diuert them; for preuention whereof, hee deſired a ſpeedy diſpatch to that court: hee ſayes, That the prince is victorious, and that the Moldauians are reuolted to him.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

AFTER many changes and rubbs in count Mansfelts remoue with his army out of Eaſt-frizeland, he hath at laſt written reſolutly he will march away, ſo he may haue the 300 thouſand florins promiſed him by the inhabitants of that countrey, for which the States are reſpondents, deliuered vnto him, and his canon and munition, with ſuch baggage of his as the Embdenners have in their hands, reſtored. The money is in readines, and more then will ſerve the turne; rhe States of Frizeland, out of a deſire they have to be rid of ſo ill neighbours, having made ſtay in their hands of 50 thouſand florins they were to ſend at this time hether for payment of arrerages of their contributions, to be employed to that vſe; and the count Erneſt de Naſſau, with the States deputyes, who lye at Delfzile to wayte, upon this occaſion of Mansfelts remove, have order to deale effectually with the Embdenners for reſtitution of Mansfelts canon and goods; in which forwardnes that buſines was, when wee heard laſt from thence: yet ſince wee ſee not which way that army can march, or where to ſettle, it is hard to ſay whether it will ſtirre or not, unles the extremity into which the emperor is putt by Gabor, drawe Tilly, with the reſt of his army, vpwards towards Hungary: in which caſe, the firſt newes wee ſhall have, wilbe, that Mansfelt is croſſed the Weſer into Germany, where he will ſoone gather vires eundo, and be no leſſe fearfull on this ſide the empire, then Gabor is on the other.

IT was credibly reported here, and at Bruxells, that Gabor was retired: and true it is, that he marched with his army from before Geding, where he held the Imperialiſts as beſieged, as yf he would paſſe the river March, and returne to Tyrna, there to aſſemble the States of Hungary. But what happened afterwards, is not here certainly knowne; though the common reports beare from all parts, as yf the Imperialiſts were vtterly defeated: which, according to the laſt advertiſements from theſe parts, is very probable; and yf it be ſo ſucceeded, will undoubtedly change the face of affaires in Germany.

THE emperor doth ſummon ayde from all parts, but will much fayle of his reckoning; for I haue ſeene, in a liſt of his forces, the Italian troopes, which laſt croſſed the mountaynes out of the ſtate of Milan, accounted, though they be now in theſe provinces, and quartered (when wee heard laſt of them) about Namur. Three regiments of Tillyes, ſent after the former towards Hungary, diſputed their departure for want of pay, and are like to march ſlowly. The duke of Saxe, in place of ſending ſuch as he was required by the emperor, hath licenſed moſt part of his men, vpon declared diſcontentment againſt Tillyes army, for lying ſtill, and living vpon ſpoyle and rapine in Heſſen, whilſt the emperor hath ſo fearfull an ennemy neare the gates of Vienna.

HERE is nothing of conſideration in theſe parts, ſave onely, that wee heare Cordoua hath finally broken vp his army, and lodged it at Burcklo, Deuticum, Lockum, and other townes bordering vpon Deuenter and Sutphen, as yf he wayted an opportunity, when the Yſſell is froſen, to make a rode into the Veluwe.

THE fleete of 32 ſayle, prepared here for the Weſt Indyes, wilbe in full readines within this weeke or ten dayes, for which the land-men were muſtered in the Texell the laſt weeke.

AT Breda hath ſucceeded this weeke paſt ſome diſorder in the garriſon, chiefly amongſt the Engliſh, which refuſed to muſter, unles it might be according to a new placcart made here at the Hagh, whilſt the army was in the field, and publiſhed in that towne, and ſome other places, but ſuppreſſed in the army, and thoſe upper frontiers, by reaſon of many inconveniences to the troopes, not ſo well conſidered of in the prince of Oranges abſence. And now a reſolution was taken by the States to have the old placcarts onely in vſe, till better payments could be made, then have bene of late yeares; which not being publikely knowne in that garriſon, was the cauſe of this diſorder: and leaſt ſome further miſchiefe ſhould follow, three of the States, two Engliſh officers, and the fiſcall, are ſent thether to enquire into the buſines, and puniſh the chiefe offenders: and all other captaynes are commaunded to their garriſons, who were here at this preſent in greater number then ordinary of all nations, to counterballance the ſeverity of this new placcart, with complaint of ill payments: which the States of Holland (now here aſſembled, and more in fault then any of the reſt of the provinces) are buſied to remedye.

I HAUE receaued your lordſhips letters of the $\frac{4}{14}$ of October, with the relation annexed of all the particularities of the late changes in that place; for which you haue the queene of Bohemias thancks, and I acknowledge much obligation; of which, in this dead time of the yeare, I haue ſmall meanes to acquit my ſelf, here being not ſo much as a blow ſtruken on either ſide: and when ſwords are ſheathed in theſe parts, there may be very well a truce of pens. For to enter into diſcourſe with yonr lordſhip de futuris contingentibus, (which you require of me) were a worke of more leyſure then my continual occupations will permitt; and then I ſhould onely ſhew you how vnable I am to frame any ſettled iudgment vppon vncertainties, ſuch as the courſe of our affaires hath long bin ſubiect vnto. Now we haue here a meſſage of comfort, ſent from our chiefs at home to the queene of Bohemia by Sir George Goring, expreſly employed to excuſe my lord of Buckinghams abſence from the chriſtening of her yong ſonne, to which his grace, with my lord of Richmond, were inuited; but withall charged to aſſure her, we will admitt no more delayes, but ioyning the buſines of reſtitution of the Palatinate with that of the match, will haue either both or none, and that ſpeedily. Thus, for the preſent, I committ your lordſhip, with all yours, to Gods protection.

From

From my Lord CAREW.

MY laſt vnto your lordſhip, bare date the 20th of November, ſince which tyme I have receaved one of yours, dated the 20th of September laſt, and with it a relation, which, accordinge to your direction, Mr. Branthwaite brought vnto me, for the which I retourne you many thankes, being one of the beſt, for ſuccinctnes and compoſition, that in my life I haue ſeene. Hereafter this, if it ſhall pleaſe you to afford me the like favour, I ſhall much eſteeme thereof, better likeing to receave the occurrents of thoſe parts in relations apart, then to be incerted in the body of a letter. Fearinge that my laſt may miſcarry, I thought it meete in theſe, now againe, to acquainte you with the moſt materiall poynts which it conteyned. Your lordſhip may remember, that in one of your former (to prevent the danger of miſcarrying of letters) you wiſhed that a cipher might paſſe betweene vs; againſt which propoſition I gave many reaſons to the contrary, the ſomme whereof is, that if any of ours were intercepted, and written in a compoſed character, it would drawe ſuſpition and jealouſie vppon vs, although the contents were of no moment; and farther, in the ſame letter, I did pray your lordſhip to excuſe me for not writinge any matter worthy your view; for to diſcourſe of ſtate affaires in theſe tymes, wherein jealouſie aboundes, is a noli me tangere; and therefore I wiſhed your lordſhip not to write any thinge vnto me, but ſuch as might be fixed vppon Charing-croſſe; the contynuance of which courſe, I conceave, is beſt to be obſerved. Although I knowe, that, of vulgar newes, you receave ſtore from the London marchants, yet, that theſe may not come emptie to your hands, I will looke backe ſome two monethes; within which tyme the prince came to London, in honour whereof ſuch bonfires were made, and ſuch ioy expreſſed by all ſorts of people, as in the whole courſe of my life I haue not ſeene it equalled, not only in London, but all the kingdome over, and truly, not without greate reaſon; for allthough (as you knowe) even from his cradle, there appeared good aſſureances of greate hopes, yet many tymes, many men in riper yeares haue fayled the expectation. But it is farr otherwiſe in this greate prince; for without flattery, (giveing him but his due) I doe verely beleeve he will exceede moſt of all the precedinge Plantagenetts, as well in judgement as vallour, beſides his gracefull comportment, and royall ſpiritt. Of the Spaniſh buſines, I dare give no cenſure; but I hope the iſſue will be anſwereable to our deſires.

SUNDAY being the 26. of October, at the French ambaſſadors houſe in the Black-fryers, the Papiſts (preſuminge vppon his majeſties late clemency towards them) tooke the boldnes to haue a publique ſermon preached by one Drury, a Jeſuite, in an vpper roome in the ſame houſe; which being overchardged with people, the flower vnder them brake; with the fall whereof more then one hundred perſons periſhed, ſome being of good quallitie; but the beſt of note was the lady Webb, ſiſter to the ladies Stirton and Morley. Toward the ende of the ſame moneth there was a call of 15 ſargeants of the lawe. Famous Mr. Cambden (whoſe workes will never die) is lately dead, and (as I may juſtly terme it) honorably buried in Weſtminiſter. About the ſame tyme Sir William Cokaine, knight, and alderman of London, had his houſe (by the negligence of his ſervants) burnt downe to the grounde; his loſſe was greate: others of his neighbours, to the nomber of five or ſix, rann the ſame fortune; and to avoyde farther perill, ſome houſes remote were pulled downe, amongſt the which the lady Raleghs houſe was one; but her loſſe in moveables not great. The 24th of November, the earle of Arrundell and Surrey, earle-marſhall of England, in camera depicta, in Weſtminiſter, (a place well knowne vnto you, where there is a ſpatious courte, like vnto that of the Starrchamber, erected) made his firſt ceſſion; and the firſt cauſe there to be tryed, and yet dependinge, was a bill put in againſt one Sir Thomas Harris of Shropſheire, barronett, praying juſtice in that court for his deprivation, alleadginge, that accordinge to his majeſties inſtructions in that behalfe, he is vncapable of that honor. What the yſſue may be, tyme will produce; but it is thoughte, that this will be a leading caſte for other barronetts, who, for want of gentilitie and eſtates of liveinge, are in the ſame danger that Harris is. The counteſſe of Warrwicke, a good and vertuous younge lady, (wife to the now earle) is lately deade. The earle of Oxfords delivery out of the Tower (ſo longe expected) expected) is not yet performed: when he ſhall be enlarged, he is preſently to marry the lady Diana Cecill, daughter to the now earle of Exceſter. More vulgar newes the preſent affords not: as for the moveings of ſtate in matters of higher nature, (according to my reſolution) I purpoſely omitt, and the like is deſired from your lordſhip; for nimis altum ſapere may produce dangerous events. And ſo, my noble lord, with the remembrance of my beſt affections and ſervices, both vnto your ſelfe and your worthy lady, and my prayers to God for your ſafe and ſpeedy retournes from that Mahometan ayre wherein you reſide, I committ you to the protection of the Allmightie.

Savoy, this 8th of Decemb. 1623.

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionat frend and ſeruant,

G. CAREW.

Superſcribed,
To the Right Honorable Sir THOMAS ROE, Knight, Lord Ambaſſador for his Majeſtie of Great Brettaigne, with the Grand Signor, at Conſtantinople.

From Mr. BRANTHWAITE.

Right Honorable,

I SEND your lordſhip herewithall a pacquett recommended vnto my care by Mr. Queſter, and am verie ſorie that I haue nothinge of my owne to adde to it worthie of your honor; for I haue as yett, ſince my lords departure, receiued no line from his lordſhip, nor anie of his companie; nor any letter from Englande, more then Mr. Queſters, which makes me moſte unable to ſaie anie thinge of that place, and not muche of anie other; yet maie you pleas to vnderſtande, That this weeke there parted from hence two Hungarians, who haue bene here (imploide by Bethlem Gabor) to negotiate with this republique, for ſome aſſiſtaunce and contribution to that warre nowe vpon foote in Hungarie, whereunto it is thought they haue giuen good eare; and ſente alonge with them a ſecretarie to reſide for ſome certaine time.

IT is writt hether from Vienna, that Bethlem Gabor hathe driuen the emperoure into ſuche ſtraits, by barringe him of his wonted prouiſion out of Hungarie, that a ſtaro of wheate, whiche is little more then two buſhells ſterlinge, is ſolde there for 100 florens; and that he intendethe to keepe in the fielde all this winter: ſoe that if this warre be nouriſhed from other parts as well as (I thinke) it wilbe in particular from this ſtate, the emperour, in thoſe buſineſſes wherein his majeſtie of Greate Brittaine is, in reſpecte of his deſcendents, a litle intereſſed, might be broughte to ſome better termes.

FROM Rome we haue it this weeke, That this pope is alreadie wearie of the depoſitation of the Valtolina, becauſe of the greate charge he is at in maintaininge garriſons there; and that he will ſhortlie driue the buſineſſe to ſome iſſue, to free himſelfe of the ſame: I praie God, it maie be for the good of the poore inhabitants, that haue beene toſſed to and fro ſoe longe. I heare nothinge of certaintie as yett, howe the marriage with Spaine proceedes; but by theſe anexed, your lordſhip will ſuerlie vnderſtand at large. Thus, with my prayers to the Almightie to conſerue you in all proſperitie, I ceaſe and remaine, Venice this ſeaconde of December, 1623. ſtylo nouo.

Your Honors moſte humble ſeruaunte,

MIC. BRANTHWAITE.

To Sir GEORGE CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

SINCE the former I haue viſitted the emperors ambaſſador, who offered to putt a trick of ſtate vpon mee, which hee keepes here in greate formality; butt I lay at a good guard, and ſo wee mett on equall termes: hee vſed mee very courteouſly, and made mee many long diſcourſes in praiſe of his majeſties juſtice in all his proceedings with his maſter, and of his generall intention to procure the vniverſall peace of Chriſtendome. In his particular and preſent negotiation hee profeſſed to haue no inſtruction to alter, or call in queſtion, the laſt articles of treaty betweene theſe empires, nor to enlarge nor retrench them; butt only to declare, that his 1623. lord was reſolued to keepe them entire vntill the twelue yeares, yett vnexpired, ſett them both at liberty ; and therwithall to expoſtulate the actions and ayds giuen to the prince of Tranſiluania, and ſome other litle breaches on the border, contrary to thoſe capitulations, and therein to require redreſſe ; that is, that either Bethlem Gabor and his ſuccours ſhould bee recalled, or left alone to his owne quarrell, according to the clauſe, Frend to frend, and enemy to enemy ; which if the grand ſignor would not graunt, nor maynteyne the treaty, that hee ſhould declare, that the emperor had done what did become him, to maynteyne the peace, and was of his oath free before God and man. That to this demaund hee had aunſwere, The grand ſignor had no purpoſe of breach; and that the aſſiſtance giuen to Gaber, was done during the gouerment of Huſſein baſſa, nowe declared enemy to the ſtate : butt becauſe at that tyme there were many laments made to the port of the yll affections of the emperor, and of many outrages committed, and that it was fitt there ſhould bee a due examination and recognition of thoſe matters, they would giue commiſſion to the baſſa of Buda, to receiue and treat with any deputies from the emperor, with full power, there, vpon the frontire, where the truth on both parts might bee more euident, to negociate and make ſuch concluſion, as ſhould ſtand with equity and honor (not once mentioning, as hee proteſts, the prince of Tranſiluania) ; and, for the better auoyding of all acts of hoſtility in the meane tyme, that they would ſend ſpeedy commands to recall the Turks, entred into Hungary, to their garriſons ; that the letters to this effect were writing ; that hee had promiſe to ſee them, and hope to haue ſodaine order for his diſpatch, and repaire to Buda ; and that further hee had not to treat nor meddle ; that if hee were deceiued, hee could doe no more ; hee had effected his embaſſy. Hee deſired mee to continue to bee aſſiſtant to him herein, as beeing aſſured I had received ſuch order from his majeſtie, with acknowledgment from the emperour of my former ſervices. I found him not very confident in the ſucceſſe, butt full of diſdayne towards Bethlem Gabor. My replyes, to drawe from him what I could, were, That wee conceiued hee ſhould not find that prince ſo auerſe from peace, if hee might obteyne iuſt conditions: That wee heard of a treaty, and offer of marriage, which as hee did not deny ſome ſuch things, ſo hee caſt them vpon the ſeeking of Gabor; butt that the one was not to bee forced, and the other reiected as too farr vnequall. I told him, That I thought it would bee difficult, if the emperour had ſuch a purpoſe, to ſeperat and exclude Bethlem Gabor from the ſuccours and protection of this port, hauing declared ſo effectually his ſeruice ; butt that, if hee purpoſed peace, they muſt giue that prince and his frends ſome ſatisfaction and aſſurance to liue quietly ; which hee ſaid was intended, if the circuit of Tranſiluania would content him; butt if hee aymed at any other thing, there was no remedy, nor reſolution, butt warre.

THUS wee paſſed our diſcourſes, and I found in him doubt enough, that the diſadvantage his maſter was fallen into by the beginning, would make the concluſion difficult ; yett hee inſiſted vpon the aſſurance giuen here in promiſe, That all ſhould bee ſettled at Buda.

To mee hee neuer mentioned the king of Bohemia ; butt what paſſed betweene him and the Dutch ambaſſador, I cannott well omitt ; that hee complayned eagerly againſt the States his maſters, for receiuing the prince elector into their country, with ſome words of reproach to his highnes ; and laid to the ambaſſadors charge the ſtirring vpp of Bethlem Gabor to theſe new attempts, and of beeing the inſtrument to introduce the Turks to the ſpoile of Hungary ; which he anſwered partly by recrimination, and partly by denyall.

WHETHER of theſe promiſſes will bee performed ; to the emperour, that the ayd ſhall bee recalled, and all referred to the baſſa of Buda (who is not his ill-willer) ; or to Bethlem, that they ſhall haue order to winter in Hungary, and that hee ſhall haue the concluding voice ; for both are auerred with equall confidence by their adhærents here, and, I think, both promiſed ; I cannot iudge : but I beleeue the truth wilbee devided betweene them ; that is, that Gabor ſhalbee chiefe in the commiſſion, and that the Turks ſhall haue order to retyre to their garriſons, becauſe wee knowe they will not lye abroad in the cold weather, and their rule is, not to ſtay in the field after St. Demetrius-day, which is the 26. October ; and, as wee heare, thoſe of Greece are allready on their retraict ; butt the frontire ſoldiours and the Tartars, to the nomber of 10000, ſtay with the prince vntill they haue order. 1623. Butt it is concluded, that the emperors ambaſſador ſhall repaire to Buda for his reſolute anſwere, where hee will find ſome good frends, and hee hopes of a ſpeedy diſmiſſion.

FROM Hungary, the ouerthrow of a regiment ſent to Tornauia, neare Morauia, in that language called Nachſonbach, is ſeconded and confeſſed by the emperours ambaſſador, the towne rendred, and many come to his party. Since, the miniſters of Gabor report, that the prince hath beſeeged the camp of the imperialls, and ſo beſett them, that they cannott eſcape; and that the marquis de Monte Negro, generall, who was come downe to make head with ſome troopes, hauing not yett formed his army, with many other men of quality, are alſo ſhutt upp in a litle caſtle, and upon the termes of rendring. Certenly the prince hath declared, that hee is in earneſt, whether to force his conditions, which the Imperialls ſay is a wiſe, or to keepe word with his frends, I leaue to the diſcouery of tyme: if hee follow his aduantage, hee will giue Lower Germany peace; butt with theſe there is much whereof to lament, for the infinite miſery of the poore and innocent cuntry people, who fall to bee the ſhare of the Turks and Tartars; and, as it is reported, aboue 20000 of all ſexes and ages ſent away captiue to Buda, Agria, Caniſea, and this frontire; and that in the camp there was ſuch plenty of them, that the price of a boy, from man to man, was butt two or three dollers; hinc illæ lachrymæ. This begetts an yll ſauour and ſcandall, and threatens an yll end to the author, who profeſſed more care of the chriſtian name. Many are here expected from him, eſpecially ſome Poliſh gentlemen taken, in all, to the nomber of 300, as a preſent to the port, and to ſhow his obſeruance; in arcanum ejus ne ingreditor anima mea. This is, I feare, tributum abhorrendum, and may bee ſaid fœtare etiam apud incolas hujus regionis. I leaue them to his judgment that ſhall judge the world.

THIS ſtate as yett ſettles not, though wee haue lately had no citty inſurrection; yett, againſt Abaſſa baſſa, notwithſtanding hee liues in Angria quietly, and promiſes to retyre in the ſpring, the Janizaries, I may ſay, rather then the grand ſignior, haue reſolued to make warre; and they, now iealous of the Spahees, prouide horſes for ſome of their own, and are ready in great fury to goe out. I beleeue they know hee diſſembled peace, and therfore are forced to come to tryall, which will produce ſome great chaunges in this citty and gouerment. To add to this generall ruyne, this day ſome fewe ſoldiours fledd from Damaſcus are, in 26 dayes, arriued, who bring aſſurance, that Manogli emir of Sidon, who once in the tyme of ſultan Achmat eſcaped into Italy, and was receiued by the duke of Tuſcany, and ſent back, hauing made his peace, hath taken the citty, the caſtle as then holding out; the baſſa beeing reuolted to him, and all the territory adioyning; and that hee hath impatroniſed 5 or 6 citties more; and wee are ſure hee is downeright for his owne vſe. This newes is heauily taken, and will induce them to eaſy conditions on the frontire of Chriſtendome; in my judgment, there beeing no apparant remedy left, butt that the fortune of this empire muſt bee tryed at a battaile, or dye of a conſumption.

I HAUE long expected to receiue from your honor anſwere concerning the difference betweene the French and mee, which doth undoe and diſtract all our actions here; one of the foundations of precedent, whereon hee builded his clayme, and much relyed, beeing two petitions ſigned by my predeceſſor, I haue gotten to bee burnt by the Dutch ambaſſador, when I could not procure to haue them in my hand, becauſe hee had denyed them to the French. I hope your honor will haue more leiſure, wee hauing heard, that his highnes is ſafely retorned for England, whoſe abſence, I am ſure, filled all good hearts with diſtractions and feares. I haue written to his highnes briefly my humbly congratulation: if hee deſire to know the affaires of this place, I ſhalbee bold to referr him to your honor, nott daring, without ſome ſhadowe, to aduenture them to the hazzard of the way in theſe iealous tymes. I am confident your honor will continue your wonted affection and fauour, becauſe I am really

Your Honors humble ſeruant.

CONCLUSION.

I HAUE receiued your lordſhips lardge relation of the apparition that came downe the Rhyne like an ambaſſador; mee thinckes, by the titles and his [ſtate], he ſhould bee
ſome

1623. ſome proiector; and that his negotiation aymes not at publicque ends, but for ſome priuat gayne: if he prooue ſo, I know wher he might bee well purged. I thancke you for all your other plentifull and fruictfull aduiſes, which though I cannot repay, I will libenter debere. And ſo I committ your lordſhip to the grace and mercy of our God.

From my Lord CAREW.

THE ixth of December, the day after the date hereof, I receaued from your lordſhip another letter, bearing date with the former heerein mentioned; and with it Mr. Brainthwaite delivered vnto me an addition of the former relation, which you diſpatched from Conſtantinople the third of October; vppon the receipt whereof I opened my letter, and within it incloſed this preſent addition, wherein, ſince the date thereof, the counteſſe of Suſſex is deade; and the day followinge, it is generally reported, that the earle her husbande married miſtris Mewtis, ſiſter to the lady Cornewallis, who had beene his auncient and familiar friend. The earle of Oxford (as aforeſayd) is yet in the Tower a priſoner; his libertie reſts in his owne will; for if he will ſubſcribe vnto an humble ſubmiſſion, and acknowledge that his majeſtie had iuſt cauſe to be offended with him, the Tower gates will be opened; which I conceave he will rather doe, then remayne any longer reſtrayned. The erle of Southampton hath recouered his majeſties favour, and every day wee expecte his retourne to the counſell boarde. A parliament is preſently expected, but yet nether ſummons, nor the day of the commencement, is not aſſigned; by it you may iudge, if a parliament be called, what the ſucceſſe will be of the Spaniſh affayre: in the meane tyme the papiſts droope. This weeke there paſſed through the narrowe ſeas, a fleete of aboue 30 men of warre of Hollande, one ſhipp with another of 300 tonnes at the leaſt; theire loadinge is only men, munition, and victualls, and are bounde, as is reported, for the Weſt-Indies; but to what place or places, is vnknowne. Sir Edward Howard, the earle of Suffolks youngeſt ſonne, is married vnto a daughter of Sir John Buttlers, and neece to the duke of Buckingham; the ſollemnitie of the marriage was at Yorke houſe, where the prince and the duke ſupped. Twenty dayes paſt, Sir George Goring was ſent by the king and prince to the queene of Bohemia, yet reſiding at the Hage in Hollande; and now the lord of Kenſington, the captaine of the guard, is preſently to goe to the kinge of France: what theire negotiations are, I am meerely ignorant; but if I did vnderſtand it, I am doubtfull whether I ſhould relate it for the reaſons formerly alleadged. In France there is a fayre out-ſide of a conſtant peace; but the Proteſtants are much afrayde of newe ſtormes; for the king continewes his fortifications before Rochell, and ſo doth he at Monpellier, ſtrengthninge them dayly; which by the pacifications ought to haue beene raſed: thoſe of the religion dayly complaine, but all in vayne. Sir Robert Sherly is come into England, but as yet not to the corte; what be the motiues of his retourne, remayne in his owne breſt.

Savoy, this 25 of Decemb. 1623.

G. CAREW.

To his MAJESTIE.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

THE long attendance to diſcouer ſome certenty to what end the actions of the prince of Tranſiluania were directed, and to what iſſue the troubles of this ſtate would come, hath made mee deferre to preſent any of my meane coniectures before your Majeſtie, whoſe cenſure and great iudgment might iuſtly deterre mee from intruſion and aduenture, when no weeke allmoſt paſſt, wherein there hath not bene ſome occaſion to doubt, or chaunge opinion.

BUTT hauing now receiued, both from the miniſters of that prince, and by other wayes, a conſtant report, that hee hath reſolued to take a truce, when hee might haue made great aduantage of the warre, whereby your Majeſties wiſedome may iudge both of his purpoſes, and what may bee expected from him; I haue preſumed to make a large relation of his proceedings, with all ſuch circumſtances as haue come to my knowledge, and of the preſent condition of this empire, to Sir George Caluert; not daring to offer them to your Majeſtie, vntil you pleaſe to command them.

I MAY haue erred eaſily in my opinion, and perhapps in ſome paſſadges; butt I haue written the truth, as it hath bene diverſly preſented to mee; and haue with all ſyncerity obeyed your Majeſties commands, to doe ſeruice to the publique quiett of Chriſtendome. What hath moued Bethlem Gabor to this ſodayne and great chaunge, contrary to the generall expectation, and his owne beginnings, I cannot iudge. Some attribute it to the ouerthrow of the duke of Brunſwick, whereby hee was left alone, and without hope of ſuccours, or a diuerſion by his army, that might haue encouraged him to haue followed his victoryes: ſome, to the vncertenty of this ſtate, from whom hee ſhould be mainteyned: others (to which I rather enclyne, though he hath carried himſelfe ſo ſecretly and cunningly with all his allies and ſeruaunts, that no man knowes his councell) are of opinion, hee neuer purpoſed any conſtancy in the warre, butt by ſhowe of his creditt here, and rumour of ſo great ayds, to encreaſe and ſecure his owne eſtate, and to augment his honor by a marriage with the houſe of Auſtria, which, it is reported, hee hath much affected, and is not yett in deſpayre to obteyne. Which of theſe is neareſt to truth, I leaue to your Majeſties deepe wiſedome to determine, aſſured of your Maieſties clemency and grace, that you will pardon all my wants, and accept my weake ſeruices, which ſhalbee ſupplyed with feruent prayers for your Majeſties eternall proſperity. I humbly take my leaue.

Conſtantinople,

Your Majeſties moſt loiall ſubiect, and unworthy ſeruant,

To Sir GEORGE CALVERT, and Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

Relations from Conſtantinople. 27 December, 1623.

IT is confirmed from Damaſcus, that the emir of Sydon hath poſſeſſed himſelfe of that citty, the caſtle not beeing able to hold out 6 dayes. Some other places and forts hee hath ſurprized, as it were, in an inſtant, threatening Jeruſalem, and hauing demanded ſupplyes, or at leaſt neutrality, from the baſſa of Aleppo. This defection is of the greateſt conſequence, becauſe hee is a prince of deſcent, and a pretender in right to thoſe cuntryes, who hath 4 or 5 ports to lett in Italian ſuccours, with whom it is thought hee hath intelligence, hauing, in the tyme of Achmat, retyred to Florence and Rome, and that hee is in ſome meaſure able to ſubſiſt of himſelfe, hauing 30000 ſoldiours in his army, and a good foundation and eſtate of his owne to maynteyne them; and yett his actions are only lamented here, and no order taken to ſtopp or reduce him, except they haue ſent ſome letters and promiſſes, now the ordinary remedye applyed to theſe manifold troubles. What is the reaſon of this ſtates lethargye, I cannott iudge; it hath no ſenſe, or will not make ſhow to feele the inward diſeaſes conſuming it. Whether they are vnable by want of money, the treaſure beeing drawne dry, or in miſtruſt of their owne ſoldiours, apter euery day to mutyne then to fight, or that the neighbourhood of Abaſſa baſſa amuſe and confound them, I cannott fully reſolue, ſo many circumſtances croſſing one another, as the ſymptomes of confuſion; all things beeing equally feared, and nothing throughly vndertaken: yett a little more ſenſible they are of him that is neareſt, whoſe followers lately tooke a paſſage and bridge not 4 dayes iourney from this citty, as if hee meant either to poſſeſſe himſelfe thereof for his owne meanes, to aduance with his army, or to keepe it, that none ſodainly from this ſide might aſſaile him. Butt, howeuer, it hath manifeſted, that hee is not quiett, and reſolued to obey, as hee promiſed; which new attempt was at court taken very hottly, the viziers tents brought out to paſſe ouer in haſt, many counſills held: but, as all things here doe, the fury paſt, this warmth cooled by degrees in two or three dayes; ſo that only more Janizaries were ſent away, to make garriſon, and to defend the paſſages, with whom are ymployed the falſe French regiment, and their colonell, all the force they can well ſpare; no Spahees entering into the quarrell, as if they were purpoſely expoſed to bee cutt in peeces; which many beleeue, by the faintneſſe and diſunited manner of their proceedings; or elſe, that they goe out of themſelues, knowing the daunger to bee moſt imminent vpon them, and that the emperour and his 1623. councell doe ſtill conniue with the actions of that baſſa. Butt now I am confident in the contrary opinion, and doe beleeue, that both they can do no more at preſent, and that they hope to wynne tyme to reconcile him before the ſpring by offers and perſwaſions; and that his vndertakings are for himſelfe, or ſome other greater alterations: yett not doubting but hee hath both correſpondence and mayntenance from ſome of principall quality. Butt I ſee no reaſon why the emperour and the preſent ſtate ſhould truſt any ſubiects power ſo farr, when his actions doe them ſo much publique diſquiett and diſhonor, though they are confident in the old reputation of their owne ſtrength, or their neighbours diſſentions, that no chriſtian prince dares or will aſſayle them; which opinion of theirs is now ſo ſettled, that nothing can remoue it butt experience. Yet having taken to conſideration their meanes, force, and manner of making warr, I can impute their former felicity to no worth of their owne, nor other cauſe, vnder God, butt that they haue euer bene the inuaders, and vndertakers to conquer; which hath raiſed their owne courage, and danted them that haue only ſtood upon the defence; for the very difference of vndertaking, preſuppoſeth ſome odds in ability: and hereby they haue made the warre in their enemyes cuntry, at his charge, with fire and ſpoile, and ſecured their owne. Beſides, the Turkiſh ſoldiour is not only apt, but deſirous to make inuaſion; becauſe all things are prey, and all kind of licence giuen them; and his hope is more vpon booty and priſoners, then vpon conqueſt; euery boy or girle ſlaue beeing here the beſt merchaundize, and worth 100 dollers: ſo that euery village is to them a magazine, and they retorne rich. Butt, I am perſwaded, verſâ vicê, if they were inuaded, and the warr brought home to their dores, the felicity and counſell of Scipio would bee againe verified, and they would bee found the weakeſt, vnprouided, undiſciplyned enemy in the world, and 30000 ſoldiours would march, vnfought with, to the gates of Conſtantinople.

BECHIR ſubbaſſi, who reuolted in Babilon, and hath held that caſtle all this paſt ſommer, againſt the emperour, hauing bene ſtraightly beſeeged by Haſis Achmat baſſa, and in danger to be forced, ſent his ſonne to Sha-Abaſs, the king of Perſia, for ſuccours; and our laſt aduice from thence brought, That ſome Perſian horſe beeing diſcouered, the baſſa feared that hee ſhould bee compelled to raiſe his ſeege; and therefore betooke himſelfe to diſſimulation; and, as if hee had ſuch authority from the grand ſignor, made compoſition; and not only pardoned Bechir, and all offences paſt, butt conferred the gouerment of that citty and prouince vpon him as baſſa, and ſo retyred his army. This newes is not yett ſeconded, but generally beleeued; and if it bee true, out of doubt that cuntry is wholly loſt: and though Bechir was contented to free himſelfe from the preſent neceſſity by treaty; yett really hee will hold the place of the Perſian, and to his vſe; whoſe agent hath here demaunded both that, and Ahiſka, as the antient patrimony of his aunceſtors.

From Hungary.

BETHLEM GABOR hauing with great expedition marched ouer Hungary, and reduced moſt part thereof to his obedience, except the townes of Presburgh, Rab. Komaza, and ſome fewe other forts, his army conſiſting of 33000 Tranſiluanians and Hungars, and almoſt as many Turks and Tartars voluntarily following for booty, mett with no ſhowe of reſiſtance, vntill hee approached Tornauia, within 4 dayes march of the border of Morauia; whither ſending before ſome regiments of his horſe, to the nomber of 4000, to ſummon the towne, they diſcouered ſome imperiall troopes, ſent to make garriſon therein, beeing 2300 foote, and 200 cauallarye, and arriued within halfe an Engliſh mile, betweene whom and the citty they thruſt themſelues. Theſe troopes, perceiuing they were ſodainly preuented, and not knowing how farr the princes whole army was behind, tooke downe a ſmall brooke to a village, and fortified themſelues in a church, and church-yard walled. The commander of the Hungars diſpatched away a currier to Gabor, with aduiſe, That hee ſhould ſend him ſome foote with expedition, relating the maner how hee had encloſed this garriſon. In the meane tyme he ſummons them, and tells them, that hee had taken poſſeſſion of Tornauia for his maſter; and at the ſame tyme ſummons the towne, and tells them, That their ſuccours ſent had yielded to him, keeping all intelligence from one another, and both from attempting any thing. The next day the prince, with his vantgard, arriues in ſight; and then this collonell ſends ſome troupes to make guard before one of the ports, very neare the wall. 1623. Theſe Germans, ſhutt vpp in the church-yard, ſeeing the enemyes horſe vnder the commaund of the towne, and no ſhott made at them, beleeued that it was true, that the place was rendred; ſo, before the foote came vpp to force them, they yeelded themſelues, and tooke pay of the prince; all, except 36 of the principall, that had licence to depart. Theſe beeing now wonne, the cittizens, the next day, opened their ports, and receiued Bethlem for their lord: thus theſe were gayned, without any ſtroke. From hence he marcheth directly towards Morauia, and ſends before him, a dayes journey, 8000 horſe, to diſcouer and ſpoile. The emperour, finding theſe beginnings vrgent, orders the brother of the prince of Licheſtein to drawe downe his garriſons of Bohemia and Morauia to the frontire; and ſends the marquiſs of Monte Negro, with Collalto, Don Balthaſer de Marades, the count Slicke, Volſtein, Tiffenbach, conte Torquato kinſman to the pope, Sampach, and all his principall capteynes, to meete them, and to forme an army for defence. It is ſaid, they were gathered together 15000, beſides the baggage; who beeing lodged at the foote of an hill, in the borders of Morauia, and many of their ſoldiours ſtraggling to gather grapes, were by theſe auant corriers of Gabor diſcouered, and preſently beſett, who tooke and ſlewe 700; ſome eſcaped, and gaue the alarum, or elſe the whole imperiall campe had bene ſurpriſed without centinell or guard, hauing proued as ſeruiceable as the geeſe in the capitoll. The Hungars hauing gotten the topp of the hill, and ſeeing the Bohemian and German army ſo neare in the bottome, and in ſome confuſion, reſolued to make tryall how they were prouided, and made ſhow of a charge; but finding them in better order to receiue them, retyred; one capten only, aduenturing too neare, was taken priſoner, and carried to the imperiall quarter; who beeing examined, told them, That the prince with a mighty army would, the next night, bee in ſight; and therefore hee aduiſed them to prepare for their ſafety; for that he came with reſolution to fight, and ouer-matching them in nomber, there was no probability of other then death or captiuity. The Imperialls rather ſcorned than beleeued theſe threatenings; butt the capteyne aſſuring them, it was no tyme to ieaſt with his owne life and theirs, they remoued the next morning, and marched towards a towne called Hodoline, or Ghoding, vpon the riuer of Moraw, that diuides Hungary from Morauia; about which was a ſmall trench, and within it a caſtle of ſome defence. The horſe of Gabor, ſeeing them moue toward that place, preſſed in a gallopp before them, and ſett all the houſes on fire, which burned a day and a night, vntill the whole was conſumed: In this meane tyme Bethlem arriues with his army, and the Imperialls ſtand in battalion to expect their fortune; butt the fire beeing ended, gaue them leaue to enter among the ruynes and aſhes, and to make the beſt of neceſſity; where they fortified themſelues, hauing no ſtore of prouiſion. In this eſtate, beeing encloſed about 13 dayes, it was diſcouered by a priſoner, that they were in great want; and that the ſoldiours beganne to mutyny, demanding of their capteynes, either to lead them out to fight and dye like men, or to make ſuch a party for them as their preſent condition would admitt. Don Balthaſar, generall of all the horſe, in the name of all the commanders, gathered the army together; and acknowledging to them, firſt, the great virtue they had ſhowed, to abide at once the aſſaults of perill and famine for their honor; and proteſting, that their caſe and their generalls was all one, for matter of allowance, entreated them to ſtrengthen themſelues with hope and conſtancy; and required of them an vniuerſall promiſe, that they would abide with patience vntill about the end of October, then at hand: if, in that tyme, neither God nor the emperor ſent them ſuccours, they would make ſome compoſition for them, not doubting but to find Gabor a chriſtian and a ſoldiour, though an enemy: and to this propoſition they all gaue their words and faith. The reaſon of this ſhort obteyned tyme proceeded not from any thought of ſupply from the emperour; butt from an opinion and cuſtome, that the Turks would break vpp their campe vpon St. Demetrius-day, the 26. of that moneth, they hauing neuer vſed to ſtay longer in the field, for the incommodityes of winter; and that now they ſerued in a nature of voluntaries, and had gotten their prey, it was very likely nothing could hold them from riſing: butt if that hope failed them, they then reſolued to giue the ſoldiours leaue to make quarter for themſelves; the generalls and commanders purpoſing to retyre into the caſtle with ſome competent numbers, which 1623. they doubted not to keepe, vntill ſupplyes, or weather, ſhould force the enemy to diſlodge. The prince of Tranſiluania, knowing likewiſe, that at that tyme hee ſhould haue trouble enough to ſtay his ſuccours, and if they ſtayed, hee feared they would proue yll wynter gueſts, and diſcreditt him with his Hungars, whom they indifferently ſpoiled, tooke councell either to force them before that day, or to wynne them by policy. Butt this latter beeing the ſafer way, and, it ſeemes, hee had no deſire to putt ſo many perſons of quality into the power of the Turks, whoſe priſoners by agreement they muſt remayne, and hauing alſo intelligence vpon what hopes the Imperialls held out, hee counterworks with the Turks to giue him a promiſe to abide with him 15 dayes after St. Demetrius; in which tyme hee pretended to deliuer the fort and all into their hands; coniecturing, as it ſeemes, that before that day the Germans would make ſome ouerture, out of which hee might work his owne aduantage, and obteyne his owne ends, and they would admire and feare his power and creditt in the Turkiſh army: for, doubtleſs, hee might haue forced them, if hee had pleaſed; butt then hee had made his eſtate deſperate of any reconciliation with the emperour, and muſt reſolue to continue the warr, vncerteyne of the conſtancy of the Turks; aſſured, they being once retyred, would very late drawe againe into the field: and perhapps he doubted the various ſucceſs of warre, and of the ſetling of this ſtate in Aſia, where all things were in diſtemper; and was ſomwhat carefull of his reputation in Chriſtendome, which hee knew was farr aduentured in this action, for which aboue 20000 poore ſoules loſt their liberty, and endangered their faith; therefore hee makes vſe of his tyme and his witt. And the Imperialls, finding themſelues deceiued in the hope of breaking vpp of the campe, now no longer able to ſuſteyne their wants, ſend commiſſioners to him, in the emperours name, to treat ſome agreement. Hee ſeeing his 15 dayes weare out apace, and the Turks beginning to diſlodge, accepts the offer; and that very day, to giue ſatisfaction to this port, diſpeeds one of his chamber, poſt; to make knowne to the vizier, (a man not vneaſy to abuſe) that hee had done his vttmoſt to deteyne the Turks to winter in Hungary; butt beeing not able longer to hold them together, hee was forced to come to treaty; for to aduenture to aſſault the trenches, was full of perill; to riſe without ſome concluſion, were to quitt the place, and honor to the enemy, and to weaken his owne reputation; to continue the ſeege after the departure of his ſuccours, would hazard his owne army into mutiny: therefore, that hee was reſolued to make a truce for 8 moneths, that ſeeing the grand ſignor had receiued the emperours ambaſſador, tyme might bee allowed for treaty and finall concluſion: that as then hee had not fully agreed; butt gaue him commiſſion to ſay, it was reſolued on to bee done, only with a formall reſeruation, of the approuement of the viziers, without which it ſhould bee held as not done; that hee ſhould require the finall reſolution of the port, Whether the grand ſignor would continue conſtant, and maynteyne him in the warre, or not? If they reſolued vpon warre, then to demand prouiſion of munition, money, ſoldiours, and all other neceſſaries, in ſeaſon; and in a meaſure, in theſe tymes, ympoſſible: if they deſired peace, that they ſhould giue a draught of what conditions they affected; butt withall, an abſolute power to himſelfe, to mittigate them, and to make ſuch other, at his diſcretion, as the neceſſity of the affaires and tyme requyred, for the proffitt of this empire. The prince, at the firſt arriuall of theſe deputies at his quarter, diſcouered ſome jealouſy and diſcontent in ſome of his followers: whereuppon hee called moſt of his commanders, and deſired them not to miſtruſt him; hee ſhewed ſome reaſons why hee might bee enforced to make a truce; butt proteſted hee would neuer depoſe armes, nor conclude a finall peace with the emperour, except hee would alſo diſarme, and leaue Germany in quiett; for though it were a hard choice for him, to bee bitten by a woolfe, or by a dogge, yett ſeeing hee could better truſt the one then the other, hee would make vſe of one to curb the other. This gaue not full ſatisfaction; butt the words of a prince are currant payment, becauſe they beare ſtampe; for his meaning, nor what hee treated, hee truſted none withall butt his owne breſt. The meſſenger here arriued play'd his part ſo well and ſecretly, as hee gaue good ſatisfaction to the ſtate, ready enough to beleeue well, and procures a ratification of the truce now ſuppoſed to bee made; and for inſtructions in the intended treaty, receiues three articles, and one commiſſion: firſt, That the emperour ſhould diſclayme all right and title to Hungary, and ſhould leaue the people free, and Gabor to gouerne them. 1623. 2dly, That the prince elector, and all the prouinces that had ſent their ambaſſadors and preſents to this port, and had made league, and taken the imperiall protection, ſhould bee reſtored to their priſtine liberty and eſtates. 3dly, That the emperour ſhould pay a tribute of 40000 dollars for Auſtria, pretended to bee graunted in the dayes of ſultan Selymus. Butt the commiſſion is the key of the worke; wherby the prince, with the councell of the baſſa of Buda, hath obteyned plenam potentiam at his owne diſcretion, if hee find peace conuenient, to make and conclude yt. This laſt beeing, as wee ſuppoſe, the end and ſcope of Gabors deſires; the others only a garniſhing, to make the Turks beleeue, that hee is very carefull of their ſeruice, and the emperour, that hee is very powerfull, and much cared for here, wee think, will produce an end of theſe warrs: and I am of this opinion, becauſe hee hath choſen by this truce rather to oblige the emperour, and his commanders, by ſo great a benefitt as their liberty, and their whole army, then to make them enemyes irreconcyleable. And to this agrees his owne profeſſion, That hee drewe not in the Turks for any neede hee had of their ſuccour, nor for any benefitt intended to them; butt to make a glorious ſhow to the emperour of his creditt in this court, thereby to facilitate his ends, which, what they are, tyme only muſt, as a miſtery, reueale.

WHAT the articles and arreſts of this truce are, wee yet know nothing, butt that it is taken vntill July or September, 1624. And I haue bene more large in the particulars of this matter, then may ſeeme needfull; butt I deſired, that from the lynes, parts, and wayes of his actions, your honor might judicare virum, and make ſome coniecture what may bee expected from him hereafter.

To the emperours ambaſſador I gaue the firſt aduice of this truce, to his great joy; who as conſtantly affirmes, that hee hath aſſurance the grand ſignor will haue noe breach with his maſter; which proceeds more of neceſſity then affection.

Righte Honorable,

THE laſte weeke proc$^{re.}$ Soranzo and his collegue Renier Zen, late ambaſſadors with his holines, entred into the colledge (accompanied with, at the leaſte, 200 purpurati) to giue vp an accompte of theire ambaſſage; concerninge which there is nothinge more as yett broken forthe into publique knowledge, then that they haue giuen his holines contente in all demaundes, that of fra. Paolo onlie excepted; who hathe this longe time beene excommunicate, and not longe ſince in effigie burned at Rome for an heretique. His holines wolde haue his bodie taken vp, and throwne to the dogges (which by this time, I thinke, they will ſcarce eate); and vnder fearfull threatninge, wills them not to proceed in makinge anie monimente for him, that had beene ſuche an enimie to the Roman churche, eſpeciallie in writinge that councell, or rather, I maie call it, anti-councel of Trent, whereof nowe he is declared author after his deathe. And this is all I can afforde your lordſhip, for the preſente, of this place.

I VNDERSTANDE from Rome this laſte weeke, that the Spanniſhe ambaſſador ordenarie there, when he was to take his laſte leaue of the pope, (after longe complimente) begun to complaine, vpon the behalfe of his maſter, of the kinge of France, (knowinge him by his proceedinge yet, to be wholie Frenche) that he was ſo greate a fauourer of the heretiques, the enimies of the kinge of Spaine and the Roman churche, to witt, in fomentinge the Hollanders payinge ſtipend to count Mansfelte, and the like. Vnto which complaint after the pope had giuen good eare, he riſe from his ſeate, and wente to a table, where he had ſome letters, giuinge him this anſwer: Take theſe two letters, and reade them; which will giue you anſwer to your complainte. Theſe letters were written by the kinge of Spaine to Rotchell and Montaban, in the time of thoſe troubles, that they ſholde not render themſelues to the kinge, for they ſholde not wante ſuccoure from him in the meane time; which did ſtoppe the ambaſſadors mouthe, whoſe maſter dothe ſoe muche pretende to be a ſuppreſſer of hereſie. I praie God bleſſe vs (who are accompted noe better) out of ſuch diſſemblinge handes.

1623. I RECEIUED a fortnett agoe another letter from Rome, which I will repreſente vnto your lordſhip (concerninge our treatie of the marriage) in the verie ſame wordes it was writt to me.

From other places, there is little noiſe at this preſente; therefore, hopeinge that this adiuncte will afforde your honore all oure hombred buſineſs, I will, for this time, ceaſe to trouble you anie further, prayinge for your healthe and happines. THESE letters came ſoe late to my handes yeſterdaie, that I am forced to write to your honor in vnbeſeeminge haſte; wherein I craue your pardon.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

HERE wee haue little newes, ſave onely of much loſſe the land hath ſuffered by inundations cauſed by iſlands of yce, which ſtopped vp the rivers, the like wherunto hath not happened theſe 130 yeares; but now by the thawes, which God ſent very ſeaſonably to ſave this whole province of Holland from periſhing, and ſuch induſtryes as have bene vſed, the waters take their wonted courſe; and the ſeaſon of the yeare advancing, putts vs out of feare of any vſe the ennemy can make of freeſing vp the rivers for this winter; for which they were prepared, having aſſembled at Maeſtricht, and downewards vpon the Maze, about 14 or 15000 men.

COUNT Mansfelt, thincking the ennemy, vpon the retiring of his French, might be taken aſleepe or in ſecurity, as contemning his weakenes, ſent out 1000 foote to ſurpriſe Frieſocthen, a paſſage into Munſterland, which had ſome of the biſhop of Collens men in garriſon, who defended themſelves till the baron of Anholts troopes, quartering in thoſe parts, drew together to the number of 2000 foote, and 1000 horſe, and came vpon the Mansfeldians ſo vnexpectedly, that they cutt halfe of them in peeces, and tooke the reſt priſoners in a church-yard, where they were retired, vpon condition to ſerve the emperour.

THIS croſſe accident, ioyned to the retreate of the French, and ill newes of Bethlem Gabors truce, hath brought count Mansfelt ſo low, as well in courage as ſtrength, that he hath finally reſolved to licenſe his army; and to that effect hath written hether, to have the 300000 florins, promiſed by the inhabitants of Eaſt-frizeland, (which money is furniſhed by the States) payd, wherby to give his men ſome contentment at their licenſing: and the States have given count Erneſt, and their deputyes, (which lye ready with the money at Delfzile) order to pay it, ſo as the inhabitants of Eaſt-frizeland will give their obligation for reſtitution. Here ariſeth a new difficultye, becauſe thoſe inhabitants thincke, that neceſſity will compell that army to disband; and therfore refuſe to giue obligation for the money.

MANSFELT, in the meane tyme, not able well to defend Stichuyſen, (upon which place the Imperialiſts have their eyes, ſince theyr good luck neare by at Frieſocthen) hath putt it into the States hands, whether count Erneſt hath already ſent garriſon, but with promiſe of reſtitution to Mansfelt, vnles the bargayne of the money preceede; and without the obligation of the inhabitants, the States will disburſe no money; ſo as I doe not yet ſee any end of that buſineſſe.

BY letters from London of the 3d of this preſent, I am advertiſed, that that very day writts were ſent out for a parliament to be held the 13th of the next; and that my lord of Oxford, after 20 monthes impriſonment, was releaſed out of the Tower, and convayed from thence, by my lord of Kenſinghton, to the earle of Exeters, where he lodgeth; and, on new-yeares-day, maryed his daughter, the lady Diana Cecyll, with a portion of 30000 l. viis & modis. Other matters of alteration are ſpoken 1623.

of, which require tyme for tryall of the truth of them. So, for the preſent, I committ your lordſhip to God.

WHILST I am now writing, here is newes come, that in Eaſt-frieſland, after many diſputes and difficulties, they haue all yealded to neceſſitie, the countrey hauing ſigned the obligation to the States, the States furniſhed the money to Mansfelt, and Mansfelt licenſed his troopes, which paſſe alla filata through the countrey of Oldenburgh. I kiſſe your lordſhips and your ladies hands, euer reſting

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionat ſeruant,

To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My Lorde,

I SUPPOSE my laſt of the 27. December, of which the 9th January I ſent copies, with ſome addition, brought not very pleaſing newes to your reſidence: butt it is better to knowe the worſt, then to bee deceiued. It is now confirmed from the prince himſelfe, as you will find by the encloſed relation, to which (for all that I can aduiſe from hence) I referr your lordſhip; only I haue heard, that ſignior Petendi, formerly ymployed, is againe diſpatched into Holland, with his maſters apology, which is partly grounded vpon the failing of promiſſes made here by the Dutch ambaſſador, that aydes and great forces ſhould bee giuen the king of Bohemia, which neuer appeared. Butt theſe are colours: hee beganne the warre, and made the truce for himſelfe; and I am perſwaded, it willbee followed by a finall peace: yett his miniſters here conſtantly profeſſe, that hee will not conclude it, nor euer depoſe armes, unleſs the emperour will reſtore the Palatinate, and leaue Germany quiett. To which end, I haue putt him in mind, how much it concernes his honor, to iuſtify his profeſſions in taking armes; though I neuer durſt encourage him to proceed in them, nor can I tell what truſt might bee giuen him either way.

I HAUE not heard from the queene of Bohemia ſince May, nor from your lordſhip ſince the 29. September; though euery 14 dayes I haue written to you, and very often to her maieſtie.

I FEARE my letters are not welcome to her, for the yll newes they bring: butt I haue allwaies diſcharged my conſcience, and aduiſed truth, as neare as my iudgment would lead mee, and therein I haue not done her yll ſeruice. What elſe I haue done, I will not boaſt of; butt what I would doe, if I were able, I would compare with all the world: and of that I doubt not, before I dye, to giue her maieſtie aſſurance. If there bee any miſenterpretation of her maieſtie, your lordſhip will pleaſe to adviſe mee, and whence it proceeds, that I may make my innocency only to plead for me: and ſo, I beſeech you, kiſs her hands in my behalfe; for I dare not write, vntill I haue ſome matter that may better content her: and ſo I commend your lordſhip to the keeping of Allmighty God.

Relations from Conſtantinople. 24 Jan. 1623.

THE truce taken betweene the prince of Tranſyluania and the marquis de Monte Negro, generall for his imperiall maieſtye, before the towne of Ghoding on the frontires of Morauia, wherein the Germanes were beſeeged, is confirmed by an expreſſe, and letters to the grand vizier from that prince, dated the 10th Nouember.

THE mediatour betweene them was the Palatine Staniſlaus Tarzow, a Hungarian. The articles, as farre as they are reuealed to the vizier, or that I can gett notice of, though I doubt not there are other, and more, which were not fitt to bee ſent hither, are fower:

1. THAT on both partes armes ſhould bee depoſed for 10 moneths, (ending the 6th of Sept. 1624.) and all other acts of hoſtility giuen ouer: That there ſhould of 1623. neither ſide, any attempt bee made, nor by force nor fraud, to take any caſtles, fortes, cittyes, or places of defence, during this truce; and that both Germans, Hungars, and Turks ſhould bee alike comprehended.

2. THAT yf the emperor were deſirous to treate and conclude a finall peace with the grand ſignior, hee ſhould vſe Bethlem Gabor as the mediatour, and doe nothing therein without his priuitye.

3. THAT all the places and forts taken in by Gabor, in this laſt expedition, ſhould reſt quiett in his poſſeſſion, vntill the time expired; and that all cityes and caſtles, now in the poſſeſſion of eyther, ſhould ſoe remayne, without any alteration.

4. THAT all paſſages ſhould bee open for free trade and ſecure entercourſe of marchants, and all other the ſubiects and frends of eyther ſyde.

THIS is all I can learne, and as much as hath bene deliuered to the vizier, but from a priuate information of the agent of Bethlem, that there are ſome other articles, which meerely concerne the prince, and were unneceſſarye to bee communicated; as, That there ſhalbee reſtitution giuen to the marquis of Saquendorſe, and to the count of Torne, of theyr eſtates. Butt whether that particular bee concluded, or propounded, and promiſed vppon the finall treaty deſſigned at Buda, I cannott learne.

THE prince determined to winter at Biſterſe-bania, or Septem Arces, which is the mint of Hungarye, not farre from Tyrnauia; as yf hee ment to hang ouer Morauia, like a cloud, vntill the end of the treatye.

THE prince made a ſhew of redeeming all the poore captiues taken by the Turkes at his owne charge, with ſome help from the Imperialls, vppon whome hee layes the blame, as hauing fayled to meete him vppon a paſſage of water, where hee entertayned the Turkiſh army; but they not comming, he pretends, the Turkes roſe in the night, and carried them all away, to the number of aboue 20000.

THE prince warned the Turkes to keepe in order, and not to ſtragle in theyr retrayte, nor to committ any inſolencye and ſpoyle, the cuntry being all in armes, and alreadye enraged: but, it ſeemes, they followed not his councell; ſome 2000 Hungar horſe ſett vppon them, as they were deuided, and ſlew 5 or 600, and recouered ſome priſoners. Whereupon the Turkes vnited, and returned, and killed as many of the Hungars, tooke one man of quality. and many other ſlaues.

VPPON this newes, the Turkes haue made a ſhew, as yf they were deſirous to continue the warre in the next ſommer, which, in this manner of ſcorreria, they can make with eaſe and profitt. But I am well enformed, that the prince is weary of theyr companie, and knowes theyr help will doe nothing but weaken, ſpoyle, and deſtroy the country; that therefore hee will take his advantage of what is paſt, and make peace.

THE emperors ambaſſador hopes his diſpatch wilbee made by the time the wayes are open to trauell: hee is confident of peace, for treaty whereof hee is ſtill referred to Buda.

BETWEENE Abaſſa baſſaes ſoldiers, and the garriſons neere him, there haue paſſed ſome skirmiſhes and encounters of partyes abroad, with loſſe ſometimes to one, ſometimes to the other: but it is now fully reſolued, and I think will hold, that the great vizier, with a compleate army, ſhall goe ouer into Aſya in the firſt of the ſpring, and ſuppreſſe him by force, yf hee bee able, and to quiett ſome other tumults in diuers partes that haue taken boldnes vnder that ſhelter; and from thence ſhall march towards Babilon, and the frontire of Perſia, from whence now they haue new and greateſt feares: for ſince that Bechir ſubbaſſee had by force made compoſition for himſelf to remayne baſſa of Babilon during his life, (of whoſe rebellion former relations haue made mention) which hath bene very diſhonorable to this abſolute monarch, it is afreſh aduiſed, that hee, for his better ſecuritye, hath taken into the caſtle a Perſian garriſon, and that hee meanes to hold the place for that king. But this is not yett ſeconded, though generally feared: but it is certaine, that the Perſian is making a great preparation for an army in Cara-baglar, a prouince on the frontire, part ſubiect to him, and part to the grand ſignior; which hath cauſed this emperor to diſpatch away the Perſian agent, heere reſident, with a principall chiaus, about 6 dayes paſt, to expoſtulate the cauſe of this moouing, and ſending forces thither, and to perſwade him to keepe the peace. But I am perſwaded, the matter will not bee decided by a meſſenger; ſenger; and that the intelligence betweene Abaſſa baſſa and him, or, at leaſt, the advantage they giue one another, will make them both reſolued and obſtinate. 1623.

THE laſt baſſa, ſent to Cayro from the port, is refuſed by the inhabitants, and ſent back; not as diſobedient to the grand ſignior, but complayning, that the country is not able to ſupport ſoe many changes of gouernours, and new exactions, that they make vppon them; with which, they ſay, theyr prouince is undone; this being the ſeauenth in 15 monthes; promiſing to giue the grand ſignior his tribute, to obey him that is now reſident, and euery 3. yeere to ſubmitt to a new, but noe oftener.

STEPHANO TOMSHA, late prince of Bugdania, about 4 months ſince depriued of that gouerment, at the inſtance of the Poliſh ambaſſador, vppon the concluſion of the peace, is agayne now reſtored to his principalitye, for a great ſumme of money, to furniſh the expedition of Aſya, which hee hath promiſed. This wilbee very ill taken in Poland, and worſe of prince Radula, who lately payd 300000 dollers for it.

IN the citty there is nothing in action, but preparation of money; to prouide which, many arrearadges are called vppon: and two dayes paſt, one of the viziers of the bench called in queſtion, (late baſſa of Cayro) it is thought, without any ground but malice. Wherevppon hee fled, left his houſe open, and all his goods, taking only two ſeruants, and ſome money, and leauing a writing to the grand ſignior, ſherte, but to the purpoſe: Naked I came hither, and naked I returne: Take that I haue, yf that may help to preſerue your ſtate, which, vnder ſuch gouernours, cannott long endure.

FROM Damaſcus, it is aduiſed, That the emir of Sydon is retyred, not holding the citty; and, as ſome ſay, hee neuer entred it. Hee hath hither ſent his excuſe, and a preſent, That what hee did, was not in rebellion to the grand ſignior, but to reuenge a priuate quarrell againſt the baſſa of that place, whome he hath carryed away priſoner. Which, though it were a preſumption very exorbitant, to enter the grand ſigniors dominion, and fetch out his lieutenant by force, yett, it ſeemes, it is not time to ſee it: but this apologie is accepted, and a ſword and veſt ſent him, in ſigne of fauour, as yf hee had done great ſeruice. Thus this ſtate maintaynes it ſelf, like an old courtier, by bearing iniuryes, and giuing thanks: but theſe things cannot long bee diſſembled, eſpecially on the part of the emir, who is now the bolder.

THERE is much rumour about the change of the great vizier, and the captain-baſſa, to goe to the warres in theſe times of great neceſſitie; in which our prayers are aſſiſtant, that wee may haue one good one: Nigro ſimillima cygno.

Extract to the Archbiſhop of CANTERBURY. Conſtant. 24 Jan. 1623.

May it pleaſe your Grace,

WITH a great deale of ioy I haue receiued your graces letter of the 12th of Auguſt; wherin, to my comfort, (and in this baniſhment I haue need of ſome) I find myſelfe aſſured in your graces accuſtomed fauour; of which I will ſtill begg the continuance, though it bee aboue my meritt. I haue, according to your command, acquainted the good patriarch with his maieſties grace, and of your graces compaſſionat affection towards him, which hath much reuiued his heart, and which, with all gratitude, hee will, by the next poſt, acknowledge to both. By my letters of the 14th October, and 15th Nouember, which I hope are arriued, I gaue your grace aduice of his reſtitution; and with them ſent you a letter, with others encloſed, to Metrophanes, from him. I haue alſo lett him know the deuious courſe taken by that man, of your bounty and care for him, and all the circumſtances of his departure. Att firſt hee ſeemed ſomwhat aſtoniſhed; butt his affection towards him preuailed to make his excuſe: firſt, That hee had giuen him in charge to prouide bookes; which might occaſion him to tread awry, to gett money: next, That hee could not beleeue of him, butt that hee would ſoone ſhake off his vagabond company, and retorne directly hither. For thoſe bookes which your grace intended to ſend him, hee made earneſt enquiry, whether Metrophanes had them, and what hee had done with them; of which I could giue no other account, butt that they were bought as a preſent for him. Hee lamented the loſs of them, with complaint

1623. of the litle meanes hee had to bee furniſhed with any, butt ſuch as were allowed, and ſold in Italy; wherby I perceiued, hee deſired that Metrophanes error ſhould not depriue him of your graces fauour. Hee hath taken order to write into Holland, France, and diuers other parts, to recall this ſtraye ſheepe, to whom hee beares an entire loue; and if hee come hither, intends to make him a kind of coadiutor in judging of cauſes, and to conferr vpon him all the dignity hee can. Hee is now well ſettled againe in his ſee, to the great content of the Greek church, though hee hath putt it in debt, by his troubles, about 120000 dollers; a great ſumme for thoſe that are daily ſuckt and oppreſſed. The Jeſuits and their adhærents haue not giuen ouer his perſecution, though they giue way to tyme, and watch another opportunity: and, as I haue bene ſecretly enformed, there is a colloyre come from Rome, that lurks here vnder the French ambaſſadors protection, called Archemandrity, who expects a collection to bee ſent from thence of 20000 dollers, to doe him another affront, beeing maynteyned by the cardinall protector of the eaſt church, who hath vndertaken that, at the inſtance, and vpon the information of the French ambaſſador and the Jeſuits; of which I haue giuen the patriarch very priuat warning. Hee had ſome ſmall light of it before, butt ſeemed, in my opinion, too confident vpon the affection of the people, notwithſtanding hee had a late experience of the truſt to be repoſed in them; and they are all as ſheepe, if the great vizier wilbee corrupted; notwithſtanding, hee will be wary, and I will not faile to giue him all requiſite aſſiſtance, beeing very gladd I haue his majeſties and your graces approbation; for, beſides that hee is a good man, it is a matter of great conſequence, to preuent that the Romaniſts gett not here an abſolute authority, which they vſe ſo tyrannouſly towards vs euery where.——

[The remainder of this being to the ſame purport with ſome former letters, we therefore omit it here.]

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT: With Additions to Sir D. CARLETON, and Sir EDW. CONWAY.

Right Honorable,

THE fewe additions that I can make to the encloſed, in themſelues of no vſe to your honor, ſerue only to demonſtrate the continuall diſtemper and indiſpoſition of this ſtate.

STEPHANO TOMPSHA, mentioned in my laſt relations to bee reſtored, and declared prince of Bugdania for a great ſumme of money, beeing outbidden by the agents of the preſent veiwoda Radula, is againe diſgraced, and this confirmed in his gouerment.

THE vizier that was thought to haue fledd the citty for an oppreſſion of the treſurer, at the ſuit of the mufti, and the eloquence of 50000 dollers, is againe receiued to the bench, and ſitts in his quality; but not well content.

THE tents of the grand vizier with the aga of the Janizaries, and all the forces of this empire on this ſide the Boſphorus, are ordered to croſs the water vpon the 9th day of this moneth; vpon certeyne aduice from Hafis baſſa, generall in the prouince of Babilon, that the king of Perſia, with a powerfull army, hath entered thoſe quarters; and that both the citty and that country would be loſt, if ayds did not arriue in 30 dayes; which tyme is expired; and it is beleeued, that allready hee hath gotten poſſeſſion. Warr againſt him hath bene proclaymed in this towne, in ſuch termes as neuer was heard in former tymes; to ſay, That whoſoeuer taketh pay of the grand ſignor in any kind as a ſouldiour, if hee come not to the rendeuous appointed, with his armes, hee ſhalbee confiſcated, eſteemed as a rebell, and his wife and children ſold for ſlaues. This is ſent into Greece, Natolia, Trebizond, and all the vttmoſt confines of this ſtate. Vpon whom the firſt fury of this preparation ſhould fall, hath begotten much queſtion in this court, and much diſpute with the Janizaries. The emperor, vizier, mufti, and moſt of the ſober counſellors, haue propounded and deſired to ſend a pardon and confirmation of all the demands of the rebell Abaſſa baſſa, vpon condition that he conuert his forces vpon the Perſian, and joyne with the army, or rather ſodainly march before, to preuent, as much as may bee, the proſperity of the enemy; butt the Janizaries will not, as yett, conſent to receiue, or to bee reconciled with him, who hath grounded his quarrell only againſt them: butt deſire they may be ledd out firſt againſt him, whom they eſteeme butt a morſell, and after againſt the common enemy. And becauſe their aga would not concurr with them in opinion, the laſt week they mutined againſt him, and hee wiſely gaue way to the ſtorme, and ſurrendered his charge; to which is preferred the 3d page of the court. Thus they are reſolued to goe to warr, butt as yet irreſolute where to beginne; becauſe the mufti will not declare Abaſſa baſſa rebell, who pretends what hee hath done was by inſpiration, and for reformation: and if he would, and that they ſhould beginne with him, in fighting there were great hazard; butt in forcing him to retyre to the Perſian, there were more. Therefore I am perſwaded the Janizaries wilbe appeaſed, and Abaſſa baſſa ſent to his owne gouernment on that ſide to make roads into Perſia, and therby to procure a diuerſion; and the whole army ſhall march directly towards Babilon, where they will find work enough with the enemy, beſides the diſunion among themſelues, and the litle obedience they are like to carry to their commanders, who are allready in faction. I will not ſay butt this round reſolution may reſettle againe the ſhaken eſtate of Aſia, and reſtore to this empire ſome reputation on that ſide; butt I am confident yt ſhalbee done with ſo much daunger, that if they had not quiett frends on this ſide, it were deſperate.

THE emperors ambaſſador labours his diſpatch, and hopes to take leaue the next weeke, referred to Buda, where the generall treaty is deſſigned.

IT is thought the prince of Tranſiluania wilbee preſent in perſon, and that he hopes yett of an alliance with the houſe of Auſtria, and had ſome ſpeech thereof with the marquiſs of Monte Negro at Ghoding.

HEE hath laboured a league and ayds from Venice, which ſtate hath priuatly ſent him a ſecretary to reſyde; butt now they begynne to talke miſtruſtfully of his intentions: yett, I doubt not, they will haue an eye vpon his treaty, and enterpoſe aſmuch as they can: where, I am perſwaded, Bethlem Gabor might bee held to ſome ſtiffneſs, becauſe of his greate profeſſions, and that hee would bee loath to bee diſcouered to the Turks; and that only is the way to awe him. I am allway venturing my coniectures, butt I expoſe them to bee cancelled and condemned of your honor: though (vnder fauour) meethinks, yt is very incongruous, that the affaires of the emperor ſhould bee nouriſhed againſt ourſelues, if there bee noe miſtery in yt aboue my vnderſtanding; and ſo I wilbee bold to conclude,

Addition to Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

I HAUE not heard from your lordſhip this 3 months, though I haue written euery 14 dayes, and haue ſent you many lardge relations of our affayres; to which I will referr you. The treaty at Buda, in my opinion, would not bee neglected: for though ther is no apparance, that Bethlem Gabor hath any reſolution but with aſpect upon himſelfe; yet becauſe he continueth in the proteſtation, that he will make no peace without reſtitution of the Palatinat, therfore, if any authoritye interpoſed, he might bee held to ſome ſtiffnes, becauſe he would bee loath to bee diſcouered both to the Turkes and Chriſtians, that he hath playd with both. The Venetians haue ſent to him a ſecretarye to reſyde, but with what inſtructions I am ignorant; yet they looſe no aduantage for want of tryall, and it is paſt my underſtanding, why ſome uſe might not bee made of him, but that wee ſhould nouriſh the emperor, to bee more able to bee obſtinate in treaty with us. I haue not ſpared to make offers of my ſelfe unto England; but I feare he hath ſo little creditt ther, that it will be thought all ſmoke that is ſpoken of him. I will rellye upon your lordſhip for a mediation to her majeſtie, whoſe long ſilence hath begotten feare in me of ſome miſconſtruction; but I haue been alway, and will dye her faythfull ſeruant. I confeſs my letters haue neuer brought her pleaſing matter; but if I haue any way preuaricated, or had any other purpoſes but her ſeruice, I am then become a Turke, and this is a true proteſtation. And ſo I committ your lordſhip to the keeping of our bleſſed God.

Addition to Sir EDW. CONWAY.

YOUR honor will giue me leaue to add theſe fragments to my former relations, being they depend upon them: ther is nothing els worthy of conſideration from theſe parts, unleſs the intended treaty of Buda, where the emperor may obteyne a peace,. that will harden him in any other treaty (if ſuch bee intended) with us. And becaus Gabor doth ſtill profeſs, that hee will not depoſe arms untill the Palatinat bee reſtored, though by his actions he hath ſhowed no ſuch ſinceritye, yet he may bee taken in his owne netts, for he wilbe loth to bee diſcouered, that he hath playd on both ſydes; uſed the Turks, and abuſed his other allyes.

THE ſtate of Venice hath ſent a ſecretary to reſide with him; to what end, your honor will eaſely coniecture: they will not looſe any oportunitye for want of tryall.

I MAY doubt that I ſhalbe cenſured too buſy in this matter; but I haue no other end but his majeſties ſeruice, and doe only ſtrike little fires, which are ſoone quenched. Your honor wilbe pleaſed to make the beſt interpretation of them, and to eſteeme me as

ALTHOUGH my imploimente (for matter of occurrents) dothe in ſome ſorte confine me to the pale of this republique, yett can I not holde my handes (becauſe I conceiue ſuch ioy) from tellinge your lordſhip, that nowe, in Englande, there is more ſpeeche of a parlamente then a matche; which I hope will putt thoſe of the Spaniſhe faction vpon the teſte; and this is all I either neede, or dare to ſaie concerninge that point, vnleſſe I knewe your lordſhip had a cypher, vnder which I mighte conueighe my bolder lines. Of this place we have verie fewe, and thoſe not of the beſte; for vpon Wedneſdaie ſennatt laſte, about 12 of the clocke of the daie, after our owne accounte, an Engliſhe ſhippe, called the Golden Phœnix, was caſte awaie within two cables lengthe of the barre of Malamocco, which was her deſired porte: of burthen, ſhe was about 350 tunn; her ladinge, by reporte, worthe 30000 l. ſterlinge, of which little wilbe ſaued; and of 30 men but 3 drowned; her owners, the Garrawais, and ſome fewe other partners; the maſter, one Newe, who, I vnderſtande, carried your lordſhip to Conſtantinople, but not vpon the ſame ſhippe. And thus muche I deſire maie ſerue your honor concerninge that tragicall point. Concerninge the buſineſſe of the Valtolina, which is yett in depoſito with the pope, I heare that he is indefatigable in giueinge audience to all thoſe that propounde him anie courſe how he maie place it for the good and quiett of Italie, howſoeuer it maie be thoughte, to eaſe himſelfe of the continuall charge he is at for maintaininge the fortes of the ſame. Some are of opinion, that he will reſtore it to the Griſons, they puttinge in ſecuritie to paie what moneyes haue gone out of the apoſtolicall chamber; and others, that he will make of that and Chauenna, a fourthe leage. But theſe, paraduenture, are bowes ſhott off at randome; howſoeuer the certaintaie wilbe ſeene ere longe. Theſe letters which I ſende your honor herewith, all came to me vpon Tuſdaie laſte; which (concerninge other matters of our ilande) maie giue your lordſhip larger ſatisfaction. Thus, with the humbleſte remembrance of my ſeruice to your honor, I committe you to Godes bleſſed protection, and remaine

Another from the ſame.

Right Honorable,

CONCERNINGE the occurrents of the time, I haue made choice firſte to begin at home, becauſe this weeke I knowe not from that place howe your lordſhips wants maie be furniſhed in that kinde. Therefore your honor maie firſte of all vnderſtand, that vpon the 3. of this inſtante, writts were to goe out to ſummon the perſons for that highe courte, which by this time (if noe Spaniſhe practiſe 1623. hinder it) I hope is aſſembled. There was nothinge made me more confidente of this proceedinge, then that Sir Edwarde Cooke, Sir Edw. Sandes, and Sir William Joanes, were not longe agoe ſente commiſſioners into Irlande; for it is nowe growne (I maie ſaie at this diſtance) ragion di ſtato, to baniſhe men by imploymente; thoughe there maie, I hope, be founde within thoſe bodies, when they are choſen, as good patriotts as theſe, which, noe doubt, will ſpende theire beſte breathe for the welfare of our kingdom: and thus muche I am bolde with your honor to ſaie in that pointe. I heare likewiſe, that his majeſtie ſendes forthewith to Fraunce, Denmarke, and the Lowe Countries, ambaſſadors, and to this republique Sir Iſaac Wake, who is nowe neare vpon takinge of his iourney: which confirmes my opinion, that we ſhall treate noe more with Spaine; and that his majeſtie will goe roundlie forwarde to vindicate the auenciente poſſeſſion of his ſonne-in-lawe: I praie God keepe him in that minde.

NOWE, I beſeeche your lordſhip, giue me leeue, when I haue doone with hombred buſineſſe, to ferie ouer into the Lowe Countries, from whence I heare that counte Mansfelte (his Frenche hauinge, for wante of paie, left him) hathe disbanded all the reſte of his armie, ſauing 1000 horſe, and ſome fewe foote, with whome he hath put himſelfe into the ſeruice of the States, leaſte that (Bethlem Gabor hauinge concluded a peace with the emperoure) he mighte, amongſte theſe diſcouragements, be taken at ſome aduantage. Within this republique I can finde nothinge this weeke worthie your honors knowledge, more then that, vpon Wedneſdaie laſte, a chiaus from that grande ſignior had his audience and ordenarie reception in the colledge here. What the effecte of his meſſage maie be, I doe not yet knowe, but I hope a fewe daies more will diſcouer it. And thus, leſte I ſholde be too troubleſome to your honor, with my heartie praiers to God for your healthe and happineſſe, I ceaſe, and remaine

Right Honorable,

MAIE it pleaſe your lordſhip to vnderſtande, that yeſterdaie, beinge the 16th of Februarie, ſtilo Gregor. I haue receiued your honorable lines of the 13th of December laſte; aſſuringe your lordſhip, that, for the time to come, I will not faile to ſerue your lordſhip dulie with what maie occurre in this place, peraduenture the time paſte (beeinge the infancie of my imploymente) not ſoe well performed. And, firſte, to beginne within the pale of this republick:

YOUR lordſhip maie pleaſe to vnderſtande, that the popes new nuncio hathe, as I vnderſtande, complained (beinge a clauſe of his inſtructions) to the prince and colledge, that they ſuffer the States ambaſſadors howſe to be frequented euerie Sabothe daie with Frenche and Highe Germans, and euen ſome of theire owne ſubiects, to heare ſermons; which was founde neither in matter nor manner, as it was related to the pope at Rome. And ſoe the nuntio hathe ſpente his breathe in vaine; and had for his anſwer, Hee was euelie and enuiouſlie informed: which, I thinke, hathe put an end to that complainte. And this is all I can for the preſente ſaie of this poſitiue and retired State.

NOWE your honor giue me leeue to leape ouer the pale, to tel your honor, that I haue hearde from Rome, That the pope, for preuentinge of imminente broiles of the empire, hathe ſounded the duke of Bauaria, vpon what termes he wold lett goe his holde of the Palatinates: who anſwers, (unleſſe he maie haue ſecuritie for 16 milions of florins, of which he is creditor to the empire) If all the worlde riſe vpp againſte him, he will neuer reſigne his title to the ſame. He is obſerued (fearinge ſome greate tempeſte) to make money of all ſortes of commodities, euen ſin alle coſe mangiative, againſte that time to inritche his coſers. Soe that it is to be feared (hauing ſortefied the Palatinates ſo muche, and prouided ſoe muche money, which 1623. is the ſinnewes of warr) that this fox, without the expence of muche blood, will neuer be drawne oute of his hole.

I HEARE nowe likewiſe from Rome, That the pope (heareinge that the matche with Spaine is like to breake off) howldethe manie conſultations, what maie be doone for the good of his beloued flock in our kingdome; and labours by all means poſſible to drawe the treatie of mariage towarde France, that the papiſtes maie not altogether be fruſtrate of theire hopes; hearinge that the prince dothe giue out, He will neuer haue more thoughte to marie amongſte catholiques. Euen the greate God of heuen either make him of that minde, or continue him, if he be of it alreadie.

I HEARE, That the kinge of Fraunce is leuyinge of a great armie, noe man knowes for what purpoſe; but thoſe of the reformed religion are in greate feare, that he will haue another bout with them: yett, if there be but (pro forma tantum) anie treatie of a mariage with France, it maie be, he will holde off his hande.

WHAT your honor wiſhes ſholde be ſaide to Mr. Tromball therein, I will not be ſilente; thoughe I doe a little doubt whether he be gone into Englande, not haueinge hearde of him nor from him of late.

THUS (humblie thankinge your honor for your good wiſhes, which I will requite with my praiers to God for your healthe and happineſſe) I kiſſe your lordſhips handes, and reſte

My very good Lord,

THEY ſay, Miſchiefs ſeldome come alone: and ſo it appeares by a hard froſt of long continuance, which came ſoone after the inundation in theſe parts, (of which my laſt advertiſed your lordſhip) and gave the ennemye tyme and commodity to aſſemble theyr troopes, and make invaſion in two ſeverall quarters vpon the yce; one into the Veluwe, over the Yſſell, neare Dewsbourgh; the other into Groningland, over the moraſſe of Burtaign: both which were froſen ſo faſt and firme, that they were ſufficient to carry canon.

THE firſt was conducted by count Henry Vandenbergh, who approched the river with 35 troopes of horſe, 7000 foote, and 6 peeces of canon, the 17th of the laſt; and paſſing without difficultye, left the groſſe of his men on both ſides vpon the paſſage at Dieren; and with 2000 horſe, 2000 foote, and 2 of his peeces, gaue a brauado the next day to Arnhem, and marched that night to Eede, a large village neare Wagening, with purpoſe there to lodge: but the prince of Orange going from hence the ſame day in perſon to Vtretcht with ſuch troopes as he could readily draw out of theſe inland garriſons, (of which, doubtles, count Henry Vandenbergh had advertiſement) it fell out in the night, that ſome boores of the countrey, who were retired into a woode not farre from Eede, and had a trumpett amongſt them, without any deſſigne, made theyr trumpett ſound. At which count Henry taking a ſodayne alarum, retired in confuſion before day to his groſſe at Dieren: but finding himſelf not followed, remayned there till the 23th, when finding apparence of a thawe, he retired that night to Keppel, ſo forward over the Rhyne to his wonted garriſons.

THE greateſt hurt of this exploict fell vpon certayne villages on the Veluwe ſide ioyning vpon the Yſſel, as Spankren, Dieren, Middachten, and Rheede; all which having ſafegard of the infanta, and being vnder contribution, the inhabitants, in confidence thereof, removed neyther cattell nor goods, but were vtterly ſpoyled and ranſackt. The other villages of the Veluwe ſaved theyr goods in the walled townes: yet, to redeeme theyr houſes from burning, were forced to agree for a yeares contribution, of which count Henry caryed with him a monthes payment: but for the reſt, the States diſavow the agreement; and ſix of the boores of the countrey, which were employed in the making thereof, are brought hether priſoners.

THE other enterpriſe vpon Groningland was chiefly conducted by the governour of Linghen, who, with the helpe of the garriſon of Oldenſel, and ſome of the baron of Anholts troopes, (who, for this ſervice, changed their oath from the emperor to the king of Spayne) burnt, and ſpoyled, and tooke priſoners as high as Dam: but hearing of 12 companyes of the States horſe come into that countrey from Zutphen, vnder commaund of Stackenburgh, commiſſary generall of the States cavalrye, retired againe in haſt with many boores priſoners, but leaving all cattell and other boote behind.

VPON advertiſement of theſe two exploicts to Bruxells, 17 troopes of horſe, and about 7000 foote, drew together in the villages of Brabant, neare Leere, vnder commaund of the count Salazar; which was here no otherwiſe vnderſtood, then hath ſince proved, to be done by way of diverſion, thoſe men being agayne returned into garriſon: yet, for more aſſurance, ſome foote companyes were ſent from Dort to Breda, where was moſt neede of men; and all the prince of Orange could doe, whilſt the countrey lay thus open and acceſſible in all parts, was, to ſecure places of ſtrength, as well within the land as the frontiers, by ſtuffing them with garriſons; wherby he was diſfurniſhed of ſtrength for the field, and therefore ſtayed at Vtrecht with 12 troopes of horſe, and 20 companyes of foote onely, attending occaſions, and cauſing the yce to be broken from Viana to Vtrecht, ſo to Amſterdam, wherby to ſecure this province of Holland: but yf count Henry had remayned vpon the paſſage, (as the voyce ran, when he made a halt, after his retreate from Eede) and fortifyed, he would have had the whole ſtrength of this ſtate on his neck, before he could have putt himſelf in defence on eyther ſide of the river, or poſſibly have layd a bridge, which could not be done till the yce were gone; and the rivers being no more paſſable by the ennemy, the greateſt part of the garriſons of this ſtate might have bene drawne into the field without perill.

THE prince of Orange returned hether immediatly vpon count Henryes retreate, having given order for the reparation of walles and fortifications at Arnhem, Wagening, Rhenen, Amersfort, and other cloſed townes of the Veluwe, which, out of too much ſecurity, hath bene heretofore neglected by the inhabitants: and this is the end of our winter warre; which being vnvſuall, will (I doubt not) fill the world with much noyſe.

I RENDER your lordſhip many thancks, with acknowledgment of much obligation for your often and diligent letters, of which the laſt are of the 29. of November. The queene of Bohemia, beſides thoſe directed to her ſelf, takes and interprets ſuch as I receaue from your lordſhip, and ſhe gladly peruſeth, aright, as written for her ſeruice; and when ſhe ſayth not ſo much her ſelf, I pray your lordſhip reſt aſſured therof from me. Theſe laſt newes of the emperors deſire to diſcharge the king of Spaine of affaires and charge towards the Leuant, by his ambaſſadors negotiation with the grand ſeignor, doth much import theſe parts of the world; for howſoeuer it is not, in a manner, poſſible, that peace ſhould be made betwixt thoſe two maine oppoſits, yet, conſidering the confuſed eſtate of that gouerment, a ſummer or two may be gayned by ſuch treaties. And I perceaue the Spaniard thincks there needs no more time for effecting his ends in theſe parts; and, not to looſe time, he ſetts vp his reſt at once, hauing drawne allready ſome ſtrength out of Italy, about 7000 men, which arriued in Juliers about the beguinning of winter; and there and in Luke-land are lodged, and putt in order, againſt this next ſpring: and we heare of ten thouſand more preparing to come out of thoſe parts; for which purpoſe the moneys of Sicily and Naples are deſtined, wheras heretofore the Spaniſh coyne went largely for the ſeruice of thoſe kingdomes.

THE States haue ſent two of theyr aſſemblie, this laſt weeke, in ambaſſage into England, and are preparing the like into France, to demaund ſuccors.

IN France the perſons in gouerment are changed; and in England, les volontez, according to our laſt aduertiſements from thence; which giues the States encouragement for theſe ambaſſages. God ſend them goode iſſue; for much depends (as your lordſhip can very well judge) of the preſeruation of this ſtate.

IT now reſts onely, that I ſhould giue your lordſhip an account of the count de la Tours comming hether out of Hungarie, in companie of one diſpatched to this ſtate from Bethlem Gabor, with a relation of his proceedings hetherto with the emperor; and purpoſes, in caſe all promiſes are not kept with him, which are, to breake againe; as theſe come from him would make us beleiue. And though much is

1623. is not to be built vppon the vnſtablenes of that prince, yet is not the occaſion to be neglected in terms as we ſtand at this preſent. I haue had ſome diſcourſe with the count de la Tour, ſince his comming; and though I had ſubiect enough to eſteeme him, vppon the goode report I had of his merit, and particularly the affection the queen of Bohemia beares him; yet I aſſure your lordſhip, the thanckfull acknowledgment he makes of your lordſhips, and your ladies, fauorable treatment, whileſt he was with you, makes me judge better of him then any thing elſe; for gratitude is a rare qualitie with thoſe of his nation. I expect dayly ſome goode ſubiect out of England, (now owr parlement ſhould, according to appointment, be begun) wherwith to entertaine your lordſhip. So, for the preſent, I kiſſe your ladies hands, and reſt

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionat ſeruant,

To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lorde,

THIS very day I haue receiued one from your lordſhip of the 17. of Nouember, which mentioneth only myne to the laſt of Auguſt; ſince which date, as many 14 dayes as haue paſſed, ſo many your lordſhip ſhould receiue of myne, hauing omitted no poſt to this day; and, butt this, of yours I haue had none, nor from England, of any newes in 4 moneths, in ſo deſpiſed a place I liue; though I haue giuen as much occaſion to procure an anſwere, in my opinion, and as pertinent to the intended treaty at Colne, as the conſequences of peace or warre in Germany can preſent.

FOR the plenty of your lordſhips I thank you: in retorne, I could now better excuſe not writing att all, then my matter; it beeing ſtraunge to vs, that this laſt new moone hath brought forth no great alterations. I thinke I aduiſed your lordſhip of the paſſing the viziers tents into Aſia ſide, and of the ſtrange proclamation and preparation for the warre, ſuch as hath noe example from former tymes; to ſay, That whoſoeuer taketh pay of the grand ſignor as a ſoldiour, in any kind, ſhalbee in readineſs to follow the vizier vpon paine to bee declared rebell, his goods confiſcated, his wife and children ſold for ſlaues. This extremity, cauſed from the letter of Hafis baſſa, generall in the prouince of Babilon, who aſſured that the king of Perſia had beſeeged that citty, and if no ſuccours arriued in 30 dayes, (which tyme is long ſince expired) there was no hope that it could hold out, and conſequently the cuntry loſt. And it is beleeued, (though kept in ſecrett) that allready the Perſian hath taken it; vſing aduantage vpon the diſſentions here, and the rebellions in Aſia, to reuenge the antient quarrells betweene theſe empires. Abaſſa continues his attempts, and hath (as is reported) putt the citty of Angora, where he wintered, to ranſome, not beeing able to force the caſtle; and is marched toward another place of importance, 3 dayes journey thence; ſo that I am perſwaded, the warr muſt goe on, though there haue bene many propoſitions to eaſe it: the grand ſignor, and the wiſeſt of the baſſas, hauing enclyned to buy Abaſſa baſſa, and to ſend him a generall pardon, and graunt of all his demands, vpon condition that hee would preſently march, and turne his army againſt the common enemy, fearing either the doubtfullneſs of a battaile with deſperate men, or to force him to retyre, and ioyne with the Perſian, where hee may bee well receiued. And, as the preſent condition of this ſtate now ſtands, the counſell was good; butt the Janizaries will not conſent, nor hearken to any reconcilement with their profeſſed enemy; butt require to bee ledd out againſt Abaſſa baſſa firſt, and ſo to proceed in the warre; and becauſe their owne aga (brother-in-lawe to the emperour) did not concurre with them in opinion, they mutined againſt him; who wiſely gaue way to the ſtorme, and ſurrendered his charge; to which a page of the court is advanced. To this confuſion are all things here brought; and this difference in opinion where to beginne, I think to bee the cauſe that no more haſt is made; butt now prouiſions, munitions, and all other preparations, are deliuering out to the officers that haue the charge thereof. The merrieſt part of this play I haue written to the queene; which though it bee light matter, yett euen from thence may bee diſcerned the lâcheté of theſe tymes. I perceiue your lordſhips opinion of Bethlem

Gabor, that no mutations here could cauſe a chaunge in him; and becauſe I haue 1623. euer made another prognoſtication, which hath proued, in the concluſion, true, I will render your lordſhip ſome part of the reaſons, which induced mee to that ſuſpition. Your lordſhips contemplation, that politicque motions are not tyed to the lawes of naturall, had more conſequence, if it had bene true, that Gabors firſt riſing had proceeded from the inſtigation of the late vizier (though the meanes of making warre, beeing taken away with the cauſe, muſt haue neceſſitated a weakening of the effect); butt it was not ſo. It was hee that incited and prouoked, not that vizier only, butt another before him, and all ſince, to giue him ayd, which hee had vſe of for his owne ends, and knew hee could take off the other when hee pleaſed. Now, if hee haue any hope to atteyne them, as hee was the firſt mouer, ſo hee hath power to retyre at his owne pleaſure: and that hee had ſoe, though I cannot giue you any one euident and conuincing argument; yett, hauing obſerued all his pretences here to bee driuen to contrary ends, and to haue two faces, and beeing aſſured, that from the beginning hee enterteyned treaties, and many other circumſtances, which, ſingle, were not great, yett, putt together, in my judgment, they amounted to a ſumme ſufficient to make mee conclude, that hee had no other bodies fortune in recommendation butt his owne: beſides, I ſawe no meanes for him to maynteyne a warre, knowing what hee could haue from hence in this diſtracted gouerment. If you aske mee then, Why I was no more reſolute in my opinion? I will ſay truth: I knew the newes would bee vnpleaſing to the place where you reſide; and I would not be the occaſion to miſtruſt him, and giue him cauſe to vnmaske himſelfe; hee might haue done better: neither in matters of that conſequence is it ſafe to bee peremptory in judgment. Now you ſee what hee hath done, and I know hee will ſend you faire apologies; butt lett mee aſſure your lordſhip, hee made a truce when hee had the imperiall army in his power, and gott tyme for himſelfe, and for them, of the Turks, as you may perceiue by a diſcourſe ſent you of the 27. December. Butt ſuppoſe, at laſt, (of which error I ſhall bee gladd) that hee was more ſyncere then I tooke him, and was forced to this pauſe of armes, lett it now appeare in this treaty; lett him there ſtand reſolute to maynteyne and dignify his taking armes for the cauſe of religion and our frends; lett him then demaund the Palatinate, and make no finall peace without ſome good effects, and I will not only recant, but build him a ſtatue, at leaſt in myne owne heart. Butt I feare the worſt; I know hee can expect litle from hence, and that what he demaunded was in his owne knowledge vnpoſſible: therefore I tooke them rather to bee refuges for himſelfe, then really his deſire to haue them accompliſhed. There is yett 6 moneths of the truce; the treaty not begunne: there is yett tyme enough, and if I had order, I would putt him to a fyery tryall, ſhould make his cheekes burne; butt howſoeuer hee may find excuſes in ſome things, hee ſhall haue none, that hee was not putt in mynd, how much it concerned his honor to juſtify his profeſſions.

FROM the count of Torne I haue not lately heard; butt I am perſwaded, in his heart, (if his owne good diſpoſition blynd him not) that hee ſuſpects more then is fitt for him to take notice of. I doe not remember, that your lordſhip euer mentioned any ouerture made by Gabor to that ſtate; butt I remember well, I acquainted you with letters, that hee procured here from the grand ſignor, both to the States and ſome others, which I thought were gotten for oſtentation, and to impreſſe a beleefe of greate matters intended; butt I neuer beleeued they ſhould bee ſent; as beeing in themſelves ridiculous: and it is long ſince hee ymployed ſignior Petendi (now againe diſpatched to the Hage, with reaſons of this reſpitt of armes) to acquaint them with the reſolution of breach, and to procure their aſſiſtance. The like hee did to Venice; and obteyned from them a ſecretary to reſide with him, not many weekes before the taking of the truce, and, I thinke, after his reſolution therein: Quid inde? Was it not ſaid of Tiberius, nullam æquè ex virtutibus ſuis quam diſſimulationem diligebat? Had hee not neede of an artificiall diſguiſe before a cunning audience? I muſt conclude, hee yett may bee made of vſe; butt hee muſt feele, or haue hope, if not of benefitt, yett at leaſt of mayntenance, for fuell to his ſtirring nature, beeing a prince of great parts, vnreſtfull, and borne either for ſome great generall good or evill. Pardon mee, my lord, this fault; I cannott fall vpon this matter without ſome indignation and heat: I am ſorry to ſee good edged ſwords tryed vpon an anuile, where, while their mettall is ſhowed, it is loſt.

1623. I WILL wayt for ſome good effects of the treaty of Germany, which your lordſhip hath promiſed mee; and wiſh there were the ſame intelligence betweene that, and this of Buda, as was betweene Trent and the colledge at Rome; then I would not doubt, beeing moued with one ſpiritt, as their part ſhalbee, of ſome good iſſue.

YOUR lordſhip will now doe mee the fauour to preſent the encloſed to her majeſties handes; it ſhall ſpeake for mee, though it cannot expreſs mee.

I HAUE bene twice a ſuiter to your lordſhip for a young nephew of myne, in the company of my lord generall Vere: I will not preſume on myne owne intereſt; butt hee hath many able frends, that will bee thankfull to your lordſhip, if you will vouchſafe him a countenance; and though I may boldly offer my ſeruice here, where I am out of the way, yett I will as willingly and heartily giue your lordſhip reall demonſtration of my entire affection, as your

February, 1623.

Lordſhips moſt affectionat to ſerue you.

My wife retornes your lordſhip her thanks and well-wiſhes doubled; ſhee deſires, with mee, to bee preſented to your lady, as her humble ſeruants.

From the QUEEN of BOHEMIA.

My Lord,

HAUING ſo good newes to write to you, I muſt giue you, my ſelf, thankes for all your letters, which I pray you to continue; your laſt was of the 13. of December. I ſee all thoſe you write to Sir Dudlie Carleton. Since my deare brothers returne into England, all is changed from being Spaniſh; in which I aſſure you, that Buckingham doth moſt noblie and faithfullie for me; worthie Southamton is much in fauour, and all thoſe that are not Spaniſh. The parliament ſhoulde haue bene vppon the 16. of the laſt month, but by reaſon of the good duke of Richemondes death, who was found dead that morning in his bed. You know how well I loued him, and therefore may eaſilie gueſſe that I am not a little ſorie for his loſſe: the parliament began the 19. of the laſt month. I ſend you the copie of the kings ſpeach, which I know will not afflict you. I leaue all particulars to Sir Dudlie Carltons letters; onelie I will tell you, that one thing giues me much hope of this parliament, becauſe it beganne vpon my deare dead brothers birth-day. I muſt alſo tell you, that my brother doth ſhew ſo much loue to me in all things, as I cannot tell you how much I am glade of it. The good oulde count of Tour is heere, whom I think you haue bewicht; for he cannot ſpeake enough of your kindneſs to him, which I giue you manie thankes for: he is ſtill verie confident of Bethelem Gabor, as you ſhall ſee by my lord ambaſſadours letters. Honeſt Tom, I pray be euer aſſured of my loue, both to you and your wife, to whom I pray commend me; and be confident that I am euer

Superſcribed,
To Sir THOMAS ROE, his Majeſties
Ambaſſadour at Conſtantinople.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very goode Lord,

I ADUERTISED your lordſhip, by the laſt weekes ordinarie, all our occurrents of theſe prouinces; ſince which time here is no alteration; but out of England we haue the newes of the beguinning of the parliament, and as goode a copie as could ſodainly be taken of the kings ſpeach, which the Queen of Bohemia hath commaunded me to ſend your lordſhip, accompanied with her letter here incloſed; by which (I preſume) ſhe doth take knowledge of the receit of yours to her majeſty, which were incloſed in thoſe to me, dated ſolſtit. brumal. for which I render your lordſhip many thancks.

IN the kings ſpeach, your lordſhip will obſerue a goode inclination to the change of affaires; for his majeſty maketh profeſſion, for times paſt, and the future, neuer to haue had, or to haue now, or hereafter, any purpoſe to change our lawes for religion; and without ſuch a change, the catholique king will vndoubtedly haue nothing to doe with vs heretiques. We haue a great loſſe of the duke of Richmont, who died ſodainly of an apoplexie two dayes before the parliament mett; and is much lamented, as a goode patriot, and in a high degree of fauour with the king; which conditions meete ſeldome in a courtier: yet now they concurre in others; for the duke of Buckingham is happie in both; and ſome tares, which the enuious man had ſowed (whilſt others ſlept) betwixt him and my lord chamberlain, are weeded out by my lord of South-hamptons induſtrie: ſo as the upper houſe will, in all apparence, goe right. The lower hath Sir Thomas Crew for ſpeaker; and the knights and burgeſſes are ſayde to be well choſen: yet the firſt day of theyr meeting were going awry in theyr buſines, but were ſett ſtraight by Sir Ed. Coke, who is ſtayde from his employment into Irland. 1623.

MY lord of Kenſington is arriued at Paris, to make as much there (according to report) as is now marring at Madrid: but till my lord of Briſtol be returned, (who is expected this month in England) and heard what he can ſay for himſelf, and the affaires of the court from whence he comes, I can build vppon nothing.

THE count de la Tour and I haue dranke your lordſhips and your ladies health together, who is a man, in all our opinions, of more merit then concurs with his poore condition, in which he appeares amongſt vs. Manſfelt is gon this day towards France. The duke of Brunſwick attends employment here. I euer reſt

To Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

Right Honorable,

WHILE it is vnreſolued heere how to proceed with Abaſſa baſſa, who continueth to ſpoyle, or put to ranſome, Aſya the Leſſe, and cannott bee reconciled for the Janizaryes, nor ſafely attempted for the Spahees, betweene which two orders there is bad intelligence and emulation; the king of Perſia hath conquered the prouinces and citty of Babilon, putt to flight Haſis Achmett baſſa, the generall of the defenſive warre, and taken priſoner Chur. Huſſen baſſa, a renowned old ſoldier; cutt in peeces all that oppoſed him; and (as is freſhly reported) hee hath ſince poſſeſſed Moſul; and deuiding his army, hath ſent part towards Van and * Diarbeck, and the other toward Mecha, as yf hee had hope and deſſigne to ſhare all the Eaſtern part of this empire. Aleppo alſo is threatned by him, and they feare that hee hath an eye vppon it (yf not ſodainly preuented); being very ambitious to haue an outlett into the Mediterranean ſea in his owne power, to uent his ſilkes to beſt advantages. The viziers tents ſtand yett empty; and though daily preparations are made, yett wee ſee noe haſt to ſett forward, nor ſcarſe any ſence, for ſtupid pride, of theſe ſoe great loſſes.

* Meſopotamia.

HEERE is arriued a gentleman from the king of Poland, with complaintes againſt the many incurſions of the Tartars, who, vnder the ſhadow of an ill peace, haue done them more ſpoyle then an open enemy: hee hath brought a playne proteſt, That they will noe longer truſt vnfaithfull promiſes, but reuenge the inſolencyes with armes. Wherevppon new and more ſtrict commaundes are diſpeeded to the Tartar chan, to contayne his people within theyr limitts: but whether they will arriue too late, or how they wilbee obeyd, I cannott iudge.

THE miniſters of Bethlem Gabor make noe more noyſe heere, nor pretend noe more ſuccours; and though the emperors ambaſſador giue out, That his maſter doth refuſe the conditions of the truce, being reinforced with troopes from the Lower Germany; yett, I beleeue, it is but a braue; becauſe, by the quietnes of the agents of Tranſyluania, I collect, that theyr maſter is ſecure, hauing diſmiſſed the moſt of his army. Howeuer, the treaty at Buda deſſigned, is like to proceed; with which (in my poore opinion) it were not inconvenient, that his maieſtyes treaty at Colln had ſome good intelligence, and were guided by one ſpiritt and

1623. counſell: otherwiſe, I feare, that hee will treate on high termes, being almoſt aſſured, on this ſide, of quiett, yf Gabor haue noe other countenance then hee is like to haue from this diſturbed ſtate.

THE piratts are ſoe buſy, and ſoe litle in any obedience to the grand ſignior, that they now ſtopp vp euen his owne port, fill the arches, take ſhippes in his harbours, ſearch his townes for the poore men that flye for ſafety, and force his officers to deliuer them. They haue lately ſurpriſed a great Dutch ſhip laden hither, notwithſtanding theyr peace, one Rocheleer, and 2 or 3 other French and Venetian newly gone from this port; and begun with the poore Candiotts, that bring prouiſion to this citty, which before they neuer moleſted; as yf now they defyed this empire, and would make warre with all the world at once: and yett none heere regards it, but rather reioyce to ſee vs excerciſed and weakened by theeuery, vnder the colour of an vnworthy trade and peace. And though I know of noe particular loſſe lately ſuſtayned by our nation neere this place, yett I tooke good occaſion to renew my complaints againſt them, and to make a new propoſition; as reſoluing noe more to truſt letters and papers, eyther falſely giuen, or without creditt and authority. I hope his maieſtye, nor the lords of his councell, will not blame mee for it: it is long before I can receaue any order, and our dangers are preſſiue and imminent. I would bee glad to bee chidden for haſt, yf, in the end, I may doe any ſeruice: ſomewhatt, I hope, with theſe, is referred to diſcretion; and becauſe the buſines more neerely concerneth the merchants, not to trouble your honour with long diſcourſes, I haue bene bold to referre you to the relation of Mr. Leate, what I haue lately done, and what I intend (not without ſome hope) to proſecute.

THE Dutch merchants are reſolued to giue ouer this trade, though theyr ambaſſador ſhall ſtay for ſtate affayres.

THE French king hath ſent an agent hither with letters; hee is newly arriued, and as yett hath noe audience: as I am informed, hee brings a playne proteſt againſt the cittyes of Algier and Tunes; and a declaration, That ſeing his maſter hath ſoe often complayned without releefe, and forborne to reuenge, for reſpect of the grand ſignior; that hee is now reſolued to arme in theſe ſeas, and to take poſſeſſion of them, ſeing the Turk hath loſt them to his owne vaſſalls, who now are only lords of them. They giue out, That the duke of Guiſe in perſon, as generall, with 40 gallions of his owne, and of the duke of Neuers, and others of this new vnion for this action, and as many gallyes of the kings, being in readines at Marſelles, wilbee abroad by the firſt of May; that they will come directly to the caſtles, and demand iuſtice of the grand ſignior; and being refuſed it, they will ſcoure the ſea, make all the Turkes they meete prizes; and, laſtly, land at Algier or Tunes, and doe theyr endeauour to take or burne them. This is brauely ſayd; yf half bee done, it is ſufficient; and the ſeaſon is very fitt to doe more then threaten. I doubt not, your honour hath all ſortes of adviſe from France; yett, becauſe this is a ſea enterpriſe, and begun in the fartheſt corner, I will not ſaue the labour to enforme what I haue learnt. I haue certayne aduiſe, That there are at Marcelles aboue 20 gallions readye, all the gallyes of Fraunce: That the duke of Neuers ſhipps and ſoldiers are daily expected, with a reſolution to putt to ſea againſt the piratts: That there is noe impediment, but a diſpute betweene the duke of Guiſe and the generall of the gallyes, nephew to the cardinall of Retz, about the command of them; the pretence of the duke, as admirall of the Prouenzall ſeas; the defence of the other, as a charge apart, immediate from the king, as generall of the gallyes in the Leuant: but it is hoped his maieſtyes authority will find ſome meane to compoſe it, rather then it ſhall ſtagger ſoe glorious a worke. And yf this were but a voyage of one yeere, I ſhould haue noe great opinion of the effects: but they ſay, that the proiect was layd by the late conſtable, Monſ. des Deguieres, with the aſſiſtance of many of the nobility, and moſt of the townes of Fraunce, who are ioined, and, as it were, made a company, to maintayne this fleete and force for many yeeres; that it was ſhewed to the French king, his ſubiects had loſt, in 12 yeeres, by the trade of the Leuant, 44000000 of francks or liures, and aboue 2000 ſhipps and barckes, taken by the piratts; in which many men of great quality were intereſſed, as hauing great adventures among the marchants; who making petition to the king for certaine priuiledges, offerd to build and maintayne 40 gallions, and 30 gallies, vppon condition his maieſtye would graunt them 3 helpes and graces toward theyr chardge. The firſt: Whereas euery walled towne or caſtle in that kingdome hath certayne allowances from the crowne reuenue, which they call octroyes, to keepe in reparation their walles, bulwarckes, and ditches; they did deſire, that the king ſhould to euery 7 octroyes add one; to ſay, that that towne which had formerly 7, ſhould haue 8; and that which had 14, 16; and ſoe proportionably. 2dly: That his maieſtye would grant the firſt half yeeres profitt of euery abbey, and other eccleſiaſticall dignity or benefitt in his guift, to this company; that is, ſeing all were in his free guift, that hee ſhould beſtow them, with that condition; which to the receauer is noe great matter. Laſtly: That whereas all inkeepers are allowed by the king, and that thoſe that grew in wealth by the rates of the townes wherein they liued, to exceed 6000 crownes, were ſeldome valued aboue that eſtate, that they ſhould bee free from any taxe aboue that ſomme: which was a ſute once giuen to the count Soiſſons, and recalled, for the vaſtnes. Theſe were referred to a commiſſion to conſider; and, as they report, are graunted and confirmed by the king; a councell choſen, and authorized to manage the ſtock, and direct it. That the marquis of Crequy, in behalf of his father in law, and many others, princes, and lords, and all the townes of France, haue putt in great ſommes of money, as into a bank, to maintayne this authority they profeſſe to take in the Mediterranean ſea. A very good example, yf it may bee well vſed and proſecuted.

THIS makes the French ſoe reſolute and bold in theyr demands heere, while others ſue precariò; yett I feare they will bee deceaued with ſome promiſes. But the ſtate of this empire is now ſuch, that wee might obteyne not only ſome remedye againſt the piratts, without running to theſe charges and extremityes, but any other our reaſonable pretences, yf wee were not heere disioynted among our ſelues: this only hath weakened all our authority and creditt. I haue often ſolicited ſome regulation, and to procure his majeſtyes order: but ſeing I haue noe anſwer, and thereby it ſeemes it is our maſters pleaſure, that wee ſuffer all iniuryes, and liue in enuy among our ſelues, I am content to beare the reſt of my time with patience, yf it pleaſe God I may doe it with ſafetye.

YOUR honour wilbee pleaſed to acquaint his majeſtye with what feruent deſires I doe endeauour his ſeruice; and to ſtand betweene mee and blame, yf all things ſucceed not according to my induſtry and wiſhes; and that you would vouchſafe mee, once in a quarter, a letter from your ſecretary: and yf all I write and informe bee not worth any anſwer, yett for my countenance, and the affection I beare you, as one of Your Honours profeſſed ſeruants, and frend.

Righte Honorable,

FROM Inglande I haue had noe letters this weeke, which makes me that I can ſaie leaſte of that place which I moſte deſired; the whole affaires, I may ſaie, of Chriſtendom, dependinge upon the ſucceſſe of thinges there. The marchantes ſaie, that they haue it in theires, that the parlament goes fairlie forwarde, which giues comforte to all that wiſhe the good of the kingdom; for, I hope, by the meanes of it, wee ſhall keepe out the Troian horſe.

FROM the Lowe Countries I heare, that the States of the Vnited Prouinces haue ſent with all expedition two extraordenarie ambaſſadors to his majeſtie, our ſoueraigne, for ſome preſente aide, fearinge (nowe that counte Mansfelt hathe disbanded his armie, and moſte of them put themſelues into the ſeruice of the emperour and kinge of Spaine, who make extraordenarie prouiſion vpon all ſides for that warre) they ſholde vpon a ſoddaine be ſwallowed vppe, eſpeciallie there beinge noe warre of diuerſion on your ſide.

I DOE not yett heare, that the kinge of France ſtirres in the buſineſſe concerninge thoſe of the reformed religion; I praie God continue him longe in that minde: but leaſte I ſholde enter too farre vpon other mens poſſeſſions, I will nowe come to the place of my proper charge.

THE popes nuntio here, not cominge to his ordenarie audience in the colledge theſe two by-paſte Fridaies, dothe make me thinke, that in his laſte he either had 1623. ſome poſitiue anſwer concerninge the pointe of inquiſition here (mentioned in ſome of my former); or that he hathe not receiued freſhe directions from his maſter, howe he ſhall further proceed in the ſame.

THE cardinal Orſino (who hathe beene here 5 dais conoſciuto ſconoſciuto) is gone yeſterdaie towardes ſome eccleſiaſtical benefice he hathe in Germanie, without viſitinge anie perſon of publique note, but the nuntio; and that, to ſhewe bothe theire greatneſſes, they appointed to meete in a thirde place; to witt, the churche of St. Giouanni et Paolo; where they paſſed a curſarie complemente. And this is all I can ſaie of this place.

FROM Rome I heare, that the pope hathe of late remoued Frederico Sauelli, his liuetenante general, forthe of that charge, and put in the ſame one ſignior Tarquinio Capirozuchie, a noble Roman, who ſhall reſide at Ancona, and haue as abſolute power and commaunde as the ſaid Sauelli had. The reaſons of that chaunge are ſaide to be theſe: That Sauelli beinge an Auſtrian, brother to the cardinal Sauelli, and to the emperours ambaſſador, nowe reſidente in Rome, all adheringe to the Spanniſhe faction; it giuethe the pope (ſtandinge in thoſe termes he dothe, with the whole howſe of Auſtrie) iuſte cauſe not to truſte either forces, or fortes, vnder his commaunde. And, moreouer, the cardinal Suinge (by the mediation of the emperoure to the kinge of Spaine) to haue the biſhopricke of Salerna, in the kingdom of Naples, latlie falen vacante by the death of cardinale Sanſeuerino, which cauſethe a greater ſuſpecte. Sauelli, vpon this, hathe demaunded licence to goe for Flanders into the ſeruice of the kinge of Spaine, which, I thinke, in this ſtate of thinges, wilbe eaſelie graunted, thoughe he be helde generallie as wiſe and valiante as the other: howſoeuer, I thinke, if he had all the cardinal vertues, they wolde not keepe him in that ſeruice. And thus, with the humbleſte remembrance of my ſeruice to your honor, I committ you to the protection of the Almightie, and reſte

Your Honors, alwais to bee commaunded,

I HEARE that Sir Iſaac Wake is choſen extraordenarie ambaſſador for the duke of Sauoy, the Swizers and Grizons; and in ordenarie, for this place; but I cannot tell howe warrantable this newes is. I haue not had one line from Sir Henry Wotton, the laſte ambaſſador, ſince his arriuall in Englande; which makes me ſomwhat wonder.

Another from the ſame.

Righte Honorable,

THE marquis de Lance, extraordenarie ambaſſador from the duke of Sauoy with this ſtate, (beinge ſente for home) tooke his leaue of the colledge, vpon Wedneſday ſennat laſte; and, as I heare, demaundinge for a grace of the prince, the releaſe of a priſoner, which wolde haue yeelded him a rounde ſumme of money, his requeſte was denied him, euen without ballattation, a thing ordenarie in ſuche caſes; which noe doubte will make him leaue this place (where he hathe ſpente muche money for the creditt of his maſter and himſelfe) not with a little diſguſte. And I heare, ſince, (by reaſon of that requeſte) there hathe paſſed in the councell of Pregadi, a ſtricte order not to gratifie either extraordenarie or ordenarie ambaſſador in that kinde; which wilbe an example to all princes, with whome they correſponde, to exerciſe the like.

VPON Tuſdaie ſennat laſte, aboute two howers and a halfe in the nighte, we had here a verie fearfull earthquake, which indured for the ſpace of a quarter of an hower; and, by what I colde obſerue, its motion begunn at the eaſte, mouinge to the oppoſitt pointe in regularitie all that time; howe farre it dilated it ſelfe, or what harme it hath doone, we haue but litle as yett, here onlie plus terroris quam periculi; for I thinke a fewe chimneyes were ſhaken downe, and noe other hurte. It is ſaide that, in a towne of the popes, not far from Ferrara, there be ſome howſes throwne downe, and ſom 36 perſons ſlane: for other harmes ſuſtained thereby, a little more time will make them appeare. And this is all I can ſaie of Venice.

FROM Rome I heare, that theare is a newe order of ſecular preiſts ellected, and called Congregatio de propaganda fide; which (with good prouiſions of money collected from the pope and clergie) ſhalbe ſente abroade to gaine with the ſame, when with theire doctrine they cannott, what ſoules they can amongſte proteſtants or other ſects, to the obedience of the apoſtolique ſea. Nowe the Jeſuits, who wolde ingroſſe all that creditt and meritt to themſelues, haue gone about to croſſe that deſigne: howſoeuer, the pope goes reſolutlie forwarde with it; ſayinge, That they (allwais contemninge ſuperioritie) wold neuer giue anie accounte of their proceedinges to him in that kinde. I praie God there maie be ſett vppe a ſtronge partition wall betwixte Englande and theſe, that we maie not be yett more peſtered with people of that condition.

FROM thence I heare likewiſe, that of late, vpon the common piazas theare, there hathe beene ſold a Paſquinata, ſtamped vpon paper, or painted, tendinge to the diſgrace of the kinge of Bohemia; which beinge obſerued by the Venetian ambaſſador reſidente there, he complained with ſome bitterneſſe to the pope, for ſuffering ſuch an abuſe. Whereupon the ſeller was immediatlie putt in priſon; and, without the aſſiſtance of the emperours, Spaniſh and Bauarias ambaſſadors, to pull him out of the mudd, his fortune wilbe a chaine and an oare.

YOUR lordſhip maie be pleaſed to receiue letters from Englande and the Lowe Countries, recommended to my care, which wee doubte will giue you an accompte of the affairs of thoſe parts. Thus, humblie crauinge leaue for all my boldnes, with the remembrance of my continuall ſeruice, I kiſſe your lordſhips handes, and reſte

Right Honorable,

IN purſuite of my laſt (the coppy encloſed): The French ambaſſador, with the gentleman ſent from the kyng, haue had an audience with the great vizier and mufty, in one day, and deliuered their letters; the ſubſtance of them were, demand of reſtitution of all loſſes by the emir of Tripoly, who lately, in his port, confiſcated a French ſhip, and hangd ſome of the men upon a falſe pretence; and from theſe of Barbarye, with a playne proteſt, in caſe of any delay or refuſall. The gentleman deliuered his meſſage with ſo much feruency and roundnes, requiring a preſent anſwere, that neyther in the buſines, nor in the conſtitution of the tymes, they were prepared to giue yt: only they asked, If the French kyng did declare a warr agaynſt the grand ſignor? To which was replyed, No; but if he would not doe juſtice, nor bee protector of theſe ſeaſe, that they weare reſolued to turne his owne upon all thoſe that had wrongd him. The concluſion for that day was, That they would take order for ſatisfaction, and for the quiet and peace in the future; and deſired ſome few dayes, to conſult and aduiſe with the grand ſignor; and this, with ſo much mildnes, and ſhow of unwillingneſs to begett, nor prouoke, any more enemies, as hath not been the ancient ſtile of theſe men, nor this port. But the ambaſſador was ſcarce out of the doores, befor the vizier brake out to his companay, That thoſe of Algier and Tunes were rayſd by their prophett in theſe later tymes, to protect the Ottoman ſtate; that they only were the true Muſulmen, which made mortall warrs agaynſt the infidells, who els, in theſe tymes of their diſtraction, would attempt their head cytty and empire; that therfore, though ſomwhat was to bee done for the preſent, yet it was more policye to mayntayne, then to ſuffer them to be deſtroyd. Your honor may from hence collect the ſinceritye of theſe miniſters; yet, I muſt confeſe, this opinion is not generall; but only the rancor of a few poyſoned harts, that hate all chriſtians. Ther are many that ſee what deſtruction and deſſolation the piratts doe and will bring upon this ſtate by the ruine of trade, from whence they haue all their mony brought in; and by the daunger of prouoking reuenge. Therfore I am perſwaded ſomewhat wilbe done to reſtrayne them, in ſome meaſure, for a tyme; but not to ſuch effect, as that poore marchants can bee ſecure; only, perhapes, they may prohibitt them (if they will obey) to medle with any on this ſyde Sicely, for their owne ſakes, and turne them

1623. all upon the coaſts of Chriſtendome, where, to us, they wilbe more dangerous. The French will not bee ready for any great attempt this yeare; but will make a round in the ſeaes: by the next ſpring, they conſtantly profeſſe, they wilbe rather in caſe to doe harme, then to threaten yt; which is theyr kyngs owne phraſe. In the meane tyme I follow my owne way, with as earneſt complaynts as the other, and as great words; but purſue my propoſition, that the captaine baſſa may haue order to uiſitt Barbarye this yeare, to realeaſe our captiues, and doe ſome juſtice; of which I haue ſome hope, becaus he knowes that he ſhall open a mine of wealth for himſelfe, by confiſcations, and it will make ſome ſhow of deſire to giue us ſatisfaction; ther is no lett uiſible to me, but feare to encounter the Spaniards, who, I thincke, are agreed to auoyd them. Of this I haue written at lardge to Mr. Leate, with order to make relation to your honor; and though it may ſeeme to bee but a flattering medicine to ſo great a diſeaſe, yet it will ſerue for a tyme, and may proue a quarrell in earneſt betweene themſelus; for I am perſwaded, the cyttyes will not obey.

HERE are come letters from B. G. the contents wherof are kept ſecrett: they ſay, between Caſſouia and Viena, are dayly treatyes, but no concluſion; but by circumſtances wee gather, that he hath ſent to procure new ayds, becauſe it is reported, that the emperour hath refuſed the truce. Wherupon the vizier lately did expoſtulate with the emperors ambaſſador, Whither his maſter ment to keepe the peace with the grand ſignor, or not? And required, That he ſhould not moleſt Bethlem Gabor, neyther in Tranſyluania, nor in thoſe parts of Hungarye in his poſſeſſion, untill all differences might bee decided at the treaty deſſigned. And this was done not in the woonted manner of menacing; but gently, and in the way of frendſhip. To which was replyed, That the emperor had no purpoſe to breake the peace with the port, but to reuenge the injuries and inuaſions of Gabor; to which purpoſe, beeing now in readines, and his forces drawne into the frontire, he would not bee at the chardge of ſo great an army, nor looſe ſo much tyme as to keepe them idle untill September, beeing the expiration of the truce, upon uncertayntye whither then he ſhould fynd them frends or enemies; and therefore, that he would come ſooner to a reſolution one way or other. If the eſtate of the princes affayres bee thus changed, he is well requited for giuing up his aduantage by a double diſſimulation; for he is not like to haue much help from hence, where they haue ſo much neede of all their owne force for their owne defence in Aſya. But, untill I haue tyme to looke better abroad, I dare not affirme any thing of theſe letters, nor of the anſwer of them, which are earneſtly ſollicited: but by the next poſt, I ſhall haue more certaynty. I am ſome tyme in jealouſy, that all this is but a ſhow between them, the better to coulor their intention of peace. The uulgar noyſe is, That he is in feare, and requires the ſuccors of the Tartars, hauing diſguſted the Turks that were with him laſt yeare. Your honor wilbe pleaſed to enforme his majeſtie and the prince; and becauſe this matter is new, I preſume not to write to them untill the next diſpatch; by which tyme wee ſhall ſee a reſolution of the viziers going to the warr, and ſhall diſcouer the ſecrett of this, and what may bee expected of peace or warr in Hungarye, the ſucceſe wherof, in my poore judgement, is of conſequence for his majeſties ſeruice. To the loſſe of Babylon, is by this dayes aduice added another, of the prouinces of Balſara and Leſha, upon the head of the Perſian ſea, and the feare of Van. Abaſſa baſſa will not obey, but ſends woord, he is in the feild; yet I ſee no more haſt, but dayly deferring, the miſterye wherof is too deepe for mee, except they ſee the Janizaries here will not mooue. What els I foreſee, is not ſafe to prognoſticate; but I feare wee are at an end of the Turkiſh trade, by which wee looſe in parcells, and ſhalbe in danger to looſe all; from which God deliuer us. And ſo I committ your honor to the heauenly protection.

Conſt. $\frac{20}{30}$. March,

Your Honors humble frend and ſeruant,

R.

To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

THE hard winter beeing broke vp, vpon which the delay of our letters haue beene layd, I haue receiued two from your lordſhip, of December and January, which mention myne arriued to the 4. October; ſince which date I haue not omitted one poſt, and ſent 10 diſpatches to you. That diligence will ſhow, I had a great zeale that your lordſhip ſhould bee informed of truth, which is aboue all ſeruice; and I haue learnt therby, obſequium amicos. I ſpeake not this to yonr lordſhip; but the matter I haue aduiſed to the Hagh, hath not beene ſo pleaſing as that of others, who deſired to make a noyſe, and perhaps begann to beleeue, like the flye, that they rayſed the duſt with theire buzzing, or at leaſt would make others beleeue ſo; but ther is no ſuch matter, no ſuch thing, no ſuch dreame, as is beleeued in Holland.

YOUR lordſhips bring mee many moſt welcome particulars, which hath reuiued my hopes and ſpiritts to new matters; but I perceaue you will venture nothing with mee that may inſtruct mee, and by your excuſe teach mee to know my owne inabilitye; and I am well content to learne any thing of you.

HERE encloſed I haue ſent your lordſhip a relation of ſuch things as haue paſſed, or are in contemplation here; and I keepe my old way, from which nothing can diuert mee, to write what I conceiue playnly; and if there be any aduice much aboue this, you may bee pleaſed to owe yt the beleefe: yet of this, as it is, great good uſe might bee made for his majeſties ſeruice.

I HAUE beene bold to refer her majeſtie (to whom giue mee leaue to preſent this letter by you) to the relation of your lordſhip for the preſent condition of our affayers. Your lordſhip hath perhaps beene enformed of a peace made with the towne of Algier by mee, if the piratts will hold yt; and that his majeſtie ſent his letters, and a conſull there to reſyde; who hath yet made no full concluſion; but the meſſinger by mee imployed thither, hath aduiſed mee, That the Duch conſull was the only oppoſer, and had much foyled the buſines: and though it concerne mee not to tell the reſt, yet it is reported, that he giueth ſome other inſtructions to thoſe villaynes, to the generall prejudice of the commerce of Chriſtendome. And I haue beene deſired to complayne agaynſt him to his majeſtie, which for ſome reſpects I haue forborne, thincking it ſufficient to enforme your lordſhip; and to deſire you to procure ſome admonition of better comportment to bee ſent vnto him; for any complaynt of a miniſter of Holland, at this tyme, in England, would bee vnſeaſonable, eſpecially in a matter of ſo much ſcandall; and therefore I referr it to your lordſhips diſcretion. And ſo I committ your lordſhip to the holy keeping of our gracious God.

Conſt. 30 April, 1624.

To Sir GEORGE CALVERT: With Advices.

Right Honorable,

YOUR honors of the 7th Nouember is come to my hands the 24. March, the hard winter, as is pretended, hauing at laſt giuen paſſage to ſixe poſts to arriue togither: if myne to your honor haue found the like foule wayes, you wilbe weary of reading them, for they wilbe many. I humbly thanck your honor for the inſtruction you haue giuen Sir Ed. Herbert, who hath written mee, that he hath expoſtulated the pretence with the chancelor and Mr. Bizieuſe, and hath receiued French anſweres, tout plein des complemens; but in that poynt, nothing that will eaſe us here: and now, hauing your honors ſecond aduice, I will obey it without further reply, and lye at my guard. Betweene us, and from the French ambaſſador, hath lately paſſed more outward ſhow of curteſyes then formerly; perhaps he hath had ſome admonition: but it may bee wee ſhall not long bee troubled with that diſpute, all French trade beeing prohibited into the Leuant; and his debt hauing thruſt him into many extreamityes, I feare for his owne, and his maſters honors ſake, he may yett fall into greater diſgraces. To our merchants he hath not payd a penny of his great engagement, beeing reſiſted by the Marſeillans in Aleppo, who haue now no goods left in that ſcale, nor much here.

1624. In the encloſed, I haue related the eſtate of our affayres in this port, both what hath lately paſſed, and what is in preſent contemplation; wherin your honor will ſee how the prince of Tranſyluania is forced to ſeeke now for ayds. It was ſayd of Hanniball, as an error, Victoriâ, quâ uti potuit, frui maluit; but it is now in queſtion, whether he ſhall enioy what he poſſeſſeth in Hungarye, where the emperor makes a great preparation, and ſhall haue great ayds from Poland, if the Swethland warr diuert it not: on the other ſyde, as Bethlem can expect no great ſuccors to attempt from this ſtate; ſoe he ſhall not bee abandoned, but may diſpute his cauſe, eyther by a ſtiffe treatye, or by armes, upon good tearmes. I will no way alter my courſe begun to any ill offices to the houſe of Auſtria, without expreſe direction; but yet your honor will giue mee leaue to intimate, that theſe new motions, wherin Gabor is exaſperated, as hauing loſt and caſt away his benefitt, may bee applyed to his majeſties ſeruice, if he may receiue any encouragement, before he bee driuen to make a finall peace, of which both ſydes wilbe glad, how bigg ſoeuer they ſpeake; and if now it ſhall be a warr, which is not uery unlikely, becauſe the emperor is ſtrong, and knowes the condition of this ſtate, it wilbe more ſharpe, and not ſo eaſely appeaſed as the laſt yeares ſcoreria. It is not fitt for mee to ſay more, but to offer my ſelfe to all obedience and induſtrye, when I ſhall receiue his majeſties commands. To whom I beſeech your honor impart, for my diſchardge, what I now write and ſend, beeing not yet ſupplyed with matter to encouradge mee to intrude under my owne name, which if his majeſtie only remember, it ſufficeth mee. And ſo I committ your honor to the bleſſing of our gracious God.

Advices from Conſtantinople, 3. Aprill, 1624.

On the 24th of the laſt moneth Ali baſſa, the great vizier, was ſent for into the Seraglio; where, beeing queſtioned by the young emperour about the affaires of the Perſian inuaſion, hee was condemned inſtantly to looſe his head; which was executed there, and his body throwne out naked into the ſtreets. The occaſion of his ſodaine death is attributed to his diſſimulation with the grand ſignor in the loſſe of Babilon; which hee denyed, and ſuborned falſe aduice, that there was no ſuch matter, either for ſloth or feare to take upon him the charge of the warre with an army that would not obey in the citty; and to the baſe money which hee had cauſed to be coyned, beeing butt one fift ſiluer, with which hee made a whole payment to the ſoldioury, putting the good dollers in his coffers. Butt the true cauſe was, his owne ſordid couetouſneſſe, who in ſixe moneths had heaped upp an infinite treaſure, by port ſale of all juſtice and offices, which hath weighed him to the ground, and will ſupply much of the preſent wants for the intended warre in Aſia.

To his dignity is aduanced Cerques Machomet baſſa, an antient vizier, and a man of an honeſt and ſincere nature; butt, wee feare, too good for the place and tymes; for wee heare hee laboureth to ſurrender his charge, as unable to ſupport or content the inſolency of the Spahees, in their demands of impoſſible benefitts.

The preparation for the warre of Aſia aduanceth, but no reſolution how ſoon to ſett forward, beeing deferred, partly upon hope that, by the authority of thoſe new miniſters, Abaſſa may bee reduced to obedience, and that great feare and impediment remooued (they haue undertaken to endeauor it; butt I beleeue it will bee very difficult to effect, beeing hee continueth the ſeige of the caſtle of Angora; and now wee heare, that his ſcattered army, that wintered abroad, beginns to retorne to him from all parts; ſo that it may bee doubted, that hee will not truſt his life upon a pardon, and that hee hath ſome greater deſſignes, hauing only trifled out his tyme the winter, to wait the opportunity of this ſommer; and it is freſhly reported, that his men haue done ſome ſpoile about Antiochia, ayded by the ſoldiours of the emir of Sidon, who is not yett free from ſuſpect); partly by want of graſs, to goe into the field, for horſes, which, as ſoone as it is come, I am perſwaded they will beginne to march. In the meane tyme the king of Perſia hath taken Babilon, Moſol, Balſara, Lechſa, on the Perſian ſea, all beghleeks or prouinces; as much cuntry as from this citty to Buda, comprehending all Boſna and Greece. Van is in great danger, beeing not able to reſiſt, and his army marched thither; Mecha threatened; and, if ſome ſpeedy remedy bee not taken by theſe new officers to ſtay the courſe of his proſperity, (on which depend all hopes) a great part of Aſia wilbe 1624.

ſeparated from this empire; and they will aduance this yeare ſo late, that they cannot bee able to oppoſe the enemy; butt either winter in Aleppo, if they reſolue for Babilon, or in Arzrum, if for a diuerſion in Perſia, to bee in a readineſs, and neare, by the next ſpring.

WHEN the great viziere ſhall goe into the warre, Georgi Machomet baſſa is declared chimacham; a wiſe man, that beſt knowes the eſtate of this empire, and howe to apply fitt remedyes, beeing newly riſen from diſgrace; whoſe aduancement commeth opportunely for the affaires of the prince of Tranſiluania, whoſe only and antient frend and protector hee is and wilbee; from him wee expect better dayes.

THE emperour for Hungary maketh great preparation, to the report of fifty thowſand men; to whoſe ayd, as it is ſaid, are arriued, under a Rageuile, fifteene thowſand Poles and Coſſacques: his ambaſſador here pretends no deſire of breach with the grand ſignior, butt openly diſauoweth the truce at Goding; and that his maſter will make warre upon Bethlem Gabor, unleſs hee may haue all the places in Hungary in his poſſeſſion reſtored; deſyring only a newtrality from this port, according to the ancient treaty.

FORESEEING this ſtorme, the prince of Tranſiluania hath ſent hither to require ayds, and particularly for Shachin Ghiray han, brother to the preſent Tartar han, with twelue thowſand of the nation. This prince hath bene long retyred into Perſia, upon the diſgrace of his brother, who beeing now aduanced to his right, had obteyned licence of the Perſian to retorne to his cuntry: but it is reported, that the Perſian, fearing hee had too much practize in his dominions, hath cauſed him to bee ſlayne on the way, knowing him to bee the beſt ſouldiour of the race; ſo it is yett uncerteyne what ſuccours ſhalbee ordered from thence; it beeing thought, that if hee bee aliue, hee wilbee moſt neceſſary to ſerue the grand ſignior, by making an inuaſion into Perſia; and they here are loath to leaue the border of Polland unarmed, or to doe any thing openly, that may make a breach with the empire, for which they are unfitt. Butt they will not abandon Gabor, if any attempt made upon him, both in reaſon of ſtate, and becauſe his frends are now againe in creditt; and therfore hee is promiſſed both ayds from the Tartars, and hath obteyned commands to the baſſas of Boſſina, Buda, Canila, Angria, and Temizuar, to bee in readineſs with all their frontier gariſon, to defend and aſſiſt him in any motion of the emperour, or elſe not to ſtirre. This ayd can bee of no great conſequence for attempt, becauſe the generall ſouldioury of Greece are called to the Aſian warre: butt it will giue him countenance enough to make a good peace for himſelfe, and his frends; or, if hee muſt haue warre, they will ſtrengthen him to a ſtout oppoſition: to whoſe ayds alſo is come the lord Farensback, lately a priſoner here, with 5000 Poles and Coſſacks, ſo that hee may treate well armed.

IN the meane tyme commiſſioners paſſe between Vienna and Caſſouia, and many treaties, wherein the prince carrieth himſelfe very humbly; butt there is nothing yett concluded: it will now reſt in the choice of the emperour, Gabor hauing loſt his opportunity. Butt my opinion enclynes to beleeue, that it will rather proue a warre, becauſe the emperour is armed, unleſſe that the prince of Tranſiluania will ſurrender much, with which hee wilbee loath to part, and the Turks more loath to ſee any encreaſe of power on that ſide; and Gabor might bee eaſily encouraged, becauſe hee finds himſelfe, deceiuing, deceiued.

Right Honorable,

YOUR lordſhip maie pleaſe to vnderſtande, that yeſterdaie, beinge the $\frac{3}{13}$. of April, I haue receiued your honorable lines of the $\frac{7}{17}$. of Februarie; wherein I finde your charitable cenſure, that mine had made noe better haſte. It is moſte true, that the winter hathe beene vniverſallie harde; but the ſeaſon of the yeare nowe aduancinge it ſelfe, we maie preſume of a ſpeedier intercourſe. My letters for theſe partes (when I haue either time or argument to write of) I preſentlie ſende to Mr. Symes; becauſe I wolde not lett them lie in an office for that purpoſe in the palace, waitinge for an vncertaine diſpatche of the ſtate for that place; and likewiſe

1624. wiſe, that vnder the merchants couer all thinges paſſe moſte ſuer, and without ſuſpecte: which courſe I take for all other places.

Your honor hathe giuen the prince of Tranſiluania his due character; for if his actions had anſwered the expectation of moſte men, (while the battell at Prage was vpon lowſinge) he mighte with eaſe haue had the emperour upon his knees at Vienna. Concerninge the conditions of peace at the preſent betweene the emperour and him, I knowe nothinge of certaintie: but I did, in my letters for Englande at the ſame time, preſſe that point ſoe harde, that I thinke it cannott yett be forgotten. And your lordſhip maie be well aſſured, that this ſtate will lett noe opportunitie ſlippe in that kinde, ſupportinge themſelues alwais as muche by pollicie as ſtrengthe.

The monimente (whereof I haue made mention in ſome of my former lines) which this republick had giuen order ſholde be erected in memorie of the deceaſed fra. Paolo (as my ſelfe hathe beene an eye-wittneſſe) was almoſte broughte to perfection; but nowe of late, vpon newe reuewe, I finde it at a full ſtoppe: whereby I perceiue there be ſome freſhe threatninges from Rome; or they are contente to let his memorie die with himſelfe: which I thinke it will hardlie doe, hauinge lefte moniments behinde him ære perenniora, which euen time, the deuowrer of all thinges, will not eaſelie obliterate.

Concerninge the duke of Vrbins eſtate, (of which I haue likewiſe made mention) I heare that the pope and the duke of Tuſcanie were once come to this agreement (buyinge and ſellinge the ſame in that dukes lifetime) that for 900000 ducates the duke of Tuſcanie wold releaſe his claime to anie parte or parcell of the ſame; prouided that, till the money were paide, he mighte haue ſome of the principale fortes thereof for caution: but the pope beinge vnwillinge to yeeld anie other ſecuritie then the apoſtolike chamber, this contracte is quite broken off, and bothe of them begin to ſtande vpon theire garde. Nowe other neighboringe princes, who wolde be lothe to ſee this eſtate added to either of theires, (by waie of diuerſion) leaſte they ſhold ſwell to a formidable greatneſſe, perſwade a matche betweene the popes nephewe and the widdowe of the deceaſed prince; in which coniuncture this diſunion is moſte like to determine: and vnleſſe this flame breake out into ſome fier, the armes of Italie maie growe ruſtie.

Your honor maie be pleaſed to receiue herewith all the letters of two weekes from Englande, which bothe came to my handes upon Thurſdaie laſte; from whence, bleſſed be the greate God of heauen, that guidethe them! that all thinges goe well there, and that nowe we begin to diſtinguiſhe better of colours: ſoe that I hope, thoſe that wold ſwallowe vs vppe by theire ſubtill proceedinges, ſhall, in the ende, concocte nothinge but theire owne diſgraces. Your lordſhip maie receiue another letter, which, I thinke, comethe from the Lowe Countries, but broughte to my handes by a porter without anie recommendation. Thus, leſte I ſholde giue your lordſhip too muche trouble, with humble thankes for your lordſhips fauours, I haue noe more to ſaie, but that I will alwais remaine

I heare Sir Iſaac Wake is to departe within fewe weekes from England for this place.

To Mr. Secretary Calvert.

Right Honorable,

THIS day the baggage and victuallers are paſſed the water for the Aſian army: the great vizier hath order to paſſe within tenne daies, and in tenne more to beginne his march. They haue pretended this delay, vpon want of graſſe; which while it hath growen, the Perſian hath ſtollen away, rather then conquered, beeing without reſiſtance; the prouince of Diarbeck, the antient Meſopotamia, whereof the head citty, Hamitt, makes ſome preparation for defence, beeing commanded by a valiant baſſa: butt it is feared the next newes will bring the ſurrender; the reſt is allready yielded, Nisbin and Merden beeing taken, which are in thoſe parts of moſt importance. It is reported, that hee tranſplants the people; and wee know not where hee hath limitted his ambition; beeing hee will haue this ſommer at leiſure, before the grand ſigniors army can encounter him. By his courſe, it ſeemes, he purpoſeth firſt to ſeparate the Arabiacs, and all to the Eaſt of the Perſian ſea, from this empire; for, beginning at Babilon and Balſara, hee goeth right northward toward Darbent on the Caſpian ſea, and wilbe poſſeſſed of more cuntry then hath bene gotten in many yeares. I dare not mention yt.

WITHIN fewe dayes wee ſhalbee reſolued what the deſſignes of Abaſſa baſſa haue bene, who yett continues his rebellion; and though newe meanes is made to reconcile him, it is doubted hee will not truſt: his army encreaſeth daily; ſo that, it ſeemes, hee trifled out the winter with greater thoughts in his head then Angora. Butt this miſtery is too deepe for mee; hee lyes in the way of the grand ſigniors army; the Janizaries will not conſent to his pardon, nor the Spahees to fight with him. Wee know not whoſe enemy hee is, nor whoſe frend; butt now it will be tryed. If hee abide the comming of the great vizier, ſome ſtrange ſtratageme, or a cruel battaile, will ſucceed it: vpon the concluſion with him, will depend much of the ſafety of this empire.

THIS day arriued letters from the prince of Tranſiluania; and within 4, his ambaſſador is expected: they report, That there is litle hope of peace by treaty; the emperor beeing ſtrong, and demaunding the reſtitution of all Hungary; to which the grand ſignior will neuer conſent, nor Gabor willingly ſurrender. They haue procured order for all the frontire garriſons, which may ſend abroad betweene 15 and 20000, vnder 5 beglerbeghs, and are promiſed 15000 Tartars; vpon which ayd hee doth moſt depend, in occaſion of any inuaſion: butt it is thought that hee may faile of theſe; becauſe, for certeyne, there are in readineſs 40000 Coſſacks to fall in ſomwhere, and, it is moſt probable, to reuenge the incurſions made vpon them. Butt the grand ſignior will interpoſe all his authority to appeaſe them, by reſtrayning the Tartars, and commanding them to hold the peace with Poland, if his letters come not too late, beeing reſolued to maynteyne Bethlem with all the power they can ſpare; and therefore hee is encouraged ſo farre, as hee will not eaſily quitt his hold. I know they both would now bee gladd of peace, if their differences were not ſo greate, and almoſt impoſſible to reconcile; the one exaſperated with loſſes; the other, with contempt and ſcorne: and I haue heard, that ſome miniſters of Gabor haue motioned to the French to bee a meanes of pacification; butt it wilbe very difficult to make any, that ſhall content both parts and this ſtate, who hath the greateſt intereſt: and now there is a murmur, that the emperours ambaſſador here ſhalbee ſtaid as an hoſtage; which is an ill ſigne, and a practice vſuall when they haue no good meaning: butt to make any inuaſion, they are vtterly vnable. This affaire then depends now vpon the emperor, who deſires only a neutrality from the grand ſignior, which will not bee admitted; and it is very like to breake out into a ſharp warre, wherein Gabor will make good ſhift, eſpecially if he haue any other countenance from Germany.

I DOUBT nott your honor is weary of theſe themes; butt wee haue no other variety, butt in theſe very much. The laſt poſt I preſumed to write to his highnes. If there bee any thing in this, that is worthy addition to the former, your honor will doe mee the fauour to acquaint his majeſtie, and his highneſs; for whom I will pray, though I can doe them no ſeruice: and ſo I committ your honor to the holy protection of our moſt gratious God.

Conſtantinople,
$\frac{18}{28}$. April, 1624.

Your Honors moſt humble and affectionat ſeruant.

I HAD forgotten to acquaint your honor, that Sir Edward Herbert hath ſent vnto mee a letter from the French King, earneſtly commanding his ambaſſador to pay our nation his debt; which I could not omitt to acknowledge for him.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

SINCE this laſt winter warre, which coſt little bloudſhed, though poore peſants payd dearely for it, (of which I gaue your lordſhip a large account) wee have had a dead tyme in theſe parts. Now affaires ſpring vp with the ſeaſon, the ennemy being drawing together at Goch in Cleueland, and Weſel, whether forrage and

The ennemyes firſt exploict, by reaſon of their chiefe rendez-vous at Goch, is thought, wilbe eyther vpon Rhees or Genep; in one of which are 2000 men, and the other 900; and both places well provided and fortifyed, ſave onely that Rhees is ſomwhat damnifyed towards the river by the late inundations.

There hapned an encounter the 7th of this preſent, neare Weſel, betwixt a convoy of 52 Spaniards led by a captayne of that nation, and 58 of two partyes conioyned of Rhees and Emmerick; wherin the Spaniards were all ſlayne, except the captayne, (who ſaved himſelf in a bote over the Lip) and three ſoldiers, and amongſt them one Alferes in office, and two reformados. On this ſide 7 were onely ſlayne, (amongſt which was a ſergeant, who commaunded the reſt) and 10 or 12 hurt; which were brought well of, notwithſtanding three troopes of horſe of Weſel, and 200 foote, which had them in purſuite.

Here is arriued a ſea captayne of this province of Holland, (Dorp, who ſtands to ſucceede Vbdam in place of vice-admiral) in good ſtate both for ſhip and men, with the loſſe of 3 onely, and 14 or 15 hurt, though he were aſſayled and boorded about ten dayes ſince by 5 Oſtenders and Dunkerkers on the coaſt of France, about Rochell; from whence he convoyed 30 ſayle of wyne marchants, who all left him in fight to trye his fortune; and one of them, a rich ſhip of Amſterdam, admirall of the reſt, was taken, after Dorp had quitt himſelf, and caryed away into Biſcay. This Dorp tranſported count Mansfelt into England (as he touched at Bullen in his returne); who, when he landed at Douer in the long bote of the man of warre, deſired he might not be ſaluted by artillerye, till he might have tyme to be on horſeback, and ſett forward on his iorney; but when his followers came after him in another ſmall ſhip, he was content to have the honor done him: which ſheweth, he apprehended the like entertaynement he mett with in France, to be ſtopped at the port.

Wee have here the count of Groisbeck, ambaſſador extraordinary from the elector of Collen, about better obſervance of neutrality in Liegeland; who being a man of quality, and much practice in negotiation, it is here believed, (and advertiſed from Bruxells, that Peckius was with him lately at Lovain, and that he gave him commiſſion to make ſome overture for renewing of the truce) he hath ſome more important treaty in charge: but as yet he hath made no ſuch matter appeare; for, having ſeene his propoſitions and papers to the States, I can pick nothing out of them to ſuch purpoſe; yet in privat diſcourſe he caryeth himſelf ſuſpitiouſly. Which being knowne to the States, and the miſchiefe which may follow both at home and abroade, in ſlackening contributions and ſuccours, they haſten his diſpatch with ſome reaſonable contentment in his pretended buſines, though not all he deſires.

Here is arrived from Bruxells one Peltz, an active fellow on that ſide, employed about exchange of priſoners, which is finally accorded betwixt the infanta and the States; here being on this ſide about 25 or 26 ſett downe in a liſt by the infanta, all priſoners of warre, except Vphouen the prior of Antwerp, and two Jeſuits, which are caſt into the reckoning: and on the other about 130, taken by the ſhipps of Dunkerke, and thoſe other ports of Flanders: and though the number be vnequall, they begin here to thincke they are over-reacht in the exchange; becauſe, in the infantas liſt, many of the priſoners have the title of dons; and thoſe which are priſoners in Flanders, are moſt of them, yf not all, ſhippers or fiſhers. But methinckes they have here no reaſon to complayne, becauſe fiſhers and ſhippers are the dons of this ſtate; and I am glad, that, by this meanes, the old prior of Antwerp ſhall enioy his liberty; who, by the commandement I receaved heretofore from his maieſty, may acknowledge obligation to his maieſty for his lyfe.

THE duke of Nuburgh, having bene a good ſpace at Duſſeldorp, where he aſſembled the States of thoſe countreyes of Juliers, Cleues, Berck, and Marckland, and fruictleſly indeauoured to engage them in a defenſiue warre againſt this ſtate, doth now pretend a new buſines, to deuide or contract with Brandenburgh, and remove all ſtrangers out of thoſe countreyes; to which effect, he makes it be vnderſtood here, That the count of Swartzenburgh, Brandenburghs chiefe counſellour, ſhould be about this tyme with him at Duſſeldorp, with ample commiſſion (of which he ſheweth a copie) to treate and conclude all things betwixt them. But they will reckon without their hoſts, vnles they have the conſent both of the Spaniſh ſide and this, which is no eaſy matter to be obtayned.

THE king of Poland hath had much diſpute with his ſubiects, in a parliament he hath lately held at Warſouia, in which a yeares truce is concluded with the king of Swede; and therby it is likely a rupture betwixt Swede and Denmarke may be prevented: for Denmarke was thought to be laying hold on that diverſion of Poland, for ſome deſſigne vpon Swede, for which he had (as our laſt newes beare) 3000 foote and 1000 horſe in readynes; but now he may be more eaſily perſuaded to peace, and to employ his ſtrength to better purpoſe.

OF a purpoſe in England, to ſend Sir Robert Anſtrudder to the king of Denmarke, and the princes in thoſe parts, your lordſhip will haue heard; the delay of whoſe diſpatch proceedes of more irreſolution, then agreeth with ſuch declarations as haue bin made both by his majeſty, and the parlement; of which (though I doubt not but your lordſhip will haue them from other hands) herewith I ſend you copies.

AT the date of my laſt letters out of England, which were of the 11th of this preſent, the States ambaſſadors had not then any commiſſioners appointed to treat with them; yet preparation of 12 of his maieſties ſhips went forward, with order to ioyne as many marchants vnto them as ſhould make 50 ſayle: and a queſtion is putt hether, vnder-hand, to the States, Whether, for the queene of Bohemias ſeruice, they can be content to ioyne 20 ſhips to our fleete? To which a goode anſweare is made; and here they will be forward enough in any goode action: but I finde we are ſtill in danger to be led on with other hopes; for which the Spaniard makes preparation, in drawing the deliberation of the buſines of the Palatinat from Vienna to Madrid; and yf that be once obtained, your lordſhip may eaſely iudge what a bayte that will be to ketch vs with, who haue been nibbling all this while at a bare hooke. And when all is done, no more can be promiſed of treaties of Madrid for the Palatinat, then hath bin for the Valtolina; the reſtitution wherof was abſolutely promiſed ſome yeares ſince, but as far from effectuation as the firſt day, vnleſſe it be vppon new and hard conditions: but we muſt attend the euents.

I AM now to render your lordſhip hartie thanckes for your many letters, of which the laſt are of the 21. February. The queene of Bohemia hath the peruſal of them all; and though ſhe doth not often take knowledge therof, cave putes that ſhe doth ether neglect you or them: and doe not entertaine any jealoſies; for I aſſure your lordſhip, I know none, of whoſe affection and habilitie ſhe is better perſwaded, nor none who hath better part in her fauour, then your ſelf; and of this ſhe hath commaunded me to aſſure you. For the change and variation of affaires which paſſe our hands ether for managing, or aduertiſing, we neede not much trouble our ſelfs with the conceit therof. And therfore, if ether you or I fayle in our iudgments of Gabor, lett us not giue ouer ayming at his ends; which, I concurre with you, are all guided by priuat intereſt, notwithſtanding his publique pretences; but that hath great part in the publique; and I haue written into England more then once to the ſame effect I perceaue you haue done, to make vſe of that occaſion: but the neglect therof I impute, with many other matters of like nature, to irreſolution, which cannot longer laſt with vs. Thus, I kiſſe your ladies hands, and committ you both to Gods bleſſed protection.

Hagh, this 26. of Aprill, 1624.

DUDLEY CARLETON.

Advices from Conſtantinople, $\frac{1}{11}$ May, 1624.

THE diſpatch of the vizier and the army for Aſia, is ſtill delayed, and litle ſpeech when they ſhall depart: in the meane tyme the Perſian preuaileth, without any oppoſition of conſequence. What the internall cauſe of this ſlowneſs is, I cannot diſcouer, though I am ſure there is ſome that muſt ſhortly diſcouer itſelfe: all that outwardly appeares is a ſuſpition, and complaynt from the Black-ſea; the citty of Caffa hauing ſent their mufti, and other commiſſioners, to enforme the grand ſignor, that 400 boats of Coſſacques are abroad, that they haue done great ſpoiles on the coaſt of Tartaria, and of this empire, and taken many ſhipps laden with prouiſion for the port; and 40000 more armed and horſed, ready for ſome land attempt, which hath putt all thoſe parts into great feare, of which they haue deſired that preſent care and prouiſion might bee taken and ordered for their defence. Whereupon there hath bene held a new councell, and Ibrahim baſſa diſpatcht with 13 gallies, to make guard vntill more ayds can be ſent. And it is now in conſultation, that the capten baſſa and the whole fleete ſhall follow them; wherby the Mediterran and iſlands will bee expoſed to danger; but I think they are here more ſecure of the Spaniards, then of any enemy. And for prevention of incurſions by land, it is alſo ordered, That Biram baſſa, now brother-in-lawe to the grand ſignor, ſhall ſpeedily bee ſent as generall of the frontire beghs of Valachia vpon the Danuby, and to keepe his reſidence at Raſgratta or Ozu. Hee will depart within ſix dayes; but, as I heare, hee refuſeth to haue any Janizaries, or others of theſe orders; butt rather will take and write newe, whom they call ſegmen, or hyred ſoldiours, and of theſe not aboue 3000; with power to command all the garriſons, and to raiſe the cuntry in any occaſion; butt withall they ſend newe commands, and letters into Tartaria and Poland, to quiett all thoſe motions, if they can. To which end there is ſpeech of a ſecrett and ſodaine change of the Tartar han, and to ſend back Jean Geray, the laſt yeare depoſed.

THE emperours ambaſſador hath obteyned and taken his leaue, but not yett departed; hee was feaſted and veſted with extraordinary honor, almoſt to flattery; inſomuch, as the manner, ſo vnuſuall in this court, makes vs collect a great deſire of peace and ſatisfaction on that part, from whence they are not free of the feare of an inuaſion; it beeing aduiſed from the frontire, that the emperour hath afoot 40000 ſoldiours; and the beghs of Greece haue made petition, that theirs may not be ſent into Aſia, butt left for the defence of the cuntry; which hath bene refuſed them, with promiſe of other care and prouiſion.

THE expected ambaſſadors of the prince of Tranſiluania are arriued five dayes paſt, butt as yett haue no audience from the vizier; neither doe wee know their meſſage; but coniecture by many circumſtances, that firſt they haue inſtruction to excuſe the laſt truce, and to giue account of the treaty now in hand at Vienna and Newheüſel; wherein, it ſeemes, they haue ſo litle hope, becauſe the emperours demands are reſtitution of all, that their principall arrant is to ſollicitt ſpeedy order for ayds; wherein they ſhall receiue all ſatisfaction, command beeing giuen before their arriuall, for the 5 beghs and garriſons of Hungary, with a promiſe of Tartars; butt I am perſwaded (vppon very good ground) that this ſtate will doe nothing to breake with the emperour, butt only in the defenſiue; and that they and Gabor both, foreſeeing how doubtfull the ſuccours of the Tartars are, by reaſon of the preſent arming of the Coſſacks, and how vnfitt it is to prouoke newe enemyes, they will take any reaſonable conditions of peace, rather then the hazard of an vnſeaſonable warre. Wherein, hauing endeauoured to diſcouer their reſolution, I finde, that they inſiſt vpon the league and truce they haue with the emperour, and vrge it to his miniſters, that they may not bee forced to a breach by the defence of Bethlem, and they are no great diſſemblers in ſuch occaſions; butt if the emperour reſolue to attempt any thing in Hungary or Tranſiluania, by armes, they will leaue all Aſia to the vttmoſt of hazard, and turne both their care and force for the mayntenance of him and their poſſeſſions in Chriſtendome. Theſe vncertentyes and diſtractions are part of the cauſes of the delay to diſpatch their army againſt the Perſian. Beeing, as it were, round beſieged with open enemyes, jealouſies and feares from ſuſpected frends.

From Mr. BRANTHWAITE, Agent at Venice.

Righte Honorable,

THIS prince and ſignorie wente the laſte weeke to vewe theire arſinal, rather (I thinke) pro forma, then anie greate need they haue, at the preſent, to drawe out what is theare; the pointes of theire heuieſte enimies ſwordes beinge tourned another waie.

CERTAINE Turkes of late, vpon the Dalmatian ſide, for ſome affronte (as they did pretend) offered them by the ſubiects of this ſtate about Zara, entred into ſome of the territories bellonginge to the ſame, where (for reuenge) they begunne to robbe and ſpoile at their pleaſure. Nowe the poteſtà, or officer of this ſtate, for that place, vpon the hearinge, ſente out armed Italians, who beate them back, killed ſome ten, and wounded manie of the reſte: which impetuous courſe, I perſwade my ſelfe, they wolde not haue taken, vnleſſe they ſawe the Ottoman empire in that diſorder and declination it nowe is, beinge in ſuche caſes, heretofore, wont to complaine at that port.

IT is here confidentlie reported, that the buſineſs betweene the pope and duke of Tuskanie, aboute the eſtate of Vrbine, is alredie compoſed; the duke beinge contente, at lengthe, to receiue the popes money, and releaſe all claime to the ſame, there wantinge nowe nothinge els but inſtruments to confirme the bargaine; which will quenche the fier that was allreadie kindled in that parte of Italie.

AFTER the archbiſhoppe of Spalato his retourne from Englande to Rome, and his peace made by the Spaniſhe theare; I heare he was commaunded by the pope and inquiſition, to write and publiſhe a recantation of thoſe bookes he put forthe at his firſt reuoult, againſte the authoritie of the churche of Rome; but more eſpeciallie to cuer that greate wounde he had giuen the pope, by callinge him monſtrous heade of the ſame. Which palinodia he was content to ſinge, but ſoe perfunctorilie, as, vpon peruſal, it gaue pregnant occaſion of newe miſtruſte: inſomuche that the pope and inquiſition gaue order to the cardinal Cleſel (his auncient friend and acquaintance) to aduertiſe him in ſome ſharpe maner of this his faintneſſe. Which the cardinal did, but in ſuche a manner, that the buſhope anſwered him, (thinkeinge he had rather come as a friend to aduiſe, then from authoritie to check) That he neither wold, nor colde, write anie more in that behalfe; addinge withall, That he neither had that meanes nor reſpect he looked for in that place; with other circomſtances of diſcontent. Which anſwer the cardinal (rather ſtriuinge to gaine the creditt of a ſtrict negotiator, then a mittigator of his friendes offence) did relate with ſuch diſadvantage to the buſhoppe, that vpon Thurſdaie fortnight he was ſente for by the pope and inquiſition; and after ſome howers of examination, was committed priſoner to caſtel Sant Angelo; where it is thought he ſhall ſpende the reſte of his daies in muche miſerie, or ſhortlie be putt to deathe abroade with greate reproche: howſoeuer, I thinke the matter be not greate; for he that is of one religion in his youthe, and of another in his midle age, will be of none before he dies.

THERE is nothinge doone as yett concerninge the Valtalina; onlie the Frenche kinge, who is heade of the collegati for that buſineſs, hathe ſente a gentleman to the duke of Savoy, and another hether, thoughe he be not yett comme, to knowe howe the count Mansfelte ſhalbe diſpoſed of, who is nowe in France, and was drawne thither to be general for that leage.

YOUR lordſhip maie pleaſe to receiue ſuche letters as my brother hathe recommended to my care. And thus, with the remembrance of my humble ſeruice to your honor, I kiſſe your handes, and reſt

Another from the ſame Hand.

Right Honorable,

SINCE the writinge of my laſte, I can finde nothinge worthie of your knowledge of this place; therefor your lordſhip maie pleaſe to vnderſtande, that I heare from Rome, howe that cardinal Bandino, heade of the congregation de propaganda fide, and the rector of the Jeſuites colledge theare, (beinge charged to relate weekely vnto the pope, what they heare concerninge the affaires of Englande) haue in theire laſte audience importuned his holineſſe to write a preſſinge letter to the Frenche kinge, That when he comethe to conditions with his majeſtie of Greate Britan, in anie treatie of a matche betweene the prince his highnes, and the ſiſter of that kinge, he wolde ſtriue to make the couenaunts as aduantagious as he colde, for the libertie of the Roman catholikes in Englande; which letter they haue obtained at the popes handes, but not without this cenſure laide vpon them; that it is rather ſome Spaniſhe practice, to make a diuerſion of that treatie, then for anie good they meane the catholiques; for they are bothe of them wholie adheringe to that faction. And thus you ſee what plotts are laide, to worke vpon the good natures of that kingdome. And thus, with my dailie prayers to the Almightie, to conſerue it in libertie and happineſſe, and your lordſhip in all healthe and content, I reſt nowe, and alwais,

Venice, this $\frac{15}{25}$. of Maie, 1624.

Your Honors moſte humble ſeruaunte,

MIC. BRANTHWAITE.

YOUR lordſhip maie be pleaſed to receiue the letters of 2 weekes, which I receiued by the laſte.

To the QUEEN of BOHEMIA.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

HOW to expreſs my joy in receiuing your Majeſties fauour, but as a man reuiued from famine and dearth, I know not: if your Majeſtie find by my later letters any trouble or feare in mee, you muſt alſo diſcouer a care and zeale to preſerue my ſelfe in your gracious opinion; and therfore you wilbe pleaſed to pardone the effects of infinite deuotion. Now I am not only content, but proud, and can forgiue any malice againſt mee, ſeeing it hath not beene able to hurt mee; reſiſted by your goodnes, I can alſo deſpiſe yt.

SEEING your Majeſtie doth take knowledge, that you read all my diſcourſes to my lord ambaſſador, which are directed to him with that intention, that continued principally for your ſeruice; I will preſume now alſo to referre your Majeſtie to one, that wayts upon this, encloſed to him. In the matters that moſt concerne your Majeſtie, which are the hopes of the prince of Tranſyluania, I haue written the truth as neare as coniecture can come, where I am none of the councell. Your Majeſtie muſt not exactly examine euerye particular, butt collect a generall concluſion out of all; which is, That yett ther may bee a warr, becauſe the emperor treates high, and Gabor is exaſperated; but the aſſurance eyther to beginn yt, or to mayntеyne yt, muſt not only depend upon ſuccors from this ſtate, who, if they haue will, muſt giue way to occaſion, beeing not able to doe much. Therfore, as I know that nothing can now bee of more aduantage to your Majeſtie, then a diuerſion on this ſyde, ſo I haue often intimated to your Majeſtie, and to England, that if you relye upon yt, you muſt doe ſomwhat to foſter yt: I am perſwaded, a ſmall encouragement from ſome chriſtian prince woulde confirme him. And your Majeſtie may pleaſe to remember what I once mooued, That he might bee taken into the proteſtant vnion of Germanye. I honor him for his many excellent parts; yett I will preſume ſo far to judge him, that his motions and affections are principally directed upon his owne aduancement or ſaftye. He is ſeated betweene two oppoſite great ſtates, and muſt encline to one of them, if he haue no other ſupport: to this, is ſcandalous, and, I thinke, he is weary of yt. I ſee upon what loathed conditions he depends, the refuges of neceſſitye. To the other, is not ſecure for him, and to Germanye dangerous: therfore both were to bee preuented. Seeing it is euident, that in all his wayes he hath only ſought out ſome on whom to relye, it were a good councell, to reconcile and take him home among thoſe of his owne religion, which promiſeth moſt fayth. Hath he not lately ſought a wife in the howſe of Auſtria? and then he would thinke himſelfe ſafe in the alliance. That beeing refuſed, Hath he not ſought to marrye the kingdome of Hungarie, and ſo to ſhelter himſelfe under the wings of the grand ſignor? but he hath found that a yoake, rather then a crowne. Ther is then a third way in which he hath not gone, becauſe it was neuer opened to him. It is not fitt for mee to direct yt; his majeſtie of Bohemia muſt take it into conſideration: I may hurt him by good councell; if I haue ſtriken fire, another muſt kyndle the light, that hath mor direction and abilitye.

I AM ouerjoyed with the newes of the happy vnion of the parlament, and moſt humbly thancke your Majeſtie for the kyngs ſpeech. Meethinckes, therin I diſcouer the ſecrett armyes that were ſhowed by prayer to the ſeruant of Eliſha. I beſeech Almighty God direct them to the end, and infuſe into their hearts ſuch a concord and temper, that they may depend upon their head, his majeſtie; that he may bee inabled to requite thoſe deceipts openly, that haue been practiſed in corners; to repayre the honor of his highneſs the prince; to recouer your Majeſties eſtates, and to augment them; and to protect the true religion, trampled upon by a double tyranny.

I AM exceeding glad of the ſafe arriuall of the noble count of Tour to his only deſires, which were to offer his ſeruice once more to your Majeſties. I haue acknowledged to him his fauor, to continew me in his remembrance: what I could doe to him here, was much ſhort eyther of his meritt, or my affection; to accept that only, is more then recompence. Whoſoeuer profeſſeth ſeruice to your Majeſtie, is my maſter: I am then ſo much your Majeſties deuoted, that if you expreſs good of mee, you muſt vouchſafe to command mee; by a naturall negligence the beſt growes out of uſe. If eyther the kyng of Bohemia, or your Majeſtie, thincke mee worthy of any fauour, I aske no other credence then the willing fruicts of my obedience. Vnder your Majeſties protection, I preſume to kyſs the kyngs hands, and to make this proteſtation, You may haue many mor able, but not one more faythfull, then

Yours.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

BEFORE I could ſeale this paper, at the inſtant of diſpach, (and therfore your Majeſtie will pardon theiſe fragments, and diſordered writings) the new ambaſſadors of the prince of Tranſiluania came to viſitt mee. I endeauored to enforme my ſelfe fully from them of their affayres, and the reſolution of their maſter; and, to that end, told them ſomwhat of our preſent diſcourſes in England. I found their anſwers uery ſober and diſcreet, but not ſo warme as in former tymes. They confeſſed they found no inclination in this ſtate to an open breach with the emperour, nor that they much depended or affected ſuch dangerous ſuccours. They complayned, that ſince the diſaſter at Prague, their maſter had ſuſteyned the burthen of the warr alone, and oppoſed himſelfe ſingly agaynſt the enemye, upon many hopes and promiſes from Holland, and other parts, and upon expectation of the ſuccor of the duke of Brunſwicke; that the laſt yeare, he had geuen ſufficient teſtimony of his affection to the common cauſe; but that he had no helpe, not ſo much as an ambaſſador, or a letter, from any of his allyes: therfor, that he was enforced to gayne tyme to make a truce, which the emperor would now retrench and diſallow; that the peace was referred to a treaty at Buda; yett ther was tyme enough; to ſhow his ſinceritye to all his confederats, he had ſent ambaſſadors: if he ſawe any reſolution, actiuely, to giue him helpe, and to runne one fortune with him, he would juſtifye himſelfe to the world, and neuer make peace without them; but if he were left alone, he muſt giue way to neceſſitye. So your Majeſtie will conclude, that all hopes from that prince depend upon Chriſtendome, and after the reſolution of the princes of the vnion he doth only hearken, and according will direct his owne; and upon theſe doth he excuſe himſelfe in this port, and fynds an eaſy retrayct from his former profeſſion.

WHAT ſeruice I may doe them within my limitts, (which are not yett enlardged) your Majeſtie will not doubt of, becauſe they uſe your powerfull name; and beeing able to doe no more, I will pray for your Majeſties eternall felicitye.

To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON: With Advices.

My very good Lorde,

TWO of your lordſhips letters arriuing at once, the former without date, but not much elder then the laſt of the $\frac{1}{11}$th March, haue brought mee a new heart; hauing by them receiued, not only an aſſurance of her majeſties juſtice, to make a right conſtruction of myne, butt of her fauour from her owne hand; the long expectation whereof did vehemently torture mee, and I could not forbeare to expreſſe my jealouſy, in a thing ſo deare to mee as the loſſe of her good opinion; and I had alſo ſome cauſe, knowing how auerſe from myne, and from truth, for other ends, ſome other mans aduiſes from this place had bene. I attribute much of this right to your lordſhips loue, and to the good count of Tour, who knew here my wayes and thoughts in her ſeruice, and could diſcerne betweene ſyncerity and flattery. Now I am not only ſatisfied but ouerioyed, and therby emboldened to continue my old and direct way of writing my playne opinion, which in the encloſed I haue done at large, relating many circumſtances for euidences thereof. And becauſe I collect from your lordſhips letter, that you haue yett ſome hope of the prince of Tranſiluania, by the commiſſion giuen to the count of Tour, and their negotiation, what it is, I know not; butt I well know, here is no deſire to bee engaged in a warre, nor no meanes. What other meanes or encouragement Bethlem Gabor may haue, is aboue my reach; and if you build any thing upon him, hee muſt haue ſome countenance from that ſide, (I dare not name which) to aſſure him in his reſolutions; which now, I think, are enclyned to warre with leſſe meanes out of indignation; and ſmall matters in tyme would confirme him. That part of Hungary in his obedience is waſted, and can giue him litle helpe; his treaſure is exhauſted, and hee is now gone into Tranſiluania, to putt that cuntry vpon the rack for mony, that at leaſt hee may treat armed, and in the field. I will not auow euery particular in my diſcourſe ſent you; butt in moſt things I am not farr wide of the generall truth. It is not ſafe for mee to confeſſe how gladd I ſhould bee, that hee might ſerue her majeſtie; butt it is leſſe ſafe to be confident on vnſtable things. I doubt not, the count of Tour, in his owne ſyncerity, that knowes not the iniquity of a double heart, doth beleeue or hope for more (then I doe) from him; butt I haue thought fitt to reſerue a ſecrett for your lordſhip concerning him, which, I beſeech you, keepe, vntill you may vſe it for his good; nor would I write it to him, leaſt it might diuert him, where, perhapps, it is not true: I was aduiſed from a good hand, and a neutrall, rather a well-wiſher to the prince then the other ſide, that when he treated at Ghoding with the marqueſs de Monte Negro, and made many profeſſions of his deſire to ſerue, and bee reconciled to the emperour, ſo hee might bee receiued into grace, with reſeruation of his owne intereſts; the marqueſs replyed, Among many yll ſignes to the contrary, there was one that ſtuck much in the mynd of his maſter; which was, the keeping of the count of Tour ſo neare about him, the only cauſe, as he ſaid, of all the miſeries of Bohemia and Germany: that therefore, if hee deſired the emperour ſhould beleeue his profeſſions in greater matters, that hee ſhould giue him that teſtimony in a ſmall one, to diſmiſs him. Which, my authour ſaith, hee promiſed; and ſo found out this honorable way of an imployment into Holland, or to viſitt the king of Bohemia, not out of offence or diſlike to the count, butt to giue ſatiſfaction for the tyme, and during the treaty; which might not bee ill done, if it had bene clearely reuealed. If it may auaile him, in your lordſhips judgment, to know it, you may vſe your diſcretion, either to tell him, or to conceale it. I thank your lordſhip for the good newes of the parliament. I haue heard their noble reſolution, ſuper totam materiam; I ſhould bee more gladd to heare his majeſties declared, ſuper unicam materiam. I beſeech God continue among them the ſpiritt of vnion and temper, that they looſe not ſubſtances, and reall liberties, for ſhadowes and ſeeming; that the church of God may bee defended; her majeſtie, and her children, reſtored to honor; and his majeſtie, our lord, as much feared of falſe frends, as hee is beloued of true. And ſo I end; fiat, fiat. Amen.

Advices

Advices from Conſtantinople, 15. May, 1624.

ABASSA baſſa, the ſuppoſed rebell of Aſia, hauing collected his army together, is ſodainly riſen from Angora, and departed eaſtward, hauing done no ſpoile to the citty nor inhabitants, butt leauing behind him a better fame then any gouernour ſent from this port. It is giuen out in this court, that hee hath accepted the grand ſignors pardon, and, in obedience to his command, is directly marched towards Diarbecker, to vnite himſelf with Hafis Achmett baſſa, for the defence of that cuntry, who only hath made ſome head againſt the Perſian: butt his courſe is yett vncerteyne, and his fidelity by many ſuſpected. Whatſoeuer his reſolution bee, his departure hath done ſo much ſeruice to this ſtate, that hereby the Janizaries and Spahees are accorded, and encouraged to goe to the warre, who before could not bee drawne out, ſuſpecting one another, and fearing him more then the Perſian; ſome ſpeculatiue men ſtill continuing of opinion, that whatſoeuer hee hath done was by order from the ſtate againſt the Janizaries; butt that nowe, ſeeing they could not bee enticed ouer the water, to bee betrayed into his hands, nor hee aduance hither with the ſafety of the citty, to which they were all retired, and that a common enemy preuailed vpon this occaſion, the grand ſignor is forced both to conceale and chaunge his purpoſe, and to make other vſe of his ſeruice. This hath much coherence with the modeſty of his actions: butt I am perſwaded, though hee did firſt riſe at the command and for the deſſigne of ſultan Oſman, yett, that hee had other thoughts in his head, which haue miſcarried by delay; and that hee is departed in ſhowe of ſubmiſſion, if not againſt the Perſian, yett at leaſt to his owne gouerment of Arzerum; which hee will hold, and perhapps bee a looker on, and attend the ſucceſs of this great preparation and warre betweene the other; which, if hee doe no more, is a great good fortune to this ſtate, and doth exceedingly reuiue their hopes: for it is euident, if hee had ſtaid in the way, either the ſoldiours would neuer haue gone out, or bene ſubiect to daily mutinies and diſſentions, by reaſon of their factions. Butt now the great vizier, treaſurer, aga of the Janizaries, and all the officers and army, are paſſed to Scutary, and muſtered the 10th of this moneth, beeing ordeyned to march the 20th; which wee expect with great longing, though as yett they behaue themſelues ſoberly, and make ſhowe of reformation, and obedience to lawes. They ſpeake of 30000 Janizaries, and 40000 Spahees; butt I think the halfe is nearer the truth, many beeing gone before, and order giuen for the rendeuous, to make the army compleate about Burſia.

FROM the Perſian there is no more newes, but a report twice ſeconded, That he is dead. If it bee true, there is then a retorne of proſperity ſhyning vpon this ſtate, almoſt out of breath, and deſperate. But ſuch a rumour hauing bene an vſuall policy of that king, hoping thereby to ſlacken the haſt now made againſt him, it obteynes no creditt here, butt rather quickens them; for they ſay hee hath bene often dead, butt ſtill reuiues to ſome greater miſchiefe. It is thought, that the vizier will march directly toward Perſia by the way of Tauris, rather to make a diuerſion, then to fight with the enemy, or to recouer their owne. Howeuer, hee cannot doe much this yeare, vnleſs the other retire vpon the noiſe. Biram baſſa is departed generall of the frontire of Poland and Bugdania, with 4000 ſoldiours, and order to drawe together and command all the beghs and garriſons, and to raiſe newe forces on that quarter, in preuention of ſome attempt feared from the Coſſacks, who are in armes vpon the border 40000, and haue putt all into diſtraction.

TO the 13 gallies ſent to make guard in the Black-ſea, are added 10 more; who firſt tranſport Jean Gheray han, to reeſtabliſh him prince of the Tartars, and to depoſe Mehmett, aduanced the laſt yeare. This reſolution was carried very ſecrettly, and though there was ſome whiſper, yett hee was not declared vntill the day hee kiſs'd the grand ſignors veſt, tooke his leaue, mounted his gally, and departed. The cauſe of this ſodaine mutation is pretended, that Mehmet is accuſed by the Poles to haue broken the peace, and ſo they would pacify the Coſſacks vpon better hopes. Butt the truth is, hee is ſuſpected, becauſe hee hath excuſed to ſend ayd to the Aſian warre, beeing thereto required, as fearing the entry of the Coſſacks into his cuntry; and the rather, becauſe his brother Shachin Gheray, who fledd 12 yeares ſince to the Perſian, beeing in diſgrace with ſultan Achmatt, is nowe retorned into Tartaria, 1624. at this inſtant, when the Perſian doth inuade theſe dominions, as if there were ſome confederacy betweene them: and both theſe brethren are braue ſoldiours; and therefore it is feared, that a dangerous reuolt or warre may breake out in theſe parts; for if Mehemett bee not ſodainly ſurpriſed, it is thought he will defend himſelfe, and his poſſeſſion. When theſe gallies haue done their ſeruice to the newe prince, they are appointed to ioyne with the others, and to diſcharge Ibrahim baſſa, one Huzein baſſa, a vizier of the bench, beeing now ſent to that command; Biram baſſa hauing likewiſe orders to haue an eye vpon the Tartars, aſwell as on the Poles. Att the firſt departure of the firſt gallies, aſſoone as they came into the Black-ſea, they mett with a ſmall Carmiſall; who reporting, that only 40 boats of the Coſſacks were before them, the Janizaries mutined, and forced the generall to retire into the channell, and demand more ſtrength; who was checked, and ſupplyed with more men, and ſo proceeded.

THE capten baſſa prepares for the Mediterran, with fewe gallyes from the port, to bee ſupplyed from the iſlands; and if attall hee bee able to looke abroad, which is doubted, becauſe the Leuents and rowers, that are furniſhed yearly from Aſia, by reaſon of the troubles, as yett appeare not, hee will not goe farre; and rather for cuſtome, then action.

THE miniſters of the prince of Tranſiluania make no great noiſe. It is thought the grand ſignor will continue and conclude the peace with the emperour, for himſelfe and Gabor, if it may bee obteyned with any reaſonable condition. In this particular, I haue endeauored to diſcouer truth on all ſides, and to compare their words with their actions, and both with that litle I haue receiued from Vienna and Hungary. George Mehmett baſſa, the new chimacham, who is the patron here of Bethlem, and knowes (if any knowe) his ſecret purpoſes, one that would make no ſcruple to confeſſe to mee, if they intended a warre, did proteſt and ſweare, this ſtate was yett vnreſolued: that they had peace with the emperour, and would not beginne the breach: that the reſolution depended vpon the emperour, and his actions: that they could not refuſe to maynteyne the prince in all his rights, that had relation to this empire, butt in no other quarrell. This language is newe and vnuſuall in that man, who is a declared enemy to the houſe of Auſtria, and euer, heretofore, made equall claimes to Hungary, and to tribute from Auſtria.

WHEN the emperors ambaſſador had his leaue, and dined in a publique diuan with the viziers, hee beganne the diſcourſe purpoſely, and told them how ſtill it was rumoured, that the grand ſignor would grant newe aydes to Gabor. To which they all, with one conſent, did ſweare by their lawe, and the life of their ſultan, that it was falſe; that they reſolued peace and amity with his maſter; that they did diſauowe the actions of Bethlem the laſt yeare; that they would ſend commands to him to retyre into Tranſiluania, and to conteyne himſelfe in his limitts, and to giue no occaſion of ſcandall, or breach of the antient league between theſe empires; which if hee did not obey, they would abandon him. The mufti ſpake the ſame dialect, and a litle more ſharply, euen to threates; and now hee is preparing to depart full of ſatisfaction, and confident that Gabor muſt ſurrender all that he holds in Hungary; butt howe, and in what manner, is referred to the treaty at Buda, where the baron Altheim is to meet him in behalfe of the emperour, and where Mehmett baſſa, who is an imperiall pentioner, will haue the greateſt authority.

THE treſorer here, inſtead of conſenting to any ayds, hath ſharply demanded the 5 yeares tribute behinde for Tranſiluania, of the princes ambaſſadors lately arriued; who pleading for their maſter the many good ſeruices done to this ſtate, and the great expence of his warre, had only this reply: What ſeruice, what benefitt, what village giuen vs? You haue waſted the grand ſignors treaſure in your owne quarrell, and muſt repay it. Many ſuch encounters they haue mett ſince their comming hither, which makes them not ſo freſh and forward, as in former tymes.

FROM Vienna it is reported and confeſſed, That the ambaſſadors of the prince haue aduanced nothing, nor obteyned an audience of the emperour, but referred to commiſſioners; the demands and offers beeing ſo farre diſtant, that there is litle hope of agreement, vnleſſe Gabor yield. Hee hath required the quiet enioying of all that is in his poſſeſſion in Hungary, to bee gouernour during his life, to keepe the title of elect king, and the honor to haue a daughter of the emperour. Vpon which conditions hee hath profeſſed to liue and retire vnder ſhelter and obedience

IT appeares then, that this empire is enuironed with many enemyes, and more feares: they ſeldome or neuer willingly haue had two great actions in hand at once; yett in this extreamity they haue ſett out 3 armies; one vnder Biram baſſa, for caution, vpon the frontire of Poland and Tartaria; another to the Black-ſea, to make guard againſt the inuaſion of the Coſſacks; a third, and the greateſt, for the oppoſition of the Perſian: and they prepare for two more, one for the Mediterran, the other for Gabor, if hee bee oppreſſed, beſides that ſent with Cigala the laſt yeare, and that with Hafis baſſa in Diarbecker, and Elias baſſa in Natolia; the one hauing attended the Perſian, the other Abaſſa baſſa: and now the city lookes as much diſpeopled, as if it had endured a 3 yeares plague.

THE piratts of Algier and Tunes haue caſt off all obedience to this empire, not only vpon the ſea, where they are maſters, butt preſuming to doe many inſolencyes euen vpon the land, and in the beſt ports of the grand ſignor. They beganne at Rhodes, where the caſtle ſhott at them: ſince, a fleete of 6 corſaires of Tunes mett with a Flemmiſh ſhipp, called the Moone, laden at Alexandretta; with whom, notwithſtanding their peace, they fought, and fired her, not ſauing any thing, butt ſome of the men, whom they made ſlaues: and after comming into the port of Salines at Ciprus, they found twoe Flemmings and two Venetians, able to fight with twoe ſuch fleets. Aſſoone as they came into the roade, they claymed peace of the Flemmings; proteſting, that if they would aſſiſt their enemies, the breach was on their parts, who thereupon vnworthily promiſed a neutrality: then they ſett vpon the Venetians. The captens went aſhore, to craue protection of the caſtle in the grand ſignors port; for which the begh demanded 50000 dollers, or elſe take their fortune; ſo they were expoſed to their owne defence. And the piratts beginning with the ſmaller ſhipp, ſhee made a good reſiſtance; butt hauing no help, ſhee was thrice fired, and at laſt burnt to the water. The capten of the Dolphin, the greater ſhipp, not ſhooting a ſhott, with his men ſtole aſhore, and fired her; beeing a veſſell of 800 tunnes, and armed with 48 peeces of braſſe; the ladings of theſe valued at 300000 dollers, of which the villaines ſaued nothing; and in all euills it was a bleſſing, that ſuch a ſhipp fell not into their hands, ſeeing the cowards were not able to keepe ſuch a fort. From thence they ſailed to Scanderone, where finding another Flemming and a Polacra, they ſurpriſed both, and then prepared to land. The aga of the ſcale, and all the inhabitants, fledd, and they ſacked the towne, and robbed all the warehouſes: nott herewith content, they ſett it on fire, ſo that nothing remaynes, butt ſtone walls, that would not burne, The greateſt loſſe to ſtraungers fell vppon the Dutch and Engliſh; wee about 10000 dollers, they 30000; and ſo they raigned in the port 8 dayes, and departed. An inſolence inſufferable, if this ſtate haue any ſenſe of honor or proffitt; for there is now no ſcale of the grand ſignors ſecure, and all trade muſt bee giuen ouer, if no preſent courſe for a full redreſſe.

From Mr. Secretary CALUERT.

My Lord,

I WRITT vnto you the viith of November laſt, That I had, according to your deſire, procured directions from his majeſty to Sir Edward Herbert, his ambaſſadour in France, for negotiating ſome accommodation in that point of difference betwixt you and the French ambaſſadour in that port, touching the precedence of your maſters; wherein, whatſoever hath been informed out of France, his majeſty, nor his miniſters heere in this court, did never yeild one tittle, ſince I had the honour to ſerve his majeſty in this place that I doe, nor no intimation given of any directions to be ſent vnto you for any ſuch purpoſe. It is true, (as I then advertiſed) that Sir Edward Herbert could not, by any diligence uſed in France, obtayne any reſolution therein, or order to their ambaſſadour at Conſtantinople, for conforming himſelfe to thoſe faire wayes which your lordſhipp had propounded for the common good of both nations, without preiudice to the honour of their princes, or deciding the queſtion. And therefore, his majeſty being herewith made acquainted, I writt vnto your lordſhipp, in that letter of November, That you ſhould doe well to avoyd all occaſion of conteſtation as much as might be, and to keepe his majeſties honour entire, though it were with ſome inconvenience another way; wherein, it was conceiued, they had their parts as well as you. And this I mention againe, becauſe I doubt, by ſome letters which I have received from you, that that diſpatch of November had miſcarryed; which I hope I ſhall vnderſtand now particularly, when you write next.

I DOE well remember, that when your lordſhipp was firſt ſent from hence vpon that imployment, you had it, among other inſtructions from his majeſty, to doe the beſt offices you could, in his majeſties name, vnto the affaires of the emperour, and the howſe of Auſtria; which his majeſty then hoped would haue been requited againe by the like good offices on their part towards him and his children. But the ſcene is cleane altered ſince that time; and the delayes which his highnes found in Spaine, and the vniuſt advantages taken by the emperour, and the reſt of his party, by colour of the late treatyes, to ſeize vpon the whole inheritance of his majeſties grandchildren, hath cauſed ſo ſharpe a reſentment, as, by adviſe of the parliament, his majeſty hath diſſolved actually all treatyes either for the match with Spaine, or for the Pallatinate; and is reſolved to recover that loſt patrimony by ſuch other meanes as God ſhall afford him. In which reſpect, your lordſhipp ſhall vnderſtand, That his majeſty thincks it now fitt you doe your endeavour, as much as you may, to keepe Bethlem Gabor in heart, by thoſe courteſies which you find in your power to doe him in that court, and to ſtirre vp his freinds to aſſiſt him; for that it concernes his majeſties ſervice to weaken the emperors party in whatſoever he may, with whom, in all likelyhood, he is to haue a warre.

THE parliament hath towards this warre, and for the defence of his majeſties kingdomes, given him, at this ſeſſion, three ſubſidyes, and three fifteenes, to be all payd within a yeare; and wee are now within a fewe dayes of our parting for this time, having many good bills ready for paſſage; and done one other greate example of juſtice vpon my lord treaſorer, the earle of Midleſex, who for oppreſſions, bribes, and extortions, is removed from both his places of treaſorer, and maſter of the wardes, impriſoned in the Tower, fined at fifty thowſand pownds, diſabled for ever bearing office in the commonwealth, and baniſhed for ever comming within the verge of the court: his ſtaffe and his ſeales were fetched from him yeſterday, and not yet diſpoſed of. For all other ordinary occurrents of this place, I muſt referre your lordſhipp to your other freinds, from whome, I ſuppoſe, you doe weekely receive them.

I HAUE yeſterday acquainted my lords at the boord with your laſt diſpatch of the vith of March; and with that likewiſe which you writt vnto the merchants, concerning your proteſt againſt the townes of Algier and Tunis. My lords expect, that the merchants ſhould attend them; and then they will take it into further conſideration, what directions is to be given you vpon it. In the meane time, I commend you to Gods holy protection, and reſt

Extract of a Letter to Sir GEORGE CALVERT. Conſtant. 31. Maij, 1624.

Right Honorable,

I RECEIVED a letter from his maieſtie, the 10th of this moneth, ſent to the grand ſignior, the contents whereof are my direction what I ſhould doe; the which I haue not yett deliuered, becauſe the diſpeed of the army would have deferred and cooled the anſwere, which I will ſollicitt. Therefore, I beſeech you, excuſe mee to his maieſtie, that I preſume not to write vnto him, vntill I can giue him ſome account of my ſeruice therein, which I hope ſpeedily to doe, to his ſatisfaction.

BY the laſt, I ſent your honor a relation of the preſent affaires: to which I can make no other addition, then that this day, after long expectation, the greate vizier and army for Aſia beginne to march. Abaſſa baſſa hath made many halts on the way, inſomuch as hee is ſuſpected of the Janizaries, that hee ſtayes for them; and at beſt, is feared that hee only will retorne to Arzerum, and keepe it. The Perſians death is no more ſpoken of; it is rather doubted hee will bee found aliue ſodainly neare Aleppo. The emir of Sidon threatens once more Damaſcus and Jeruſalem. The newe Tartar han, mentioned in my laſt, ſent to remoue Mehmett Gheray, in poſſeſſion, is againe recalled; who hauing, it ſeemes, ſome intelligence of the others comming, hath made ſhowe of reſiſtance; and this ſtate will not venture him into open rebellion, fearing hee may, by his brother, haue ſome correſpondence with the Perſian: which is not vnlike; the inuaſion of the one, and the liberty and retorne of the other, concurring.

THOUGH, I think, any aduiſe I can giue from hence, of the affaires of the prince of Tranſiluania, either comes too late, or is not reguarded in England; yett I will not neglect my duty to enforme, praying your honor to acquaint his maieſtie, and the prince.

HOWE hee made his truce, and hath begunne to treat peace in Hungary, and at the ſame tyme practized ſuccours from hence, and what hee is like to obteyne, my former diſcourſes haue mentioned. Since the arriuall of his newe ambaſſadors, they haue viſited mee, and deliuered mee a letter from their maſter, not in vſuall termes of recommendation of any of his affaires, butt barely of curteſy, and of credence to his miniſters. I haue kept my old ſtile with them, hauing no other order; but withall, endeauoured myſelfe to diſcouer the truth of their negotiation, and their princes reſolution. I haue found their language changed, and conſonant to the anſwere giuen mee by the vizier here. They informe, That the emperour ſeeks the warre vpon him, and will accept of no conditions, butt that hee retire out of Hungary, and confine himſelfe within the limitts of the riuer Tibiſcus; whereby hee muſt looſe Caſſouia, and allmoſt all his poſſeſſions in that kingdome: which hee wilbee loath to doe, and this empire more loath to conſent vnto; yett they can giue him no great aſſiſtance, butt will endeauor the beſt compoſition by the treaty of Buda. They excuſe him of the laſt truce at Ghoding, vpon the failing of many promiſſes made them from the Dutch ambaſſador, and the ouerthrowe of the duke of Brunſwick, whom he expected in Sileſia. They ſay, That ſince the diſgrace of Prague, hee hath ſupported the whole burthen of the warre, vndertaken for the quiett of Germany alone: That his allyes haue not only not performed ayds, butt not ſo much as ſent him a letter, or a meſſenger: That therefore it is wiſedome for him to ſecure himſelfe. And theſe excuſes paſſe well here, becauſe they fitt the tymes, and haue much ſhowe of reaſon in other parts, where outward things are only known. Butt herewith they profeſſe to this ſtate, That the prince will want ſuccours, which they ſollicitt for his defence; and ſhall haue all that can bee ſpared from the frontire, if there bee no accord. And in other places hee offereth himſelfe ſtill to continue the warre, vpon condition, that his allies, who expect eaſe from him, doe actually declare themſelues, and runne one courſe with him: that then he will neuer make a finall peace, vntill he can giue it to all Germany. And I am of opinion, though this ſeeking of ſubterfuges argue ſome alteration, that hee is more diſpoſed to a warre then euer, beeing exaſperated by diſdaine, if his meanes concurre. ——

[The Remainder of this Letter is omitted, being the ſame with part of that to the Queen of Bohemia. See before, p. 231.]

From Mr. BRANTHWAITE.

Right Honorable,

THE emperour, together with the Spaniſhe, who are relata, haue of late, as I heare from Rome, (vpon purpoſe to incommodat this ſtate) delte with the pope to ſerue Stiria, Carinthia, Tirol, parte of Dalmatia, and Slauonia, with ſalte, of which he hathe ſtore within his dominions; tellinge him, That he maie, ex jure, tranſporte it ouer the Adriatick without payinge anie tole or cuſtome for the ſame, and that it will yeelde him 60000 ſcudi per annum; which proiect the pope is reſolued to goe forwarde with, notwithſtandinge this republicque dothe chalenge to be abſolute lordes of the ſame: wherevpon, there is like to growe ſome temporal as well as ſpiritual diſcontents betweene him and them. Howſoeuer, this ſtate, becauſe it dothe not onelie touche theire priviledge, butt alſo their profitt, (vſualie ſeruinge thoſe parts with the ſame commoditie) will, noe doubt, diſpute theire right with his holines, as they haue formerly doone, euen in pointes of ſpiritual iuriſdiction. But nothinge is as yett putt in execution; thoughe a little more time will, peraduenture, diſcouer all. And this is all I can for the preſent afforde you; for the times are wonderfull barren of occurrents here, all action beinge drawne vnto the other ſide of the Alpes.

BY my laſte letters out of Englande, which came in the companie of theſe I ſende your honor herewithall, I vnderſtande, that Sir Iſaac Wake, lord ambaſſador for this place, had taken his leaue of his majeſtie, and was readie to ſett forwarde of his iorney; ſoe that I thinke it cannott be longe before he ariue here, nor before I take my jorney thitherwarde. And thus, with the humbleſte remembrance of my ſeruice to your honor, I committe you to the tuition of the Almightie, and reſte

Right Honorable,

THE French ambaſſador in ordenarie with this republique went the laſte weeke to Rome, as he himſelfe gaue out, for ſome priuate devotion; but the worlde conceiues it is to aſſiſte Monſ. Betunes, ſent ambaſſador thether from the Frenche kinge about that importaunte buſineſſe of the Valtelina; wherein the kinge of Spaine hathe made himſelfe ſoe ſtronge at Rome, that it is thought he will ſerue himſelfe of that paſſage, (ſtil pretendinge he wolde vſe it for the defence of the catholique cauſe) to releeue himſelfe with ſuche forces as he can raiſe in Italie for this ſommers warre on the other ſide. It is ſaide the collegati make greate broglio againſte him; and, verie liklie, what they cannott doe by treatie, (becauſe, in ſuche proceedinges, his golde preuailes) they will trie what maie be doone by the ſworde.

THE cardinal Scaglia, ſomtimes commiſſarie of the inquiſition at Rome, hauinge had authoritie to examine and ſearche the papers of the late impriſoned archbuſhoppe of Spalato, founde he hathe plotted to transferr himſelfe into Greece, to auoide the popes importunitie, who ſtil laboured him to write a recantation to thoſe bookes he putt forthe (at his reuoult) againſte the authoritie of the churche of Rome: and it is thought, if not for that plot, he had beene at libertie before this. Howſoever, in this durance, they vſe him with faire termes, til they maie drawe ſomthinge from him to repaire the greate breache he hathe made in that churche. I cannott learne he yett conſentethe to write anie more; ſoe that it maie be (contrarie to all expectation) he will, in the ende, proue a martyre.

FOR Vltramontane occurrents, theſe which accompanie, maie be, will afforde you all, or the moſte parte; onlie giue me leaue to tell your honor, That here it goes current, that the matche betwixt Englande and France is concluded: but of that I wilbe ſparinge, hopinge the next occation will afforde you more. And thus, with the beſte remembrance of my ſeruice to your honor, I humblie take my leaue, and remaine

To Mr. Secretary CALVERT: With Advices.

Right Honorable,

THE encloſed conteynes all our variety ſince my laſt; butt this day hath ſhowed how the troubles of Tartary doe affect this ſtate: for the grand ſignior reſoluing to maynteyne his authority, and to ſettle the newe prince, orders and diſpatches are ſending to all the beghs vpon the Danuby, and to the princes of Moldauia and Wallachia, to riſe with all their force to his aſſiſtance, who is yet much the weaker, and, in a kind, beſeeged; the capten baſſa commanded to bee ready within two dayes for the Black-ſea, to ſuccour him from thence, ſo that the Mediterran wilbee left open. Vpon this aduantage, Kopiſpolsky, one of the late priſoners here, and nowe generall of the Poles, is ſaid to haue entered Tartaria; which will doe no good, but rather part the fray, and bring them to agreement.

I RECEIUED a letter from the king of Poland, by his new-arriued nuntio, full of good words; butt I had rather haue my mony I lent his captaines here, vpon his word: butt I know what nation they are. This gentleman reports, That his maſter will requite his maieſties good offices here, by a mediation for the Palatinate: butt, à Nazareth poteſt aliquid boni eſſe? I ſhall continue to doe his maſter all good offices, for his majeſties honor, and my obedience.

WHAT to ſay of Bethlem Gabor, I am at a ſtand; his ambaſſadors ſollicitt their diſpatch, who haue obteyned all the defenſiue ayds of the frontire. The laſt aduiſe from thence brought, That his miniſters were departed Vienna, without fruict of their negotiation. Butt the duke of Sbaraſs, more freſhly from Poland, writes mee confidently, That the treaty is renewed, and ſhalbee continued to the end of June, with great hopes, on the princes part, of a finall peace; which will ſett the emperor at too much liberty, and I feare it is too late to preuent it.

I HAUE deliuered his majeſties letter here to the grand ſignior, by the hands of the chimacham, and haue receiued an order in writing for a full and reſpectfull anſwere; which I will not mention to his majeſtie till I ſend it, which ſhalbee by the next poſt: yett I would not conceale how well it was accepted, and how tymely it came, to eaſe and honor mee, and to doe great good to the merchants; the grand ſignior hauing giuen a ſharp command, vnder his owne hand, That neither I nor they bee no more affronted, diſguſted, nor iniuried. I profeſs truth, his majeſties name is in great authority here, and at this tyme eſpecially, euery miniſter ſhowing a deſire to giue vs content.

YOUR honor may better collect the occaſion, then I write it. You may pleaſe to acquaint his majeſtie with theſe generalities: by the next I will render myne owne account, by your honors fauour. I haue no further with which to trouble your honor; but relying vpon your accuſtomed protection and care, I humbly take my leaue.

Conſtantinople,

Your Honors moſt affectionat ſeruant.

Conſtantinople, 12. June, 1624.

IT was doubted, ſome fewe dayes paſt, that Mehmet Gheray, laſt yeare made Tartar han, beeing encouraged by his brother Shachin, newly come from baniſhment in Perſia, would not ſubmitt to the grand ſigniors order, and reſigne his principality to his coſen Jehan Gheray, lately ſent and made prince; and therefore hee was againe recalled, fearing to putt that cuntry into trouble. Butt it ſeemes that, before that order could ouertake him, hee was landed, and Mehemet Gheray come downe with a great army to reſiſt him: and the generall of the gallies in the Black-ſea was forced to land both his Janizaries and artilery for his defence; and with ſuch power as they could make, not exceeding 4000, to entrench themſelues vnder the countenance of their ordinance; where there hath paſſed ſome ſharp blowes in three skirmiſhes, and on both ſides about 2000 ſlayne; the generall diſpatching one gally hither with the aduiſe, and requiring preſent ſuccours. Whereupon, the 11th of this moneth, a peremptory order came from the grand ſignior, That ſeeing his honor was now engaged, hee would maynteyne Jehan, and giue

THE army of the great vizier reſts about Eſmitt, and (if it will) ought to aduance this day: there is much hope of their valour; for allready they beginne to fight with their generall and themſelues. The Perſian continueth neare Diarbecher. Abaſſa baſſa is turned about, and encamped at Kaiſarie, which hee hath, in a manner, beſeeged, attending the comming of the vizier; but with what intent, no man knowes: hee is very ſtrong in horſe; and it is much feared by the Janizaries, that he waytes to betray them; they wilbee hardly drawne forward, his obedience beeing yett as doubtfull as euer.

THE emperors ambaſſador is departed, aſſured either of peace, or that his maſter, hauing aduantage, will take his choice. I receiued aduice, that the commiſſioners of Bethlem Gabor were retorned from Vienna, hauing done nothing; and that both parties prepared for warr: butt ſince, of the firſt of May, from a principall perſon, and of great quality, I receiued letters, that the truce and treaty was againe continued vntill the end of June, with full hope of a finall peace. Butt I am of opinion, if the prince haue any tymely countenance from Germany, hee is more affected to the warre then euer, beeing now preſſed to hard conditions.

THIS faction in Tartary will a litle diſcourage him: butt his miniſters here haue receiued full aſſurance of what ſuccour poſſible can bee giuen, if the emperour make not peace.

THE piratts of Tunes haue taken another Flemming about Ciprus, laden for the accompt of the Venetians and Genoueſes, to the value of 150000 dollers.

THE king of Poland hath ſent hither a nuntio with the capitulations, congratulations, and confirmation of the league and treaties. Whether they will ſee the aduantage vpon the Tartars, or not, is doubtfull.

From my Lord CAREW.

My noble Lord Ambaſſador,

MY laſt vnto your lordſhip bare date the 8th of December, 1623: ſince which tyme, I haue receaved one of yours, dated the 6th of March, which Mr. Branthwaite deliuered me the 12th of May followinge, 1624; and with it 3 large relations, as well of Bethlem Gabor, as of thoſe eaſterne parts; for all which and other your former favours, I retourne you many thanks, with the aſſurance of the conſtant affection I beare your lordſhip, ready to be demonſtrated in your ſervice.

THE 19th of February our parlament begann: the firſt thing in agitation proceeded from the commons houſe, preſenting vnto his majeſtie theire humble petition, That he would be pleaſed to breake of all treaties with Spayne, aſwell of the intended marriage, as the reſtitution of the Palatinate; in both which they alleadged, That his majeſtie had beene abuſed; and if he would be pleaſed to graunt theire humble deſires, they would give him (if warre ſhould enſue) theire ayde to the vttermoſt of theire abilities. The king, gratiouſlie acceptinge this franke offer, was pleaſed to declare and publiſhe the annulling of the former treaties; and, in his wiſdome, foreſeeinge that a dangerous warre was like to enſue, his demaunde was (for the immenſe charge which was like to fall vppon him) ſix entire ſubſidies, and twelue fifteenes. The commons, fearinge that ſo greate a charge would be too heavie for the people, durſt not (although theire harts aſſented therevnto) graunt the propoſition; but, for the preſent, they yeelded vnto three whole ſubſidies, and three fifteenes, to be leavied within the yeare; ſo as the kinge would be pleaſed, that the moneyes might be only expended for the maintenance of the warre that may enſue, and more particularlie for the defence of Englande, the ſecuring of Ireland, the aſſiſtinge of the States in the Vnited Provinces, and others his majeſties friends and allies, and for the ſetting forth of his royall navie: and farther, they humbly prayed, That his majeſtie would vouchſafe, that when the ſubſidies were collected, that they might haue treaſurers of theire owne nomination for the cuſtodie thereof. This requeſt being graunted, they named, in the acte for theire treaſurers, Sir Thomas Middleton, Sir Edward Barkham, aldermen of London; Sir Paule Bammuge, barronett; Sir Richard Grubham, knight; James Cambell, George Whitmore, and Raph Freeman, aldermen of London; and Martin Bond, of London, haberdaſher: and theſe treaſurers not to yſſue any of the moneyes, but by warrant from the counſell of warre, nominated by his majeſtie, and incerted in the acte: the nomber are tenn; namely, George lord Carew, Foulk lord Brooke, Oliuer vicount Grandiſſon, Arthure lord Chicheſter; Sir Edw. Cecill, knight; Sir Edward Conwey, knight; Sir Horace Vere, knight; Sir Robert Manſfield, knight; Sir John Ogle, knight; and Sir Thomas Button, knight. I haue ſett them downe, and ranked them accordinge to the acte; otherwiſe you would marvell whie barrons preceade the vicount. The reaſon is ſubiect to your vnderſtandinge, becauſe the vicount Grandiſſon is not a peere of this realme; and Cecill placed before ſecretary Conwey, in regard of his birthe. It held ſome debate in the houſe, but concluded as aboueſayd.

FOR your better vnderſtandinge, I doe ſend you heere incloſed a briefe of ſo much of the acte, as concernes the duties of the treaſurers and counſellors of warre in the theire places; which your lordſhip will conceaue to be both cautious and ſeveare, ſo as you ſhall haue reaſon to pitty your poore friends expoſed to danger; noe one of vs being guilty of ambition to be embarqued in a buſines of this nature, but impoſed vppon vs by vnreſiſtable authorities.

IN this parlament, the prince and the duke of Buckingham (at ſundry tymes, in committees of both houſes) made ample relations of all that paſſed concerninge the matche, whileſt they were in Spaine; whereby it evidently appeares, that there was no other then colluſion and deceipte on the Spaniſh parte; in both the aboue mentioned treaties the Spaniſhe kinge never intendinge any reall proceedinge.

THERE was never any precedent parlament ſo many good bills paſſed for the publique as in this; which determined the 29th of May, and proroged vnto the 2. of November next, at which tyme both the houſes reaſſemble.

THE firſt complainte againſt any greate man, was againſt the lord keeper: the information was ſo foule, as it might haue iuſtlie diſabled him to beare any publique office; but the plaintiffe, a woodmonger, called Morley, failinge to proove his ſcandalous aſſertions, was by the lords cenſured to ſtand on the pillery in Cheapſide and at Weſtminſter, fined in 1000 l. to the kinge, to acknowledge his offence in the Kings-bench, and to aſke the lord keeper forgivenes at the Starrchamber barre.

THE next greate man was the lord treaſurer, againſt whome there was many accuſations of bribery, extortion, oppreſſion, negligences in the kings ſervice, &c. His cenſure was, To looſe all his offices, namelie, of treaſurer, maſter of the wardes, &c. and ever hereafter to be vncapable to beare any office in the kingdome, fyned in 50000 l. and to remayne priſoner in the tower during the kings pleaſure, and alſo not to come to reſide within the verge of his majeſties courte. But his majeſtie hath allready enlardged his impriſonment; and how farr fourth hereafter he will extende his grace vnto him, is yet vnknowne.

DURINGE the parlament his majeſtie cauſed a proclamation to be yſſued, for the baniſhing of Popiſh prieſts, Jeſuits, and ſeminaries, prefixinge a day for theire departure; otherwiſe to vndergoe the ſeveritie of the lawes heretofore made againſt that viperous broode.

THE marqueſſe of Hinojoſa, extraordinary ambaſſadour heere for the kinge of Spaine, findinge that any farther treaties ether for the marriage, or the Palatinatt, were broken of, and the proclamation aforeſaide ſett vppon every poſt of the towne, to raiſe iealouſies betweene the father and the ſonne, informed the kinge, that the duke of Buckingham, with thoſe of his partie in the parlament, had a purpoſe to ſequeſter his majeſtie, and to ſettle the gouerment of the realme vppon the prince; and farther, to caſt a bone of iealouſie and diſcorde betweene the prince and the duke of Buckingham, it was divulged, that there was a treatie of marriage now in handlinge betweene the king of Bohemia his eldeſt ſonne, and the dukes daughter, an infant of two yeares old. His majeſtie (becauſe, in generall termes, it was informed, that ſome of the lords of the counſell were acquainted with theſe practiſes)

1624. cauſed as many of them as were then at court to be ſworne in his maieſties preſence, to deliver the truth of theire knowledges; all of them proteſtinge, that they never hearde of ether of thoſe intentions: which gave the kinge full ſatisfaction of that which he never formerlie doubted; but is not well pleaſed with the ambaſſadour, who ſhortly departs, without ſeeinge the kinge, or to be preſented with plate or iewells, as is accuſtomed. It is ſuppoſed, that the Jeſuite, padre Maeſtro, (who was heere in the tyme of Gondomar, and now lately retourned) is the boutefeu of all theſe ſcandalls.

BEFORE Dover 5 Dunkerkers were fought withall by 8 Holland ſhipps of warre: the Dunkerk admirall was ſunk in fighte; the other 4 recouered the Downes, to ride vnder the protection of the kings ſhippe; in reverence whereof, the Hollanders (ridinge cloſe by them) offer noe violence, but intende to waite vppon them, vntill they weigh anchor for Dunkerke. It is now aboue 3 weekes paſt ſince theire comminge into the Downes.

THE lord Vaux is vppon his departure vnto his regimente in the archdutches ſervice. The erle of Briſtoll is longe ſince retourned: at his comminge to London he was preſently commaunded to his houſe, where he yet remaines, and to this hower hath not beene queſtioned withall: the cauſe of his reſtrainte is ſome diſtaſte taken againſt his negotiatinge about the matche in the court of Spaine. The duke of Buckingham hath beene longe ſicke, and is yet very weake, but paſt danger: at his comminge abroade, it is thought that the buſines concerninge the erle of Briſtoll will be handled. The lord of Kenſington, ſome monethes paſt, was ſent to the French kinge; and after him, the erle of Carliſle was diſpatched thether, with commiſſion for ether of them to be ioynte ambaſſadours, to treate (as is ſuppoſed) with his majeſtie of France, aboute a marriage with that kings ſiſter. Never ambaſſadours haue beene more royally receaved then they are.

THE Eaſt-Indie company haue lately complayned againſt the Netherland company in the Indies, for doinge of juſtice vppon ten Engliſhmen, who (as the Hollanders ſay) had combyned with the Indians of the iland of Amboyna, to ſurpriſe a fort of theires; and a brother of Mr. Towerſon of London is one of the nomber. Att this complainte his majeſtie tooke offence; butt Monſ. Arſens, and his colleague (ambaſſadors heere for the Vnited Provinces) are confident, that the information is falſe, which tyme will diſcover: but heereof wee are certaine, that the newes came in a Holland pynnace, which arrived at Amſterdam, bringinge with them certaine letters thereof vnto our London marchants. If it be true, the king had good reaſon to be highlie offended; for in the articles betweene them and vs, there is one to this tenure, That if any of our men ſhall committ any offence againſt the Hollanders, worthy of puniſhment or death, that he ſhall be remitted to the Engliſh, and tryed by them; and ſo likewiſe, if any of theires ſhall offende, they are to be iudged by them of theire owne nation. The coronation day, which was wonte to be ſollempnized with triumphes at tilt, this yeare was forborne; for in apparance it proved diſmall: the earle of Oxford, in practiſinge, (with the fall of his horſe) brake his arme; and Candiſhe, vicount of Mansfield, haveing his horſe ſlayne vnder him, was ſo ſore bruiſed with the fall, as he hardly eſcaped death.

SIR Henry Wootton is provoſt of Eaton; Sir William Gray of Northumberlande, created barron of Warke in February laſt; the lord St. John, ſonne to the marques of Wincheſter, was called by writt to the parlament; and the 16. of the ſame monethe the duke of Richmond died ſuddenlie of an appolexie, and the ſollempnitie of his funerall was the greateſt of any ſubiect that ever I ſawe; and his office of ſteward of his majeſties houſe is conferred vppon the marques Hamilton.

IN March laſt, the earle of Dorſett died, and his brother ſucceeded him in his earledome. In Aprill, the earle of Clanricarde was created vicount Tunbridge, and barron of Sommerhill in Kent. John Murrey, vicount of Annan, was created earle of Annandale in Scotlande; and the 15th of the ſame monethe the count Mansfield came to London, and departed from the king and prince with greate contentment towards France the 22th followinge. His majeſtie, in his ſpeech in parlament vppon the laſt day of this ſeſſion, gave ſtraight chardge vnto the lords ſpirituall, the judges, and to the juſtices of the peace, to putt the lawes againſt recuſants and obſtinate papiſts in execution, as heretofore hath beene accuſtomed.

Of the prince I haue ſayd nothinge; my reaſons is, becauſe I cannot ſay ſo much as his prayſes merritt; for I proteſt vnto your lordſhip, I never in my life haue ſeene or knowne a younge prince quallified with more excellent gifts, both of body and mynde, then he is adorned withall; and, doe beleeue me, (for I flatter not) I conceave him to be the miroir of princes now liveinge; and therefore, as wee are happie in the father, ſo there is no doubt but our happines will ſucceede in the ſonne.

The newtrallitie wherein wee ſtand betweene Spayne and the Vnited Provinces, proves damagable to our marchants; for on both ſides our ſhipps are taken, and goods confiſcated, if there be in them ether munition, victualls, or other marchandiſes whatſoeuer, vſefull for the warre: but thoſe of Dunkerke haue done vs moſt harme, and give greater affronts; for now of late complainte is brought to the counſell-boarde, That cloſe aboarde the ſhore, at the entrie into an harborough, (the name whereof I haue forgotten) in the north, two Engliſh marchants have beene taken by them, and two others within the mouthe of Thames, the one as high vp as Quinborough, and the other athwarte of the Reculver. His maieſtie and the lords are very ſenſible hereof, and accordingly, I doubt not, but they will proceede. Haveing thus farr troubled your lordſhip with fragments of newes, Mr. Branthwaite brought me your laſt letter vppon the tenth of this preſent June, it bearing date from Conſtantinople the 17th of Aprill; for which, and your precedent favours, I retourne you many thanks. About 18 monethes paſt, one Monſ. le Hermite, admirall of 13 Holland ſhipps of warre, (full of men, armes, and utenſills for fortifications) ſett to the ſea, entitelinge theire iourney, The unknowne voyage; and well may it be ſo termed; for to this hower, no newes of theire actions is retourned from them; but it is ſuppoſed, that they are planted in the South-ſea, vppon the coaſt of Chilie, which you knowe is ſeated betweene Peru and the Straights of Magelan. In my laſt, I tould you of a fleete of 36 ſaile of Holland men of warre; they ſet ſayle in December laſt, of whoſe enterpriſe, hetherto, wee haue no intelligence. In this letter I haue touched the Hollanders proceeding againſt our men in Amboyna. Heere incloſed, I ſend you the coppie of a letter, which the preſident of the Engliſhe ſent vnto the Dutch governour, whereby you may be enformed of the ſtate of that affaire.

The kinge, at the departure of the judges towards theire circuits, hath given them ſtrickt inſtructions to proceede (as in former tymes) according to the lawes againſt Jeſuits, ſeminary prieſts, recuſants, &c. In the ayde of the States, the king is pleaſed to ſend thether 6000 Engliſhe, devided into 4 regiments, whereof the erles of Oxford, Southampton, Eſſex, and the lord Willoughby, are colonells; but the liſt of the captaines are yett vnknowne, the nomber of ſuitours being ſo many as were competent for an army of 20000. The earle of Lawden, of the familie of Carr in Scotland, hath lately cutt his owne throate, leavinge behinde him but one daughter and heire, who is to be married vnto Sir Robert Carr his ſonne, of Farinhurſt; which Sir Robert is a gentleman of the princes bedchamber, and it is ſuppoſed, that the kinge will be pleaſed to conferre the earledome of Lawden vppon Sir Roberts ſonne aforeſayde.

Your lordſhip (I hope) will excuſe this abrupte manner of writinge, wherein no methode is obſerved; but as things come to my memorie, they are related by

Savoy, this 17th of June, 1624.

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionatt frend to ſerve you,

G. Carew.

I pray your lordſhip to preſent my ſervice vnto your noble ladye; and God ſend you bothe a ſhort and ſafe retourne into England.

From the Lord Archbiſhop of CANTERBURY.

My very good Lord,

It had ſtood with decency, that before this time I ſhould have returned you both thankes, and an anſwere vnto thoſe many letters, which, at ſeverall times, I have received from you; but that the length of our parlament, wherein I had ſome ſmall part, and after that a fitt of the goute, did not give mee leave to ſalute my

1624. frendes as I ſhould have done: but now I let you know, that ſuch hath bene the mercy of God toward vs, that it which ſeemed the moſt dolefull accident vnto vs that hath befallen in this later age of the worlde, that is to ſay, the ſecrett departure of our prince into Spaine, hath prooved vnto vs the moſt behoofull and beneficiall of any thinge whatſoever. The prince ſaw there the baſenes and poverty of the country, the extreme wants of the kinge of Spaine, their irreconcilable hatred to our religion, their fraudes in deluding vs, and of drawing on a pretended matche for eight yeeres, without any intention to conclude it, or perfect it. His highnes found there in direct termes told him, That all the treaty which had bene in England was but verbal, and not reall; hee found impetitions and alurements from the pope, all kinde of temptations from their clergymen, all tricks that the Engliſh fugitives could poſſibly putt vpon him, an ineſtimable ſort of deviſes to ſet the papiſts in England at liberty, to procure a toleration for them, and nothing but othes required vpon othes from the kinge heere, his counſell, and all men in authority, that nothing ſhould bee vrged againſt them. The prince at the firſt had ſome ſhewes of honour done vnto him, and ſome ſuch intertainment as the country could afford; but his trayne was never well intreated, and that good which they had, before his returne, ſuffered much diminution. In ſeven moneths that the prince was in Spaine, neither the kinge, nor any of his brethren, did ever invite him to dine or ſuppe with him; and when Waſhington, his page, dyed there, with all his credit, hee was not able to procure him chriſtian buryall.

HIS highnes gave many greate guifts there, but with fraudulent ſhewes of future thinges, was inforced to come home without the infanta. The kinge, who had truſted the Spanyard, now finding himſelfe ſo ſtrangely deluded, was wonderfully perplexed therevpon; but at the laſt, by the plaine declaration of his ſonne, and of the duke of Buckingham, did ſo reſſent theſe indignities, that hee held it fitt to call his parlament; where, by thoſe two which had bene in Spaine, his majeſty made knowne to both the houſes, the particular wrongs, and unworthy vſage, of that kinge vnto him. And therevpon, craving both the adviſe and aſſiſtance of his parlament, they undertooke, with their bodies and goods, to ſtand by him, if hee ſhould breake with the kinge of Spaine, and with the emperour. Wee humbly beſought his majeſty, that hee would declare the two treaties, that is, for the mariage, and for the Palatinate, to bee at an end; and if warre ſhould follow therevpon, which in reaſon is to bee expected, wee gave him a liberall ſupport for the ſuſtentation of the ſame. That which was in preſent given were three full ſubſidies, to bee paid within the ſpace of one yeere, and three fifteenes in the ſame time; and the clergy gave foure ſubſidies, two to bee paid within the compaſſe of a yeere, and the other two, in two yeeres after. So the treaties are declared, both in England and Spaine, to bee annulled; and, becauſe it is conceived that wee muſt have ſome blowes, (although there bee no denunciation of warre) the kinge hath appointed a counſell for the warre, and the parlament have deſigned treaſurers for the keeping of the mony; which is to bee beſtowed vpon the Palatinate, and the ſtrengthning of the kingdome, and our allyes, that ſo religion and ſafety among vs may bee maintayned.

THE worke is greate, and wee go to it with deliberation: but for the preſent, there are 6 thouſand men to bee immediatly ſent over, for the aſſiſtance of the Hollanders, vnder very noble colonels; the earle of Southampton, the earle of Oxford, the earle of Eſſex, and the lord Willoughby; to bee paid by our kinge for two yeeres, and after, as occaſion ſhall ſerve. A defenſive league is alſo entered into with the Hollanders; but, for this yeere, no kinde of attempt to bee vpon the Palatinate; onely Mansfeild is hired to trouble the emperour in Alſatia by an army collected at the charge of diverſe princes and ſtates. But to enable our ſelves againſt another yeere, Sir Robert Amſtrowther is ſent to the kinge of Denmarke, and to the lower circle of Saxony; and another is gone to the kinge of Sweden, not without hope that the duke of Saxony, and ſome other princes, may bee drawne in, to free Germany from this Auſtrian and Spaniſh yoke, and to reduce it to the ancient liberty. Sir Iſaac Wake alſo is imployed to the ſtate of Venice, to the duke of Savoy, and to the proteſtant Helvetians; that they may ioyne for the helpe of the Griſons, and for the recovery of the Voltellina. God bleſſe our endeavors, and wee ſhall do well, the prince ſhewing himſelfe, as hee doth, a brave yong gentleman, and interpoſing himſelfe in all theſe treaties with the good liking of his father. The earle of Carlile is in France, as negotiating a mariage, ſo endeavouring to get that kinge to ioyne againſt the common enemy and devourer of Chriſtendome. Wee were vpon letters of mart at ſea, in the name of the kinge and queene of Bohemia; but that is ſtayed for a time. Wee are now informed, that the plate-fleete, which hath bene ſo long expected by the Spanyard, is come home; but whereas they gave out, that it did conſiſt of 17 millions of pezos, wee are now advertiſed, that the whole is but 8; which although it bee of good valew, yet it no way correſponds vnto the debt of that kinge, nor to the greate darings which in the ſpringe they gave out, according to the faſhion of their brags and rhodomontados.

There hath bene good agreement all this time between the two houſes of parlament, and many very good lawes are enacted; as againſt monopolies, concelements, vexing of the people by certioraries, and many other good thinges of the like kinde; ſo that the commonwealth is like to reape much benefitt by this ſeſſion, and in the beginning of November (God willing) wee are to meete againe. Thus you ſee I am willing to let you know how the world goeth with vs; to which you may adde, that preeſts and Jeſuites are by proclamation baniſhed, and the lawes are like to take place, in a moderate manner, againſt our recuſants.

Of Bethlem Gabor wee vnderſtand litle, but that hee is wiſe, and maketh the beſt conditions for himſelfe: hee is remote of, and wee know not the certainty of his eſtate; and ſome blemiſh it is vnto his action, that hee vſeth the Turks and Tartars; which maketh chriſtian princes afrayd to ioyne any way with him. But certainly, if the kinge of Bohemia, who is forced to lye at the Haghe, had bene able by himſelfe, or his frendes, to have concurred with him, hee would more have vexed the emperour then any man can imagine.

You muſt ſalute the patriarcke in my name, to whom at this time I do not write; but I hold it fitt to give him this account of Metrophanes; that in July laſt I gave him viaticum, to carry him to Conſtantinople by land; and for a long time after I heard of him, but ſaw him not; only in February or March laſt, hee came vnto mee, and told mee, that hee was reſolved then ſpeedily to go home by ſea, and would know what ſervice I would command him. I told him, that for 7 or 8 moneths hee had not knowne mee, and now I would not know him; hee might go where hee liſt, and might do what hee pleaſed. I thought then hee had gone away; but now, 2 daies paſt, being in my coach at London, I ſaw him go by mee; but what hee intendeth, or what hee hath done with the books which I gave him for the patriarcke, I can yeeld no account.

So, craving pardon for this long letter, I commend you to the good bleſſing of Almighty God, and do remaine,

Lambeth, June 23.

G. Cant.

After our hartie commendacions: Whereas complaint hath bin made to the prince his highnes, and this boord, by the farmors of the preemption of tinne, that both his majeſtie ſuffereth great loſſe in his cuſtomes, and that they are verie much hindered by the ſeacrete exportation of tinne in ſlabbs, veſſell in thicke moalds, and into barres; whereof a great part is (as wee are informed) brought to the ports of Conſtantinople, Aleppo, and Smirna: although wee haue taken the beſt courſe wee can heere for the remeadying of this abuſe; yet wee haue thought good to praye and requier you to take ſpeciall care, that when any ſhipps ſhall arriue in thoſe parts, you cauſe diligent ſearch to be made for any ſuch tinne, brought without the licence of the farmors: and, if any ſhalbe found, to ſeize the ſame, ſatisfying the marriners for it in ſome reaſonable ſort; but not ſo as that they may bee encouraged to vſe the like fraude afterwards; wherein, as in all other things

Superſcribed,
To our verie loving freind
Sir THOMAS ROE, Kt.
his Majeſties Ambaſſador with the Grand Signor,
at Conſtantinople.

To the QUEEN of BOHEMIA: With Relations.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

WHEN I haue ſtudied my ſelfe dull to fynd ſome matter to write from this place, that eyther might bee ſeruiceable or acceptable to your Majeſtie, I am farther off my end, then when I firſt begann; and to lett too much tyme paſſe in ſilence, might giue your Majeſtie occaſion to condemne him that is ambitious of nothing more then of your fauour. Therfore I preſume to aduenture ſuch ſtuff as I haue, in a breefe relation, ſent my lord ambaſſador, and to your Majeſtie, ſuch enformation as I receiue, or can collect, of the proceedings of the prince of Tranſyluania, as hauing moſt cohærence with your Majeſties ſeruice. His ambaſſadors haue taken their leaues of mee, and I ſpared not to acquaynt them with ſuch newes as I had, and to make inference upon them, that their maſter might not bee precipitate in his treatyes. I deſired them to uſe freedome and ſinceritye with mee, what I ſhould aduertiſe into Chriſtendome; and, I ſuppoſe, they did, becauſe their anſwers were both reaſonable, and did concurre with my owne knowledge and obſeruations. They confeſſed ingenouſly, that the princes chancelor was agayne gone to continew the treaty at Vienna, but without power of abſolute concluſion untill their returne: that their maſter was wearye of the ayd of the Turkes, beeing without deſcipline; yet, that they had order, in neceſſitye, to the frontire beghs for defence: that the prince would not conſent to looſe any part of Hungarie granted him at the laſt peace. Then I preſſed them to reſolue mee, If their maſter had will and meanes to maynteyne the warr without the Turks? To which they replyed, He had will enough, and more then euer, and meanes to defend himſelfe; but that it was not wiſdome to bee engaged with ſo great an enemye alone: but that his reſolution was to enterteyne tyme with treaty, untill he heard from the count of Torre, and the fruict of his negotiation, and of the iſſue of the rumors of his majeſties reſolution to recouer the Palatinat by the ſwoord; in which caſe, or if he might haue any reall comfort from Germanye, he woold neuer make peace, untill all his frends and allyes might enioy it with him; but if he had no help, they thought he would ſecure himſelf by the beſt wayes of accommodation in his power.

THIS beeing the ſubſtance of all our diſcours, your Majeſtie may collect how to make uſe of him, and how farr to truſt him; and how neare the truth I haue alway aduertiſed you. I conclude, if it bee not too late, and that prince too much neglected, he may bee a noble inſtrument of your Majeſties ſeruice, and of the generall peace of Germanye. Thus much your Majeſtie may pleaſe to communicate with Sir Dud. Carleton, to whome I had no leyſure to write at lardge, beeing ſurpriſed by the poſt: and if I haue no other meanes to doe your Majeſtie ſeruice, yet I will ſend an army of prayers to heauen for your Majeſties honor and proſperitye; whom I beſeech God Almighty to bleſs and keepe for euer.

Conſt. 26. June,

Your Majeſties moſt faythfull, humble, poore ſeruant.

THE great vizier Cerques Mehmet baſſa is marched toward Diarbecker, from whence there is a flying newes, or rather, a rumour ſpread, That the Arabs, ioyned with ſome of the grand ſignors forces, haue giuen a check to the Perſian; hereby to encourage their owne army, who are not yett out of feare of Abaſſa baſſa and his troopes, that ſtay about Keſarie; and it is erneſtly expected what part hee will take. This hott ſeaſon the Perſian aduanceth not, but only forageth the cuntry.

THE capten baſſa, with 16 gallies, is gone into the Black-ſea, in ayd of Jehan Gheray, now made prince of the Tartars, whom Mehemett Gheray, as is reported, hath beaten off the land, and forced him to retire to the grand ſigniors gallyes that brought him. This ſtate beeing ſtill reſolued to maynteyne the authority of the emperour, in giuing thoſe people a prince, hath ordered all the frontire ſuccours to meete them, to place him by force; which now, in the opinion of many that know that cuntry, wilbee a matter of great difficulty, all the Tartars taking part with Mehemett: hee hath in army 70000 horſe. By this meanes the Mediterran is left open, and vnarmed, to any attempt of the Spaniard, if hee bee an enemy.

CANTEMIR-EMIRZ, another Tartarian prince, left to make guard on the frontire of Poland, and Koneſpolsky, generall of the Poles, were with their armies within one dayes march; and from them is much expectation of an encounter.

THE ambaſſadors of the prince of Tranſiluania haue obteyned their diſpatch, and taken leaue; the ſubſtance is, with cold order for ſuccours from the beghs of Hungary, if the emperour with armes enter that kingdome. The chancellor of the prince is againe gone to Vienna; and they report conſtantly, that hee will yield vpp nothing of his laſt treaty made 3 yeares paſt; that hee will by treaty deferre all reſolution of finall peace, vntill hee ſee the iſſue and reſolution of the princes of Germany, and other warres now much rumored.

THE piratts of Algier and Tunes ſwarme in all theſe ſeas, and haue lately bene againe, 6 ſhipps, at Scanderone, and taken two French and one Sciott in the road, landing and robbing vpon the Mayne; and haue ſhutt vpp all the grand ſignors ports in and neare the bottome; only in the ſpace of 3 moneths they haue taken and burnt 9 ſhipps, and the value of 600000 dollers from Chriſtians; and there is no more ſecurity in theſe trades.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

THE vncertainty to which affaires have bene ſubject of late dayes, hath made me lett paſſe ſome ordinaryes without writing; till now, that I might advertiſe your lordſhip vpon good grounds, what wee are like to truſt vnto here this ſummer; which, on the ennemyes ſide, being the offenſive, hangs ſtill in doubt, there being apparence of the imperialiſts ioyning with the Spaniards againſt this ſtate (vpon a pretended quarrell of ſuch places count Mansfelt putt into the States hands in Eaſt-frizeland, and certayne townes lying vpon the Yſſell; as Deuenter, Zutphen, and ſome others, anciently belonging to the empire); but no declared aſſurance. On this ſide, where wee ſtand onely, as yet, vpon the defenſiue, wee are ſtrengthened with two new alliances; of which the States ambaſſadors, returned within theſe three dayes, both out of England and France, have brought theyr maſters the good newes: the firſt, with his majeſty, our maſter, wherby theſe provinces ſhalbe immediatly ayded with 6000 foote payd, vnder fower brave coronells, (the earles of Oxford, Southampton, Eſſex, and the lord Willoughbye) and this for two yeares and a halfe, (which wee account three ſummers) of certainty; and ſo to continue, vnles his majeſty, at the beginning of the laſt ſix monthes, give warning he will ceaſe his ſuccours. The ſecond with the French king, which brings hether a pecuniary ayde for three yeares, of 12000 florins for the firſt yeare, (of which the ambaſſadors have brought order for the firſt ſix monthes) and 1000 for each of the other two yeares. The Venetians continue a punctuall payment of 50000 florins by the monthe. Which three aydes being added to the meanes of this ſtate, wherby 65000 foote and 4400 horſe are maintayned, and all the frontiers well fortifyed and provided, with the helpe of God wee need not here feare what man can doe vnto vs.

AS yet here is no moving of any conſideration on eyther ſide; onely the Spaniards, wee heare, have muſtered their wagons, and prepared a certayne number of portable botes in Brabant, for paſſage of rivers; and the emperors ambaſſadors

SIR Robert Anſtrudder is come hether with title of extraordinary ambaſſadour to the king of Denmarke, the electors of Saxe and Brandenburgh, and the prince of Neyther-Saxes circle, well inſtructed, and auctoriſed to treate with all thoſe princes touching the recovery of the Palatinat; to which purpoſe Sir James Spens is coming out of England to the king of Swede; and yf ſome diſputes betwixt Denmarke and Swede hinder not, (which are voyced to be broken into open warre, but thereof wee have no certainty) ſome good may be done, now his majeſties reſolution, no longer to ſuffer himſelf to be abuſed by treatyes, is ſo well knowne; and his care to preſerve what remaynes as yet vnvanquiſhed on this ſide the ſeas, made appeare by ſo good effects: And ſeriò will in part excuſe ſeriò.

SOME ſtay Sir Robert Anſtrudder hath made here, to carye with him aſſurance, for thoſe princes better incouragement with whome he is to treate, how his majeſty wilbe ſeconded by this ſtate; wherin he receaves, and wilbe able to give, full contentment.

I MUST now render your lordſhip thancks for many letters with theyr dubles; the laſt of which were of the $\frac{18}{28}$. of Aprill, with a poſtſcript in cyfer of the $\frac{1}{11}$. of May, which I cannot finde out, either in part or in hole, by your cyfer; and therefore imagine you haue taken ſome one you vſe with others, in place of that we haue betwixt vs.

I HAUE not bin able to doe your lordſhip any ſeruice, touching your nephew in general Veres companie, during his abſence, hauing no quarter with his liuetenant coronel, Sir Ed. Vere; but now he is arriued here, I haue deſired him to take notice of him, as one for whome I ſhall acknowledge obligation for any fauour he ſhall doe him; and that he hath promiſed me.

THE queen of Bohemia commaunds me allwayes to remember her to your lordſhip: ſhe is againe in a faire way to increaſe the number of princes, of which we haue a full colledge hereby at Leyden, whether the prince Charles is come owt of Brandenburgh.

TO conclude with your lordſhip, I muſt tell you, the prince of Orange is much ſatisfied with your forbearance in aduertiſing into England againſt the States conſull at Argier; who, for his ill comportments, is now to be reuoqued, and another ſent in his place: and ſuch is the goode correſpondencie at the preſent betwixt his majeſty and this ſtate, that I can aſſure your lordſhip they here deſire owr accord with thoſe of Argier as much as theyr owne, and haue preſſed me to recommend it to his majeſty. Thus I kiſſe your ladies hands, and reſt Relations from Conſtantinople, $\frac{10}{20}$. July, 1624.

THE king of Perſia hath beſeeged a ſtrong caſtel within the precinct of Arzrum, the old gouerment of Abaſſa baſſa; whether this hath occaſioned it, or that hee and the vizier were one afraid of another, a peace is made betweene them, and the gouerment of that prouince giuen him during life, for the defence whereof he is derectly marched thither. Pardons and honors are confirmed from the port, and whatſoeuer the rebells would propound for themſelues; and yett, at this diſhonorable agreement, this ſtate doth reioyce, as at a great victory, and haue raiſed their hopes now of good ſucceſs agaynſt the Perſian; yett there reſts ſome doubt, becauſe neither part would truſt the other to ioyne, but haue taken ſeuerall wayes; the vizier towards Babilon, Abaſſa to Arzrum; from whence litle is this yeare expected, and fewe beleeue, that the Perſian will ſell all his conqueſts for the noyſe and firſt ſight of theſe armyes.

FROM the Black-ſea there haue come many aduiſes: That the prince of the Tartars, ſent from hence, is beaten from the land; and that the capten baſſa, ſeeking once more to ſett him aſhore, hath receiued a great foile and loſſe, wherin the prince was hurt, if not ſlayne: of the particulars wee can haue no certenty; but without doubt the party ſent from hence hath receiued diſgrace, and the Tartars haue diſcouered an arcanum imperij, poſſe principem alibi quam Romæ fieri. They neuer committed a greater error (though all bee one confuſion of errors in gouernment) then this, nor of which they will ſooner and longer repent, that they would offer in theſe tymes, when the peace with Poland wauered, when all theyr force was drawne into Aſia, to depoſe a youthfull prince, and beloued of the people, to plant an old, gowty, decrepid wretch, who the laſt yeare was by them depoſed for inſufficiency; and now the quarrell is on foote, they know not how to retyre. This empire hath hereby loſt, or endangered, one of the greateſt honors and prerogatiues, to giue that nation a prince at the pleaſure of the grand ſignor; whom now they not only refuſe, but dare oppoſe the armyes of the port, and ſend inſolent letters, That it is ſufficient for theſe to gouerne Conſtantinople: if they will not bee quiett, but vndertake to moleſt the princes in poſſeſſion, that they will eſteeme themſelues as free and as ancient as the race of Ottaman. In concluſion, I am of opinion, there will bee found ſome way, though with ſhame, to recall their order, and to confirme the preſent prince, excuſing the fact vpon miſinformation, which for quiettneſs hee may formally accept.

THERE is not one word nor mention of Bethlem Gabor, nor his deſſignes, ſince the departure of his ambaſſadors. It is beleeued, all things are quietter there, then is conuenient for the quiett of other chriſtian oppreſſed countryes.

NYNE galleys of Meſſina, and 4 of Malta, haue mett with 5 piratt ſhipps of Barbary entering into the port of Tunes; and beeing fauored by a calme, ſunk two of them in fight, and tooke the other three with 600 men in them, whom they haue brought to Palermo. It is reported, Sampſon was commander, who, when hee ſaw hee muſt fall into captiuity, by 3 wounds with his owne hand, hee ended his wretched life. Theſe 13 gallyes, joyning with the 6 of the great dukes, within two dayes after went out againe, vnderſtanding of 7 corſaires more. Now they haue opportunity to doe any thing, if they haue the courage; for there are no gallies of this port in the Mediterran to hinder them. It is thought that theſe 5 pirats are the ſame that were at Ciprus and Scanderone.

THE 9th of this moneth, betweene 70 and 80 boats of the Coſſacks, with 50 men apeece, rowers and ſouldiours, watching the opportunity of the capten baſſas beeing engaged in Tartary, entred the Boſphorus about breake of day; where diuiding themſelues, they ſackt and burnt allmoſt all the villages and houſes of pleaſure, on both ſides the riuer, as farre as the caſtles, and within 4 miles of this citty. The principall places were, Baiukdery and Jenichoie, on the Grecian, and Stenia on the Aſſia ſhore: where hauing made great and rich booty, they ſtaid vntill 9 of the clock in the forenoone; and then all this citty and ſuburbs hauing taken the alarme, the grand ſignior came downe to the waters ſide, the chimacham to the water port. Halil baſſa made himſelfe generall in this tumult; and hauing not one gally ready for defence, they mannd and armd all the ſhipp-boats, barges, and other ſmall wherryes, to the number of 4 or 500, with ſuch people as they could eyther gett to rowe, or hope to fight; and diſpatcht all the horſe and foot in the citty, to the number of 10000, to defend the coaſt from farther ſpoile: neuer was ſeene a greater feare and confuſion. Nowe wee expected, that theſe poore theeues would preſently haue retyred; butt they, ſeeing the Turks boats make towards them, drewe themſelues together into the middſt of the channell, nor farre aboue the caſtles, and ſtaid firme vpon their oares in battallion, in forme of a creſcent, expecting the aſſault, the wind and current beeing agaynſt them. Halil baſſa cauſed ſome ſhott to bee made afarre of; butt they anſwered not with one muskett, but houered from one ſhore to another, without any ſhew of retraict. Hereupon, the generall, ſeeing their forme and reſolution, thought it not fitt to aſſayle them with ſuch boats as hee had, but eſteemed it wiſdome enough to keepe them from further attempts, fearing, if they had broaken his fleete of boats, which was eaſily done, that they would venture downe to Conſtantinople, which was now empty of all defence. And thus theſe fewe boates, hauing firſt made great ſpoile, lay the whole day, vntill the ſunn-ſett, faceing and brauing the great and fearefull citty of the world,

THIS ſmall action, and bold attempt to affront ſo great an empire, hath made a ſtraunge diſcouery: how much, vnder the reputation, the terror and ſtrength of this ſtate now is! how weake and unprouided they are! But as the oracle commanded them firſt to ſeate ouer agaynſt blynd men, it hath bene their fortune to haue to this day blynd enemyes. Phillipp of Macedon had neuer proiected, nor his ſonne Alexander neuer aduentured, with ſo ſmall forces, the huge enterpriſe of ſubduing the eaſterne empire, if they had not diſcouered the effeminate and faint courage of the Aſiaticques, by the admirable retraict of Xenophon, and ſwift incurſion of Ageſilaus, great armyes not daring to oppoſe the vertue of their ſmall numbers. Sæpe res maximæ à parvis principijs oriuntur. How this attempt will bee taken from the Poles, is in queſtion; for hereby the treaty of peace is abſolutly broken.

Right Honorable,

WITHIN the compaſſe of eight daies laſt paſte, newes hath beene brought to this ſtate, of two notable damages doone them by the Turkiſhe pirats of Tunis and Algear.

THE one neare Cyprus; where 8 of thoſe men of warre foughte with thre Venetian marchants, and in the end ſunke two, and tooke the thirde, which was the greateſt, and richeſt of burthen: butt it fortuned, that they mett not longe after with the gallies of Cicilie and Malta, who incountred them, tooke awaie the Venetian, and burnt thre of theirs, puttinge the reſte to flight; which beinge in the Turkes poſſeſſion aboue 24 howers, thoſe of Malta and Cicilie hold as theire lawfull prize.

THE other at Peraſto, vpon the Dalmatian ſhoare; where the inhabitants, thoughe they liue vnder theire owne lawe, yett render ſome obedience to this ſtate: whither 14 armed gallies of thoſe pirats ſtole in by night, vppe the gulfe of Cataro, and landinge themſelues ſuddenlie, ſurpriſed thoſe of Peraſto, puttinge to ſworde the aged, and tender youthe; but carried priſoners with them thoſe of midle yeares of bothe ſexes, which, by report, amounted to the number of 1400 ſoles, or more. They likewiſe fired where they came, carried awaie all boote of momente, as armes and munition, with what treaſure they cold finde beſides. This republique (thoughe clypeum poſt vulnera ſumunt) are at the preſent arming forthe ſome gallies, and other ſmall barkes, (for I thinke nowe they haue fewe greate ones lefte) to ſecure the gulfe from greater danger. This prince hathe beene ſicke of a feuer allmoſte three weekes, and broughte to a verie deſperate ſtate; but this morninge I heare his feuer hathe lefte him, ſoe that, without ſome relaps, he is like to ſcape for this time.

And thus, hauinge nothinge ells at this preſent worthy obſeruation, I humblie take leaue, kiſſe your honors hands, and reſte,

SIR Iſaac Wake, lord ambaſſador for this place, is come to Turin, where, I heare, he will ſtay ſome weekes; but about what buſineſſe, I knowe not: by my next, it maie be, I ſhall giue your honor ſome better accounte.

From Mr. BRANTHWAITE: With the Archbiſhop of Spalato's incloſed.

Right Honorable,

THIS prince, whoſe indiſpoſition of healthe I did mention in ſome of my former, is reaſonable well recouered, thankes be to God: but, by reaſon of weakneſſe and diſapitence, he dothe not as yett venter abroade to performe anie publique office: and this is the moſte that, for the preſent, I can ſaie of this place.

FROM Rome I heare, that the Frenche ambaſſadors haue had manie and longe audiences of the pope about the Valtelina; but, as yett, nothinge is effected: ſoe that Monſ. Villier, in ordenarie with this ſignorie, who went vpon purpoſe to aſſiſte in that treatie, is vpon his retourne hether again; who hathe, by reaſon of a defluxion of rume, and an il phiſition, loſte an eye in that iourney.

THE archbuſhoppe of Spalato remainethe yett priſoner in the caſtle of Sant Angelo, where he is often examined, and muche threatned by the pope and cardinales to write a recantation; though (as appearethe by a letter he hathe writt to an aduocate of this towne, his couſen german, the tranſcripte whereof I ſende your honor herewithall) the matter is far otherwiſe.

FOR our homebred affaires, the good agreement of his majeſtie with this laſte parliament hathe ſett them in ſoe good order, that we need not nowe feare the inſolencie of the papiſtes, who had once almoſte brought it to that paſſe, that noe man colde ſhake his heade without a comment: but nowe, God be thanked, men begin to write and ſpeake freely.

AND thus (deſiringe your honor to accepte this little) with my humble dutie remembred, I kiſſe your lordſhips handes, and reſte

Your Honors ſeruaunte at commaunde,

MIC. BRANTHWAITE.

THE laſte weeke I receiued a letter from our newe ambaſſador, Sir Iſaac Wake, at Turin; who, by reaſon he had not had his publicque audience of that duke, cold not prefixe anie certaine time of his repaire hether: yett I thinke we maie expect him the latter end of this monthe.

A Letter to the KING: With the GRAND SIGNIOR's and GRAND VIZIER's incloſed to his MAJESTY.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

IF there bee any matter worthy your Majeſties conſideration, fitt to bee aduertiſed from this court, you will bee pleaſed, not to expect it in this my humble letter; which going farre about, will beare antient date, before it can bee preſented to your Majeſtie. And though I knowe it bee a great preſumption to trouble your Majeſtie at any tyme, much more with empty and impertinent lines ; yett ſuch ceremonious officers as theſe are neceſſary in the courts of the greateſt princes, to vſher in things of more importance. Hauing therefore receiued anſwere from the grand ſignior to your Majeſties laſt letter of congratulation, and requiſition of juſtice, for many inſolencies done to vs your Majeſties ſubiects here reſident (for which your high fauour, wee render your Majeſtie all humble thanks) ; and the preſent great vizier, Georgi Mehmet baſſa, deſirous to bee knowne to your Majeſtie, as one that hath done mee all good offices, hauing deliuered mee another to preſent to your Majeſtie ; I haue ſent them both vppon our ſhipping by this gentleman, retorned for that ſeruice ; who, I humbly beſeech your Majeſtie, may haue the honor to kiſſe your hands. The forme of them is in the generall vſuall, and theire phraſes ſuch as, for the ſtraynes, may giue you ſome delight. Your Majeſtie will bee pleaſed to accept them in their owne expreſſion ; it beeing a leſſe fault in a tranſlator to write nonſence, then to make newe. Your Majeſtie hath them almoſt word for word, faithfully rendred ; and if you vouchſafe to pardon their vanity, the matter otherwiſe, I hope, will giue you ſatisfaction. I haue receiued here ſome formall reparation, and ſince paſſed my buſineſs with greater eaſe, and more quiett, and hope ſo to continue vnder your Majeſties protection ; whoſe name in this court (without all flattery) is of more authoritye then any princes in Europe. In the peace of Algier and Tunes, I haue receiued as much as I can require, except only in puniſhment of the baſſas, who haue mony to fine for their heads, and I none, butt to maynteyne myne owne. I am now of opinion, that I ſhall ſettle that buſineſs ſo, that your Majeſties ſubiects may with leſſe expence, and more ſafety, continue theſe trades, if they fall not with the fall of the whole empire ; which is yett, in my opinion, in great perill of diſſolution, for want of gouerment and iuſtice in the head, and obedience in the members. Of thoſe matters I ſhall preſume to write your Majeſtie more largely ouer land, which will come long before this to your hands. Hauing then nothing herein to doe, but to make way for the preſentment of theſe, and, in the name of all the merchants trading theſe ſeas, to acknowledge your Majeſties care and fauour extended to them, whereby they enioy the fruicts of their hopes, and great aduentures; which alſo, I preſume, they will come before your Majeſtie, and dutifully confeſſe; if I bring nothing butt thanks and prayers for your Majeſties continuall and eternall happines, I will hope of your gratious pardon for all other defects. 1624.

Conſtantinople,

Your Majeſties moſt humble and loyall ſubiect and ſeruant.

Coppy of the GRAND SIGNIOR's Letter to his MAJESTIE, in anſwere to one receiued in May 1624, dated in July 1624.

Han MORATT, euer Happy,

TO the mighty and renowned prince among the majeſties of the princes of the faith of JESUS, obeyed of the great potentats the followers of Meſſiah, ſole director of the important affaires of the Nazaren nation, ſoueraigne of the limitts of honor and power, lord of greatneſs and authority, JAMES king of Great Brittany, France, and Ireland, whoſe laſt dayes the Lord God fullfill with all felicity: this our imperiall letter beeing arriued, it ſhall giue you to vnderſtand,

By the fauour and permiſſion of the Lord of heauen and earth, and the interceſſion of the holy ſoule of his principall meſſenger, the ſeale and laſt of the prophetts (vpon whom lett ſaluation bee multiplyed); wee beeing now come and entred into the poſſeſſion of the glorious empire, the retraict of princes, and the ſanctuary of the potentats of the world, your Majeſties letter, full of all ſincerity, ſent vs, in obſeruance of the termes of congratulation of our aſſumption, and to maynteyne the treaties of antient loue and frendſhipp, beeing preſented by your owne faithfull and well-deſeruing ambaſſador reſident in this our high court, the elect among the lords of the faith of Jeſus, Sir Thomas Roe, and after tranſlated, and giuen vs by our chiefe miniſter, the great vizier, beeing come before our roiall and illuſtrious preſence, and read from the beginning to the end, was to vs moſt acceptable; you hauing in the entrance thereof expreſſed, with all noble forme and ſtile, the good will and mind which you beare in and to this our correſpondence of loue and affection, and to the ſtrengthening of our peace and frendſhipp; and therein aduiſed vs, That aſſoone as you receiued the good newes of our happy and proſperous aſcention into the high and glorious throne of the Ottomans, (which giues luſtre to all other princes) you conceiued an vnexpreſſed ioy and gladneſs; and according to the ancient cuſtome, you had deſigned and appointed a noble and qualified perſon to bee ſent your ambaſſador in this office of congratulation; butt beeing that this yeare in thoſe parts the winter hath bene very ſharp, and that the paſſages by ſea and land were ſhutt vpp, you were, againſt your will, enforced to excuſe this delay; and with many honorable words you haue declared to vs your approbation to maynteyne the antient frendſhipp, which is founded in all ſincerity. Therefore wee hauing perfectly taken knowledge of your integrity and truth, and of your good mynd and greate affection allwaies borne to our (euer faithfull) houſe; the which beeing to vs a great contentment to our mind, and gladnes to our heart, wee haue inſtantly, for the accompliſhment of all thoſe particulars in which you haue aduiſed vs, and for the continuance and obſeruance (conformable to the cuſtomes of antient tymes to this day) of the peace and league, giuen our expreſſe and (in all the world obeyed) imperiall command; and alſo ſtraightly charged, that all the articles and priuiledges contracted and written in the capitulations, (bee they what they will) ſhalbee confirmed and ratified; and (according to antient cuſtome) that they ſhalbee obſerued, and by all perſons reſpected; and that none of our cuſtomers, or other officers, ſhall doe or innouate any thing contrary to the fotmer vſes, and accuſtomed obſervations: neither ſhall they giue to your merchants any trouble; nor, contrary to juſtice, and our canons, they ſhall doe them no moleſtation by newe impoſitions: butt rather, that in our happy dayes,

From GEORGI MEHMETT Baſſa, Vizier of the Bench, and Chimacham in Conſtantinople, to his MAJESTIE.

TO the high and renowned among the majeſties of the lawe of Jeſus, reuerenced of the potentats of Meſſiah, only director of the important affaires of the Nazarene nation; ſoueraigne of the limitts of honor and power, lord of the examples of greatneſs and grace, our benigne frend the king of * England, of Great Brittanny, France and Ireland, our beloued James; whoſe laſt dayes lett the Lord fullfill with all felicity and illumination.

* So it is in the originall, to ſhow their ſingularitye in coſmographie.

To whoſe roiall preſence, after ſalutations ſent, (ſuch as doe fortify the eſſence of all true loue and good concord, and doe reenforce and forme the true foundations of ſincere frendſhipp) and aduiſes preſented, that haue good intentions; and hauing ſaluted you with ſuch reſpects as my neceſſary duty requireth, worthy of the pure amity continued betweene your Majeſtie and the ſhadow of God our emperour, and my indebted obligation for the good correſpondence and negotiation which you haue with the faithfull people, and offering myſelfe vnto you, and in all reſpectiue termes demanding of your welbeeing and eſtate, (the true effect of your Majeſties goodneſſe) our frendly aduertiſement is this:

The diuine majeſtie of the omnipotent Lord, whoſe name is aboue all things, ſupreme monarch, which produced eſſence from nothing, and gaue beeing to the heauen and earth; who, for the welfare of his people, doth conſtitute kings and princes vpon the face of the earth, ſuch his ſeruants as it pleaſeth him to chooſe; and for their better agreement and intercourſe of one another, by the meanes of good frendſhipp and correſpondence, by his prouidence and power, did make a difference, and bettered the eſtate, degree, and quality of ſome one aboue another; did appoint and permitt, that euery people, ſmall and great, ſhould attend to a good concord, and proffitable commerce.

Nowe, that powerfull and perfect Creator, Lord of the lights of this world and that to come, hauing, according as his moſt abſolute will did require, and as his vniuerſall prouidence did ordeyne, conſtituted our moſt happy, proſperous, and great emperour, emperour of the earth and ſea, refuge of the great Cæſars, and of the powerfull * Shahs, the only hope of all people, head and chiefe of the princes of the world; giuer and diſtributer of the crownes of the potentats of the vniuerſe; the Alexander of this age, borne vnder the moſt noble conſtellation; the benigne ſeruaunt of the honored Mecha and Medina, deſtroyer and enemy of the foundations of iniuſtice and euill; your Majeſtie, in obſeruance of the termes of congratulation of the imperiall aſſumption, and to confirme your antient frendſhipp and loue, hath ſent to the high port, that ſuſteyneth the world, your letter (full of all ſyncere effects); which by the hands of your ambaſſador, reſident in this bleſſed court, the elect among the lords of Jeſus, Sir Thomas Roe, whoſe end bee happy, was conſigned; and beeing ſent and preſented to the allway victorious ſtirrupp of the king of kings, was to him moſt acceptable. And hauing therby vnderſtood your antient and ſyncere frendſhipp, hee inſtantly gaue his high and imperiall command, that all thoſe particulars and clauſes mentioned in your moſt beloued letter, ſhould bee accompliſhed and performed, and the peace and amity to this tyme continued ſhould, conformable to antient cuſtomes, bee of all men obſerued and reſpected; and the capitulations heretofore contracted and maynteyned to this day, and all the articles and priuiledges, and all other graunts, (bee they what they will) written and agreed on, ſhould bee ratified and confirmed; and according to the rule of antient tymes, that they ſhould bee of all men accepted, reſpected, and obeyed; and that no cuſtomer, officer, or other fermor, ſhould giue any moleſtation, or doe any wrong to any of your Majeſties ſubiects or merchaunts, nor doe any the leaſt thing contrary to the antient cuſtome, and obſerued rule; nor, contrary to juſtice and the canons, that they ſhould not lay on them newe impoſitions: butt that in the happy raigne of his majeſtie, more then in former tymes, the ſaid your ſubiects, with a quiett heart, and contented mynd, might follow their affaires and commerce, without the impeachment or iniury of any man, conttary to the capitulations. And to this end, there are giuen alſo expreſſe imperiall commands, and moſt effectuall orders, to all the miniſters and gouernours of all the borders.

Therefore there beeing written and ſent to yonr Majeſtie, (the true eſſence of all ſyncerity) from the king of kings, his imperiall and bleſſed letter; it hath ſeemed to mee to bee neceſſary, and my duty, that I alſo ſhould write and ſend this my letter, moſt full of loue; which beeing arriued with you, wee hope in your fauour, that alike to your ſyncere frendſhipp, and pure mynd, which you haue allway ſhowed vntill this day, vnto this high and imperiall port, that you wilbee pleaſed alſo now to bee conſtant and firme in the wayes of amity, and ſtable and reſolute in the paths of ſincerity; and that you will, in the tyme to come, make cleare demonſtration of your good reſolution and mind to concurre to the perfection of correſpondence and league, and to the fortification of the foundations of the peace and treaty; and that you will not retyre from renewing the habitt of the antient correſpondence, by ſending, from tyme to tyme, your valorous and reſpected ambaſſadors, promiſing your Majeſtie, by the grace of the great God, that in the happy tymes of his imperiall majeſtie, all that which is renewed and bound faſt, and all thoſe articles, priuiledges, and agreements, which are confirmed and ratified by his imperiall fauour, of certenty and truth neuer ſhalbee altered or contradicted; and wee will take heed, that they ſhall not bee changed nor violated. Wherein your abouenamed ambaſſador, reſident in this bleſſed court, doth attend in his charge, and in all occaſions conteyneth himſelfe within the circle of diſcretion and due

To Sir GEORGE CALVERT: With Relations.

Right Honorable,

Of which I now ſend copy.

BY the laſt poſt I only ſent your honor a breefe relation of our occurrents encloſed to Mr. Branthwaite; from whom, ſince, I haue receiued aduiſe of a letter which your honor hath written, and for which I haue exceedingly longed; that I might receiue ſome directions in theſe great changes, both at home and in Hungarye, how to employ my vnwoorthy ſeruice; but it is ſome way miſcarryed, though wee haue had frequent packetts, and two later then the mention thereof.

I KNOW I omitt my duty to his majeſtie, and to his highnes; and therin more neglect my ſelfe, then their ſeruice, in not writing; but I feare my matter too ſlight for their interruption: and if ther bee any thing fitt for their knowledge, I eſteeme yt better preſented by your honors mediation. You wilbe pleaſed then to communicate the incloſed to them, for my excuſe; and procure ſuch an interpretation of my boldnes, (if I bee any way tranſported into error by too much zeale) that I looſe not my ends, which are only his majeſties ſeruice. I am enforced to mingle ſome part therof with cyphar, becauſe in the inſtant of the laſt tumult, our ordinary packetts arriuing, they were ſurpriſed by the jealouſye of a buſy officer, and carried to the chimacham; ſuſpition caſt abroad falſely, that ſome of them would diſcouer ſome intelligence with the Coſſacks; and the inſolent furye of the tyme preſſed to haue them all opened in publicque diuan or councell; which, to appeaſe the rumour, was promiſed; but in few dayes, by the wiſedome of the vizier, they were deliuered us ſafe. I could haue beene content they had beene ſeene, for the manifeſtation of our innocence, but not for the conſequence of the example. This forceth mee to be a little more warye; and though I would write nothing to giue aduantage to theſe agaynſt mee, yet I muſt needs write ſomething that would diſpleaſe; and therfore I endeauor to avoyd, as much as I can, all occaſion. I haue diſpatched away the grand ſignors lettre in anſwere to his majeſtie, with another from the vizier, which he would needs ſend, pretending and really ſhowing mee ſome fauour; for which if an anſwere might not be inconvenient, it would confirme mee, here, more in his opinion. The man is vayne, and eaſely taken with ſuch baytes; and wee neede frends and protectors. By the next poſt I will ſend the coppyes to your honor, and giue his majeſtie account of the buſines of the piratts, wherin ther is as much done as is poſſible, a new baſſa ſent with new and feruent commands, ſuch as I am confident wilbe obeyed, and that wee may trade hereafter without feare of them. When thoſe letters ſhall arriue, which are gone, for more ſecurytye, vpon our owne ſhipping, you wilbe pleaſed to excuſe us here, the tranſlators, the vanytye of the phraſes, and pride and inſolent ſtile of the writers. Your honor knowes how ſwolne their titles are with wynd, and I was loth to ſend them; but they are rather matter of laughter, then to bee troubled att; which beeing pardoned, otherwiſe the ſubſtance is more full of curteſye then euer I ſaw any, as their owne neceſſitye requireth; and I hope will giue ſatisfaction; for the promiſes are great, and I fynd ſome realytye according to the dull pace of this people.

I CAN giue no other judgement of Bethlem Gabor, then what I haue done in my relation: I feare the vizier is miſtaken in his creditt with him, and that he is gone really to the other party, and no way left to bring him off, but to lett him ſee, if he will ſee yt, that he ſhalbe only trayned with hope of a princes, and, in concluſion, ſhalbe offered a wayting gentlewoman; ſuch I know is theyr diſdayne of him: though the emperours agent coldly deny any ſuch purpoſe as vnequall, yet willing to entertayne the opinion, that wee might feare yt, and the Turkes take diſpleaſure at yt. I am not wiſe enough to know why he hath beene ſo much neglected. If he joyne with the other faction, he will prooue a woorſe enemye then he was a frend, and all the force of the emperour wilbe at libertye. It is not impoſſible to recouer him, if it bee thought fitt; and though ther bee many better wayes, yet if his majeſties ſeruice require yt, I can ſay no leſs then, Here I am.

I WILL trouble your honor no farther, and I feare euery line I write; but that I hope the reader is my protector, and myne innocence myne aduocate; and ſo I committ your honor to the holy keeping of our gratious God.

To Sir GEORGE CALVERT: With Relations.

Right Honorable,

Of which I now ſend coppy.

BY the laſt poſt I only ſent your honor a breefe relation of our occurrents encloſed to Mr. Branthwaite; from whom, ſince, I haue receiued aduiſe of a letter which your honor hath written, and for which I haue exceedingly longed; that I might receiue ſome directions in theſe great changes, both at home and in Hungarye, how to employ my vnwoorthy ſeruice; but it is ſome way miſcarryed, though wee haue had frequent packetts, and two later then the mention thereof.

I KNOW I omitt my duty to his majeſtie, and to his highnes; and therin more neglect my ſelfe, then their ſeruice, in not writing; but I feare my matter too ſlight for their interruption: and if ther bee any thing fitt for their knowledge, I eſteeme yt better preſented by your honors mediation. You wilbe pleaſed then to communicate the incloſed to them, for my excuſe; and procure ſuch an interpretation of my boldnes, (if I bee any way tranſported into error by too much zeale) that I looſe not my ends, which are only his majeſties ſeruice. I am enforced to mingle ſome part therof with cyphar, becauſe in the inſtant of the laſt tumult, our ordinary packetts arriuing, they were ſurpriſed by the jealouſye of a buſy officer, and carried to the chimacham; ſuſpition caſt abroad falſely, that ſome of them would diſcouer ſome intelligence with the Coſſacks; and the inſolent furye of the tyme preſſed to haue them all opened in publicque diuan or councell; which, to appeaſe the rumour, was promiſed; but in few dayes, by the wiſedome of the vizier, they were deliuered us ſafe. BETHLEM GABOR hath made an abſolute peace with the emperour: the particulars are kept very cloſe, if at all they bee ſent hither; butt the emperors agent

HEE anſwered, That no man knew him better then himſelfe: that hee was a man made of inconſtancy, more able to deceiue, then eaſy to bee deceiued: and (as I ſuppoſe, to make this change ſeeme leſſe in my eyes) hee added, That if hee were putt vpon a ſpitt, before hee could bee turned twice about, hee would change 3 frends; butt that he was ſoe aſſured of his hate to the houſe of Auſtria, beſides his difference of religion, that he would undertake to fetch him back, and to make him break the peace at his pleaſure. Aduiſe of this peace was ſeconded by letters from the emperour, in confirmation of the league with the grand ſignior, which were gladly receiued, and the agent reſident had audience to deliuer them, veſted and honored, a fauour very vnuſuall without preſents. Whereby the peace of this ſide beeing aſſured, all the imperiall forces drawne vpp into theſe frontires laſt yeare, are ſett at liberty for worſe ymployment. My opinion is, that it was much more eaſy to haue kept vpp the prince of Tranſiluania, while hee was mouing, like a rolling ſtone, then to raiſe him againe from his reſt: butt in conſilijs infœlicibus optima viderentur, quorum tempus effugeret.

I HAUE receiued aduertiſement, (the truth whereof is very probable, though I cannot directly iuſtify it) that ſince the arriuall of the caſlariaga, who gouerns all within, an old foxe, longe practiced in this ſtate, baniſhed by ſultan Achmat, and nowe recalled, the ſultana hath hearkened to a treaty of peace with Spaine, butt very ſecrettly; which is ſo farr aduanced, that in the tyme of Haly baſſa, the laſt vizier ſtrangled, there were letters written to the viceking of Naples in his name: That the grand ſignor beeing reſolued to liue in quiett with all his neighbours, and hauing receiued intimation, that the king of Spaine had often, and latly, made offers of treaty, that now the port was free and open, to receiue his ambaſſadors, and to make a firme league and peace with all the houſe of Auſtria. This was negotiated by a fryar, and the inſtrument a ſultana, ſiſter to the emperour. It is kept both from the knowledge of the mufti and the preſent chimacham. Theſe letters were ſent by a Jewe in Chriſtian habitt, to Spalato, to paſſe by the way of Venice: butt the death of Aly baſſa ouertaking him at Adrianopoly, hee durſt not proceed without new order; where hee ſtaid two moneths, vntill the newe vizier, now gone to the Aſian warre, was drawne to conſent to the counſell, who confirmed his inſtructions, and wrote newe letters, in his owne name, to the ſame effect; and ſo hee is now proceeded vpon his imployment, by Catara, or Spalato, through the dominions of the Venetians, where hee may perhapps bee diſcouered for ſuch as he is, a Jewe, and a ſpye of Spaine. This is what I am informed: and I know that the Spaniards make many ſuch offers here, whether to delude, or in earneſt, is aboue my judgment; butt if ſuch as theſe reconcile, yt is allway to be ſuſpected, the end thereof is in detriment of ſome other. This ſtate hath no reaſon to refuſe any frends, their force beeing all drawne into Aſia, and the reconciliation of Abaſſa anewe ſuſpected; for hee keepes the field for his owne aduantage. Butt the Spaniard had neuer leſſe need to ſeeke a frendſhipp of theſe, who cannott harme them, if they had no other deſſigne, that needs all their forces. It is my duty to write all that I heare; judgment and election is left to his majeſtie.

To the QUEEN of BOHEMIA.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

I AM now much more vnwilling to preſent my ſelfe before your Majeſtie then euer; for though I doubt not you haue receiued the certaynty of the peace made by the prince of Tranſyluania with the emperor, yet ther depends vpon yt ſome conſequences fitt for your Majeſtie to know, though vnfitt for mee to write: It is thought here, and not much liked, that he hath a promiſe of a daughter of the emperor, which will make him wholy imperiall. The emperors agent doth not with that diſdayne denye yt, which he was woont to doe; but rather ſeemes as if he did not beleeue yt, yet with a kynd of inſinuation, that wee might feare yt. In my owne opinion, I thincke he is cooſened; and though it bee very late, yet it is not impoſſible to lett him ſee yt, if he bee not deceiued by delayes. Ther is but one counſayle left to recouer him; which is, to lett him, or made him diſcerne, that he is enterteyned and trayned only with the name of a wife, who, when their turne is ſerued, ſhalbe offered a wayting woman; ſuch, I know, is their ſcorne of him. And if his majeſtie proceed in the warr, ther is nothing of more conſequence then to ſett vp that prince agayne into choler and indignation; or els the forces of the empire wilbe at too much libertye.

I BESEECH your Majeſtie, keepe theſe my thoughts to doe you ſeruice, and mee no diſaduantage: tymes were neuer ſo dangerous to uſe freedome. If his majeſtie would giue mee leaue, I could perhaps from hence ſend him ſuch aduice as might mooue him by feare or ſhame; for if he bee not already wholy loſt to this ſtate, he would bee looth to bee diſcouered how he hath played with them.

I HAUE receiued aſſurance from Sir D. Carleton, of the continuance of your Majeſties fauour and opinion of mee; wherin, though my owne innocence and conſcience of the humble and zealous affection I will liue and dye in, to your Majeſties ſeruice, made mee not ſincke vnder my feares; yet the greatnes of the loſs, and my owne demeritt in ſubſtance, left mee not free of all fears, for which I begg your gratious pardon. I haue not one dropp of bloud in my hart, which I will not ſhed for you.

I HAUE ſent my lord ambaſſador a lardger relation, which ſeeing your Majeſtie takes pleaſure to read, I will craue leaue to referr you; it is neare a coppy of that I ſend his majeſtie; only ſome things ſhortened, for due reſpects.

AND ſo I moſt humbly kyſs your Majeſties hands; offering continuall vowes and prayers for your Majeſties eternall proſperitye.

Conſt. 25. July, old ſtile, 1624.

To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON: With Advices.

My very good Lord,

YOUR plentifull letter of the 26. Aprill hath not only feaſted mee with varyetye of newes, (for which I was an ill debtor, by the diſaduantage of ground) but reſtored mee to my ſelfe, by the aſſurance you giue mee of the continuance of her majeſties fauour to my demeritts, and by your good councell to teach mee not to giue occaſion by feares and jealouſyes, when I giue none in my actions. I haue asked her gratious pardon, and thancke you for my cure; it is not in my nature, for which I haue a wife to wittnes; but ſome woords caſt out by the Duch ambaſſador, or rather vants, kyndled that zeale in mee, to bee more ſecure. He is a man as far from deſcription, as from beeing knowne in Holland; and though he bee their oracle, he is our mountebancke.

OF our affayres here, and the peace made by Gabor, I haue encloſed all I know or conceiue: it is neare a coppy of that I ſend his majeſtie; only to England I haue enlardged in the particulars, what I am enformed in the treaty of peace with Spaine: I cannot juſtefye yt, but I rather inclyne to beleeue yt, then the contrarye, though I thincke it bee enterteyned by the Spaniard, rather to delude, then in earneſt.

IT is tyme to conſider Bethlem Gabor: if he bee loſt utterly, he will prooue as ill an enemy as hee was a frend; but the vizier here would make mee beleeue he can recall him; but I am ſure he is deceiued: perhaps his majeſties authorytye might; but neuer receiuing one line in anſwere of all I haue aduertiſed and forewarned of him, I dare not preſs yt. Your lordſhip will accept my thancks, and ſuch matter as I haue; to which referring you, I will eaſe you of this trouble, and commend your lordſhip to the holy keeping of our moſt gratious God.

Conſtantinople,
25. July, 1624.

Relations. Conſtantinople, 7. Auguſt, 1624.

THOUGH there are no letters come to the port from Bethlem Gabor, of the particular articles of his peace made with the emperour; yett there is the more ſuſpition, that it is concluded to the greater diſaduantage of this ſide: and beeing it was done without the knowledge or direct warrant from hence, there is a generall murmur, that the prince is wholly gone to the imperiall party, and loſt to this. Which doubt though they would not publiſh, yett it is euident, theiſe haue more grounds of ſuſpition then are diuulged, and muſt beare it patiently, during theire owne warrs in Aſia.

BUT yett theſe conditions of the peace are not kept ſo ſecrett, but that it is confeſſed, that Gabor hath ſurrendered, and diſclaymed all title to Hungary; and conſented, that the emperors ſonne ſhall bee preſently choſen king thereof, and keepe his court in Presburgh; that all the eſtates of Hungary ſhall receiue him, and Bethlem aſſiſt and ſerue him in all his occaſions.

THAT Gabor ſhall remayne quietly prince of Tranſiluania, and earle of the Siculi: that he ſhall hold Caſſouia, and 2 or 3 other ſignories which he formerly poſſeſſed, during life; and, after that, they ſhall retorne abſolutly, as members of the crowne of Hungary. This article is that which troubles, if it be true; that the prince att all hath treated of Tranſiluania, any way inſinuating a dependance of the empire: that he is enterteyned ſtill with hopes, and treaty of a daughter of the emperors: but it is beleeued, the picture ſent him ſhall ſerue the turne.

SOME other articles concerning the eſtates of priuat men, and mutuall pardons. But this is reported the ſubſtance of the treaty.

THE chiaus ſent to the emperour, to bring newes of the inauguration of this grand ſignior, and to offer the continuance of the ancient leagues and treaties between theſe ſtates, is retorned, with the emperors letter of acceptance, and confirmation of the treaty made at Zitwa, which was the laſt; wherin it was agreed, That what either ſide poſſeſſed at that tyme, ſhould remayne as it was; and if any roade ſhould be made, priſoners taken, or place ſurpriſed, during the truce on either part, that reſtitution and full ſatisfaction ſhould bee giuen by him that broke the truce.

IT ſeemes that the vizier, Ali baſſa, and this that now is, Cerques baſſa, did both of them conſent to the renewing of this treaty, which was often broken; ignorant vtterly of the affaires of thoſe parts, and of the preſent diſaduantage to Bethlem Gabor, and this ſtate: for hereby, it beeing now againe in vigor, the grand ſignior muſt ſurrender Vach, and many other places of importance, that had beene gotten in this tyme, when it was neither peace nor warre; and is bound to make many other reſtitutions of dammage. But as I thincke the imperiall party will not preſſe theſe ſmaller matters, ſo I thinck they will demaund Vach, and all the country depending; and hold themſelues, for their limitts, ſtrictly to that treaty, which now is confirmed on both ſides. There are many diſcontent at his concluſion, and lay the blame on the information of the baſſa of Buda, who is a pentioner of the emperour: but their owne troubles in Aſia makes them ſilent, and ſuffer both this loſſe, and many affronts from Tartaria and the Coſſacks.

THE capten baſſa, and all his fleet ſent into the Blacke-ſea, are much doubted, there hauing beene no newes of him certeyne in a moneth, and many reports, that he is taken, with his gallies, beeing about 30, two viziers more with him, and Biram baſſa, generall by land, by the Tartars, who threaten all Wallachia, as farr as Adrianopoly. But as of this there is yett no certenty; ſo it is moſt true, that the Tartars are in open rebellion and warr with this ſtate.

THE motion for a peace to bee made with Spaine was beganne by the emperors ambaſſador, vpon ſome ouerture made by a renegado Spaniard in the Seraglio, offering ing his creditt with the caſſariaga; but it was vtterly refuſed and reiected, when the agent came to ſpeak in particulars: ſo that I beleeue nothing is done, and the meſſenger ſent only with propoſitions, and no promiſe of acceptance from hence. But it is moſt true, that both the ambaſſador and the agent did make offer to treat it; though they ſay, it is an vſuall part of the emperors inſtructions, only pro forma. 1624.

FROM the parts of Aſia wee heare litle, only a report, that the Janizaries and ſome of Abaſſa baſſas men haue mett and fought; that they will not bee reconciled to him, nor hee to them: ſo that the peace made with him is doubtfull; for which they haue mutined againſt their aga, and diſplaced him. It is reported, that he hath cutt of the heads of Colophon baſſa, and two or three of his chiefeſt captaines; but to what end, becauſe they would, or would not conſent to peace, is vncerteyne.

From Mr. BRANTHWAITE.

Right Honorable,

THIS prince, of whoſe indiſpoſition I haue formerly writt, dothe yett keepe within his owne lodginges; though, thankes beto God, he is paſte all daunger, and maie be expected abroade within 4 or 5 daies.

VPON Wedneſdaie night laſte newes was brought hether from the podeſta of Verona, that vpon the Monday before, about 3 howers of the night, a tower of the ſame cittie, called the Racketta, (where gunpowder and munition was kept) was fired by a lightninge from heauen; which beinge blowne vppe by the violence of the powder, hathe borne downe with it the greateſte parte of two monaſteries, (one of Capoccens, and another of nunnes) lamed a greate manie of bothe conuents, and (if reports maie be beleeued) ſlaine a greate manie of them, and other perſons adioyninge. Nowe there wantethe not ſome that imagine that it was artificiall fier: but that, as alſo other particulers concerninge the ſame, I hope my next weekes letters will better diſcouer. It is thought, that (the plague beinge at this preſent ſoe hott in ſome partes of Cicilie) vnleſſe it ceaſe nowe at the ſhuttinge uppe of the yeare, the pope, for feare of the infection, will deferre the ſolemnizinge of the anno ſanto; which will make a greate manie of all nations (and in particuler of Engliſhe) loaſe their laboure, that are nowe come into theſe partes to participate in that diuotion.

THE Valtoline buſineſſe was neuer more hotlie canuaſed at Rome, then it is at this preſent, becauſe the colligati are perceiued a litle to moue; which makes the pope ſeeme moſte willing to harken to anie propoſition, which by maner or forme maie reflecte vpon the common good, of which he proteſtethe to be a tender father: but I praie God, that, in the ende, he doe not to muche in particuler fauour his catholique ſonne. The Frenche and Spaniſhe ambaſſadors haue frequent audiences there; and (they ſaie) what one makethe, another marrethe: but of theſe thinges (if all be true that is reported) we ſhall ſee an end, I hope, verie ſhortlie.

AND thus, humblie deſiringe your honor to pardon my haſtie ſcriblinge, I kiſſe your lordſhips hands, and will euer remaine

Your Honors to be commaunded,

MIC. BRANTHWAITE.

To Sir GEORGE CALVERT.

Right Honorable,

MY letters of the 3. Aprill will ſatisfy your honor, that I receiued yours mentioned of the 7th Nouember, the 24. March after; which hauing made ſo long a ſoiourning at Venice, I could giue you no ſooner account thereof. In my anſwere whereunto, I tooke knowledge of Sir Edward Herberts endeauour in France, to procure ſome moderation in our differences here; but it was all French ayre, nothing to the purpoſe: and therefore, concluding it impoſſible, that any could come from thence, in that nice queſtion, for my aduantage, I reſolued to obey his majeſties order, to keepe his honor entire, and to auoyd the occaſion of diſpute; which was continued vpon faire termes, vntill a generall greeuance forced refiſted. For your honor will perceiue, he drewe from a new vizier letters of confirmation of the old peace; which was his only ayme, and not to enter into particulars; whereby the emperor hath, or ought to haue, great aduantage: and the vizier neither knew what had paſſed before, what that treaty was, how Gabor was enclyned, nor any thing more, butt a peace was once made; it was then a good one; why ſhould it not bee ſo nowe? which the emperour hath accepted, and confirmed by his letters; et ſic finitur fabula. I will omitt no manner of occaſion to putt the prince in heart againe; nor did I omitt to lett him know how things were like to chaunge in Chriſtendome. From hence there is ſmall hope of any motion, they beeing gladd to diſſemble their owne diſaduantage, vntill the matters of Tartary and Aſia are compoſed, and the grand ſignor ſetled in gouerment. Yett there may arriſe ſome difficulty about the preſcription of the frontire, ouer which I will haue an eye: butt I deſire to receiue ſome more particular order, how farr I may in occaſion proceed with the prince of Tranſiluania, to write, ſend to him, or to treate; for I doe not doubt, (though I can promiſe nothing) that before the ſpring, if hee ſee his majeſtie actually engaged, and that hee bee any way countenanced, and taken into the protection of the vnion, that hee may bee moued to new actions, where hee ſhall ſee any hope of aduantage: butt if hee bee not in ſome ſort ſought vnto, and aſſured, hee will ſecure himſelfe, if not worſe. By him a braue diuerſion may bee wrought; therefore my opinion is conſtant, That hee ſhould bee no longer neglected. Of whatſoeuer I can doe, I will giue his majeſtie good account.

CONCERNING the eſtate of our affaires in this court, and of the conceits wee haue of Bethleem Gabor, the encloſed will enforme your honor largely; whereby you will perceiue, that the ſcene is here likewiſe altered; peace made on all ſides; butt with what ſyncerity, I leaue to his maieſties, and your honors iudgment. I haue only drawne the lynes, not preſuming to lay on the coulers. The aduantage was loſt twice; firſt, by giuing no encouragement to Gabor, while hee was in action and armed; ſecondly, by forbearing to giue order to croſſe the emperors ambaſſador, while hee was here, where hauing no oppoſition, no man to open their eyes, hee eaſily wrought vpon the aduantage of their ignorance, and diſtraction of their owne affaires; and procured his owne ends, which had bene then more eaſily reſiſted.

IN the buſineſs of the pirats, vpon his majeſties letter to the grand ſignor, hee gaue ſo faire an anſwere by letter to his majeſtie, ſo faire promiſſes, and ſo free an offer to aſſure the peace, that I could not refuſe another tryall, hauing ſent a new baſſa and new commands to both places: whereupon I haue more hopes then euer. Of this particular I will giue account to the lords of his majeſties councell by the next poſt, the baſſa beeing now departed, and the grand ſignors letter to his majeſtie ſent by ſea: the copies of them will arriue long before the originall, and the ſucceſs depends vpon anſwere from thoſe citties, which I haue ordered the conſulls there to ſend to your honor. So, at this tyme, I can ſay no more, but I haue done all that can bee done; and you may pleaſe, in the meane tyme, to intimate ſo much to their lordſhipps.

THUS, humbly deſiring your honor to acquaint his majeſtie with as much hereof as may conduce to his ſeruice, and to procure his fauorable enterpretation of my deſires to doe more then I write, I leaue you to the gracious keeping of our bleſſed God.

Conſtantinople,
$\frac{22}{32}$ Aug. 1624.

To Sir EDWARD CONWAY: With Relations to both Secretaries.

Right Honorable,

I MAY fall vnder your cenſure, by neglect of writing theſe fewe moneths paſt: butt if you pleaſe to conſider, that I had long begunne and continued to giue an account of ſuch of our occurrents here, as might any way conduce to his majeſties ſeruice, to Sir George Caluert, and that the connexion and dependance of them drewe a kind of neceſſity to the ſame courſe, and that I could not, at all tymes, conuey all things ſafely without a cyphar, you will not too rigorouſly condemne mee, eſpecially hauing written diuers tymes to your honor, and allwaies ordered copies to bee deliuered you of what I was able to relate; but as yett you were neuer pleaſed to take any notice, that you had receiued them, or were acceptable vnto you. Butt nowe, hauing lately had a chaunge of his majeſties order, vpon the great change of the affaires of Chriſtendome, and beeing enformed of your honors continuall attendance at court, I haue preſumed to ſend vnto you the encloſed diſcourſe, of the preſent condition and alterations in this ſtate, humbly deſiring you to communicate them with his majeſtie: and ſeeing his majeſties reſolution to recouer the loſt patrimony of his children by ſuch iuſt meanes as God hath enhabled him withall, that perhapps ſomething may moue from the prince of Tranſiluania, to diuert the great forces of thoſe who ſhall protect and patroniſe ſo iniuſt a cauſe; it may bee more neceſſary then formerly, that I ſhould receiue punctuall directions for my rule and diſcharge; that you wilbee pleaſed to ſollicitt his majeſtie therein, and to giue tymely inſtructions how farr I ſhall proceed

1624. in animation, or negotiation with that prince; my order yet extending no further, then to keep him in heart by ſuch courteſies, as may moue his frends to aſſiſt him. Butt as your honor will find by the encloſed, and my former aduiſes, that this leaue is come too late, optima viderentur, quorum tempus effugerat, ſo it is now requiſite, that I bee limitted and directed, either to write or ſend, and treat with his miniſters in particulars, and to doe whatſoeuer alſo may withdrawe him from his late raſh agreement, and peace made with the emperour; for now all things here are changed, and more force muſt bee vſed to raiſe him againe, then would haue ſerued to keep him vpp while hee was in motion.

HIS pretences why hee made this peace, you will find in my diſcours caſt vpon the neglect of him in Chriſtendome, while hee alone ſtood in the quarrell; that hee had no countenance, no encouragement, from any: and laſtly, upon the haſty and inconſiderate ratification of an old treaty with this port, without his comprehenſion. Both theſe may bee colours, yett they are very faire ones; but the greateſt omiſſion was, that there was no oppoſition made againſt the gloſſes of the emperors ambaſſador ſent hither, no man to reſiſt him, and to diſcouer the advantage hee ſtole by the ignorance of the laſt vizier, from whom, without councell, hee procured letters of confirmation of the old peace made at * Wizze, which was his only ayme; and not to enter into any particulars, whereby hee hath deceiued this ſtate, and enforced, or at leaſt left a ſhift to Gabor, to excuſe himſelfe in making peace. Butt to take things as they nowe are, there is litle hope of any thing to bee done from hence; for though the wiſeſt ſee they are ouerſhott, yett while their owne affaires in Tartaria and Aſia are vnſetled, they are content to winke, and will not prouoke more enemyes. Somwhat is referred to Buda, for performance and accompliſhment of that treaty accepted by the emperour, as the deſcription of their antient limitts and frontire; whereby Vach ſhould bee ſurrendered by the Turks, and priſoners ſett free, and other dammages repaired; which certeynly theſe will not performe, but hope to wynne tyme. What may arriſe from hence, I cannot foreſee; butt I doubt neither part will ſtrayne the cord till it breake. I wilbee vigilant vpon any occaſion is offered: butt if his majeſtie will giue mee leaue to ſpeak playne; though many are of opinion, that Bethlem, in hope of an alliance, is quite gone to the other party, and the Turkes feare it; yett I am perſwaded, hee will bee deceiued, and ſoone ſee it: when their turne is ſerued, they will offer him a waiting gentlewooman, as the emperors agent told mee, hee might bee content with the picture; and that if hee and this ſtate ſee any able hand engaged in the warre in Lower Germany, actually, wherby they may haue eaſe or aduantage, it wilbee no difficult matter to perſwade them to take it: butt now they haue both depoſed armes, and will ſee effects, before they venture their owne peace. The prince is of nature changeable and ambitious, but doubtleſs an enemy to the family of the emperour: hee only may make an vſefull diverſion for his majeſties ſeruice; but then it muſt not bee hoped, that hee ſhould bee blowne vpp with winde: there muſt bee ſome offer, ſome ouerture made to him, to take him into the protection of the vnion: hee muſt ground himſelfe vpon ſome treaty: hee may bee offered ſome honorable match; for of that hee is moſt deſirous, to enoble his bloud, and to raiſe his family. If theſe courſes bee taken with him tymely, hee may bee recouered, and raiſed, by the ſpring, to great vſe; if not, you muſt giue him loſt for euer.

* Zitwa.

I HAUE preſumed, and I feare, exceeded my limitts, extra provinciam ſaltitare; butt I hope, his majeſtie, and your honor, will take my zeale in the beſt ſenſe. If herein I ſhall receiue any directions, I will doe my endeauour, and effect more then I will promiſe. In the meane tyme, I will omitt no occaſion, as farr as I underſtand my commiſſion will warrant mee, to doe all things that ſhalbee fitt, or in my compaſſe, both here, and with the miniſters of the prince; deſiring your honor, that I may receiue a ſpeedy anſwere, that may bee vnto mee a ſtarr of direction to ſaile by, whereof I will giue his majeſtie a good account.

THE grand ſignor hath anſwered his majeſties letter, which is ſent by ſea; therfore I omitt to ſend the tranſlate ſo long before it; butt you may bee pleaſed to lett him know, it hath preuailed in moſt things. And I hope, the merchants will come and giue his majeſtie due thanks for his fauour, eſpecially in the buſineſs of Algier and Tunes, of which I will render to the lords an account by the next poſt.

I WILL interrupt your honor no further, but entreat you to take my honeſt meaning into your protection, and to preſerue it in his majeſties and his highneſs opinion, which I value aboue all earthly recompence. And ſo I committ your honor to the holy keeping of our bleſſed God.

Conſtantinople, 21 Auguſt,
Engliſh ſtile, 1624.

Conſtantinople, 21. Auguſt, 1624.

TWO gallies are arriued from the Black-ſea, that haue brought the dead bodies of two viziers, and certeyne newes of the ouerthrowe of the army ſent vnder the capten baſſa, to plant a newe prince of the Tartars; who hauing landed his forces and artilery, was rowted and beaten, himſelfe wounded, 28 peeces of ordinance loſt, two viziers of the bench, and about 5000 ſoldiours ſlayne and taken, the reſt ſaued by flight vpon the gallies. The capten baſſa with his fleete ſtaied about Varna, to receiue new order. There hath not happened to this empire, in many ages, a loſſe of more importance, in reſpect of the conſequences may followe. An imperiall army beaten, and therby Tartaria ſeperated from obedience to this ſtate, and that people taught to knowe, that they are able to make and maynteyne their owne prince.

THIS beeing no tyme to take knowledge of this diſgrace, policy teaching theſe rather to cure, then make the breach greater; the grand ſignor did, the next day, diſpatch a gally to the prince of the Tartars: whereuppon he ſent his ſonne a veſt, a ſword, and a confirmation in his place; caſting all the fault vpon the capten baſſa, and diſauowing his attempt, though hee was ſent out with commiſſion to doe it; which (to make their diſſimulation good) is like to coſt him his head, beeing ſent for in. This ſodaine yielding on this part ſhewes a great weakneſs and feare, to flatter a victorious enemy; and it is doubted how the Tartarian will accept a guift which hee hath taken by his owne ſtrength. If hee ſtand out, hee will proue a dangerous neighbour to this citty, all wayes beeing open to him, Adrianopoly and the borders already in feare of him, and (as is reported) ſome Coſſacks ioyned with him: butt I am of opinion, they will reconcile, and both parts conſent to diſſemble their preſent reſolutions.

TO make ſome compenſation of this defection, Abaſſa baſſa the ſtrong rebell hath made his peace with the * great vizier in Aſia; and to ſeale the creditt of his faith alterâ proditione, hath ſent the heads and eſtates of 3 of his chiefe followers to redeeme his owne. This hath much raiſed the countenance of this court; and though the pardon bee diſhonorable, yet it is ſeaſonable. Yett they dare not ioyne their armyes metu novæ reconciliationis; butt hee is gone to his owne gouerment of Arzerum, with promiſe to keepe it ſafe; and the vizier marched ſlowly towards Babilon, yett held by the Perſian.

* Colophon baſſa.

THERE is no account giuen by Bethlem Gabor, as yett, of his peace made with the emperour; which raiſeth a generall ſuſpition, that hee is really gone ouer to that party. His miniſters here, to ſome his frends, excuſe it vpon the litle reſpect or eaſe giuen him from Chriſtendome, when hee ſtood in the quarrell alone. To this ſtate they lay the fault vpon the raſhneſs and ignorance of the 2 laſt viziers, and vpon the irreſolution of all affaires by their often change, who had ſent letters from the grand ſignor to the emperor, accepting and ratificing the old treaty and peace, without mention or comprehenſion of Gabor; whereas it was formerly agreed, and ſo much promiſed to him, that hee ſhould, with the aſſiſtance of the baſſa of Buda, treate anewe, but armed. Butt the viziers, ignorant of all particulars, and carried away with the generall reſolution of a peace and treaty, the emperors ambaſſador wrought vpon that aduantage, and procured theſe letters ſo preiudiciall to the preſent eſtate of Gabor, and his deſſignes; which (as they ſay) beeing diſcouered by the emperor to their maſter, forced him to make the like haſt ſibi conſulere. By the confirmation of the old treaty of * Wizze, Vach ought to bee reſtored, reparation of damage, and freedome of priſoners. Butt the Turks hope, that the emperor wilbee ſo buſy in other parts, that hee will not ſtrayne and inſiſt too ſtrictly vpon particulars; wherby they may gayne a yeare or two, vntill their affaires are ſetled in Aſia, not meaning to ſurrender any thing; and ſo, while both parts diſſemble their preſent occaſions, it may proue a Valtolini buſineſs. Some circumſtances, for formes ſake, are referred to a meeting at Buda, about deſcribing and bounding the frontire, and reſtitution of priſoners, and reparation of damages; wherein, perhaps, may arriſe ſome difficulty, which beeing taken at firſt bound, may produce ſome other reſolutions then yett appeare. The vizier and councill here are not ſo well pleaſed, neither with the haſt of Gabor, nor with what hath paſſt from this port; butt anſwere beeing come from the emperour, that hee hath accepted the laſt treaty, they cannot now recall it; and if they ſhould, they are not in ſtate to diſpute new conditions. Soe all parts are forced to ſeeme content, and to diſguiſe their feares one of another.

CONCERNING Bethlem Gabor, though many beleeue, that the hope of ſo high a match as the emperors daughter deceiues him in earneſt, yett I make no doubt, hee will ſoone ſee the error; and beeing in his owne nature remuant, and earneſtly bent vpon his owne intereſt, that if hee ſee any other able prince actually engaged in the warr of the Pallatinate, it wilbee very eaſy to perſwade him to make vſe of the occaſion for his owne aduantage. This diuerſion muſt haue tyme to bee wrought this winter, wherein nothing can bee expected vntill the next ſpring.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

THE marquis Spinola, after five weekes lying idle in open villages about Breda, two howers diſtance from that towne, is finally ſett downe before it, where he hath bene now ſix dayes. He himſelf lodged with one halfe of the army at Ginneken, the next village adioyning on Brabants ſide; and the other halfe at Terheyden, the midway betwixt the Swallow and the towne: but whether the deſſigne be to approch it, or block it vp, as yet wee have no certainty; for the laſt newes from thence were onely, that the marquis, with Don Gonzales de Cordoua, and Don Louys de Velaſco, were in perſon buſye in aſſuring their quarters, and ſtopping the avenues to their camp, and towards the towne. Yet is not all ſo cloſe ſhutt vp, but that French voluntaryes are daily met in troopes, without more then their ſwords by their ſides, neare the towne, by ſuch as come in ſafety from thence, who reporte, that the two next dayes after the marquis was come to Ginneken, the boores were ſuffered to bring into the towne their corne and proviſion, on Berghen ſide, without empeachement; and there hath bene no hinderance of the common commerce with that towne, and cariage of victualls and all manner of munition from theſe parts by water, till Wedneſday laſt, that three beere botes, with a ſmall frigate, which did convoy them, were ſtopt, and taken vpon the river neare Tertreyden.

THIS manner of proceeding would breed as much aſtoniſhment here, as the marquis his lying ſo long ſtill with much want and incommodity, and doing nothing, but that a report brought hether by certayne men come over vpon paſport is believed, that the ſiege of that towne is expreſly commaunded out of Spayne; and that the marquis had ſome other deſſigne.

THE circuit of the place is ſo great, that all could not poſſibly be ſtopt at firſt; yet hath the marquis his whole army about him, count John being returned vnto him with certayne troopes, wherwith he ſhewed himſelf before Graue, and hath brought with him 2000 foote, and 7 troopes of horſe of count Henry Vandenberghs; who hath left his quarter at Mouick, and is marched vp towards Genep, with purpoſe, as is thought, to ſitt downe before that place.

THE prince of Orange, not diſtruſting any danger for the preſent at Breda, where are 45 foote and two horſe companyes in garriſon, beſides the burghers, which are warlike; the fortifications all finiſhed, and no want of victualls or munition, prepares to goe from hence with intention to doe ſomwhat of moment in other parts, whilſt the marquis is engaged before that towne: but it is to be doubted, he wilbe hindred from drawing troopes together ſufficient for any great deſſigne, by a new diverſion ſpoken of in Frizeland, by ſome of Tillyes troopes ioyning to the garriſons of Groll, Oldenſel, and Linghen; though Tilly himſelf (as the laſt newes wee have out of Germany ſay) hath made a bridge over the Mayne, and doth intend to march with that part of his army which hath wintered in Heſſen, towards Elſas, there to anſweare ſuch alarums as are given out of France; for which, it ſeemes, there is ſome ground, by the language Monſ. d'Eſpeſſe, newly arrived here, ambaſſador reſident out of France, held on Thurſday laſt, at his firſt audience in the aſſembly of the States generall; where, after accuſtomed complements, he profeſſed, The king his maſter did meditate nothing more then warre with Spayne, for reſtitution of the liberty of Germany, and protection of theſe provinces; which, he ſayd, he was commaunded freely and openly to denounce to the States, for their better incouragement. But they take it onely as a French boaſt; yet, ſince this is the ſtyle of that court, it may ſerve to ſtartle them in Germany.

THIS ambaſſador is come hether in extraordinary faire equippage for an ordinary reſident; and though he be a papiſt, doth profeſſe ſo much moderation in the point of religion, that a large roome in his houſe he cauſed to be made chappelwiſe, for the maſſe, before his comming, the States are content to winke at, promiſing themſelves better effects of his good offices in France, then of his predeceſſors of the religion, who in that regard were alwayes ſuſpected of partiality.

HERE hath been a vulgar brute any tyme this ſix weekes, that the two fleetes laſt ſent out of thoſe provinces to the Weſt-Indyes, the one vnder Wilkis as commaunder at ſea, and Dort at land; the other vnder l'Hermita, as chiefe both at ſea and land; had taken, the one, Baya de todos los Santos, in Braſile; the other, Arrica on the South-ſea. The firſt of which is proved true in effect, as it was two dayes ſince related to the States by one expreſly diſpatcht away with a frigate with the newes: and I have ſpoken with two Portingall Jeſuits, which eſcaping out of Baya, when the place was taken, and flying to Fernambuco, from whence they embarqued themſelves for Lisbone, were taken by one of theſe countrey freebooters, and brought priſoners hether; who confirme the loſſe of the place, the taking the governour, (Don Diego Mendoſa Hurtado) with fower or five others of quality, priſoners, and much wealth in the towne and ſhipping, of which five only were fyred, and the reſt taken; which hapned the 10th of May laſt, ſtylo novo.

THESE Jeſuits affirme, they left ſo great a fright in Fernambuc, that they believe, yf the Hollanders doe but ſhew themſelves before the place, they will take it: but whether they will ſtay and fortifye where they are, or purſue their victory, and returne with the ſpoyle, is here much doubted. The meſſenger which came from thence, left coronell Dort buſye in entrenching and fortifying Baya, in which he is very expert; and it is wiſht he will make it good, till a new fleete, now preparing by this Weſt-Indian company, (of which 12 good ſhipps are in readynes) may arrive with ſupplyes. But withall it is feared, that the king of Spayne will ſett vp his reſt in rooting them out of thoſe parts by ſome royall navye, where otherwiſe his abſolute monarchy may be much ſhaken by revolts, when the inhabitants may be ſecured of a new patronage; as even the Portugalls themſelves, and people of their race, which remayne neare Baya vpon that coaſt, make knowne they will caſt of the Caſtilian yoke, and ioyne with the Hollanders, when they can be once aſſured they will make good their conqueſt, and not leave them to the mercye of the Caſtilians.

OF the ſucceſſe of Hermitas enterpriſe there is good hope, becauſe he was left ſafe, in a due tyme for his exploict, at la Mers paſſage into the South-ſea, by a frigate of adviſe; which though it was caſt away in the returne, the men eſcaped, and brought the newes hether of the fleete being ſo well and ſo far advanced.

I HAVE receaued all your lordſhips before by the ordinarie, and now, laſtly, thoſe of the 12th of June. A particular letter, by little Lambert, of the 25. of Aprill, came to my hands two dayes ſince; the bearer wherof ſhall finde all the frendſhip I can doe him, both vppon your lordſhips recommendation, and likewiſe in regard of the honeſt report he makes of your lordſhip, and your noble lady, whoſe hands I kiſſe very affectionatly, and euer reſt,

Hagh, this 2d of
ſtylo nouo.

Your Lordſhips faythfull ſeruant,

DUDLEY CARLETON.

THE queen of Bohemia findes your lordſhips reſpect to her, in your particular letters; and the knowledge of affaires in your other to me, of aduertiſements; both which ſhee takes very gratiouſly: which you may belieue, though now ſhe writes not.

To the KING.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

I WILL not preſume to importune your Majeſtie with large particulars, hauing choſen rather to offer them to you, at your Majeſties leiſure, by Sir Edward Conway, to whom I haue addreſſed ſuch diſcourſe and matter as this court affoords; only, of ſome generalls, I hope your Majeſtie will pardon mee, that I mention them. Your Majeſties letter to the grand ſignior, in fauour of mee your vnworthy ſeruant, and of the merchants, came ſo opportunely for our eaſe, and was ſo well accepted for ſome redreſſe, that I preſume, (as I humbly doe) the Leuant company will render your Majeſtie due thanks. The anſwer giuen mee is ſent vnto your Majeſtie in July laſt, vpon our ſhipping, with another letter from the great vizier; of which, though a long paſſadge by ſea will hinder the ſpeedy deliuery, yett I haue ſent the tranſlates, and hope, if your Maieſtie pleaſe to forgiue the folly of their forme, ſtile, and vanityes, the matter will giue you ſome content; for therin you ſhall find the great reſpect is borne to your Majeſtie by this emperour and ſtate, and very large promiſſes of the continuance and encreaſe, and of reformation, in tyme to come, of any iniury offered to vs your Highneſſes ſubiects. To the letters themſelues, I will bee bold to referre your Majeſtie, and only point at what effects wee haue found of them. Here the grand ſignior gaue a command of the higheſt nature, ſigned with his owne hand, in theſe words, ſent to the vizier; Take heede that the ſubiects of the king of England receiue hereafter no wrong: do iuſtice, and ſuffer not the ambaſſador to haue any cauſe of complaint, at your perill; for I will not that he bee moleſted. In the buſineſſ long depending of Algier and Tunes, I was reſolued not to bee deceiued with any more vaine commands from this port, for ſuch I had found the former; butt, vpon your Majeſties laſt complaynt, the grand ſignior, vizier, and all the baſſa's, ſeemed to bee ſo deſirous therin, both to giue your Majeſtie ſatisfaction, and to take away the occaſion of any breach might enſue of the peace and commerce with this empire, that they offered mee newe orders, ſo effectuall, ſigned by the ſultan, ſent by a publicque officer, a newe baſſa of Algier appointed, the old recalled, and the command for execution therof giuen to him in my preſence, vpon perill of his head, that I could not refuſe them; and they are together diſpatched the port 6 weekes ſince. How farre to engage my word for ſuch a people, or my iudgment vpon their obedience, is dangerous: but thus much I dare teſtifye, that the commands ſent from hence are ſincere; that the baſſa hauing vndertaken the effecting of them, vpon his life, ther is no other likelyhood but that the peace willbe accepted and kept; which willbe greatly for the proffit, eaſe, and ſafety of your Maieſties poore ſubiects: only one litle helpe is wanting, that there might bee giuen the baſſas of thoſe places ſome preſent, to recompence their loſſes of ſhares, in maynteyning it. And becauſe of this affaire, I haue giuen a larger account to the lords of your Majeſties councell, and to the Leuant merchants, and haue therwith ſent the copies of the commands. I will not trouble your Majeſtie farther: but if you vouchſafe to ſee them, (which, for their forme, are not vnworthy) your Majeſtie willbe ſatisfied in my endeauour, that therin can no more bee promiſed on theirs, nor done on my part.

THE concluſion of peace betweene the emperour and the prince of Tranſiluania, I doubt not, is long ſince knowne vnto your Majeſtie. His miniſters here make diuers excuſes, according to the intereſt of thoſe to whom they giue them: but ther is no account yett ſent to this ſtate, what the conditions are; which makes it the more ſuſpected, that he hath rather vnited with the emperour, then made a bare and newtrall peace. From Poland I receiued a rude draught of the articles in barbarous language: I dare not avow that they are exactly right, but vpon the credit of the ſender, the duke of Sbaraſs, who commended them to mee, as a copy of that ſent his king, who, both for intereſt and neighbourhood, is likely to know the truth: ſuch as they are, I haue encloſed them to Mr. ſecretary.

WHAT my opinion is in that matter, I haue by many former, and by this occaſion, ventured your Majeſties cenſure of mee; that I thought that prince was too litle reſpected, and that his departure to the emperour would bring a great addition of eaſe or force. That is now paſt preuention, though perhapps not paſt recalling:

for I am perſwaded, if he ſawe any able arme engaged, that he might not ſtand alone, and any ground of ſecuryty for himſelfe, that he ſhould be cared for, and comprehended in the concluſion, that it were not difficult to ſett him againe on foote; and that without any ſcandall of ayds from hence, who cannot endanger any part of Chriſtendome. And this is to be obſerued out of the manner and nature of the warre, which can be made by that prince, that it is onely vſefull for a diuerſion, beeing rather a kind of incurſion with a multitude of horſe, without great artilery, or any formed army, then fitt to beſeege or take places of importance, ſuch as are vpon the frontire of the Turke. And ſuch an enemy is more apt to riſe in any occaſion, (when others muſt conſider how they venture their owne, when they make a breach) becauſe his end is booty and ſpoyle, and his retraict eaſy into his cuntry, where hee is ſure not to bee attempted, while he depends vpon this empire, with whom they will not breake. Yett ſuch an inuaſion will require as great force to reſiſt it for the tyme, as the moſt formall enemy: and if the prince of Tranſiluania but moue toward Morauia or Sileſia, of neceſſitye both the emperour and the duke of Bauarre muſt recall their beſt ſtrength, to keepe their townes from fire, and their owne diſcontent people from reuolt. If I haue in any preſumption, or in one ſyllable, exceeded my limitts, to meddle thus farre in matters ſo high aboue mee, I humbly craue pardon; theſe my errors are the fruits of my zeale to your Majeſties ſeruice, and of an honeſt heart. If your Majeſtie take any content to know the eſtate of this empire in it ſelfe; the generall is, it is enuironed with many troubles abroade; within, infected with pouerty, mutiny, and want of gouerment. But hauing continued a cuſtome to ſend by euery poſt a kind of commentarie to Mr. ſecretarye, I will rather preſume to referre your Majeſtie to them, if you pleaſe to call for them, then to obtrude them vpon you without licence. And thus, vnable and vnworthy to doe your Majeſtie any acceptable ſeruice, I will retire to that way wherin all ſubiects are equall, to pray for your Majeſties eternall felicity.

Conſtantinople,
4. Sept. 1624.

Your Majeſties moſt humbly deuoted ſubiect and ſeruant,

R.

To Sir GEORGE CALVERT.

BY this ordinarie I haue preſumed to write to his majeſtie, giuing account of diuers matters; as, of the anſwere of his letter, the buſines of Algier, and the treaty between the emperour and the prince of Tranſyluania; wherin I haue taken the boldnes to open my owne hart, perhaps with more zeale then diſcretion or iudgement. Theſe I haue addreſſed to Sir Edw. Conway, and with them a coppy of the articles concluded betweene them, in ſuch barbarous language, and imperfect, as they were ſent mee from Poland. I cannot affirme, that they are exactly right; but from diuers circumſtances, and the creditt of the duke of Sbaras, who for intereſt, and uicinitye of the kingdom, muſt know the truth, I doe beleeue they are the ſubſtance; wherby it will appeare, that Gabor hath done ſomwhat more then make a neutrall peace, hauing in ſome ſort conſented to reſiſt the Turkes, in any inuaſion, for thoſe parts of Hungarye granted him, and in no caſe to aſſiſt them. Ther is yett no aduice come from him, what are the particulars of his concluſion, which augments the ſuſpition here; and I beleeue he will neuer communicate to them the truth in any poynt that may giue them diſtaſt; but he will keepe frends with both, as artificially as he can. I could not now ſend your honor another tranſcript of them, but will recompence it by the next; though, I doubt not, you will haue a ſight of theſe: which when your honour ſhall haue conſidered, and all that can bee ſayd of Gabor, yet it is not impoſſible to ſett him againe on foote, nor nothing more neceſſarye for a diuerſion. But the motion muſt not beginn from the Turkes; for they are not deſirous of a breach out of rancknes, and abundance, but for aduantage: therfore the prince himſelfe muſt mooue yt to them, as he did the laſt yeare, with coulors and ſhowes, for his owne ends; and then he wilbe willingly heard, and he cannot want aydes. It is neceſſarye alſo, that your honor know, the Tranſyluanians, who are his proper ſubiects, are uery wearye of the quarrell; for they gett nothing by it: it is only the Hungars that prouoke him, and

I HAUE herewith ſent your honor the coppyes of the grand ſigniors and viziers letters to his majeſtie; which I doe not directly addreſs to him, for reſpect of the originalls, ſo far behind: but becauſe it is neceſſarye his majeſtie ſhould tymely know the effects, and that the merchaunts may take notice of them, to render their due thancks, I haue choſen to conuey them by your honor, when you ſhall fynd the fitteſt oportunitye for deliuerye. To the companye I haue ſent the coppyes of the commands to Algier and Tunes, which are the fruicts of his majeſties letters, and as much as can bee expected or done; for this ſtate will not breake with them for us; of which I haue particularlye giuen relation to the lords of his majeſties councell, hauing receiued from them my order: of the buſines I haue made my laſt tryall, deſiring your honor to preſent yt to them, and to warne the merchants to bring theſe commands, for my full diſchardge; and that you would bee pleaſed to read them. If my letters and diſcourſe the laſt poſt, of date the 20th of Auguſt, bee not arriued, I haue ſuplyed the one by the incloſed, and the other by a coppy ſent Mr. Branthwaite, from whom your honor may command yt.

THE capten baſſa was come in to the mouth of the chanell, forced to leaue the ſea by the mutiny of the ſoldiers, who had loſt their armes and munition, when he loſt his canon. But a new aduice from Varna, of 150 boats of the Coſſacks, ſeene and deſſigned for this cytty, cauſed him to bee ſent out agayne, beeing reenforced with men, and all neceſſaryes, not without danger of his life; the young emperor in perſon, in a ſmall bardge, going to diſpeed him.

FROM Aſya wee haue no newes, but that the viziere reſts with his army at Iconium. Abaſſa is in outward obedience, and the other content to beleeue it. The Perſian keepes what he had gotten, and wee muſt attend the ſpring for an iſſue of that warr.

I AM informed out of Italye, that diuers Genoueſes, by their reſpondents and factors in England, are intereſſed in many of the beſt merchants ſhipps of London, as owners; not vnder their owne names, but ſome other, hauing an 8th or 10th part: the ſhips are alway at their command to be imployed; as inſtance, The St. George, called firſt The Tygar, a ſhip of 500 tunns, new built, armed with between 30 and 40 peices of ordinance. Vnder this coulor, both our ſhips and munition may bee ſtoln from us, to ſerue the kyng of Spayne; for the owners may giue order to ſett them out of England for Genoa, or the coaſt of Italye, with fiſh, or other commoditye, as upon a merchants voyadge: but when they are abroad, the ſhips are theirs; they ſhalbe lent, or taken up, or arreſted, for the ſeruice of the Spaniard, as the George now is. It is thought, that many more are in the ſame manner belonging to them, and that it is a practice of policye, and by correſpondence with Spayne. It may not bee true; but, in my poore opinion, it were uery requiſite that it ſhould bee ſought into, and reformed. Your honor wilbe pleaſed to acquaynt the lords with the ſuſpition. I haue touchd yt to Sir Edw. Conwey. Thus, crauing pardon for the continuall trouble I giue your honor, I committ you to the bleſſing of Almighty God.

Conſtantinople,
1^{4}_{4} Sept. 1624.

Your Honors moſt affectionat frend and ſeruant.

I DOE not take myſelfe diſcharged of your lordſhipps command, ſent in May and June, 1622, That I ſhould endeauour the ſuppreſſion, at leaſt, the reſtrainct, of the piratts of Algier and Tuuis, by authority of the grand ſignior, untill I haue either brought it unto a perfect end, or haue diſcouered it wholly deſperat; though I haue rendered your lordſhipps accompt of my proceedings and hopes theſe two laſt yeares; wherein I firſt giue your lordſhipps humble thanks for the good acceptance and allowance made mee for what I had done: but the buſineſs it ſelfe either miſcarried, by thoſe ſent thither; or from the litle reſpect that was borne to the laſt emperour, nothing hath bene effected of value; but they haue continued, not only to make prey of vs, and all other nations, at ſea, butt they haue landed at Scanderone in the grand ſigniors dominion, robbed the Scale, Turks and Chriſtians, without reſpect or difference; and haue, for moſt part of this ſummer, ſhutt upp the Archipelago, and ſtopped all paſſadge to this citty. Of how great conſequence their growth is, to the utter ruyne of all trade, euen to the mouth of the Engliſh chanell, I haue often intimated: butt other occaſions not ſuffering this to be taken into conſideration, about 6 moneths paſt I made a proteſt to the grand vizier, and the capitan baſſa, againſt them, in his majeſties name, That hee would no longer bee deceiued with falſe promiſſes, the effects whereof ſhewed ſoe litle ſyncerity; and did deſire, that either they might bee declared enemyes to this ſtate, or that a preſent courſe (which I propoſed) might bee putt in execution, for their correction: of which I then gaue relation to Sir George Caluert, and of the formall wyndy anſwere I receiued, deſiring him to acquaint your lordſhipps; and therefore ſhall not need to make repetition. I thought it out of all hope euer to doe any good by treaty or agreement with a people without faith, without gouerment, without a prince or head, at leaſt, without obedience to him; men that liued upon ſpoile, enemy to all the world; for ſo their actions haue declared. Butt this ſtate taking their owne cauſe a litle more to heart, then our complaynts, ſeeing their inſolency to proceed euen to the deſtruction of the grand ſigniors owne ports, and trade and cuſtomes, it moued them alſo to take into conſideration our loſſes, part whereof fell uppon themſelues. At this inſtant his majeſties letter to the emperour arriuing, and requiring iuſtice in that cauſe, and thervpon a true information giuen him of the outragious courſes of thoſe people; hee inſtantly gaue order for redreſſe, by fiue ſeuerall commands, ſigned by his owne hand, the higheſt kind of edict vſuall in this empire. Hee ſent a new baſſa to Algier, recalling the old, and an officer of his court, expreſſly to knowe the reſolution of theſe rouers, whether they would obey or no. How earneſt and efficatious theſe commands are, I will not mention, hauing ſent copies of two of them for my diſcharge, humbly deſiring your lordſhipps to vouchſafe the reading of them, when they ſhall bee preſented by the Leuant company; whereby you will then reſolue, that no more can bee promiſſed by them, nor done by mee: yett, to giue them the more ſtrength, I cauſed the new baſſa to bee ſent for before the vizier, who read the commands to him, and told him, It was the grand ſigniors abſolute will, That hee ſhould eſtabliſh and maynteyne a peace with the Engliſh: That to that purpoſe hee was ſent; no excuſe ſhould bee accepted: That if hee performed it, hee would bee his agent at court for his preferment; if not, for his puniſhment: concluding with a ſolemne proteſt, That his head ſhould anſwere the next complaynt. Vpon theſe conditions, the baſſa hath vndertaken the gouerment, and is departed with a capigi, and the grand ſigniors commands, ſixe weeks paſt. What the ſucceſſe wilbe, I dare not promiſe; your lordſhipps wilbe pleaſed to expect it from the conſull of Algier, whom I haue ordered to giue you account: butt my opinion is, that it wilbee performed at firſt, and that the grand ſigniors commands wilbe accepted, and the peace proclaymed: for the baſſa hath giuen here ſuch ſatisfaction, that I cannot doubt him; and the ſoldioury are weary of the ſmart encounters they meete with in our good ſhipping; and the rumour of our fleets of warr at ſea will make them deſirous to haue no quarrell with us. There is only one circumſtance wanting, which I had no power to undertake; the baſſa's of theſe two ports haue their greateſt proffit by theyr ſhares of prizes, and that hath made them ſo backward to obey, and make peace, to theyr loſſe:

1624. butt as I haue procured a prohibition to them to take any; ſo, if it might bee ſupplyed by ſome feeling, (which is the beſt argument in Turky) that is, 1000 dollors a yeare allowed mee, to giue in preſent to the baſſa at the end of euery yeare, that wee haue experience that hee had kept the peace, and not otherwiſe; I am confident I could both maynteyne ſuch a baſſa in his place, and our owne ſecurity by his meanes. The matter is not great, nor no way diſhonorable, beeing a free guift from mee, of which wee giue ſtore here to no purpoſe, from a baſe cuſtome. If your lordſhipps bee pleaſed to conſider this motion, and to truſt mee, it is the uery life and roote of all our endeauours; and to ſend for the Leuant company, to propound how this litle ſumme may bee raiſed, which ſhall not bee giuen, except peace bee kept; and then it wilbee eaſy to make computation how many 100000 dollors the common wealth will ſaue by it euery yeare. I haue propoſed this to the merchants, and humbly referre it to your lordſhipps conſideration: the laſt tryall is made, and I can doe no more, nor will neuer ſeeke for more commands, if this and this courſe preuaile not; deſiring your lordſhipps to accept my poore endeauours.

I WILL not preſume to trouble your lordſhipps with other diſcourſes of this court, and the affaires of Hungary; of which, giuing a continued rellation to Mr. ſecretary, I doubt not you are fully enformed. Your lordſhipps wilbe pleaſed to pardon this my intruſion, and to preſerue mee in your grace and fauour; and in that confidence, with all due reſpect, I take my leaue.

To the QUEENE of BOHEMIA.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

I SHALL hereafter, with much more pleaſure, preſume to interrupt your Majeſtie with my letters, beeing ſett at more liberty to doe your ſeruice; it is not conuenient that I ſhould ſay wherein. As your Majeſtie will at firſt conceiue it, ſo you ſhall now try mee, whether my affections and endeauors will concurre: and though the beſt opportunity be loſt by too long forbearance, yett the cauſe is not deſperate, if rightly vndertaken. I haue, this poſt, written to his majeſtie, and both ſecretaries, my opinion, which I know is truly grounded; what is my part, diligence and my life, ſhall end together. I haue ſent my lord ambaſſador, according to my cuſtome, a continuance of diſcourſe of our affaires here, and with it a copy of the treaty betweene the emperour and the prince of Tranſiluania, which I receiued from Poland for true, vpon the creditt of a good author, whoſe intereſt and neighbourhood muſt bee well informed. Therein your Majeſtie will find ſome ſtraunge conditions, not of a neutrall peace, butt of a ſeeming adhærance to the emperour. Notwithſtanding, giue mee leaue to make a comment vpon it: If theſe articles bee not ſealed with a marriage, (which is almoſt impoſſible) the prince will remayne more inwardly offended then euer; and it may bee conceiued, that hee hath rather giuen way to tyme, then really depoſed all his high thoughts. Therefore, ſeeing it will ſo nearly concerne your Majeſties ſeruice, that hee bee in tyme wakened from this dreame, and ſett in his old way; there is no other councell left, butt that the king of Bohemia ſend him an ambaſſador, and offer him to bee the meanes of his admittance into the vnion; to which, there is much hope, both his majeſtie and other princes will conſent. Then, ſeeing hee hath had no other excuſe butt his neglect, when hee ſhalbee aſſured of eaſe by the warre vndertaken in the Palatinate, to the defence whereof the Bauarian forces wilbee wholly ymployed, that hee may riſe againe vpon aduantage, and that in any treaty or compoſition that may enſue, that hee ſhalbee cared for, and comprehended as one of the league, there is no queſtion hee will reſume both the title and crowne hee hath ſo vnwillingly reſigned. It is not difficult to propound him ſome honorable match in Germany, of which hee is deſirous, to enoble his bloud, and confirme his houſe, if hee may haue iſſue. Many other ouertures there are, that will pleaſe him, which will ſhowe themſelues, if it were once reſolued on. Your Majeſtie beleeue, though this opinion come from mee, that it is deriued from much reaſon, and great experience of his nature. Hee muſt now bee ſought vnto in way of compenſation. To think that hee ſhould be moou'd from hence, is a great error; hee doth not depend vpon this ſtate butt for aduantage and ſafety ; and it was hee that ſtirred them the laſt yeare, not they him ; neither are they now in caſe, or deſirous, to giue any occaſion of breach ; but if the prince take ſuch a reſolution of his owne, and for his owne ends, hee is able to head them, and will neuer want coulers and ſhowes to drawe ayde. Butt the difficulty and only point is, to engage him againe, and to giue life to his ambition by aſſurance of correſpondency, and a diuerſion in Chriſtendome, to ſett both at more liberty to purſue their particular deſſignes. Your Majeſtie bee pleaſed to vrdge this courſe ; and as there is hope of very good ſucceſs, ſo nothing ſhalbee wanting here, that may ſecond and fortify it. The Tranſiluanians are weary of the warre, as hauing no benefitt by it ; butt it is the Hungars, whoſe naturall hatred of the Germans, and deſire to caſt off the imperiall ſubiection, that muſt giue life to the cauſe ; for that kingdome is his mark, and in hope of that hee may bee only wrought vpon. The count of Torne, I am perſwaded, out of his great experience, will concurr in this aduiſe ; and I ſhall be gladd, if your Majeſtie vouchſafe to ſignify howe it is approued and putt in practice.

FOR the affaires of this place, I will preſume to referre your Majeſtie to Sir Dudley Carleton, to whom I haue written largely. Your Majeſtie will not now doubt, you haue a faithfull ſeruant here, that will omitt no occaſion. In that confidence I will reſt, and in hope that I ſhall liue to ſee your Majeſtie the glory of Chriſtendome, as you are of ladyes ; which Allmighty God graunt for his poore churches comfort, and releaſe of oppreſſion.

Your Majeſties moſt humble, true ſeruant.

I AM now in hope I ſhall receiue ſome grace by the commands of the king of Bohemia ; whoſe hands I humbly kiſs, as my poore wife doth your Majeſties feete.

From Mr. BRANTHWAITE.

Right Honorable,

SINCE the laſte fregat wente awaie from hence with letters towardes that place, theſe 3 adioyned pacquetts, directed to your honor, came to my handes, which I make noe doubt will ſatisfie you in pointe of our home-bred affaires ; and therefore in that behalfe I maie, for the preſent, be ſtill.

HERE hathe nothinge of momente paſſed latlie in this ſtate, more then a tragicall accident by fier from heauen at Verona, the printed relation whereof I ſende your honor herewithall : and that this prince is yett ſoe feeble after his longe ſickneſſe, that he comethe not abroad into anie publique aſſemblie.

VPON the thirde of the laſte monthe, prince Filibert, ſeacond ſonne to the duke of Sauoy, died at Palermo of a tertian feauer ; whereby three greate offices which he helde of the kinge of Spaine are voide ; for he was prior of Caſteel, vice-kinge of Cicilie, and general at ſea. He is muche lamented ; and there wante not thoſe that thinke his end was haſtned forward by ſome ſiniſter meanes, hauing but 32 yeares, and a bodie of a verie proſperous ſtate.

THE colligati doe yett iuſte nothinge about the Valtelina, thoughe the late leuies in Fraunce were expected to fall with ſome expedition into Italie, for that or ſome other deſigne ; but I heare from Rome, the queene mother hathe writt to her countryman the pope, that he ſholde not conceiue anie feare ; for ſhe wolde preuaile ſoe farre with her ſonne, that the Frenche armes ſholde not come vpon this ſide. I praie God (in caſe the matche goe not forwarde with vs) the pointes of theire ſwordes be not turned againſte the poore proteſtants of that kingdom.

MY lord ambaſſador, Sir Iſaac Wake, is in the courte of the duke of Sauoy, where he writethe he ſhall yett be entertained with ſome buſineſſe there ; and therefore I can yett prefixe you noe time of his repaire hether, where vpon my parte he is expected with ſome deuotion, that I maie iourney homewarde before the ſhuttinge vpp of the yeare.

AND thus, with my moſte humble ſeruice remembred to your honor, crauinge pardon for all my boldnes, I committ your honor to the bleſſed tuition of the Almightie, and reſte,

Your Honors, alwais readie to diſpoſe of,

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My Lord,

I HAUE written ſo lately unto your lordſhip of all occurrents in theſe parts, that I haue little at this time to advertiſe, and ſhould haue lett this ordinary paſſe in ſilence, but that the queen of Bohemia hath commanded me to addreſſe her incloſed unto your lordſhip under my couer; which occaſion of ſaluting your lordſhip I moſt willingly embrace, and the rather, becauſe I finde you were growne ombrageous of late, by not receauing the accuſtomed frequency of her majeſties letters; but I make no queſtion, the incloſed, with a former I ſent you from her majeſtie, will giue you full ſatisfaction, that there is no change in her majeſties wonted good affection.

THE prince of Orange, on the 4th of this preſent, drew from this place all our gallants; whome he hath carried with him vp towards Nimmeghen, where he hath appointed his troopes to meete him, with deſigne (as is beleeued here) to attempt ſome exploict of importance in thoſe higher parts, whilſt the marquis Spinola buſyeth himſelf abowt Breda, where he ſtill remaines; whether with purpoſe to beſiege the ſame or not, doth not yet well appeare by any thing he hath done. It is now abowt 15 dayes, ſince, leauing his olde quarter at Gylſen, he drew neare the towne, lodgeing himſelf at Gennekens, a ſmall village within halfe a mile of the walls. Counte John de Naſſau tooke his quarter at Terheyden, ſomwhat more remote. But all the time ſince their comming thither, hath bin ſpent in fortiſying their quarters, which remaines ſtill in doing; meane while they ſuffer great wants and incommodities, which will be hard to redreſſe ſo long as they continew there. From Bruxells it is advertiſed, their deſigne is to blocque up the towne, and to take it by famiſhing thoſe within; but what hope they can haue of ſuch a ſucceſſe, I cannot imagine, there being neare two yeares prouiſion of corne, and very plentifull magaſins of all ſtore of munition: neither are the ports ſo ſtraightly beſett, but that, euery day, men both go in and owt, and much prouiſion of victualls findes entrance, 60 oxen at once, one day the laſt weeke; and in a manner, whatſoeuer elſe is eſteemed neceſſary for defence of the towne. Counte Henry Vandenbergh lyeth not farre from Genep with 4 or 5000 men, doing as little there as the marquis Spinola at Breda: which manner of offenſiue warre cauſeth no ſmall aſtoniſhment here; but it is expected, the prince of Oranges being abroad will awake them; of the ſucceſſe of whoſe jorney I ſhall not faile to giue advertiſement, when I haue knowledge thereof. For the preſent, I ſend you no more then theſe printed papers; with which I preſent my beſt ſeruice to your lordſhip and your noble lady, euer reſting

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionat ſeruant,

To the Duke of SBARAS.

My Lord,

I FYND my ſelfe your lordſhips debter 3 letters, the firſt two of the dates of May, by his majeſties ſecretarye here reſident; the later, by your lordſhips ſeruant now returned: and if I haue long forboorne eyther their anſwere or the continuance of the correſpondence and loue I beare your lordſhip, you wilbe pleaſed to impute the faulte to the danger of ordinarye conuoyance, and the treacherye of ſome here, by whom I hoped to haue ſent more ſafely; which hath made mee wary, and miſtruſtfull of all. Your firſt mentioneth only one of myne receiued; the ſecond, another of March, wherin I preſumed to write to his highneſs, which, by that meanes, I perceaue, is accepted, and that hee hath uouchſafed to take knowledge to his majeſtie, my lord and maſter, of my deſire to doe him ſeruice, far aboue my meritt; for which fauor, I haue only in my power to render his highnes humble thanckes. I hope to make good (in ſpight of any malignitye) the opinion he hath expreſſed of mee. The laſt brought mee the two treatyes, for which I reſt your lordſhips debter: that of the Voltoline, I ſuppoſe, are but propoſitions, and nothing concluded ſo eaſye for the ends of Spaine: to graunt the paſſage, and to baniſh all of the religion, will prooue a woorke of more difficultye. From Tranſyluania wee haue had no certayne newes this 4 monthes, but in generall, of a peace made; what it was, wee were all uncertayne, untill your lordſhip ſent it mee; which paſſing the hands of ſome ill Latiniſt, loſt much of the perfection in tranſcribing; but the ſence I haue collected; and fynd yt extreame ſtrange, that Gabor ſhould not only renounce a crowne, but enter into articles preiudiciall to that dependance he hath from hence. If your lordſhip be ſure that it is a true coppy, then I eaſely coniecture the cauſe why the prince ſo deferrs to giue account therof to this ſtate; and I beleeue he will diſſemble the greateſt part, and neuer confeſe ſo much. Your lordſhip ſhall doe mee an infinite fauour, if you pleaſe to reexamine yt, and to ſend mee, by the firſt poſſible conuoyance, a more exact aduiſe of the concluſion betwene them; which, both for intereſt and neighborhood, your lordſhip before this tyme muſt needs haue; ſuppoſing that this beeing ſent from Poland in June, it may bee in ſome parte defectiue, ſeeing the treaty continued longer. The other aduiſes, giuen mee by your lordſhip, of the preparations of the emperor and Spayne, for the Lower Germany and Holland, the intereſſed doe know their deſſignes, and will prepare them a warme welcome: certaynly wee feare their treatyes more then their ſwords. Of the duke of Neuers fleet wee haue heard nothing in the ſea, but much in the ayre; ſuper nubila rates: this ſummer they might haue raygned in the Medeterran alone; ther was none to offend them. For the priuat caution your lordſhip hath giuen mee concerning my ſelfe, I take it as a great argument of your frendſhip: the ſuſpition was not new to mee; but the confirmation from ſo good an author hath done mee much aduantage; and I can giue your lordſhip no better aſeurance of their falſhood, then your owne experience, the miniſters of Gabor, who can wittnes, when I knew in my hart, that his actions were beneficiall to ſome whom I was bound to honor, yet I neuer aſſiſted, nor conſented to them, for the publique good. I can ſay no more; but that young man is a traytor to his countrye; therfore I can looke for no truſt in him to mee. He hath deteyned at leaſt two packetts to your lordſhip, and, I feare, ſhowed them here: he hath often ſollicited mee for more; but hauing ſome warning from a gentleman ſent hither by your lordſhip, I haue forborne, perhaps to my preiudice in his majeſties and your lordſhips opinion. For the other, with whom he dayly conſpires, I deſpiſe any thing he can ſay or write: men that build their owne reputations upon the ſlander of others, are not woorth the anger; and that he diſſembles it to mee, ſhowes he dares not juſtefye yt. This hath beene the cauſe, that I haue had no conuerſation with his majeſties nuntio here; that interpreter hath ſought to carry him other wayes, and to ſeeke newe frends. I offered my ſeruice with all good heart; but ſeeing it was refuſed, I haue not forced it upon him: I thincke it was not his majeſties order; and I am ſure, if he had great uſe of any help, he could not fynd ſo ready in any other place, nor perhaps ſo powerfull. When the Coſſacks made that deſperate attempt within the channell, which putt all in confuſion, I feared he might bee in danger; I am ſure I only was in ſuſpicion, and your lordſhip knowes no innocence is ſafe agaynſt furye; yet I tendered my help without acceptance, and did not goe behind the doore to tell the inſtrument how ill I tooke yt. Breefly, I ſhalbe moſt willing to doe his majeſtie or your lordſhip any honeſt ſeruice, if it bee accepted: if ther bee better wayes, I am glad any hath diſcouered them.

FOR this preſent eſtate, all is in quiett; and the youth of the emperor giues them great hope of recollecting themſelues: only the diſgrace receiued in Tartary, beeing diſauowed, is likely to fall heauy upon the councellers of that unſeaſonable attempt. A ſword and veſt is ſent to Mechemett Gheray, and he is confermed han, and it is ſayd, it is accepted; and that the loſt canon ſhalbe ſent back: but the Janizaries demand juſtice of the capten baſſa, for engaging them in that action; and ſome muſt bee ſacrificed to the error, and the people. The gallyes are not yet ſuffered, to come in. The emperor in perſon went to the fanall, to giue order for their reenforcing, upon a rumor of more Coſſacks ſeene in the ſea, wher they make guard. Of this kynd of warr I know not what to ſay; only, if it bee not preuented, it will begett greater inconuenience. It is true, the incurſions of the Tartars deſerue all kynd of like reuenge; but now that a breach hath been between them and the Turkes, though they bee outwardly reconciled, yet they cannot ſo peice agayne, but that you might by ſome meanes ſecure your ſelues of that great incommoditye at once: for if this courſe continew, this ſtate will aduenture any thing, rather then endure alarms in the night in their head cytty; and though yet they are not in condition to breake, yett they take all courſes in Aſya to recouer themſelues;

MY laſt letters to your lordſhip were dated on the 18. Aprill, by a Poliſh gentleman; another the 25. with a breefe diſcourſe encloſed, by a ſeruant of the Duch ambaſſador: I hope they will ſhow you more of my affection, then abilitye to doe you ſeruice, wherof this bearer would in no ſort make uſe of mee. I know not what ſeaes my letters paſſe; but I know I haue written your lordſhip aboue ten ſince your departure.

I BESEECH you, returne my humble thanks to his majeſtie, to whom I will write by his agent; in the mean tyme you may be pleaſed to ſay truth for me: I haue not fayled in any thing in my power, but I haue beene commanded nothing theſe ten months. And ſoe I leaue to trouble your lordſhip, wiſhing you encreaſe of honor and happines.

Conſt. $\frac{10}{20}$. Sept. 1624.

I HEARE your lordſhip deſires to goe to the hott-baths of Acon, in Germany: you wilbe ſubiect to partyes of ſtraggling horſe in your journy; it is neighbor to all the quarrells. In England the baths are more holſome, and more renowned, I am ſure, more quiett and ſafe, wher I know you wilbe honored.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

THE prince of Orange (according as I advertiſed your lordſhip in my laſt) went vp to ſeeke out count Henry Vandenbergh, who, by reaſon of the contrariety of the winds, wherby the going vp of his excellencyes canon was hindered, had leyſure to provide for all, by diſtributing a great part of his men in Weſel, Berck vpon the Rhyne, and Goch, and lodging himſelf with the reſt in Hammeken (a ſtrong quarter betwixt two rivers near Berck): yet the prince of Orange, imagining, by his going on towards thoſe townes, he might cauſe the marquis Spinola to riſe from before Breda, went forward with 127 companyes of foote, 32 of horſe, and 80 peeces of canon; which number is made ſo great by certayne ſmall peeces drawne each with one horſe, called drakes, of his new invention. His onely attempts were, the recovery of Cleue and Munderbergh, taken by count Henry Vandenbergh in his deſcent that way this ſummer; at the firſt of which places he mett with more reſiſtance then he expected, there being 300 men in garriſon, which attended canon, but yealded vpon the firſt ſhott. The caſtle indured two batteryes, one within the other, without the towne, which played a whole day; in which the captayne of the caſtle and 13 ſoldiers being ſlayne, the reſt yealded, and went out with their ſwords onely by their ſydes. And this was all which his excellency thought fitt to vndertake in thoſe parts, finding the foreſaid townes well manned and fortifyed, and not judging it convenient to adventure the weakening of his army before any of thoſe places; and having a greater worke before his eyes, (the leavying the ſiege of Breda) is accordingly fallen downe towards it; but what courſe he will take in that enterpriſe, which depends on events, is hard to conjecture. And the marquis Spinola having fortifyed his quarters in all parts, (which is all he hath hetherto performed) it will prove a tough and long peece of worke; and (I thincke) the labour wilbe on both ſides, which ſhall ſtarve one another firſt.

HERE are come, this weeke paſt, great and happy returnes from ſea; three Eaſt-Indian ſhipps richly laden, and a priſe taken in the Weſt-Indyes in the gulfe of Mexico, neare the cape Santon, on the iſle of Cuba, by one Scoutens, a native of this towne; who having bene trayned vp in his youth amongſt the Spaniards in thoſe parts, was ſett out in January laſt by the new Weſt-Indian company, with three ſhipps; one of which he loſt in the fight with this he hath taken; the other he ſent home with the priſe; with the third he himſelf ſtayes vpon further adventure. This priſe is a ſhip of 400 tunnes, bound from Nombre de Dios to the Hauana, (there to attend the paſſage of the next Indian fleete from thence into Europe) laden with Indico, ſkinnes, cuccinelle, to the valew (as is eſtimated vpon the firſt view of the whole cargaſon) at 120 thouſand pounds ſterling, beſides 8 peeces of braſſe ordinance with the king of Spaynes armes, and as many of yron. They have here likewiſe newes of two ſhipps come to the iſle of Wight, laden with the booty was made at La Baya in Braſile.

THIS new French ambaſſador (Monſ. de Eſpeſſe) is entred into a negotiation with the States vpon three points: one, a conjunction in peace or warre with the pyrats of Algier and Tunis; offring eyther to ioyne with the States in the like accord as they have made, or requiring the States to ioyne in warre againſt the pyrates with the French: another, to have the French paſports allowed without impediment for French ſhipps to yſſue to and fro in and out the ports of Flanders: the third, to haue free trade in the Eaſt Indyes. To which no other anſweare is as yet made vnto him, but reference by the deputyes who treate with him, to their principalls; and thoſe will require ſo many more references, that they will prove all workes of great length and difficulty.

THE trouble I have in many matters of like nature, ſpecially our Eaſt Indian diſputes, makes me judge of the ſucceſſe of other mens indeavours, who are to treate with a popular commonwealth, by my owne. This French ambaſſador ſayth, the treaty of our match with France was concluded the 7th of this preſent; and ſo it ſtands in the printed Gazetta of Amſterdam: but till the queene of Bohemia have aſſurance thereof from our ambaſſadors in that court, (which ſhe is in ſtate to long for) wee all ſuſpend our beliefes. For much haſt, I can onely kiſſe your lordſhips and your ladies hands, reſting, as euer,

Right Honorable,

THESE three laſte by-paſt weekes I haue receiued nothinge out of Englande either for your honor, or my ſelfe; which makes me imagin, that there hapens litle of moment in thoſe partes, or that my frindes ſuppoſe me to be on the waie homewardes; for I haue beene ſummoned by Mr. ſecretarie Caluert, aboue a monthe agoe, to make my ſpeedie repaire that waie. Howſoeuer, I haue diſobaied the proceſſe; for he did thinke my lord ambaſſador for this place had beene ariued here, who is yett at Turin; from whence his cominge is vncertaine, hauinge founde ſome buſineſſe in that courte, which will entertaine him for a while. His lordſhip writes me from thence, that the matche with Fraunce is concluded; that count Manſfelt is retourned into Englande to make ſome leuies; and that the conteſtabile di Aldighera is comminge vppe towardes the confines of the duke of Sauoy with his troupes: ſoe that with the ſaide dukes aſſiſtance, and that of this ſignorie, which nowe beginne a little to moue, we maie hope, within fewe monthes, to ſee ſomthinge doone concerninge the Valtelina.

THE marquiſs Spinola, I heare, hathe begirt Breddawe: but, thankes be to God, it is ſoe well manned, fortefied, and vitled, that before he doe win it, it will coſte him the ſetting on.

THE prince of Orange is marchinge towardes Weſell, to make a diuerſion by beſeeginge that cittie; and the Hollanders haue taken from the Spaniard, in the bay of All Saints, in Braſile, the cittie of Sant Saluadore; which troubles them more then all the reſt; a printed relation whereof I ſend your lordſhip herewithall.

VPON the 8th of this preſent the archbiſhoppe of Spalato departed out of this life in the priſon of Caſtel St. Angelo, vpon a fewe daies ſickneſſe; whereby, it is thought, he hathe preuented ſome greater diſgrace: for his maeſtro di caſa, who was not longe agoe brought priſoner from Spaine, hathe, in his examination, confeſſed, that his maſter ſent him to treate with the duke of Buckingham, at his beinge theare,

THIS daie a gentleman of my lord of Arrundalls is ſhipped here to goe for thoſe partes; who thoughe he maie be furniſhed with the recommendation of greater perſons, yett, with your honors leaue, I make bolde to throwe in my mite; and the rather, becauſe he is my countriman, and longe acquaintaunce. His name is Pettie; his callinge, a diuine, wherein he hathe worthilie proceeded batchelor, and, notwithſtandinge his dependencie, a man that is ſound inoughe, and hathe more in him then he makes ſhowe of. His endes of trauellinge into thoſe partes he will acquainte you with. And therefore, if your honor wilbe pleaſed, at his cominge, to ſhowe him your fauourable countenaunce, your honor ſhall finde none more readie to be commaunded by you, then

Your Honors moſt affectionat ſeruaunt,

To the PRINCE of WALES.

May it pleaſe your Highnes,

FROM your highnes gratious acceptance of my former preſumption, I am againe emboldened to pay you ſome tribute from the Eaſt, where your renowne daily riſeth as glorious as the ſunne, the light of the world, as your highnes is the hope of it. I knowe I cannott add any thing to your fullneſs; yett the leaſt quittrents are as well accepted and maynteyned, as thoſe that fill the Exchequer. Vnder this ſhadow of my duty, your highnes will giue mee leaue to preſent our contemplations here, of the parts and affaires of Chriſtendome, though at too great a diſtance.

I WILL preſume, that your highnes is many wayes informed of the peace made betweene the emperour and the prince of Tranſiluania; wherof I haue ſent ſuch an imperfect coppy, as I receiued from Poland. I cannot auowe that it is exactly true, becauſe ther is no account giuen of the particulars from Bethlem Gabor: yett it is to mee the more ſuſpitious, beſydes the creditt of the author, who muſt, for many reſpects, know the truth. Certeyne it is, the peace is concluded with ſome diſaduantage to this ſtate, (which makes it bee kept priuate) and to the freeing of the emperour of all his feares on that ſide, and giuing him too much liberty to oppreſſe the Lower Germany. That this might haue beene preuented, I have alway beene of opinion; and Gabor kept on foote, with a ſmall countenance from Chriſtendome: but now it is too late to looke backward. To take the matters as they are: It is not impoſſible to raiſe him againe without ſcandall, if a right courſe bee taken; and nothing ſo neceſſary for a diuerſion, and the eaſe of the intended recouery of the Palatinate. The nature of the warr he can make, and the condition of the people, ſhow it: hee is able to bee in a readines on a ſodayne, his forces conſiſting of frontire ſoldiours, and horſe allway in action; his marches are ſwift, without great baggage; the pay he giues, liberty of ſpoile: he can runne no great danger to looſe, becauſe his territory of Tranſiluania depends vpon the Turkiſh empire; ſo that, in any diſtreſſe, he may retyre to his owne, and the emperour cannot proſecute him without a breach with this ſtate. The queſtion only is, howe to engage him againe. Without doubt hee hath not depoſed, but vayled all his great deſſignes, ſeeing he ſtood alone in the quarrell: but if hee had any encouragement, or ſawe any his allyes actually in a warre, that might giue him opportunity to proſecute his owne ends, and that hee might ground himſelfe vpon ſome treaty, that, in occaſion of any compoſition, he might bee cared for, and comprehended in the generall peace; there is no queſtion, he would more willingly take vpp the title of a crowne, then he hath renowneed it; non animo, ſed occaſione victus. To expect he ſhould bee raiſed from hence, is a great error, and hath an yll ſound among the name of Chriſtians. It was he that moued and prouoked theſe the laſt yeare: it was he that found reaſons or colours to deceiue them, for his owne deſſignes; and ſtill he maynteynes a icalouſy, to vſe in his occaſions. This ſtate is not fitt nor deſirous to make a breach with the empire; therfore they will not beginne it; or if they had a will, if it did not alſo concurre with the apprehenſions of Gabor, he were able to diuert it. On the other ſide, if he affect, or haue hope of proffitt by it, he can want no ſhowes or pretences to procure ayds from hence: he can feyne a thouſand feares, and ſeeming aduantages, and vſe them as he pleaſe. So that it muſt bee concluded, the motion muſt riſe from Gabor; his ambition muſt bee fomented; and ther is but one way, that he may be honored with a ſolemne ambaſſage, in the name of the princes of the vnion, and admitted into their alliance and protection. It is euident, he hath aymed at the kingdome of Hungary, by the countenance of the Turks; but ſeeing the tymes did not comport, and his ſuccours, as the ſtate itſelfe, ſo vncerteyne, he then tryed to encreaſe his greatnes, vpon opinion of it, by treaty to gett a daughter of the emperour, with her to eſtabliſh himſelfe and his poſteryty in part of Hungary and Tranſilvania, if he might from ſo high a match haue iſſue: and this hope did beguile him to leaue his aduantage laſt yeare; and now hee is forced to take what conditions he can gett, and, inſteed of a wife, ſhall haue a ſcorne in the end. Thus much he cannot chooſe but ſee, that he hath beene abuſed; but he dares not nowe take notice of it, hauing no ſure retraict: but if hee were ſupported by the alliance of Germany, (and beeing a proteſtant prince, ther is more faith to bee expected from him) hee would ſoone bee in the field, in the generall cauſe, with 30000 good men. To confirme him herin, two things muſt bee offered him: ſome honorable match in Germany, where there is no want of Dutch princeſſes, and a promiſe to mayneteyne him in his pretences to Hungary, vntill a generall peace may giue a happy end vnto all thoſe quarrells. An ambaſſador, thus inſtructed, would worke wonders with him: he muſt bee ſought vnto nowe, (becauſe he is at reſt) in compenſation of the neglect that hath beene ſhowed him, when hee made profeſſion to ſtand ſingle in the cauſe, for which many ſuffer. If hee bee once but enclyned, hee ſhall find ſuch frends here, as hee ſhall haue no excuſe vpon want of meanes to maynteyne himſelfe. I dare vndertake to doe him great good offices, vnfitt to mention, and opportunitye doth inuite it; for in this laſt confirmation of the peace of Zitwa, the Turks by ignorance haue ouerſhott themſelues, agreeing to deliuer vp Vatch, and many other places, and to ſett at liberty the captiues taken ſince that treaty, which they will neuer performe; but hope that the emperour, beeing buſy in Germany, will not too exactly demand it, nor ſtretch the cord too farre; and that they may paſſe a yeare or two with diſſimulation, vntill their affairs are better ſettled in Tartary and Aſya. But it is eaſy to take this occaſion, to make the breach greater, if Gabor will vſe it; the Hungars, as naturall enemyes to the Germans, and alway apt to ſhake of the Auſtrian ſubiection, beeing more ready then hee; the Morauians and Sileſians, eſpecially the oppreſſed proteſtants, haue no other hopes, but to receiue him for their deliuerer. Hee cannot now mooue, beeing ſo well ſeconded and ſupported, as is propounded; but moſt of thoſe prouinces will reuolt from their forced obedience, and all the power of the emperour and the Bauarian willbe litle enough to quench their owne fires, and to keepe their territoryes from a generall defection.

I KNOW not how farr I haue tranſgreſſed, to enter ſo deepe into thoſe mines of ſtate without leaue: but your highnes benignity will enterprett my errors as the fruicts of a feruent deſire to doe ſome ſeruice to his majeſtie, and his poſteritye, whoſe vaſſall I am, and for whom I had rather ſhedd my bloud, then blott paper.

I WILL not trouble your highnes with relations of the gyddineſs of this ſtate, which, by fragments, haue no taſt in them: I haue ſent his majeſties ſecretaries continuall and dependant diſcourſes, the copies wherof I haue entreated might bee preſented to you: what is now freſheſt, perhaps your highnes will pardon that I intrude it. The prince of the Tartars, that hath eſtabliſhed himſelfe, hath yett accepted his confirmation from hence, and promiſed to reſend the artilery loſt; but hath mingled his ſubmiſſion with ſome words, that ſhowe he meanes to ſubſiſt of himſelfe.

IT is reported, but not ſeconded, " That the Janizaries would not proceed in the " iorney of Aſia, vnleſs they might bee reuenged vpon Abaſſa baſſa, who though " reconciled to the grand ſignior, and his pardon giuen and accepted, yett the com-

To Sir EDWARD CONWAY.

Right Honorable,

IN confidence of your honors fauour, I have preſumed to write to his highnes, and the duke of Buckingham, more at lardge, my opinion of the meanes and way, wherby Bethlem Gabor may be of uſe to the recouerye of the Palatinate. I cannot feare any miſconſtruction, when I looke into my owne heart, that from thence nothing ariſeth, but with ſincere intent to his maieſties ſeruice ; and that I know, from good ground and obſeruation, that I haue deliuered the greateſt probabilitye ; wherin, though otherwiſe I am farr below the conſiderations of ſo high a nature, yett they that ſtand nigh the marke, haue creditt to giue ayme to the beſt archers. I will ſay no more in that buſines, but that ther is no man ſo fitt to make a ſpeedye diuerſion, becauſe his meanes are at hand to rayſe a ſuddayne inuaſion into Auſtria or Morauia : he hath no cauſe to truſt to his peace ; and ther is no other ſure way to engage him, then thoſe by mee propoſed. In this, I beſeech you, take mee into your protection, eyther to encourage, or ſilence mee for euer.

THE occurrents of this ſtate I haue encloſed, not doubting but your honor will communicate them with his maieſtie and the prince. You will fynd, that the ambitious of Auſtria might take better objects, then the oppreſſion of Chriſtians ; and that it is tyme to free us from hence, when ambaſſadors are murthered, and no qualitye ſafe among us.

I CAN add nothing but a little inlardging of my laſt aduice concerning the intereſt the Genoueſes haue in our beſt merchants ſhipppping. Franciſco Spinola, nephew to the marquiſs in Flanders, is beſt part owner of the Saint George, and Benjamin, and John, and Ralph, and Andrew, and, as is reported, of diuers others ; theſe 3 are ſhipps of great force. His reſpondent in England is one Peter Ricaut, a Duchman of Antwerp or Bruſſells, one that had great familiaritye with Gondomar, and feaſted him aboord one of thoſe ſhips in the Thames. I haue nothing to accuſe him of, but that from him may bee knowne how many and what ſhips are ſo engaged. I know the maſters ſeruing in them are good men, and true ſubiects, and that they take ſecuritye, and are as warye as they can, not to bee ſubiected to Spaniſh arreſts ; but it ſhall not bee in their power to help yt, when they are abroad. The deſſigne is to tranſport goods from port to port in the Leuant, from Genoa and Ligorne, to Naples, Sicelye, Venice, Carthagena, and Allegant : but in the meane tyme the fraight comes to the ſtranger ; our ſhips are in their ſeruice worne out, and they are alway ſubiect to bee taken and imployed in the ſeruice of the kyng of Spayne. The bodyes of the ſhips, and the ordinance and munition are the proper goods of them who depend on Spayne; and if but vnder this couler, our ordinance are ſtoln away, contrarye to the care of the lords of his majeſties councell, wherof I was a wittnes, as they may pleaſe to remember, and to the prouiſion intended by the laſt parlament; for when they are in the port of Genoa, it is in the power of Spinola to diſchardge the men, and to take the ſhips, and all their prouiſion, as his owne goods, notwithſtanding any collaterall ſecuritye, which may make amends to the priuat men, but cannot ſecure the ſtate of ſo great a loſs. The experience of this danger, and of ſome deſſigne in the like caſe, is not new, nor vnknowne to the lords, when the duke of Oſſuna ſent an Engliſh merchant to London, in the tyme of his warrs with Venice, and gaue him order to freight only 3 or 4 of our beſt ſhips, with baſe commodities, for a couler; as fiſh, lead, and ſuch like, for Naples; and particularlye the Merchant Royall, the beſt ſhip then in the riuer; with intention, when they arriued, to ſtay them, and force them to that ſeruice. Which beeing diſcouered, the lords of his majeſties councell did preuent the danger, by giuing leaue that the ſhips ſhould proceed; but chardge, neuer to come vnder command; and ſo that plott was fruſtrated. I deſire not to hinder the nauigation and imployment of our ſhipping; but I haue thought it my dutye to enforme what I haue learnt and feare: ther may bee more miſterye in yt, both wayes, then I vnderſtand. When I haue diſchardged my conſcience, I leaue yt to his majeſties wiſedome, and your lordſhips cares, to determine what you pleaſe. Your honor ſhall doe mee a grace, that I may receiue from you two lines; that I may know that I am accepted as

To Sir DUDLEY CARLETON: With Relations.

My very good Lord,

YOUR lordſhips of the 8. July receiued, doth mention a poſtſcript of one of myne to a letter of the 18. Aprill; addition the $\frac{1}{11}$. May in cypher, which you cannot diſcouer, and doe ſuppoſe that it is miſtaken by mee for ſome other. I uſe but two, one for his majeſties ſeruice, which is of the alphabett; the other characters to your lordſhip; neyther can I fynd, though I am verye carefull of coppyes, any thing written to your lordſhip of the 1. May, nor from the 10. Aprill vntill the 15. but I fynd a lardge diſcourſe of the affayres of this countrye of the 1. May, ſent for England, and that poſtſcript may bee a breefe therof. It is not woorth the repetition; but if your lordſhip deſire it as a continuance of our ſtorye, I will ſend you that weeke at lardge, vpon knowledge of your will therin: but I ſuppoſe you muſt needes, if you ſearch, fynd yt; for I cannot bee miſtaken in the cypher, hauing and vſing no other att all.

THE freſheſt occurrents I haue herewith encloſed, which will ſhow you, that all things are not ſo quiett as ſome hoped: Abaſſa baſſa is departed agayne, broken with the Janizaries. In my opinion, that flaw cannot bee made whole without much bloud: yet they are not deſirous to come to trye it by battayle; but rather will diuide and ſpoyle the countrye, euery one reſoluing to liue ſo, as long as he can: the day of euill will come faſt enough of yt ſelfe.

FROM Tartaria this day it is woorſe: the new prince hath ſpoyled Bugdania, the vayuod, not able to reſiſt him, hauing made eſcape. From thence he is entered into Walachia, and hath beſeeged that prince in his caſtle, beeing the ſonne of the prince of Bugdan. The poſt is but 9 dayes wanting from Tergouiſta, and hath made knowne the danger this morning. Two priſoners returned of the French company, taken in the laſt defeate, and ranſomed, doe this day report to the vizier in open court, That the Tartar chan, inſteed of ſending the loſt artilerye, which was expected, hath both carried yt all into the land, to his towne of Bachay-ſeray, and alſo taken all the canon and munition of the caſtle of the cytty of Caffa, ſubiect to the grand ſignor, beeing the great port of the Negropont, and lent it away; which

FROM Bethlem Gabor, as yet, is no better nor other account come or giuen to this ſtate; which makes much murmur: two dayes ſince, his agent ſent mee woord, all was not ſo ill as I beleeued. I haue written to his majeſtie, the prince, the duke, the ſecretaries, my opinion, more fully then euer I thought I durſt in matters of ſo high nature: my honeſt hart will protect mee therin; lukewarme men God and man doth abhorre. I am certayne ther is no other way, but what I haue propoſed. The kyng of Bohemia muſt vndertake yt, and in his name the ouerture muſt beginne: a match offered wilbe the great induction. Gabor can bee on foote in 20 dayes, though not to take great cyttyes, yet to force the emperor, and all the frends he hath in Germanye, to looke to their owne houſes, and to keepe their people from a generall defection, to which they were neuer ſo prone: beeing poore, they haue not much to looſe; and oppreſſed both in body and conſcience. If that prince once ſhow his affection, he cannot want ayds; but it is hee that deceiues, bends, and looſens theſe at his owne pleaſure; they know nothing, but as he enformes them.

I THANCKE your lordſhip for your fauour to my nephew: my deſire is, that he riſe not per ſaltum; but take his degrees. He hath ſerued Sir Ho. Vere 4 yeare, in the Palatinat and Holland: an ancients place is my ambition for him. I hope his lord will fynd in him or in mee, his ſeruant, ſomwhat to deſerue yt.

I HAUE procured the conſulſhip of the Duch, in Aleppo, to bee giuen to the Engliſh; which is to us both a ſtrength and profitt: it was lately in the French; but they haue ſo much oppreſſed them by their debts, and forcing them to payments vnjuſt, as vnder their protection, that they made ſute to change; and the Duch ambaſſador, at my requeſt, conferred it vpon our conſull; which the French conſull, newly arriued, takes in great diſdayne, and threatens us to recouer yt agayne by order from the lords the States; but wee doe not uſe to giue way for braggs nor woords. I doubt not, the Duch ambaſſador will protect his owne priuiledge; yet I earneſtly deſire your lordſhip, for the honor of our nation, if the French ſeeke to contract with us, that you wilbe pleaſed to deſire them not to reſolue to doe us an affront, before they heare our reaſons; then they ſhall fynd, that the French hath more oppreſſed their ſubiects, then the Turkes; and this I will prooue. I ſuppoſe your lordſhip ſhall haue ſome motion in this from England, our conſull beeing the brother of Mr. Kyrckham, clarke of the ſignett.

YOUR lordſhip hath done our treaty of peace very much help, by cauſing the conſull of Algier to bee recalled. I haue ſent new orders and a new baſſa thither, to remooue the old, and I doubt not to bring it to a good concluſion; but haue little hope of fayth in them, when they ſhall haue aduantage. I make account, my lord of South. is long ſince with you arriued: to excuſe my ſelfe is a kynd of accuſation. Your lordſhip will lett him ſee our troubles and varietyes here; and I will truſt him, that he will beleeue I am his true ſeruant; and ſo I committ your lordſhips to the holy protection.

THE great vizier Cerques baſſa abiding in Iconium, and Abaſſa baſſa in Karacheiſar, neare thervnto, he was earneſtly prouoked by the Janizaries to ſett vpon him; but the vizier, hauing expreſſe order not to make the breach greater with the rebell, but to vſe all meanes to appeaſe him, and to reconcile him to them, would not be drawne to conſent thervnto; for which cauſe, and ſome other their ſmall diſcontents, they twice ſtoned the tents of the vizier, and wounded him in the head. Whervpon vpon he aſſembled the commanders of the Spahees, declaring vnto them the great truſt the grand ſignor had in them; and (ſhowing them an abſolute order giuen him to keepe good tearmes with Abaſſa, and neuer to fall into blowes with him) he deſired them to find ſome way of pacification betweene him and the Janizaries; who inſtantly promiſed their obedience and ayd to execute all his commands. Then the vizier called together ſome of the capteynes of the Janizaries, and perſwaded them ſo to worke with their companions, that a peace might be concluded betweene them and Abaſſa baſſa; who finding their fellowes very vnwilling, had much difficulty to perſwade them. In the end it was agreed, that the vizier ſhould treat, and accommodate all differences; who preſently ſent to conferre with Abaſſa; but he by no meanes would truſt himſelfe, or giue a meeting; and anſwered, That he would neuer depart from his followers and army; but if that he deſired to ſpeake with him in priuate, that he ſhould firſt ſend his brother, the beglerbegh of Caramania, and Elias baſſa of Natolia, in hoſtages, and then he would come vnto him. Which his diffidence much diſpleaſed, and the vizier was conſtrayned to treat the peace by mediation; which hauing brought to effect, he tooke his oath 3 tymes vpon the Alcaron, to hold him as a frend, and neuer to doe him any violence. The Janizaries alſo gaue their conſent in publicque, promiſing to maynteyne the worde of the vizier. And the articles of their reconciliation, beeing drawne in writing, were ſent to Abaſſa, who reciprocally made the like oath, and accepted the peace vpon the conditions following, ſigned by the vizier: That he ſhould be confirmed baſſa of Arzerum, his ſonne beghlerbegh of Orfa, and his lieutenant, of Maras, all on the borders of Perſia; and that he ſhould depart with all his army to the defence and cuſtody of that prouince, and wayt vpon the aduantages of the enemy. While Abaſſa baſſa did treat this accommodation, Colophon Muſtafa baſſa, the principall of his colleagues in all his rebellion, made ſome ſhow of retyredneſs from him, and vnderhand to parly with the vizier apart; and in concluſion wrote vnto him, and promiſed to deliuer or to kill Abaſſa baſſa; which his letter beeing eyther intercepted, or ſent him, and ſeeing that Colophon had reſolued to ſell him treacherouſly, he called him into his tent, and asked him playnly, Why he went about to betray him? And withall, ſhowing him his owne hand, he drewe his ſword, and claue his head; deliuering all his goods vnto ſome ſeruants of the vizier, to conſigne to their maſter. Then it was anewe moued to Abaſſa, that he ſhould aduance with his forces preſently toward Babilon vpon the Perſian; who had retyred his mayne army to oppoſe the princes of Vsbeck, that had made ſome incurſion, leauing 5000 ſoldiours garriſon in the cytty. But he refuſed to goe, vrging, That he was only bound by the treaty, to retorne and make guard in his gouerment of Arzerum. Whereupon the vizier, forced to riſe and aduance, he arriued at a caſtle called Nigda, nere Aleppo, wherin were diuers chiefe followers of Abaſſa; who hauing vnderſtood of the pacification made, came out with preſents and victualls to meete the vizier and his army, and were of him well receiued; but the Janizaries, enuying to ſee them ſo vſed and honored, in a fury fell vpon them, and killed them all, vſing the oportunitye; and entring the caſtle, put to execution their wiues and children, and euery perſon found therin, and all other that could be diſcouered in the bordering villages apperteyning to him, to the great diſcontent of the vizier. Which beeing knowne to Abaſſa, and ſeeing they had broken their oath and faith, he roſe with his army, and marched right to the imperiall campe; where arriuing, one of his capteynes with 400 horſe beganne the daunce, and without delay fell into the quarter of the Janizaries, doeing ſome execution for an hower and halfe: in which skirmiſh there fell, on both ſydes, 2 or 3000. The vizier, ſeeing this beginning, partly forced by the Janizaries, and partly for his honor, drewe vpp his whole army, to come to a battaile in their defence; which Abaſſa baſſa perceiuing, that which he expected not, but hoped that the vizier and Spahees would haue giuen him leaue to reuenge many inſolencies vpon the other, vnwilling to fight with the grand ſignors generall, ſounded a retraict, and gott him off, a mile or twoo. The vizier, to ſhowe himſelfe faithfull to the Janizaries, and to keepe in grace with them, ſent 4 beghlerbeghs with their regiments in purſuite of him; who finding him in good order and firme, made ſome ſhow of ſchermiſh, to litle purpoſe; but they returned to the camp, and told the vizier, That they had found him in battalion, with 40000 men; and that they were not able to deale with him. The next day Abaſſa, with many great 1624. threatnings, marched away directly for Arzerum; and the vizier to Diarbech, for his hybernation; in great diſpleaſure of the Janizaries, and the rather, that he is beloued and protected by the Spahees. There may be ſome circumſtance, more or leſs, in this relation; but it is very neare the truth, and I beleeue it may be reckoned the firſt day of paſſing the Rubicon.

FROM Bugdania it is aduiſed, That the brother of Cante Mir is broken through that prouince, and entered Poland, hauing firſt ſpoild that cuntry, and drouen away all the cattell, notwithſtanding it is ſubiect to the grand ſignior. The Polands are intrenched on that frontire, and wee expect to heare, that their comming out will not bee ſo eaſy as their entrance.

* THE 800 Coſſacks, that went in ayd of the new chan into Tartaria, after the victorye obteyned, inſteede of pay, were treacherouſly cutt in peeces by his order, fearing they had learned the entrance into his cuntry. An ambaſſador from the emperour of Muſcouy beeing arriued in Tartary, with 2 chiauſes, that were ambaſſadors of the grand ſignor, returning in his company, (it ſeemes that he was not long before ſent to the prince of the Tartars, to negotiate a confederacy agaynſt the Turke) and now paſſing by him, he ſtaid them, and told him; You that, fewe dayes ſince, practiſed with mee againſt the grand ſignor, I may doubt you are now ſent to Conſtantinople, to doe the like office againſt mee. Therfore he cauſed his head to be tooke off, with both the ambaſſadors of the grand ſignor, and ſome of their chiefe ſeruants; of which ther is great complaynt made in this court; an act of more then Tartaran barbariſme, that may be here diſliked, but cannot be reuenged.

* This newes is contradicted; and it is reported, he hath rather enterteyned them as mortall enemies of the Turkes.

Sept. 21. THIS morning the murther of the ambaſſador of Muſcouye is confirmed, and it is freſhly aduiſed to the open diuan, That the prince of the Tartars hauing firſt ſpoyled all Bugdania, (Radula, the vayuod, hauing made eſcape) that he is entered Walachia, and beſeeged his ſonne, prince of that countrye, in his caſtle of Tergouiſta, notwithſtanding they are ſubiects of the grand ſignor: and that inſteed of ſending backe the artilerye loſt in the laſt defeate, which was expected, he hath entered the caſtle of Caffa, the cheefe port of the Negrepont, and carried away from thence all the canon and munition, which he hath taken vp into the land to his towne of Bagchaiſeray, as if he ment to fortefye himſelfe, which hath beene a practiſe vnknowne to the Tartars. Theſe are very ill ſignes of ſubmiſſion, and yet the common name of Muſſellmen, when they come to the poynt of blowes, eaſily accommodates all quarrells.

From Sir GEORGE CALVERT.

My Lord,

BY your diſpatch of the 25. of July, which I receiued ſome three or fowre dayes ſince, I am much amazed and troubled, that one of mine, dated the 18. of May, whereof I ſent a duplicatt the weeke following, was not then come vnto your hands; when as other letters, from my coſen Branthwaite, aduertiſing this diſpatch of myne, were already arriued. That which I then writt vnto you was of much conſequence, and highly imported his majeſties ſeruice; as giuing you directions for your carriage in the buſineſſe of Bethlem Gabor, and for want whereof you haue beene hitherto, as I perceiue, in much incertitude how to proceede. All aduiſes that come hether out of Germany, do concurre with your lordſhipps aduertiſement, That hee is gayned to the emperor. Yet if any meanes might bee found how to fetche him off againe by ſome incouragement from thence, vntill a way might bee reſolued on by his friends in this part of Europe, how to ſupport him, it were a greate ſeruice, if it be within your power to contribute any thing towards it. This I write vnto you, to ſecond your former directions, of which I ſend you now another copie, not finding heere any change of counſailes from that which was then; the cauſes and reaſons remayning ſtill the ſame.

GEORGE CALUERT.

I HAUE, by miſtaking, putt the poſtſcript to the copie that ſhould haue beene to this; butt it is all one, ſince on either it doth but expreſſe the affection and well wiſhings of your faithfull frend and ſeruant,

G. C.

To Sir EDW. CONWAY.

Right Honorable,

WHAT additions of outward things I can make, I haue encloſed herein, hoping that my laſt letters, whereof I now ſend copy, brought your honor a larger relation, whereupon this is dependant; butt if they miſcarried, I haue ordered Mr. Branthwaite to wait vpon you with a tranſcript, and humbly deſire your honor to communicate them to his highneſs and my lord of Buckingham, hauing preſumed to referre them to you, for auoyding the growth of my packett aboue proportion.

SINCE, an agent, or ambaſſador, is arriued from Bethlem Gabor: aſſoone as hee alighted, hee demanded of mee an audience, as if hee had firſt order to aduiſe with mee; butt hee hath deferrd it from day to day, and I iudge by his proceedings, hee is afraid to bee diſcouered.

THE pretence giuen out of his coming, is for releaſe of the tribute of Tranſiluania for thoſe paſt yeares that hee made warre with the emperour; which perhapps will not be graunted, if hee withdrawe not from him in ſome points. They publiſh no particulars of the peace, but ſuch only as may not giue ſuſpition of him here. I cannot reſolue any thing of him, vntill wee meete; but will carry a curious eye vpon his actions, and vſe the opportunity as well as I can. Hee dares not diſſemble much with mee. The articles I ſent your honor are confirmed to mee by another copy, the ſame in ſubſtance, only more correct in the errors of the writing; whereby you may ſee to what conditions the prince hath bene enforced for want of countenance. And this is all I will ſay of him: if hee bee not fetcht off from the imperiall party, hee will proue a worſe enemy then a frend; for hee is able to furniſh 10000 horſe to them, at tenne dayes warning; but I hope, hee hath not now firſt reſolued conſtancy. By the next poſt I ſhalbee able to giue ſome reſolution and judgment what is to bee expected from him; butt I ſtill am aſſured, the way to wynne him is from Chriſtendome.

THERE is a report, that the baſſa of Buda hath made a roade into Hungary about Komora, and taken great booty; butt it is not ſeconded, nor very likely, hee hauing allway bene a frend to the emperour; yett it is true, there hath lately fallen ſome diſcontent betweene them. If any ſuch thing happen, Bethlem will ſoone apprehend

I MUST allway conclude with a petition, That you wilbee pleaſed to mention mee to his majeſtie as zealous of his ſeruice; and to protect mee vnder the number of Your Honors ſeruants.

My Lorde,

THE long expected ambaſſador of Tranſiluania is arriued: hee giues out, That hee is butt a forerunner of another to come, according to the ſatisfaction of his retorne; his buſineſs, to acquitt his maſter of tribute due for yeares paſt, when hee warred with the emperour, and to giue a ſlight accompt of his laſt treaty; and thereto to demand confirmation, that is, to them, to they know not what. Hee deales only by the agent of the emperour, and takes no knowledge of the Dutch ambaſſador. To mee hee pretends daily viſitts, butt would bee ſure of his diſpatch firſt. To the vizier, in priuate, hee makes newe ouerture of warre, and demands ſuccours. No man knowes where to bee aſſured of him. Doubtleſs hee is among nettles, and can neuer bee ſettled, vnleſſe hee bee looked vpon from Chriſtendome: here hee ſhall not paſſe ſo ſmooth as hee thinks. I would preſerue him in creditt; butt it ſhalbee then for ſome vſe; otherwiſe, his diſſimulation will fall vppon himſelfe. By the next poſt I ſhall giue your lordſhip more certenty of his reſolutions; for hee hath no refuge left, butt to bee faithfull, or to bee laid open.

THERE is a freſh report, that the baſſa of Buda hath made a ſcorreria about Comora, and carried away a great booty. It is not ſeconded, nor very probable, hee hauing bene allway a frend to the emperor; yett lately there hath bene ſome diſguſt betweene the borderers. If it bee true, Bethlem will ſoone apprehend the occaſion: hee cannott digeſt the loſſe of that dignity hee ſo much gloried in; and that may bee the cauſe hee writes to none by this meſſenger; loath to ſubſcribe Weywod, that lately wrote King of Hungary. This would be nouriſhed: and I am ſure, there is no truſt on neither ſide.

THE articles of the peace betweene Gabor and the emperor are verified to mee by another copy, the ſame in ſubſtance, more correct in the phraſe, and one article or two more: That this peace ſhalbee communicated to the king of Poland by the emperour, who is to mediate a good neighbourhood for Bethlem; and hee in the meane tyme ſhall debitè ſe accommodare with that king. And ſo I ceaſe to trouble your lordſhip, commending you to Gods moſt holy protection.

Relations from Conſtantinople, 1. October, 1624.

ABASSA baſſa, in Aſya, beeing departed from the grand vizier in much diſcontent, and making ſhow to goe toward Arzrum, hath made a long halt vpon the way: and it is now agayne vncertayne whither he will direct his courſe. Many feare he will turne agaynſt Angora, or looke toward this cytty; but as that is not probable, ſo ther is nothing certayne of him. The Coſſacks haue agayne appeared nere the mouth of the Boſphoros, with 150 frigatts; and done much ſpoyle vpon the Grecian coaſt, inſomuch that all that ſhoare of the Black-ſea is left deſolate. Wherupon the grand ſignor commanded the capten baſſa, with his fleete of gallyes newly come in, to goe out to ſea agayne. In twenty fower howres they were made ready, in number about 23; but the Janizaries would not bee commanded, at firſt, to goe vpon them; but by perſwaſions of their capteynes, and their owne generall, deputye to their agha in the warrs of Aſya, they are departed, to make guard, though that ſea bee innauigable for gallyes in this ſeaſon.

BIRAM baſſa, that was ſent generall this paſt ſummer vpon the frontire of Poland, 1624. aſwell to keepe the land from incurſions, as to finiſh a caſtle called Saxye, which was begunn in the tyme of ſultan Oſman, fittly ſeated vpon the riuer of Nieſter to keepe in the Coſſackes, by which was their uſuall and greateſt deſcent into the Black-ſea, not able to hold the place, was forced to retyre into Moldauia; which the Coſſacks entered, and haue razed it to the ground. In his retraict, the Tartars that had invaded that prouince, fell vpon him[*], and, as is reported, robbd his carriages, and tooke away about 200 horſe; and that, eyther in reuenge therof, or for the defence of that countrye, which was part of his chardge, he gathered his troopes together, and ſett vpon the Tartars, who gaue him an ouerthrow, wherin ſome ſay he hath loſt his beſt men, and that he is taken; others ſay, only wounded; others, that Alexander, the prince of Walachia, is carryed away captiue; and that Biram, ſeeking to recouer him, gott this loſs. But of theſe nothing is certayne, but this, that the Tartars haue ſpoyled both thoſe prouinces; and without reſpect of the promiſed obedience, haue beaten Biram baſſa[†], the grand ſignors generall by land; reſiſted the captayne baſſa, and ouerthrowne him; that they haue carried away the artilerye loſt in that fight, and taken away all the munition of the caſtle of Caffa; wherby it is much feared, that they will prooue very dangerous and troubleſome neighbors. The Poles lye in their trenches, neare Chotyn, with a great armye, to no purpoſe yet diſcouered.

AN ambaſſador from Bethlem Gabor is at laſt arriued, to giue account of their maſters new peace made with the emperor, a man of meaner qualety then ordinarye. It is verye likelye he comes with excuſes, and to deliuer his affayres by halues. He can diſſemble no more then ſome here, that know all the truth of his maſters proceedings, will giue him leaue. To day he hath audience, and ſhortly wee ſhall know as much as himſelfe. It is reported, he brings new propoſitions of war; but whither as a fayre introduction, or in earneſt, is not diſcouered; fingebat metum, quo magis concupiſceret. If he haue any ſuch deſire, he hath great abilityes to procure meanes and ſuccors; apud ſubjectos, apud proximos, apud collegas, varijs illecebris potens, cui et expeditius fuerit, imperium tradere, quam obtinere; that is, he is fitter and more likely to help the Palatinat, then to gett Hungarye.

To the QUEEN of BOHEMIA.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

BY my laſt of the 4th of September, I did intimate to your Majeſtie my liberty: I now attend occaſion to ſhowe the fruicts thereof; elſe, to haue bene ſtill bound, had bene ſo much better for mee, as a handſome excuſe is better then a willfull fault. The prince of Tranſiluania hath at laſt ſent hither his ambaſſador, to giue ſome formall account of his laſt peace with the emperour, and to procure releaſe of tribute for thoſe yeares hee made the warre. To mee hee ſent the firſt hower of his arriuall, as if hee had order to aduiſe with mee; butt hee deferreth it from day to day, and doth his buſineſs by thoſe that are the emperors ſeruants. This courſe makes vs doubtfull what his purpoſe is, eſpecially hauing not ſo much as ſaluted or taken notice to the Dutch ambaſſador; perhapps in conſcience hee will abuſe him no longer: butt my opinion is conſtant, that in all this, hee only gaynes tyme. It is impoſſible hee can ſoe eaſily digeſt the title of Hungary: butt hauing contracted to renounce it, hee is aſhamed to ſubſcibe Veyuod to thoſe to whom hee had written King; and therefore hee forbeares his letters, vntill hee bee ready for a newe occaſion. Of this your Majeſtie bee aſſured, hee ſhall diſſemble no further here, then I will giue leaue, becauſe I knowe all their ſecretts. I ſhalbee able to croſſe all their deſſignes euery where, if I ſee hee bee wholly loſt; though my endeauour ſhalbee to preſerue his creditt, if hee care for it: if not, while hee forſakes his old allies, hee may find his newe not able to protect him from puniſhment.

[*] For this encounter betweene Biram baſſa and the Tartars, the laſt report is, That in the retrayct of the baſſa from Saxie, the Tartars directly, and without any occaſion, ſett vpon him; but that he eſcaped by flight, without any great loſs, except of his owne and his maſters honor.

[†] Theſe reports are not prooued true; the baſſa only loſt ſome horſes and baggage; the prince Alexander kept in the caſtle of Tergouiſta: yet the Tartars remayne in Walachia, committing great ſpoyles, as in ſucceeding relations.

Safely

1624. Safely I dare ſay no more, butt that your Majeſtie may expect more then is fitt to promiſe, (for there are many occaſions open) if from Chriſtendome (whence only hee may bee confirmed) the beſt bee not neglected, which I haue ſo long and ſo often preſſed: and in that point I haue written largely to his majeſtie, the prince, and to all ſuch as may direct it rightly. By the next poſt your Majeſtie ſhall receiue more certenty: they are ſo entangled on both ſides in their owne diſſimulations, that it is allmoſt impoſſible, when they ſhalbee laid open, to truſt to any reconciliation.

YOUR Majeſtie vouchſafe to enforme mee, what is the reſolution and opinion of the king of Bohemia, and other the princes of the vnion, of Gabor; what hopes they haue of him, and which way they will direct them; and I will then render you a good account of my ſeruice. In the meane tyme, hee ſhall not eaſily obteyne conſent of this ſtate to his treaty; and hee cannot keepe it, nor will the emperour truſt in it, without their confirmation. Somwhat I haue done, vnfitt to venture to paper. I beſeech your Majeſtie, burne this letter; and for our occurrents, to take them from Sir Dudley Carleton. I moſt humbly kiſſe his majeſties hands: and ſoe the great God of heauen reſtore, bleſs, and keepe your Majeſtie for euer.

Your Majeſties moſt humble ſeruant.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

THE prince of Orange haueing recouered and razed Cleue and Monſterbergh, finding that the marquis Spinola employed himſelf rather in fortifying his quarters, then in approaching vpon Breda, without any apparence of riſing from before that place to follow his excellency, (whoſe marching vpwards was chiefly deſigned for diuerſion) on the $\frac{8}{18}$. of September, raiſed his leaguer, and giuing order for the deſcent of his ſhipping to meet him at St. Andreas ſconce, put himſelf upon his march downwards.

IN his paſſage he ſlighted the workes by count Henry Vandenbergh raiſed at Monicker-Haye, and putting his army ouer to the Graue, marched all along that faſt country as low as Bommels-werdt; and once more paſſing the Maze by Huyſden, lodged his army the ſame night, the $\frac{24}{14}$th, in the Long-ſtract; and there, expecting more forces to joine with him, refreſhed his men.

THE count Henry Vandenbergh, vpon deſcent of the prince of Orange, did, on the other ſide, haſten his joining with the marquis, and came the $\frac{16}{26}$. of September before Breda.

THE marquis ſtrengthens himſelf from all ſides to ſitt it out: in horſe he doth much ouertoppe his excellency, being conceaued to be betwixt 6 or 7000; but in foote (notwithſtanding the forces of count Henry Vandenbergh) he is not thought to be aboue 15 or 16 thouſand, and thoſe very poore men.

THE prince of Orange, by deſcent of the count Henry Vandenbergh, being enabled to draw many companies from aboue, which otherwiſe he could not haue done, the enimy, by the counts falling downe, was litle aduantaged: ſo as the prince croſſed the Dunghen out of the Long-ſtraet by Getruydenbergh the firſt of this preſent, ſtilo novo, ouer two bridges of boates, with 176 companyes of foote, 28 of horſe, and 72 peeces of artillery greate and ſmall, and encamped at Meede, about 2 Engliſh miles from Getruydenbergh, and within litle more then one from the enemyes next works, which are ſconces and redouts, and lines drawne betwene ſconce and ſconce, with which he hath enuironed the towne, as appeares in a card which goeth herewith.

HIS excellencys quarters were found very bare on the edge of the heath, without wood or ſtrawe: but to helpe the ſoldior, greate ſtore of ſayles were brought out of Holland and Zeeland, which were diuided amongſt them, to make them tents and cabins.

THE army conſiſts of three brigadoes. The Engliſh nation make the firſt, and lodge with his excellency. The ſecond, commanded by prince Henry, conſiſts of the French, Wallons, and Monſ. Brederods regiment. And the Scottiſh, High-Dutch, and Freeze, make the third, commanded by count Erneſt.

SINCE his excellency ſitting downe at Meede, where he hath only intended the aſſuringe his campe, and viewing the beſt approach vpon the enimy, to make waye to the towne, the marquis hath cauſed certaine dikes to be cutt aboue within the land, and let in ſo much water, that therby he takes away all commoditie from his excellency, of advancing the next way to his quarters; ſo as his excellency drawes his workes towards Terheyden, Baglioni's quarter, and fortyfyeth at Seuenberghen, vpon the entrance of the Merck, the riuer which falls from Breda: which in all euent will hinder the enimy, though he ſhould take the towne, from incommodating the riuers with boates; and that is the worſt which can befall the States by that loſſe. But his excellency, hauing means to aduance on both ſides of that riuer, will putt the ſaueing therof to the vttermoſt tryall; and it ſtands him vpon, ſince not only the beſt peece of his principallity, but a high point of his reputation, is at the ſtake againſt the marquiſes.

FOR ſea-matters, here is much diligence and coſt in preparation, and greate encouragement by happy ſucceſſes, a priſe of much value being newly brought into Fluſhing, a ſhipp laden with powder and munition, and greate quantity of rich moueables belonging to the count de Lemos, late vice-roy of Naples; who being employed by the king of Spaine ouer-land, as ſuperintendent of the equippage now ſetting out for the driuing the Hollanders out of Braſile, ſent his munition and ſtuffe by ſea; which, with his ſteward, was taken about the cape of St. Vincent by a priuate man, knowne only by the name of Captaine John, ſonne to a midwife of this towne, who will now put on the brauerie of a vice-roy of Naples. And it is accounted a good omen for the buſines of Braſile, that the munition prepared for offence, ſerues for defence of theſe men, who haue now in readines 18 ſayle of good ſhipps, and 5 pinnaſſes, which with 800 landmen, and good ſtore of victualls and munition, ſhall be ſent away with the firſt wind, for the ſuccours of La Baya de Todos los Santos; and by January next a ſecond will follow from hence, of 35 ſayle; of which the States Generall furniſh 8 to the ayde of the companie, and 1600 landmen.

THERE is one ſhippe more brought into Amſterdam with 700 cheſts of ſugar, which was diſpatcht away from Fernambuc into Spaine, ſoone after the takeing of La Baya, for feare of an attempt of the Hollanders vpon that place; but fell into their hands vpon the coaſt of Barbary.

I THINCKE it will not be vnpleaſing to your lordſhip to vnderſtand, that our noble coronels at the camp, both new and old, liue in good vnion, and preſerue theyr troopes faire, and in order for good occaſions: ſome ſicknes hath bene amongſt them, of which few dye. The French voluntaryes haue had ill accidents; ſeauen or eight of them, being taken by the ennemy, comming out by night from Breda towards his excellencyes camp, after ſome diſpute about ranſome, are turned back to the towne in theyr ſhirts.

THE firſt day of his excellencyes croſſing the water by Gertruydenberg, the baron of Valiac was ſlayne in duel by Monſ. Bouteuille; and on Saturday laſt, Monſ. Bruante, who ſince his comming hether ſent a challenge to Grobenduncks ſonne, to reuenge on him the death of his father, was kild by a karabin in a looſe skirmiſh, whome he encountred with his ſingle ſworde, vnarmed; and yf the duke of Brunſwick eſcape the like miſhap, he hath good luck; for he makes it his daily practiſe to beate in the ennemyes perdues.

THE queene excuſeth writing to your lordſhip till the next ordinary, when your lordſhip ſhall haue from me what further happens, who reſt

IT is now long ſince I heard from your lordſhip.

From the Same.

My very good Lord,

BEING ſurpriſed by the departure of this ordinary ſooner then ordinary, I muſt in few words advertiſe your lordſhip of the fayling of an important enterpriſe the prince of Orange had vpon the citadell of Antwerp the 12th of this preſent at night, of which one Broockem, a captayne of horſe, had the conduct; who 1624. with fower troopes of horſe, and about 2000 foote, moſt of them fyrelocks, drawne out of ſeverall places, to the end no ſuſpicion ſhould be given in the army, parting from Berghen about 5 a clock in the morning, came to the citadell about 11 a clock at night; and there at a back-dore, into which twice or thrice a yeare proviſions are vſually taken into the citadell for the vſe of the garriſon, hung a petard, and made a flote bridge over the dytch without any alarum taken: but this taking vp betwixt 3 and 4 howers tyme in paſſing to and fro with a ſmall bote over the caſtle dytch, at the length, a ſentinel at the point of a bulwarke gave the alarum by ſhooting of his muskett, which was followed by 3 or fower more: but the petardier, and thoſe which aſſiſted him in the worke, held themſelves quiett, till, the alarum being no more purſued, they went to call vp the troopes, offring to make the petard play, yf they would give on: but in the meane tyme, thoſe of the citadell, with burnt ſtrawe flung over the walls, diſcovered the attempt, and it was no further purſued; for which the petardier blames the troopes, ſaying, he would have done his worke howſoever, yf they would have advanced: but they excuſe themſelves, as of a thing vnfaiſable; and ſo the matter reſts in diſpute betwixt them, as it commonly doth in the fayling of ſuch enterpriſes, one caſting the fault vpon the other: but yf it had hitt right, as it was well projected, it had bene coup de partye, and might well have ſucceeded, there being then in the citadell not above 250 ſoldiers: but it is not like, hereafter, a place of that importance wilbe left ſo ſlenderly garded.

DURING the expectation of the event of this exploict, the prince of Orange advanced his workes very ſlowly; and ſince hath done ſo little, that it is conceaved he will remove his camp, or the greateſt part of it, at leaſt, to Rozendal, or ſome place therabouts, to incommodate the ennemyes convoyes, in which conſiſts ſalus negotij; for otherwiſe, Breda wilbe loſt in tyme, vnles thoſe which ſeeke to famiſh it, be removed by famine, and incommodity of winter now approching. By letters of the 16th of this preſent, I vnderſtand all was well in the towne, where they wanted neyther victualls nor courage.

ON Wedneſday laſt the queene of Bohemia was ſafely delivered of a ſixt ſonne, being her 8th child; and both her majeſty, and all her little ones, (of which wee have 6 here with vs; the other two are at Berlin with their grandmother and aunt) well in health, thancks be to God, whoſe ſingular bleſſing it is, in ſuch an vniverſall ſickly ſeaſon, which chiefly caryeth away children; ſo as in the next townes here adjoyning, Delft and Leyden, (from whence theſe little princes and princeſſe were lately vpon that occaſion removed to a houſe of count Henryes, in a village about two howers diſtance from hence) it is found that more then one halfe are dead.

I EVEN now heare out of England, that his majeſty hath reſolved of giving the count Mansfelt the like entertaynement of 20000 l. ſterling, monthly, he hath of the French king, and his confederats; and that the count wilbe ſpeedily here, to make his leavyes, and other preparations for the warre; which how or where it will begin, this winter tyme now neare at hand, I cannot comprehend. Out of England and Scottland he is to have 12000 men, which, they write from thence, are now leavying: but, by what miſchance I know not, I have no letters from thence this many a day.

TWO of the Dunkerke ſhipps, which have long layne in the Downes, gott out yeſterday was ſeavenight; one of which is eſcaped; the other periſhed, being ſhott betwixt wind and water. 16 ſhipps were loſt at the ſame tyme by tempeſt on the Goodwins, of which two were Londoners out-bound, and one of good burden laden for Venice. All the affaires here proſper at ſea, as your lordſhip will heare by the common Gazettas.

I AM to render your lordſhip thancks for letters, of which I cannot accuſe the date, they being in the queen of Bohemias hands; in which you aduertiſe Gabors peace with the emperor, and ſubmiſſion to very vnworthie conditions; which we hope here will not be diuturna, becauſe it is not bona.

THE infanta hath conſented to the reſtitution of Frankendale, according to the conditions of the depoſito; yet we are no whit the better for repoſſeſſing our towne. God make vs more fortunat hereafter, both in negotiation and action; to whoſe protection I committ your lordſhip, euer reſting

My Lord,

MY laſt vnto your lordſhip bare date the 17th of June, wherein I acquainted you then with all the occurrents that happened in theſe partes, betweene that and my former letter: ſince which tyme I haue receaved two diſpatches; the one vppon the 13th of July, without date; the other of the 25th of July, which I receaved the ſecond of this preſent. In my laſt, I related vnto you of an intention of ſending 6000 foote, vnder the conducte of the earles of Oxford, Southampton, Eſſex, and the lord Willoughby; which is now performed, and were the braveſt companies of foote that ever were ſent into the Netherlands. Alſo I related, that 4 Dunkerke ſhipps of warre (chaſed by —— Hollanders) recovered the Downes, ſhrowding themſelues vnder the protection of the kings ſhipp, that lay there: ever ſince which tyme the Hollanders have attended them, being now full 5 monethes, the Dunkerkers not daringe to departe; and the Hollanders with 13 ſayle, or men of warre, rydd (in reverence of the kings ſhipp, without offence) cloſe by them: yet, notwithſtandinge the carefull watche of the Hollanders, vppon the ſeconde of this preſent, in a darke tempeſtious night, when on all ſides they were buſied to protect themſelves from the ſtorme, one of the Dunkerkers cutt his cable by the halſe, and made an eſcape; another ſunke in the ſtorme; the thirde ſunke by the Hollanders, and with her there periſhed the viceadmirall of that fleete; the fourth recouered Ramſgate neere vnto Sandwich, on whome the Hollanders now attende. When this ſtorme happened, there was in the Downes 100 ſayle of all nations; 40 of them are yett miſſinge: it is ſuppoſed ſome 14 are drowned, amongſt which the Dolphin of London was ſunke, and all her men periſhed: and the kings ſhipp, the Antelopp, was on the ſandes; but by induſtrie brought off, all her maſts being cutt cloſe by the boarde.

BREDA is beſiedged by the marques Spinola, and lyes neere vnto the towne, haveing rounded the ſame with intrenchments in ſuch manner, as nothing can ether come in or out of it. His army is deuided into 4 quarters, yet ſo, as every quarter ioyneth with the other: the one commaunded by count John of Naſſaw, couſen-german to the prince of Orange; the ſecond, by ſignior Paolo Baglioni, an Italian; the third, by the count Vandenbergh; and the fourth, by the marques Spinola. The towne is admirably well fortified; arte can no more then what is there performed: theire outworkes are infinite ſtronge; and beſide bourgers, betweene 7 and 8000 ſouldiers within the towne; of victualls and munition there is no want: ſo as, in the opinion of all men, Spinola is like to haue no better ſucceſſe, then he had at Bergen-op-zome. The cheife commaunder in the towne is Juſtinian of Naſſaw, baſe brother to the prince of Orange. The prince (to raiſe the ſiedge) with an army, as the reporte goeth, of 30000 foote, and 3000 horſe, lyes at the backe of Spinola's campe, betweene Gertrudenberge and Breda; ſo as the beſeidgers may be ſayd to be beſeidged: and the Spaniſhe army (without very ſtronge convoyes) cannot be relieved with victualls, munition, or other neceſſaries, whereof they ſhall be in want. Of the nombers of either army no certainty is yet knowne; for they dayly encreaſe: but in my tyme I haue not heard of two ſuch greate armies in the Netherlands. Of our Engliſh colonells, I heare of none to be perſonally within the towne, but Sir Charles Morgan; yet there are Engliſh regiments in it, and alſo French and Wallons.

FROM the Haghe wee haue good newes, that the queene of Bohemia is lately delivered of a ſonne. I doubt not but reporte hath come to Conſtantinople, that the citty of St. Salvador, in the bay of Todos los Santos in Brazill, (where the vice-roy and the officers of the kingdome reſided) hath bene taken by the Hollanders, where they haue had an incredible rich ſpoyle, the vice-roy and his ſonne taken priſoners, with ſundry others of quallitye. This acte is a great blowe to the king of Spayne; for Brazill (after Mexico and Peru) yeelded him a greater entrata, then any part of the Weſt Indies. They meane not to doe, as wee did at Cales, to burne the towne, and come awaye by the light; but they fortifie the ſame, and meane to inhabite there: in theire ayde a fleete of men of warre is now preſently to departe from Holland with all neceſſaries for theire ſupply. Alſo the Hollanders haue looked into the bay of Mexico, where they haue lighted vppon many rich purchaſes, and amongſt others,

THE earle of Carliſle, and the lord Kenſington, now earle of Holland, reſide yet at Paris; but theire negotiation about the matche, whereof formerly I gave you a taſt, is in ſo fayre a waye of concluſion, as I hope wee ſhall ſhortly ſee her in England. Wee dayly expecte the comming hether of Mounſ. de Villeauclere, whoe bringes with him the articles agreed vppon betweene the kinges to be reciprocally ſigned by both theire majeſties.

THIS laſt moneth the prince (in purſute of a ſtagge, by the ſtumbling of his horſe) receaved a dangerous fall, the horſe falling vppon him, ſo as, in the opinion of thoſe there preſent, little life was founde in him; but, God be thanked, no other ill accident hath enſued, then a bruiſe in one of his thighes, the payne whereof makes him not yet ſo well able to ryde as accuſtomed. The queene mother of France hath ſent a gentleman, called Mounſ. de Beautruy, hether expreſſly to congratulate his faire eſcape.

THE parliament, which was aſſigned to commence againe vppon the ſeconde of November, is prorogued vnto the 16th of February next. The earle of Middleſex his fyne, which was 50000 l. is abated vnto 30000 l. The earle of Briſtoll ſtandes yet ſequeſtred from the courte, and hetherto he is not called to his anſwere. The lord Vauxe hath quitted his regiment, and the ſervice of the archdutches.

THE difference betweene the Eaſt-Indie companies of England and Holland, are not yet compounded; but there is greate probabilitie of good agreement.

THE Turkiſh pyratts haue bene vppon our weſterne coaſt, and vppon the coaſt of Ireland, on both which they haue taken ſome of our marchants: to free the ſea from theſe wolfes, 7 of his majeſties ſhipps are employed, 4 weſtwarde, and three for Ireland. The newes from Ireland is, that a Turkiſh piratt, haveing loſt himſelfe in a ſtorme, not knoweing where he was, was driven into a coue neere vnto Wickloe in the county of Wexford; and, not able to come out thereof, rendred himſelfe vnto the kinges officers: the ſhipp was laden with wyne, and all the Turkes impriſoned.

IT is ſayd, that the marques of Hinojoſa is diſgraced in Spayne, for his ill carriage in his imployment heere; the kinge would not permitt him to take his leave, or preſented, at his departure: the like farewell had Don Carlos de Colonna, who is lately departed; and heere is left onely a Spaniſh agent, to negotiate. Sir Walter Aſhtons retourne is dayly expected, and I ſuppoſe no other then an agent will be left in Spaine. Sir Edward Harbert, the ambaſſadour leidger of France, is retourned, in whoſe roome Sir Albertus Mourton is to ſucceede. The duke of Lenox died in the late progreſſe; the lord Stafford dead; the earle of Holldernes married to alderman Cockaines daughter. Sir William Birde, judge of the prerogative court, died lately; and his roome is ſupplyed by Sir Henry Martin, judge of the admiraltie. Sir James Crofts, Sir Carew Rennolls, Sir Robert Lane, and Sir John Stafford, queene Elizabeths old ſervants, dead; and ſo is my noble and ancient frend the earle of Thomond in Ireland: Sir Richard Morriſon is like to be his ſucceſſor in the precedency of Mounſter, whereof he had a graunt ſome yeares paſt; and Sir Edward Villers hath obtayned the reverſion after him, betweene whome there is likely to be ſome compoſition. Sir Robert Naunton is reſtored againe to the counſell boarde, and made maſter of the wardes, which roome fell voyde by the cenſure of the earle of Middleſex. The archduke, Charles of Auſtria, brother to the emperour, and biſhop of Nuis in Siletia, is gone for Spayne; and it is reported, that the duke of Nuberge likewiſe is on his way thether; and ſo is the prince of Poland, whoe hath beene lately at Bruxells. The plague and ſicknes is in both armyes; and from the Spaniſh campe three thouſand runawayes haue beene, by the prince of Orange his paſport, ſent home to their countries. It is to be feared, that the peſtilence will take vpp the quarrell betweene them: thankes be to God, as yet, wee haue no plague in England; but fluxes and hott agues is ſpred throughout the kingdome, whereof nombers haue died; and heere in London, for ſome few monethes paſt, 4 or 500 weekely are buried: the cauſe is ſuppoſed to haue proceeded from the aboundance of fruite, whereof there was ſuch ſtore this laſt ſummer, as melons haue beene ſould every where as ordinarely as cowcombers.

It is reported, that the duke of Eſpernon is dead in France, and the duke of Oſſuna in Spayne. The count Mansfield hath beene lately heere againe, and retourned, and hath obtayned of his majeſtie 12000 foote, to be leavied and impreſted heere, and to land at Callis, where 10000 foote, and 3000 French horſe, are to ioyne with them. The chardge of this army is to be borne by the king our maſter, the French kinge, the ſtate of Venice, and the duke of Savoy; whoe are onely to contribute money, but no men: the deſigne is the recouery of the Palatinatt and the Valtelina. There is to be ſent preſently into Ireland 2250 foote, and 230 horſe of addition, over and beſides the ſtanding garriſons there, for the ſecuritie of that kingdome; and alſo money is aſſigned for the repayring of the decayed forts and caſtles there, and for the erectinge new in ſuch places as ſhalbe thought neceſſarye; and likewiſe commaundments are iſſued to haue all his majeſties fleete in a readineſſe, but the deſſigne not yet divulged. More for this preſent I haue not to relate, but to give you thankes for your letters and relations, and doe preſent my affectionate ſervice to your lordſhip and your noble lady: only this I haue forgotten, that if in Turkie you can light vppon ſome ſtaues made of ſtrange woode, or ſtrange wood to make ſtaves withall, that when you retourne into England, your lordſhip will remember to bringe ſome of them with you, to ſupport the weake leggs of

To the QUEENE of BOHEMIA.

May it pleaſe your Majeſtie,

TO this day I haue bene in expectation of a conference with the agent of Tranſiluania, which hee hath often promiſed, butt either feare or ſhame withholds him. Hee brought no manner of mention of the peace his maſter hath made with the emperour, nor no letters to the grand ſignor; butt hoped to paſſe here coucred with ſhadowes, pretending only that hee was ſtill in treaty, the iſſue whereof did depend vpon anſwere from this port; and that hee was ready for warre, if hee ſhould receiue ſuch order. All this was beleeued, ſo ignorant they are of the truth of their owne affaires, or eaſy to deceiue themſelues by flattery: but when I knewe the contrary, that not only the peace was made, butt many branches thereof were tranſacted; newe ambaſſadors of Gabor arriued at Vienna, proſecuting the hopes of the marriage, and negociating other matters, for union and defence of the frontire; and that the prince had procured the pardon of the lord Hoffkerchen, with many other circumſtances; I thought it was tyme to giue ſome ſtoppe to the violence of his chaunge, knowing very well, that the emperour did neither truſt him much, nor this ſtate ſuſpect him enough. Beſides, finding in generall termes, that the vizier did not like any peace made and concluded apart, much leſs that hee would approue this, ſo preiudiciall, I lett him know a fewe particulars, which hath giuen ſome impediment to their confirmation. There is a quarrell fallen out betweene the emperour and the baſſa of Buda, which may bee fomented; many good occaſions are offered, eſpecially this ſtate beeing a litle reuiued from the feare of the Tartars defection, which is in ſome better termes, though not fully ſettled. I can promiſe nothing in a buſineſs wherein I muſt proceed, for many reſpects, warily; butt this good I haue done, that I haue brought the Dutch ambaſſador to a right way and apprehenſion of theſe things; and beeing more vnfitt for mee then for him to make large relations, I will deſire your Majeſtie, for your full information, to procure a tranſlate of his diſpatch in ciphar of this date to the States; wherein you will ſee ſome conſent now in our opinions; and what I haue endeauoured on all parts, I am well content that hee take the name, and make vſe of it. It is not conuenient, that I ſay any more; I haue long ſince made the ſame motions to his majeſtie, the 1624. prince, and lords in England; the king of Bohemia muſt ſecond it. Perhapps the many vnconſtancies of Gabor haue made them neglect him; butt that neglect hath bene the occaſion of all his chaunges; and therefore, if they pleaſe to try this way of aſſuring him, which I haue ſo long intimated, I am confident hee may not only bee regayned, butt aſſured for euer; and then it is more then euident, that hee is the fitteſt inſtrument in the world, to diuert and moleſt your Majeſties enemyes. From hence hee ſhall want no help that is fitt to bee miniſtred; butt hee had rather haue one ambaſſadge from Chriſtendome, then twenty commands from Turky. A mariage is his only ayme; hee treats that alſo ſecretly in Poland, and hath his eye ſettled vpon greater hopes, in that kingdome, which, if hee become imperiall, hee will looſe at once. It is a great want to mee, that I haue no ciphar from your Majeſtie; which makes mee ſtriue to write in riddles, and to omitt much: butt I will euery way bee found

My Lorde,

THE packetts diſpeeded hence the $\frac{20}{30}$. September, wherein I gaue your lordſhip a large relation of theſe parts, are all loſt; the portaletteres beeing murthered on the way; butt becauſe I renewed them by the laſt, of the 5th preſent, I will not doubt, but they haue found a fairer paſſadge. I haue not much matter worthy the trouble of reading. The agent of Gabor hath kept mee in expectation to this day, and yett deferrs to come to mee, either aſhamed or afraid. Hee brought no letters to the grand ſignor, but only to ſome principall officers. Hee hath not once mentioned the peace betweene his maſter and the emperour, ſeeking wholy to diſſemble it. To which purpoſe the prince hath written, that hee is ſtill in treaty, and nothing concluded; butt that hee is ready in armes to renewe the warre, if hee ſhall haue ſuch order from hence; and though this bee too groſſe, yett it paſſeth for good, and is beleeued here; when wee knowe not only the peace made, butt tranſacted; newe ambaſſadors ſent to Vienna, to continue the treaty of his marriage, as if hee deſired to bee coſened more notoriouſly; and to negotiate an alliance vpon the frontire, againſt any breach with this ſtate, of which there is now giuen ſome occaſion by a diſcontent of the baſſa of Buda, whoſe ſeruants loſt 15000 dollers, his money, by theeues in the emperours territorie; for which hee hath ſharply demanded reſtitution of 50000, and hath receiued a cold anſwere. Whereupon (hauing, by order from hence, drawne together all the beghlerbeghs of that frontire, and their forces) ſome alteration may happen. Further, Bethlem Gabor hath procured the reconcilement and pardon of the lord Hoffkerchen, and made many ſhowes of a ſyncere deſire to recouer the frendſhipp of the emperour, and to aſſiſt him in all his occaſions. Butt ſuch is the blindneſs of this ſtate, that they will beleeue nothing. There is but one thing to doe here, which is, to lett them ſee how they are abuſed, and to hinder the confirmation of this peace, by directing them in their old way to treate together, and not diuided; which will diuide Gabor, in the end, from them; and ſo ſome difficultyes may arriſe about Vach, which may change all; at leaſt, things will not goe ſo current: if there bee any ſtay made of this præcipitation, there may bee tyme to ſhowe him his errors from Chriſtendome, from whence only hee may bee aſſured. And I am very confident, hee would reioyce more to enter into ſome league that might countenance his hopes, then in any peace with him, who truſts him not, and of whom he can neuer bee aſſured. To effect this, ſomwhat hath bene done, and it hath taken right impreſſion: the Dutch ambaſſador, as beeing more fitt, and who now doth walk more directly, beeing ouerſeene, hath giuen a large account thereof in ciphar to his maſters, who may make vſe of that more fittly vnto the king of Bohemia; and I deſire to bee eſteemed a newtrall in this buſineſs, at leaſt not too buſy.

THIS citty hath long ſuffered many feares from the defections of the Tartars; butt now they are a litle refreſhed by the retorne of the grand ſignors meſſenger with hopes of peace; butt the conditions are not yett knowne, and I think not much pleaſing; yett all ſhalbee conniued with for the tyme. The Tartars haue not yett loſt Wallachia, where they haue almoſt ruined the prouince. Your lordſhip will expect a larger aduiſe by the next poſt, as wee long to heare of the good defence of Breda. And ſo I leaue your lordſhip to the holy keeping of our gracious God.

Your Lordſhips affectionat frend and ſeruant.

To Sir GEORGE CALVERT, with Sir THOMAS ROE's Diſcourſe to the GRAND VIZIER about GABOR's Peace.

Right Honorable,

HAVING, from your honor, receiued ſome enlargement of liberty, in doing a litle ſeruice here to the generall cauſe, I haue choſen to giue you the account of my actions and opinion therein, as more proper, both in reſpect of the relation it will haue to my former letters, as for the better conueyance vnder your ciphar; deſiring your honor to acquaint his majeſtie, and to procure mee further direction, if it bee requiſite.

THAT Bethlem Gabor hath made a peace, I am aſſured, is knowne, the copy whereof I haue long ſince ſent to Sir Edward Conwey; whereby it will appeare, that the beſt occaſion of my ſeruice was paſt; for it is more hard to raiſe him anew, then to keepe him mouing. The emperors ambaſſador tooke aduantage of his tyme here, and procured a confirmation of an old treaty at Zitwa, without mention of Gabor; which beeing diſcouered by him, forced him (as hee pretends) to take ſome care of himſelfe. Which way to recall him, I haue preſumed to write my thoughts at large to his majeſtie, the prince, the duke of Buckingham, and Sir Edward Conwey, formerly; ſo that I ſhall not need to make repetition, butt only to continue the ſame opinion, that if any good bee to bee expected from Gabor, it muſt bee founded from Chriſtendome, by embraceing him into the vnion, and by ſome alliance made with him; and that there is no prince ſo opportunely ſeated to make a diuerſion, nor ſo eaſily drawne to it; butt it is not nowe poſſible to beginne it from hence, where hee can diſguiſe all things at his pleaſure: it is hee that muſt firſt bee gayned, or all is in vayne, and wilbee ſcandalous; and for this I haue giuen many reaſons. I haue then conſidered what is my office, and find that to moue a warre would haue no reliſh; butt to direct the buſineſs into the old way, to hinder the confirmation and acceptance of his peace, to driue it to a newe treaty, where the occaſions of Vatz wilbee irreconcileable; and the conditions of his ayding the emperour, diſcouer a neceſſity in this ſtate to maynteyne him allway an enemy. To this purpoſe I haue directed all my endeauours of late, and nowe haue had a good opportunity by the arriuall of an agent from Bethlem, who wee thought had come to excuſe his maſters peace, made without the conſent or knowledge of this port; butt wee haue found, that hee had no ſuch arrant, bringing no letters to the grand ſignor, only ſome to the principall miniſters, which haue not ſo much as mentioned it, butt rather the contrary; that the prince was ſtill in treaty, enterteyning tyme, vntill hee had order from hence; and that hee was ready to renewe the warre, if it ſo ſhould bee commanded here. And thus hee hoped in earneſt to gayne ſome tyme vpon theſe, and to walk diſguiſed; and though this diſſimulation was too groſſe, yett it gott creditt here, and was beleeued, either out of ignorance, or eaſineſs to flatter themſelues. The agent hath pretended, from his firſt arriuall to this day, to come to mee; butt ſtill deferrs it, for ſhame or feare that I ſhould tell him what I knowe; which is, that not only his maſter hath made a ſtraunge peace, butt that many braunches thereof are tranſacted, newe ambaſſadors arriued at Vienna to proſecute his hopes of marriage, as if hee deſired to bee coſened in folio, with commiſſion to negociat a more ſtrict confederacy with the emperour, by offers to ſerue him; with many other circumſtances, which would argue, that all were meant with ſyncerity, eſpecially hauing procured the pardon of the lord Hoffkerchen, and ſome others. What to affirme or beleeue, is very doubtfull; yett this I knowe, neceſſity hath much enforced the prince to this humility, and the incertenty of ſuccours from this troubled ſtate, and the neglect of him from other parts; neither doth the emperour truſt him, nor can hee haue any aſſurance in his owne truſt. Therefore I thought the occaſion fittly offered, to awaken the ſecurity of this ſtate in him, to lett them ſee the daunger of their looſing him, and to ſtay the præcipitation of his relaps. To which end, I haue acquainted the vizier with ſome articles of his peace, ſuch as would not pleaſe, and of which hee was ignorant: I haue ſhowed him their errors in a haſty agreement to the old peace, and in ſuffering Gabor to conclude for himſelfe, and to treat apart. I haue diſcouered to him the deſſigne of the emperours laſt ambaſſage, only to ſeperate them from Bethlem, and to ſowe a jealouſy betweene them, not ſo much to wynne the prince, as to ruyne him. I haue giuen him many reaſons why this peace, thus made, is neither honorable nor ſafe; and haue councelled to diſauow it, and to proſecute the firſt reſolution to treate vnited at Buda, that ſo all controuerſies of the frontire may bee conſidered and determined vpon a good foundation, that the peace deſired may bee conſtant and ſure. Which hath bene very well accepted, and taken into ſerious conſideration, with promiſe, that this way ſhalbee followed, of which I knowe what of neceſſity muſt bee the iſſue; I am ſure ſuch, as the emperour cannot diſarme his frontire, nor bee ſecure. By this courſe I hope to obteyne tyme (to recall Gabor) from Chriſtendome, if it bee thought fitt, without which all is fruictleſs, and to take him in his owne diſſimulations: yett withall, I haue bene carefull of his creditt here, imputing his actions to neceſſity. I cannot promiſe, that hee will ſodainly change, becauſe his wayes are intricate; butt hee ſhall not runne ſo ſmoothly on to the aduerſe party as hee hoped, if hee meant it ſyncerely, whereof yet is great doubt: hee cannott forgett the title of Hungary, and ſhall marry ſcorne and repentance for a wife. There are alſo many wayes to mooue him, butt the moſt aſſured were by offering him an alliance in Germany. The elector of Brandenburgh hath ſiſters, and other princes daughters. Hee is rich in gold, and hath no ambition in ſo earneſt purſuite as an honorable match, to lay the foundation of his family: hee hath trafficqued that way in Poland, and yet ſecretly continues it; butt his aymes there are higher; hee neglects not to make a ſtrong faction for more aduancement, and his hopes are very great; and therefore hee will the more eaſily forſake the emperour, becauſe his frends on that ſide are of a contrary part. I muſt conclude, it were a matter of great conſequence and charity, to reconcile him, and aſſure him to the vnion of Germany. His ſpiritt nor his fortunes are not to bee contemned, and your honor may beleeue mee, hee is much greater futuri temporis expectatione. That hee will neuer betray Chriſtendome to the Turke, (though, to riſe from a meane fortune, hee made ſome faults: prima dominandi ſpes in arduo) all that knowe his ends and hopes, are aſſured. At this tyme there is ſome diſcontent fallen betweene the emperour and the baſſa of Buda his ancient frend. The baſſas ſeruants beeing robbed of 15000 dollers in the emperours territory, hee hath required reſtitution of 50000, vſuall in Turky, and hath receiued a cold anſwere. Whereuppon ſome ſcorreria hath bene made for ſatisfaction; and this ſtate, in doubt of the late demaund of Vatz, hathe ordered all the beghlerbeghs to drawe to a head on the frontire to him; ſo that ſomwhat may ſodainly breake out, eſpecially if the peace of Gabor bee diſauowed. I hope I haue walked within my limitts, and that his majeſtie will pardon mee, if I haue any way ſtrayed from his purpoſes. This I can juſtify; I haue giuen no ſcandall attall, to raiſe any trouble to Chriſtendome. Your honor will doe mee the fauour to make the beſt conſtruction hereof to his majeſtie; and though I will not undertake much, yett I will omitt nothing that may tend to his ſeruice.

OCCURRENTS of this place I omitt to the next poſt, they beeing of no greate note, except only, that this ſtate is a litle refreſhed by hopes of a reconciliation and peace with the Tartars; butt on what conditions, is yett ſecrett; and I think, though they may bee accepted, yett they doe not greatly pleaſe. And ſo I committ your honor to the gratious keeping of Allmighty God.

REASONS, ſhewing that the Peace made lately betweene the EMPEROUR and BETHLEM GABOR, is neither ſafe nor proffitable to this Empire.

1. FIRST, It muſt bee graunted as an indiſputeable truth, that the cuntryes of Hungary and Tranſiluania, which are vnder the ſubiection of Gabor, were as a bulwarke vpon the frontire of the grand ſignors dominion; which beeing ſtrong both by nature, and many good fortifications, did allway not only keepe the emperour from ſodaine inuaſion, butt were able to affoord, for their owne defence, a competent army.

2 To maynteyne Bethlem Gabor in feares and jealouſies of the emperour, was the only meanes to keep him dependant vpon this ſtate.

3. But the peace now concluded (beſides the preiudice of many articles therein conteyned) doth open a way of ſuch a reconciliation and league betweene them, as may wholly chaunge the condition of the frontire.

4. In the effects of this peace, either Bethlem Gabor is not deceiued, or elſe deceiued. If hee bee not deceiued, then hee muſt haue giuen him a wife, the daughter of the emperour; which if it bee performed, it is eaſy to judge what power ſo great a lady, and ſo great an honor, will gayne vpon him, to make him wholly imperiall, and by hope of iſſue, to vnite Tranſiluania to a dependance vpon the houſe of Auſtria, and to renounce all frendſhipp with this port: if hee bee deceiued, and ſhall neither enioy the wife, nor the peace expected, (which is moſt probable) then it is euident, that thoſe promiſſes were giuen onely to wynne tyme, that the emperour might obteyne his ends in the Lower Germany, and after conuert his encreaſed force againſt Gabor, in reuenge of ſo many affronts done him, that may bee laid aſide, butt will neuer bee pardoned. Which beeing admitted, it is then out of queſtion, that this peace is made vnſeaſonably; and that it were more ſafe, that Bethlem ſhould now continue the warre vpon him, while the emperour hath many other irons in the fire, then to beare it alone, when hee ſhall haue loſt all his allyes.

5. If Bethlem Gabor had any reaſon of ſtate theſe laſt yeares, to make a warre vpon the emperour, hee hath much more reaſon nowe to continue it; becauſe the reſolution of the king of Great Brittany to recouer the Palatinate, will ſo buſy the emperour, and the duke of Bauare, that the enterpriſes of Gabor wilbee more eaſy, when all the cuntry of Auſtria and Morauia are left without garriſon, and the emperors purſe will ſoone bee left without mony.

6. By the manner of the concluſion of this peace, this empire and Bethlem Gabor are, as it were, diuided: for whereas it was agreed by the wiſeſt men of this ſtate, that a peace was moſt conuenient for this tyme; yett it was reſolued, that it ſhould bee treated at Buda by Mehmet baſſa, and the prince of Tranſiluania, (who knew the eſtate of the frontire) with their ſwords in their hands, which had bene a wiſe courſe: butt the emperors ambaſſador that was laſt here, would by no meanes hearken to a new treaty; butt ſtill profeſſed, that his maſter would maynteyne that of Zitwa: which as it made a ſhowe of ſyncerity, ſo it was full of fraud; for hee knew, by that treaty, Vatz and all priſoners were to bee reſtored, which would not bee yielded to, vpon a newe agreement. Therefore hee made vſe of his tyme, and procured a letter of confirmation of the old peace from the viziers, that did not know the particulars, butt were deceiued with a generall opinion of the conueniency of peace. When this letter was obteyned, the ambaſſador had his end; for the copy of it was preſently ſent to Gabor, to ſhowe him that the peace was accepted without him, and that there was no care taken of him; and therefore hee was enforced to doe the like, to make his owne conditions: and thus a mutuall jealouſy was ſowen betweene this ſtate and Gabor (which was the principall ſcope of the laſt ambaſſadge); and they that ſhould haue treated vnited, with knowledge of one anothers actions, were diuided both in councell and in heart.

7. It is euident, that the emperors ambaſſador did inſiſt vpon the old peace of Zitwa, onely to keep on foote a quarrell, and a pretence to Vatz, at any tyme when his maſter were ready to breake, either with this empire, or with Gabor; which hee will not doe, vntill hee haue ſeperated them one from another, and all their allies from them both.

8. By this peace all the prouinces about Tibiſcus retorne in effect to the obedience of the emperour, and remayne only in ſhowe and title to Bethlem Gabor.

9. By this peace all thoſe kingdomes and prouinces that ſent hither their ambaſſadors, nowe 5 yeares ſince, to make a firme league with this empire, and were accepted as allyes and frends, by capitulations ſigned by ſultan Oſman, are vtterly abandoned, and left to the will of the enemy; whereby all eſtates of Germany wilbee afraid, euer hereafter, to truſt or rely vpon the frendſhipp of this port.

10. By this peace the Hungarians are forced to ſubmitt wholy to the emperour, and will neuer giue any creditt to Bethlem Gabor, nor hazard their eſtates for him, who

11. BY this peace Bethlem Gabor hath broken all faith with his allies, to whom hee was ſworne to conclude nothing without their knowledge, as vnto Frederick king of Bohemia, and to the States of Holland, to whom the grand ſignior hath often written to that purpoſe: ſo as hereafter there is no prince or ſtate that will make any league, or haue any allyance with Gabor.

12. FROM the premiſſes the concluſion is neceſſary, that this peace, thus concluded apart, is proffitable to neither, dangerous to Gabor, and diſhonorable to the grand ſignior. Therefore it is very requiſite, that it bee diſauowed, as done without order; and that the treaty of Buda, which was reſolued vpon, ſhould bee renewed; where the prince for himſelf, and Mahomet baſſa for this ſtate, might make ſuch conditions, vpon good aduiſe, as might bee ſafe, and equall to all parts. Wherein, if the commiſſioners of the emperor ſtand upon the treaty of Zitwa, as cloſely ymplying ſome aduantage, it is neceſſary, that that point bee made cleare, whether Vatz ſhalbee reſtored or no, and not to leaue matters of ſuch importance in ſuſpence; wherby, all things beeing made playne, the peace that ſhalbee made wilbee firme and aſſured.

To Sir GEORGE CALVERT.

Right Honorable,

THE reaſons giuen your honor in my laſt, extend to giue you this trouble: The agent of Bethlem Gabor is departed with his full diſpatch: he neuer once looked ouer this way, but ſent mee an excuſe, which was a playne one, when I knew, ſhame withheld him. Whatſoeuer hath beene fitt, hath beene done: it was not likely to bee effectuall to mooue directly war; that would ſeeme done only for our owne ends; and theſe neyther are, nor haue no frends. The grand ſignior hath written a letter to the prince, rather of inſinuation, then ſharp reprehenſion; yet admoniſhing him gently of the report of his peace made, repeating many particulars enough diſtaſtfull, but pretending to giue no creditt to yt, as a ſcandall rayſed by the aduerſe part to mooue him to jealouſye: therfore firſt putting him in remembrance of the many benefitts and great protection euer receiued from this port, and of his obedience due to yt, and, for his better encouragement, releaſing him of two yeares more tribute, vpon ſome conditions; he hath giuen him new and direct orders to ſtand vpon his guard, and to proceed no farther in any treatye, nor in execution of any already paſt, without the priuitye and conſent of the beglerbeghs vpon the frontires, who haue command to aſſemble at Buda, and to bee ready with all their forces, if that firſt treaty deſigned at Buda proceed not; vtterly diſavowing this laſt, as made without councell. Whatt will follow, I cannot promiſe; but buſines are now in a right way, and no danger to one foote of Chriſtian ground, as the caſe ſtands: all they can doe, is but to chaſe the bull, while others muſt wound him. The expectation of ſome army ſeene in the Palatinate withholds all reſolution in Gabor: when wee beginne, ther wilbe many followers. As I receiue lardger inſtruction, I will doe my dutye; and ſo I committ your honor to Gods moſt holy keeping, and reſt

If the ſcope of his ambaſſage be anie other then congratulation, it is like you will finde it out theare, before anie ſuche thinge be preſented to the publique knowledge of this place.

THIS ſignorie haue choſen for theire extraordenarie ambaſſador likewiſe to the Frenche kinge, ſignior Jeronimo Priuli, who is to departe about the latter ende of the next weeke. It is thought he goethe to pacifie that majeſtie, quæ eos durè increpuit about the performance of the articles of the leage: which buſineſſe hathe beene ſoe ill related from time to time by the late departed Frenche ambaſſador to the kinge his maſter, that it hathe lefte a bad reliſhe behinde it, and cauſed the ſaid Priuli (the ambaſſage beinge of that nature) to take the imployment vpon him, muche againſte his will; althoughe he haue bene theare in ordenarie, and well redd in the practique of that courte.

Your Lordſhips, readie to diſpoſe of,

MIC. BRANTHWAITE.

I CAN yett drawe noe certaine reſolution from my lord ambaſſador for this place, when he will make his repaire hether; which makes me feare I ſhalbe expoſed, in my iourney homewarde, to the malignitie of the ſeaſon, and inclemencie of the heauens; for I muſt departe within fewe daies of his arriual.

WHAT are come to my handes this weeke for your honor, you maie receiue herewithall.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

THE camps and the beſieged towne remayne in theyr wonted eſtate; onely wee heare of many petty convoyes of the ennemy beaten by count Henry at Walwick; amongſt which, one, conſiſting wholy of Spaniards, with many wagons; and another with 4 fayre graye coach-horſes. The boores give this incouragement, that yf very fowle weather come once, it wilbe impoſſible for any wagons to goe to and fro betwixt Antwerp and the ennemyes camp, where a generall councell hath bene held of what they ſhall doe: and whereas they iudged to have the towne in two monthes, now, vpon demure conſideration, they have added two monthes more: therfore Breda ſhalbe to blame, yf it doe not putt two monthes to make ſix, which all letters out of the towne promiſe with advantage.

I AM confident, Mr. Trumbull hath advertiſed your lordſhip of Peckius employment from Bruxells, to draw downe the troopes of the Imperialiſts into theſe countreyes: wherwith the States being acquainted, have employed certayne deputyes to the vpper parts of theyr frontiers at Rhées, to take into ſervice as many of thoſe

THE heere Van Oyen, (who hath chiefe commaund over Brandenburghs troopes) going abroad ſimply to rayſe contributions in Marckland, with three companyes of foote, and one of horſe, finding all the force of the ennemy drawne downe before Breda, and the townes without garde, firſt ſurpriſed Vnna by ſtratagem, wherin he found 6 peeces of canon ; and with them afterwards tooke in Lunen, and 3 or 4 other places neare and vpon the Lip : vpon which ſucceſſe, be ſent to the prince of Orange for more troopes, in hope to effect greater matters in a countrey where he finds no reſiſtance. His excellency hath ſent him another troope of horſe, and all the foote in Brandenburghs pay ; with order, that any troopes from above, now in ſpeach to be licenſed by the Imperialiſts, that will adhere to him, ſhalbe receaved. This is a ſmall and caſuall beginning, but now turnes to deſſigne, and may prove a matter of great and important conſequence.

OUR ambaſſador in Germany came opportunely to Hamburgh about the end of the laſt month, in his returne from the elector of Saxe towards Denmarke, to countenance the leavyes making in thoſe parts with the States commiſſions ; which the emperors miniſters laboured to croſſe, ſaying and ſwearing they were for Mansfelt: but Sir Robert Anſtruther ſacramented as loude as they, and threatned the Hanſes, that yf they hindered thoſe leavyes, their trafficke into Spayne ſhould not be ſafe through the narrow ſeas.

FOR the reſt, his negotiation with Saxe, and other princes he tooke in his way going and comming, (to whome he hath bene buccina belli) hath done little good to ſtirre them vp ; Saxe excuſing himſelf by former engagements, and offring his ſervice to his majeſty for his children, onely by way of interceſſion : the reſt ſhew more inclination ; but will not ſpeake cleare, till they find England be declared publiquely : ſo as when they ſhall vnderſtand, that fiſtula pacis returnes thether anew out of Spayne, theyr ſmall ſparkes of courage are like to be cooled. Meane while, for further anſweare to his majeſty, they talke of a grand diete of both the circles of Vpper and Lower Saxe, with the aſſiſtance of Denmarke ; for which ſome of them yeald this reaſon, that the diſeaſe of Germany is too deſperate to be vndertaken by one phyſitian alone : ſo as it is likely a meeting amongſt them wilbe reſolved of, this winter. But ſeldome comes any good of a diete of Duch doctours, ſuch as commonly are the aſſiſtants : and vnles the princes be brought to meete themſelves, the reſolutions wilbe of no moment ; which Sir Robert Anſtruther doth iudge will depend vpon the progreſſe of our match and league with France, and ſetting Manſfelt in the head of an army for diverſion of Tilly, who holds them all en bride.

THERE hapned an vnfortunate miſchance this day ſeavenight to count Mansfelt and his trayne, in theyr paſſage for England ; who haſting to putt to ſea in the kings ſhip, (the Speedwell) which attended them at Vluſhing, and taking the worſt (as the Duch ſay) of 3 pylots were offered them, wayghed anker at two a clock in the afternoone, and by 4 were run on a ſand, where the ſhip ſtuck faſt ; but, in hope the floud would fetch them of, ſtayed aboard till night, when it was too late to have helpe : onely count Mansfelt, with a page, was caryed out with the longbote, and ſett on board of another ſhip, with which he arrived ſafely on Wedneſday laſt at Margett. Sir John Wentworth, with ſome of the counts ſervants, ſaved themſelves that night in the ſecond ſhip bote ; the firſt, which caryed the count, returning no more : others were fetcht of, the next morning, by Vluſhing botes, to the number of 75 in all : ſome (but I heare not who, nor how many) are loſt, and amongſt the reſt, the yong count Wickenſteyn, brother to him was lately ſlayne here at the Hagh. The body of that ſhip, (as by all lykelyhoods is gathered) being broken after by tempeſt, is brought as high as Catwick, and there caſt on ſhore. On the coaſt of North Holland is lately caſt away, by a leake in a ſtorme, one of our Engliſh Hamburgh ſhipps, (the Vnicorne) laden with about 3000 clothes, of which 2200 are recovered; but fower marchants, the maſter, and 15 maryners, drowned, and 7 ſaved. Another ſmall Engliſh ſhip is caſt vp at Wick, with one man onely, halfe alive and halfe dead. In all the tyme of my long reſidence here, ſo many wracks have not hapned to our ſhipps vpon this coaſt, as theſe in a ſhort ſpace. 1624.

I HAVE receaued by this laſt ordinarie your lordſhips letters of the 21. of Auguſt, and $\frac{5}{15}$. of 7ber, with one to the queene of Bohemia, the anſweare wherof ſhe refers to the next; meane while, bid me tell you, She is glad you haue your hands at more libertie then formerly; which, after the next diſpatch out of England, (which I exſpect howerly) ſhe will better lett you know how to vſe for her ſeruice, then now that things remaine vnreſolued, both for the match and league with France, though our laſt left them vppon the point of vndoubted concluſion for both.

I HAVE ſent your remembrances to my lord of Southampton, and the reſt of owr lords, coronels and generals. My lord of Southampton and my lord Wreothſley are remoued ſick from Roſendale to Berghen-vp-Some; the father, of a double tertian; the ſonne, of a feuer, with conuultions, in greater danger of the two.

THE prince of Orange hath bin very ill a goode while of a paine in his back, which, his phiſitians ſay, is more dolorous then dangerous. The fayling of the ſurpriſe of the citadel of Antwerp doth much trouble his head; vppon which he had another enterpriſe on Friday night laſt, by the ſame men, after the ſame manner, and with the ſame ſucceſſe as the former; which is bis ad eundem. And I rather maruayle at the vndertaking then the fayling, ſince it was to be performed per eoſdem; no ſtrangers, but all of this nation. I will conclude for the preſent, euer reſting

From Sir EDWARD CONWEY.

My Lorde,

MUCH may bee ſayd for my excuſe, and much ought to bee ſayd to excuſe mee, that I haue ſoe longe forborne to write to your lordſhip: but to avoyd that vnfruitfull way, I will doe that which ſorts beſt with my hart, and I hope wilbe more acceptable to you, directly to confeſſe, that there hath ben a fault in that, which I pray you to excuſe, the rather, becauſe it hath neuer growen to that ill condition of neglect, or leſſeninge of my reſpect or acknowledgment of your proper worth, and the condition of your imployment: but beinge conſtantly in the acknowledgment of my obligations, and reſolution to make good my profeſſions, I beſeech you to take things as they are preſently, and expect hereafter as conſtant a correſpondencie as paſſage, will permitt, and as faithfull an indeavour from mee to improue your ſeruices to his majeſtie, as the occaſions will beare. Neither muſt I betray trueth, and the diſcharge of myſelf towards you, ſoe farr, as to leaue it doubtfull, whether or noe I haue performed you thoſe offices, though I haue giuen you noe accompt. But I may and doe truly ſay, that from the firſt day I was his majeſties ſecretarie, my attendance hath ben continually vpon his perſon; and ſoe your letters (to whomſoever they haue ben directed by you) haue ever come to my hand to bee repreſented to the king, who hath ever vouchſafed your dilligence, and ſtill put a good value vpon the iudgment and grace of your relations. And for the buſines of Argier, I prized it, defended it, and gaue it paſſage with all the forces in my power; and when there was anie anſweare giuen by my maiſter, I did retorne that into the right way by which it might find you; and that was as much as my publick dutie challendged from mee at that time. But I confeſſe, that to that dutie of particular reſpect to your lordſhip, and your noble ladie, I did owe, and had it in intention to pay, the preſentation of my ſervice to you: but ſtreſſe of buſines, and thoſe of the higheſt conſequence, and much perplexed, falling vpon an old man in a new occupation, leaſt mee not the freedome of my owne purpoſes; yet once more I muſt proteſt to you, that I neuer loſt an opportunity to make you and your actions acceptable. And nowe, ſince it hath pleaſed you to addreſſe your originall letters to mee, I will indeavour to giue you the beſt accompt I can; and doe reckon it a miſ-

I AM perſuaded, there is very good acceptation of the offices you haue done to the advantage of his majeſties deere and glorious children, though they ſitt yet in the ſhadowe; and I conceaue, that the continuance and advancement of your indeavours that way will bee vouchſafed, and meritt moſt, when they produce the greateſt fruite.

BY the next conveyance I will ſend you a cypher; which leaſt it miſcarrie, and to ſaue time, you may bee pleaſed, with the firſt opportunitie, to ſend mee one from you: and ſoe wee may dryue the intelligence with either that comes firſt: without anie, I will giue you a plaine and ſhort narration of the face of affaires vnder our horizon at this preſent.

THERE are noe more treaties on foote for the reſtitution of the Palatinatt, which is parted into the poſſeſſion of the emperour, the kinge of Spaine, the duke of Bauaria, the biſhop of Ments, and the biſhop of Trier; the duke of Newbourg and others havinge ſome balliages and donatiues, to ſtrengthen their partie.

THE States haue receaued this ſommer from the kinge an ayde of 6000 foote, as you haue heard. The prince of Orange, beinge nowe in the field, lyes neere Spinola's quarter; whoe hath ſoe ſtraitly beſieged Breda, as nothing goes in nor out. The guarriſon within is well victualled for ſome moneths; but that is noe eternitie: ſoe that, except a royall accommodation attempt Spinola, or doe ſomethinge that may diuert him, in all probabilitie, that towne is loſt; and with it, a great deale of reputation from the States; and much honour, and manie advantages, gotten to the other partie.

IT hath ben obſerved, that the fugitiue Iriſh haue ben great attendants this ſomer in the court of Spaine, and haue had much countenance and encouragement; and doe make themſelues beleeue, that if the States ſhipps had not taken the port de Todos los Santos in Braſill, a fleete, that hath ben preparinge all this yeare in Spaine, would haue looked towards Ireland; which yet, they make accompt, it will doe in December. But wee beleeue them not; and yet doe ſend 4000 men into Ireland.

THE greateſt points which are nowe in knittinge, are, the match of prince Charles, a braue, noble, wiſe, and actiue prince, and the beſt ſonne to the beſt of father in the worlde, with maddame Maria Henriette, ſiſter to the French kinge. The match wee hold concluded, all articles beinge agreed; whereof one is, that the French kinge vndertakes to procure the diſpenſation in three moneths.

THE other point is, the imployment of Manſfelt for the recovery of the Pallatinatt, and ſetlinge the peace in Germanie. His majeſtie, in this coniunction and diuerſion, to be effected by a league betweene the French kinge, Venice, and Sauoy, comes in by an aſſiſtance of twelue thouſand men to bee leavyed in England, and tranſported to their rendezvous at Calice at his majeſties charge. And his majeſtie doth further allowe to count Manſfelt fifteene thouſand pounds for the preſent charge, and twentie thouſand pounds a moneth, ſoe long as the accommodation ſhall continue. Theis troopes are lent to the prince Pallatine; and to bee ſoe imployed, as not to make anie breach of freindſhipp betweene his majeſtie and the kinge of Spaine, who remaine ſtill in tearmes of amitie; the marquis Ynoioſa being reſtrayned in Spaine, and Don Carlos in Brabant, for their miſdemeanors and ill offices here, whereof you haue heard. Here is nowe an agent from Spaine, one Bruneo, a ſecretarie; and Sir Walter Aſton is continued in his ambaſſage there.

YOUR lordſhip can beſt iudge how longe theis thinges are like to hold in this faſhion. I will troble your lordſhip noe longer, but giue your lordſhip all aſſurance, and beſeech you to beleeue, that I can neither forgett the affection and dutie I owe to your noble ladie, nor the profeſſion I haue made to you; and will keepe them through all my actions, and your vſes, to approue myſelf

Newmarkett, Nov. 12.

Your Lordſhips affectionate freind and ſeruaunt,

EDW. CONWEY.

To

To the Lords of his MAJESTIES Councell.

Right Honorable, my very good Lords,

I HAVE receiued your lordſhipps commaund of the 26. June paſt, the 11th of this moneth; which long paſſage I mention for myne owne diſcharge, that I haue not giuen ſo due and tymely an anſwere as your lordſhipps may expect; to the ſubſtance whereof, by which you require mee to take ſpeciall care, and make diligent ſearch for any ſecrett and vnlawfull exported tynne, by marriners or others, vpon the ſhipps ſubiect to his majeſtie, and to ſeize the ſame, with other limittations of your lordſhipps juſtice and fauour to poore men, you may bee pleaſed to know, that I will obey with all duty and diligence; and though I had not any particular command from your honors in that point formerly, yett conſidering the great abuſe, and the liberty taken, eſpecially in a commodity belonging to his highneſs prerogatiue, and farmed by diuers honeſt merchants, vpon the firſt intimation of the tynne factors in this citty, I called the maſters and officers of the laſt ſhipp, the Roiall Exchange, departed in June, before mee; and (as well as I could) made them vnderſtand both the perill, if they were taken, and the iniury they did to thoſe who ventured their whole eſtates in that preemption. Yett finding it very difficult for mee to diſcouer the true quantity then brought, (for I can make no ſearch, butt either by themſelues, who will not obey mee in their owne execution, or by Turks, which is dangerous both for ſtealing, and in the preſident) I thought it more fitt to deale moderatly, and to perſwade them to bring it to light themſelues, vpon promiſe, that I would not for that tyme take aduantage, butt rather cauſe it to bee bought by the tynne merchants at an honeſt rate. If they refuſed, or that after I tooke any, (hauing ordered that none ſhould bee landed) I would ſeize it to his highnes vſe. Whereuppon they conſulted, and truſting vpon my word, (which is not vſuall among them) they promiſed to deliuer mee euery pound; butt not in parcells, whereby any one might bee accuſed, nor in the name of any, butt the whole ſhipps company; and ſo they threwe it into a cabbin in one maſſe or heape, and I found it to bee 90 kintalls. When I ſawe the quantity, as the abuſe was the greater, ſo I ſcarſe knewe how to maynteyne my promiſe, our factors beeing full of that commodity; yett for the future conſequence, and my word giuen them, becauſe I found they dealt truly with mee, I procured them ſale by the great, and gaue them about 5 dollers in a kyntall leſſe then the currant price, and conſigned the goods to the fermors ſeruants; whereby they haue ſome amends, and the poore men very litle gaynes. Thus I begunne, according to my diſcretion, to open a way to a more rigorous courſe, if they forbeare not; hauing made publique declaration, that hereafter I will either ſeize all, or neuer ſuffer it to bee landed: to the fullfilling whereof, now I haue receiued your lordſhipps order, I ſhalbee the better ſtrengthened; though I cannot promiſe your honors full execution, becauſe as they are a ſtout people, and the beſt ſeamen of England, extreamity (I know by experience) worketh not well vpon them; ſo they will then ſteale it aſhore, as they doe aboord, and ſell it to much more preiudice. And as I will doe my endeauour here to reſtrayne the licence taken, by all conuenient wayes, ſo it were very fitt, that the maſters of euery ſhipp trading the Leuant, ſhould haue warning to publiſh to their company, that command is giuen to mee, to ſeize it in all parts; for now, when it is once aboord, and the firſt hazard borne, they thinke they are ſafe. This perhapps would make them feare, at leaſt iuſtify mee the more in any rigor. It is very euident, if ſome ſtricter courſe bee not taken, this practice of liberty will vndoe the fermors, and abaſe the price of the commodity, which merchants hold vpp; for marriners not only cloy and ſpoile the firſt marketts, butt they doe, and can, vnderſell the merchant, becauſe they pay no cuſtome, impoſt, duty, nor freight: and ſince my arriuall at Conſtantinople, tynne is fallen 12 dollers in the kintall, and only by ouerlaying the place.

I WILL ſignify your lordſhipps command to Aleppo, Scio, Smirna, and all other reſidences vnder my gouerment; where, I doubt not, due obedience and reſpect ſhalbee rendered to it.

I PRESVMED to trouble your lordſhipps with my letters of the 4. September, and double copies; which beeing arriued, I hope will giue you ſatisfaction, that whatſoeuer can bee done by authority of this port, to reſtrayne the pirats of Algier and

Tunes,

1624. Tunes, hath bene obteyned, and then by mee anewe diſpeeded to thoſe cittyes. Of the ſucceſſe thereof, as I make no doubt, ſo I will not importune your honors with longer relations, hauing ordered the conſull there reſident to giue your lordſhipps an accompt. Thus humbly referring myſelfe to your lordſhipps fauour, I committ you to the bleſſed keeping of our moſt gracious God.

Conſtantinople, $\frac{14}{24}$. Novemb. 1624.

To the QUEEN of BOHEMIA: With Relations.

THE aſſurance of your Majeſties fauour continued, and the benigne interpretation of my humble deſire to doe your Majeſtie ſome acceptable ſeruice, (though it bee accompanied with no fruict) receiued, by your gracious letter of Auguſt, doth not more reuiue mee, then confirme that goodnes in you, for which you are admired. If I did a little feare, bee pleaſed to pardon that effect of my zeale; in that paſſion I looked not vpon your Majeſtie, but my owne demeritt. I am not only penitent, but encouraged agaynſt all diſtruſt; and will learne hereafter, like a ſinner, rather to conſider to whom I am vowed, then what I am. I haue formerly recanted, and confeſſed that fault; and haue now obteyned, inſteed of forgiuenes, a reward.

YOUR Majeſties beleefe of mee, that I would write better newes, I hope hath changed the ill; my laſt three haue mended their ſtile; ther wants only a meanes of more ſaftye in conveyance to communicate ſomwhat with your Majeſtie, that would not diſpleaſe; for although all things are not yet actiuly right, yet they are in a good way. Thoſe that would haue depreſſed Bethlem Gabor too much, haue loſt their labor: the peace made by him, is not confirmed from hence: the ambaſſador of the emperor departed, is ſtayd at Buda, vntill the treatye bee begun, wher ther will ſo many difficultyes bee diſcouered, that the concluſion will prooue doubtfull; eſpecially ſince theſe beginn to lift vp their heads, hauing accommodated all their feares with the Tartars, and reconciled the rebells in Aſya: their inſolencye will returne with their proſperitye. In the meane tyme, the prince of Tranſiluania pretends to bee as ready to take occaſion, when he ſhalbe encouraged, as he was haſty to lay it downe, when he was abandoned; and he may bee putt to yt, before he bee aware. I could neuer make any judgement of him; certaynlye he can neuer truſt thoſe, whom he hath ſo much offended; yet he hath ſought to engraff himſelfe into fauor; but the miſs will ſharpen him. I muſt euer fall vpon my old diſcourſe; ther is no man ſo fitt and able to retreue the oppreſſions of Germanye; and if ther bee ſome that wilbe hardly drawne to haue a good opinion of him, yet his fortune is ſo great in preſent, and ſo much greater in expectation, that reaſon of ſtate will perſwade to take him into better conſideration. He hath a powrfull faction in Poland; and becauſe I would doe him all the creditt I can, I haue ſent a diſcourſe to Sir D. Carleton of his practice and hopes there. Ther may bee ſo much good uſe made of yt, as to redeeme him from the neglect that hath almoſt loſt him, and enforced him to by-wayes to ſeeke frends; and this good fruict it will produce, that it will make him irreconcileable with the emperor, who doth by all wayes oppoſe his encreaſe in greatnes. This I haue alſo, for the ſame end, ſent into England.

HERE is arriued a baſſa from the fronteirs of Hungarye, who was much diſtaſted with the laſt treatye of Gabor, and labors not only to diſanull yt, but to gett more authoritye into his owne hands. His comming hath ſtartled the other ſyde. Ther is nothing omitted, that may aduance the generall peace, vpon honeſt tearmes; if it cannot bee had, woe bee to them by whom offence commeth.

OCCURRENTS of this place your Majeſtie will vouchſafe to accept from my relations apart: ther is not much pleaſure in them; all our play is ſpoyled, becauſe the actors here grow wiſe by their owne harmes. Your Majeſtie will fynd, that nothing I can write you is woorth the keeping, and letters remayne ſubiect to future conſtructions. I acknowledge them good for nothing but the fire; and ther, I hope, they ſhall end.

IT doth infinitely content mee, that your Majeſtie is pleaſed to command mee any thing, though it were to pick ſtrawes; but when you promiſe to pay mee mony, you diminiſh mee, and hold mee at a low price. I would I were as able to preſent your Majeſtie with all the wealth of the Indyes, as a few bezars. In this countrye they are rarely had, but in tyme of peace, and trade with Perſia. I haue ſome of myne owne, and I thincke the moſt rare in the world, that may bee eſteemed jewells: how to convey them in a packett, I know not; they would giue miſtruſt, and rather looſe the letters, then come ſafe themſelues. I will attend the beſt and ſpeedieſt oportunitye, with extreame gladnes, that your Majeſtie wilbe pleaſed to accept them. In the meane tyme, I haue giuen order, that your Majeſtie ſhall receiue ſome for uſe for England: they are Eaſt-Indya commodityes, and Sir Tho. Smyth is alway furniſhed plentifully; yet they will not cure his gowt. I haue written to him to ſend them, and of the choyſeſt, as a poore new-years-guift; and I know he will alſo bee glad of the occaſion to doe your Majeſtie any ſeruice. In this only I wilbe equall to any, to pray for your Majeſtie, that you may liue with more glorye, to weare out, or to add to, the laſt moſt glorious name of queene Elizabeth. And ſo I moſt humbly kyſs your Majeſties hands. 1624.

Conſtantinople, 27. Nov. 1624.

MY poore wife will take from me the ſending our preſent, which ſhe claymes as due to her. She is ouerjoyed to ſee her name in your Majeſties letter, and kyſſeth yt, as it were aliue. I ſhould bee jealous of ſo much paſſion to any thing but paper.

Conſtantinople, 26. Nouember, 1624.

IT was reported here, that the prince of Poland was gone out of the kingdome to marry a daughter of the emperour, or the king of Spaine, which gaue much ſuſpition to this empire: butt from ſome that knowe the ſecretts of that ſtate, I haue bene informed, that though hee were not out of all hope of ſuch an alliance, yett the difficultyes were ſo many, that his departure was rather out of diſcontent, then of any great deſſigne. Firſt, although hee were generally beloued in his perſon, of the nobility and men of warre, beeing a prince of great ſpiritt and action, yett hee ſawe, that the very opinion of his matching with the houſe of Auſtria did auert his beſt frends from that feruency and zeale which hee expected of them, eſpecially thoſe who are the moſt powerfull, and could neuer endure their liberty to be ouerawed and endangered by the authority of thoſe neighbours, that haue long ſought to encroach vpon them. His mother-in-lawe, on the other ſide, the ſiſter of the emperour, had made a faction for her owne ſonne, butt ſo weake, for the ſame cauſe of his bloud, as that ſhee openly did diſſemble it; yett priuatly ſhee ſo wrought with the kyng, that hee gaue ſmall countenance to the prince, either for the match with the emperour, or the ſucceſſion after him. To breake the one, and to take from him all hopes in the other, ſhee practiſed with the pope (who alſo ſtood well affected) not to grant a diſpenſation, and with her brother to refuſe the match, vnleſſe the ſtate of Poland would firſt either declare, or giue ſome aſſurance of his election; and laſtly, with them by her owne party, not to engage themſelues for many reaſons that pleaſed, and fittly concurred with their owne ends and affections.

THE prince, thus allmoſt left without frends, and ouerpreſſed betweene twoe factions, it is ſaid, tooke his journy, without any certeyne reſolution on whom to rely; butt reſolued to ſhowe himſelfe abroad, and make his owne aduenture. What his deſſignes are, and where hee will fixe, wee that liue out of the chriſtian world, can make weake coniectures: butt to conuert our obſeruations vpon obiects within our owne horizon; Bethlem Gabor, beeing well enformed of all theſe diſtempers and diuiſions, hath not ſate ydle, nor neglected to practice ſomwhat for himſelfe; and taking the opportunity, hath wrought vpon another faction contrary to all theſe, which are the proteſtants, and principally with the family of the Rageuills, whom it is thought hee hath made ſure vnto him; butt the papiſts beeing much the ſtronger, and no poſſibility without their fauour to attayne his ends, hee hath not omitted to attempt them with ſome inſinuations of conformity, butt eſpecially by ioyning himſelfe in that common rule, of oppoſing and excluding all the kindred and frends of the emperour. To this hee hath added reaſon of ſtate, and that which doth moue very much; that hee will giue abſolute peace and ſecurity to the kingdome of Poland, from the Turks and Tartars, who force them to keepe continuall armyes in the border; and yett once or twice a yeare their cuntry is broken into, ſpoiled, burnt, and infinite numbers of poore people carried away, inſomuch as all are weary of the charge; the frontire diſpeopled, and no hope of quiett.

1624. This argument of euery mans particular ſafety, and the great mens eaſe and proffitt, comes neare them, and is very weighty. To make it good, hee ſhall haue all countenance and aſſiſtance of the grand ſignor and this ſtate; who, vpon the condition of his election, will offer to enter into any league with the Poles, and to reſtrayne the Tartars abſolutly, which for a tyme, and for their owne ends, they may performe; beeing then aſſured from that ſide, from whome they haue both their greateſt feares and daungers: and they will almoſt account Poland conquered, if they can make Gabor king, though therein they wilbee deceiued; for when hee ſhalbee ſtrong, hee wilbee ſtout and obſtinate beyond their expectation. This practice is not newe, although nowe, on this occaſion, more earneſtly purſued; for I haue knowne, in myne owne experience, a great vizier, two yeares ſince, moue it to one of the moſt powerfull lords of Poland, with condition, if hee would aſſiſt Gabor, that the grand ſignor ſhould giue him the others principality; which hee refuſed with diſdayne becomming his honor. And though the nobility of Poland bee very high, and hardly to bee drawne to ſubmitt to a man, whom, for ſome reſpects, they ſcorne; yett the example is freſh, of electing a prince of Tranſiluania. The diuiſion in the houſe of the king opens him a way: the generall diſlike of any allyed to the houſe of Auſtria, leaſt it giue too much opportunity to them, by continued authority, to wynne too many frends, and ſo to clayme a right, and frame a title, doth force many to his party: the hope of ſecurity, and reſt from the feares and incurſions of the Turks and Tartars, doth preuaile, aboue all conſiderations, with the people: and laſtly, the opinion of his owne vertue, and the addition of Tranſiluania to their ſtrength, whereby they ſhalbee aſſured euery way on their frontires, and, in occaſion of any warre, the more enabled to make reſiſtance, hath ſoe encreaſed his fauorers, and reconciled his oppoſites, that it is thought hee ſtands in great poſſibility, at leaſt in greater then any, to bee aduanced to that crowne; eſpecially ſince the death of prince Phillibert of Sauoy, vpon whom the thoughts of many principall lords of that kingdome were conuerted, perhapps in malum omen. The emperour beeing neither ignorant of theſe workings, and hauing had lately ſufficient tryall of his yll neighbourhood, a petty prince, and knowing (as hee can neuer forgiue, ſo) the other can neuer bee reconciled ſo truly, as that hee may reſt ſecure, feares nothing more then Gabors encreaſe of power, nor endeauors more then to oppoſe it; and to that end, by his laſt ambaſſador, and his newe reſident, ſought to ſowe a jealouſy in this ſtate, that allready they had made Bethlem Gabor too greate, and giuen him ſo much the reynes, that hee ſtood vpon himſelfe, and neglected the authority of the port. The inſtance they gaue was, euen in that peace which hee had newly concluded with them, without the conſent or knowledge of the grand ſignor; of which though they had the benefitt, yett they would turne the maner of making it vpon the prince, another way, for his harme; vrging, that if hee were a ſubiect, and Tranſiluania a prouince, of the Turkiſh empire, that it was requiſite hee ſhould bee reduced to that obedience and awe, wherein thoſe of Moldauia and Wallachia liued, to doe nothing butt by leaue, and to bee placed and diſplaced at pleaſure. Therefore ſeeing, as hee was, that hee durſt preſume to make treaties, as if hee had bene ſui juris; it was likely, if hee grew greater, that hee would caſt off all ſeeming ſubiection, and proue a dangerous rebell. This counſell was giuen vnder the maske of frendſhipp; and many, that looked no further then the peace made, (which ſhewed ſome neglect) beganne to ſpeake earneſtly, and to perſwade the reſtreyning of the power of Gabor, and to call him to a ſtrict account; butt the wiſer found it no tyme to thruſt him into rebellion, which was the only ayme of the Imperialliſts, who well knewe his ſpiritt would not endure too ſtraight a curbe: ſo that now hee ſtands entire in fauour, in outward ſhowe, and continually offering to breake with the emperour againe, if hee may bee maynteyned. The peace hee hath made is not confirmed, butt referred to the old deſſigned treaty at Buda, where, in the diſcuſſing of particulars, many difficultyes will ariſe, that may ſhake it.

THE grand ſignors ambaſſador, ſent to the Tartar han, is a moneth ſince retorned, in company of another ſent hither, maſter of the princes horſe, who bring aſſurance of a reconciliation and ſubmiſſion, the veſt and ſword receiued with honor, and that principality accepted as a guift, which was kept by the ſword. Butt with all theſe faire words the Tartar demandeth preemptorily the diſplacing of Radula the father, prince of Moldauia, and Alexander the ſonne, prince of Wallachia; and that, vntill this bee graunted, hee will not withdrawe his forces from thoſe prouinces, where they haue done great ſpoiles, notwithſtanding they are ſubiect to the grand ſignor. An anſwere is giuen, and the ambaſſador retorned with complements; butt ſince his departure nothing is changed; butt rather another, by him recommended, perſecuted; who for feare hath made eſcape *.

SHAHIN GHERAY, brother of the Tartar han, hath made a peace with Koneſpolsky generall of the Poles, and hath promiſed to ſend an emirze to reſide at Warſouia for pledge and mayntenance of this frendſhipp, vpon conditions that their Coſſacques ſhall ioyne with them to make warre vpon the Muſcouite, for recouery of a cuntry loſt ſome fewe yeares paſt. Neither of thoſe nations can liue without booty; therefore, while they are buſied in thoſe colder parts, Poland may haue a litle reſt.

AN army of Tartars, lately entered Akyrman, neare the Danuby, beeing ſubiect to the grand ſignor, gaue a new feare and alarum here, that they would deſcend to Adrianopoly; butt it ſeemes they were ſent to free the priſoners taken by Cantemir, and to reduce him to obedience, and to enter into the league of Poland, though others miſtruſt treachery in their vnion.

THE French conſull newly planted in Jeruſalem, vpon pretence that hee was placed there for ſome practice, was by the baſſa of Damaſcus, vnder whoſe gouerment is the holy citty, ſent for by 30 ſoldiours, bound vpon an horſe, and putt in irons into a dungeon, where hee remayned 6 dayes, and by his ſtoutneſs was releaſed. Hee was accuſed of intelligence with the emir of Sidon. To haue a protector, where there is no reſiding of merchants, is ſubiect to much ſuſpition. Perhapps the father guardian, who by this newe title is diminiſhed, (and the Romiſh clergy doe not endure willingly to bee ecclypſed) may haue bene an inſtrument of this affront: if not, yett I am perſwaded, they will not long comport the arrogance of any vniuerſall protection, which that conſull doth aſſume.

ABASSA baſſa hath made his peace abſolutly with the great vizier in Aſia, ſurrendered Arzrum, and taken the baſſaleeke of l'Axa neare Babilon, toward which hee is departed with his army †.

THE Perſian, as is reported, hath beſeeged the citty of Orfa in the way to Aleppo, and may proceed at his pleaſure; for all the grand ſignors army, vpon the peace with Abaſſa baſſa, (as if all were done, and that they had no more enemyes) by troopes tooke leaue of the vizier, and are retorned many hither, and the reſt to their owne dwellings, promiſing to drawe together againe in the ſpring, and not aboue 10000 left with him; whereuppon hee is enforced to retyre, and winter in Tocatt, about 6 dayes poſt from this citty.

THE chimacham hath obteyned a greater victory in peace, and of more conſequence to this ſtate, then the conqueſt of a prouince, in the difficult buſineſs of monyes; which were growne ſo baſe, that no prouiſion was brought in, ſhopps ſhutt vpp, all trade at a ſtand, the citty in danger of famine. Hee paid the ſoldioury a whole pay in that falſe mony at 10 aſpers a peace, and within 10 dayes cryed them downe to 3, the chequine from 420 to 120, the doller from 280 to 80, and accordingly rated all prouiſions and goods, and proclaymed them to bee ſold at the antient prices. The ſoldiours haue obeyed, and although many tradeſmen haue ſuffered, in the firſt dayes, death, and other ſeuere puniſhments, yett at laſt it is ouercome, to the vniuerſall ioy of the people; and there is no greater wonder, then that they, who lately were tigers, are now as tame as aſſes. Butt hee tooke the opportunity of the generall abſence, and hath reſtored the commonwealth. If the Perſian ſhake it not, it will ioyne againe, like the body of a ſerpent; vicinorum invidiâ fruitur.

My very good Lord,

I AM to render you thancks for 3 letters of September, come almoſt together, and ſince I had any matter to exchange from this barren place; where, ſince they are growne wiſe by their owne harmes, I fynd them the dulleſt people vnder heauen. When they were mad, they made good ſport; now their grauetye becomes 1624. them, as a gowne would doe a moyle. With one of thoſe, I receiued a grace from the queene, which as it did aſſure mee of pardon, ſo it ſhowed mee my fault. It is not my diſpoſition to bee miſtruſtfull, rather my occupation. I am forgiuen and confirmed. I had cauſe to ſuſpect others, though, if I had conſidered her goodnes, I ſhould haue ſcornd them. Your lordſhips newes of Braſill is welcome, for their ſakes that loſt yt; but for any good wee receiue by the winners, wittneſs the Eaſt-Indya barbarous proceedings. It is all one who hath yt, the diuill or his dam; intereſt only makes mee not angrye: your lordſhip liues among them, and ſees their beſt. I haue tryed them Eaſt and Weſt, and know their beſtialitye and ingratitude.

YOUR lordſhip will giue mee leaue to conſider the propoſitions you mention in your laſt, made by Monſ. d'Eſpeſſe to the States, to enter into the ſame accord with them of peace with Algier, or to draw the other to ioyne in a warr; in my opinion, both impoſſible. It ſeemes not to mee honorable for the French kyng to deſcend in peace to the Duch treatye; that is, to ioyne with the piratts to make war, or to take and ſpoyle any foote of chriſtian land; in which neceſſitye may excuſe the Duch, but nothing could defend the honor of a great prince to make ſuch a contract with theeues; and without yt he cannot enter into the Duch agreement. On the other ſyde, to draw the Duch to breake their peace, is vntymely; they haue no place then to water in the Leuant, but only Zant; I meane their merchants, vſing the botome; and it is a kynd of confeſſion, that the French kyng is not able to trade in theſe ſeaes, without their help. I fall vpon this buſineſs, becauſe I haue made a peace lately, by a new baſſa, and commands procured by mee: I haue aduice, that it is publicquely proclaymed and accepted; and it a little concerns us, to leaue the French for a pray: cormorants and woolfs muſt haue ſome foode, els they will ſeaze on any thing. The French ambaſſador here hath euer followed mee, and whenſouer I obteyned any thing for that buſines, he would endeauor the like; eyther to ſeeme to doe ſomwhat, though to no purpoſe; or to foyl my proceedings, by cloying them with commands, who will neuer bee frends with all at once. I am perſwaded, ours is ſecure; therfore I could bee content, the French ſtood alone, and ranne their fortune. Free trade in the Eaſt Indyes may bee graunted them: I know India as well as any man liuing, and perhaps haue had more vniuerſall conſiderations vpon the whole, then any Duch capteyne, or Engliſh factor. The kyng of Denmarke hath the ſame deſire; but all theſe nations will fall vpon our owne Eaſt Indya companyes error, to ouerlay trade. They all ſuppoſe, by rule of arithmeticque, that if 1000 l. ſtocke did produce 1000, by proportion a million muſt produce a million; but the reaſon is as good as his was, that beeing twenty yeares of age when another was ten, would nedes bee 80 when he was fortye. All the miſvnderſtanding of Indya is, to ſuppoſe that ther is commoditye for ſo much ſhipping. I will vndertake, when the Duch and wee had 60 ſhips gaping for lading, ten of them would haue brought home all the ſpice and ſilkes in the Indyes. Then the fifty empty ſhips that rotted, wages and chardge, like Pharoes leane kyne, eate vp the profitt of the few laden. But, ſuppoſe ther were to lade 40 ſhips yearly, wher ſhould it bee vented? Is not Europe cloyed, and all priſes fallen, all Indyan commodityes become druggs? The Portugalls might haue taught us ſo much witt, who, when they had all the Indyes quiett to themſelues, and caſt vp what Chriſtendome could ſpare, to keepe vp the eſtimation of the commoditye, bound all, and burnt aboue halfe there. The gayne of Indya is by a little ſtocke: it may bee fitt for the Duch, in reſpect of reaſon of ſtate, to enter into the great chardge; but it will vndoe us, that are mere merchants there. Lett the French trade their pleaſure; they will come home, not by the Cape of Hope, but Deſperation: it will neuer bee well, till it bee out of creditt. Your lordſhip will thincke mee out of matter, to leape from Turkye to Indya: if I could leape home, I care not if both were in the ſea.

I SEND your lordſhip encloſed, ſuch miſcelanye ſtuff as comes within my proſpect. If you woonder why I trouble you and my ſelfe with Poliſh miſteries, I will only make this apologye. I haue ſent yt you, becauſe I beleeue yt true; and that you ſhould know, if Gabor haue ſo great hopes, that he is more woorthy of conſideration, then he is eſteemed in our parts of Chriſtendome. I would gladly, by doing him any creditt, redeeme him from the contempt that hath almoſt loſt him. He will not bee quiett till he bee dead, and ther is no man ſo fitt to ſerue our occaſions in Germanye as he: this Poliſh deſſigne will utterly diuide him and the emperor; that would be nouriſhed, howeuer the other prooue. This ſtate will aſſiſt him, and they beginn to ſpeake their antient language of tribute. Their peace in Aſya made with the rebell, and reconciliation with the Tartar, hath encouraged them to thincke on their border of Hungarye with more ſpiritt: the peace is not confirmed, ſomwhat is woorking; ther only wants a declaration in us, that haue the greateſt and iuſteſt cauſe. It is tyme for mee to take vp; my pen runns riott. I am

MY wife thancks your lordſhip for your continuall remembrance, and deſires to returne the ſame to your lady.

From Sir DUDLEY CARLETON.

My very good Lord,

OUR affaires having conſiſted of late dayes chiefly in negotiation, conducted by our extraordinary ambaſſadors, the two earles, Carlile and Holland, in France, and Sir Robert Anſtruther in Germany; I know not wherin I may better ſerve your lordſhip, then in giving you an account (howſoever you may have it from other hands) of my lateſt advertiſements from theyrs: and yf my laſt of the $\frac{8}{18}$th of this preſent come well to your lordſhip, you will ſee how the effects of Sir Robert Anſtruthers indeavours (which chiefly tend to ſtirre vp thoſe dull Duch to quick and vigorous reſolutions) depend vpon the ioinct proceedings of France and England; which, as well for the mariage, as for ſetting a brave army on foote vnder Mansfelts commaund, are in all reſpects in as good ſtate as can be imagined; and that your lordſhip will find by the extract of a letter I receaved this laſt night from our two earles ambaſſadors, by a ſonne of Sir Thomas Germains, who, for this tyme of the yeare, came with extraordinary diligence: and our ambaſſadors, having diſpatched Sir James Outerlony into England, the ſame day Mr. Germain came from Paris, with advertiſement of the finall concluſion of all things. I doe looke daily for newes from thence of the ratification; as by an extract of my laſt from Mr. ſecretary Conwey, which I ſend likewiſe herewith, your lordſhip will iudge I have good reaſon. To theſe papers I adde an extract of my laſt letters from Bruxells; by which, and the former, your lordſhip hath as ample knowledge as I can give you of thoſe affaires, whereof, I conceave, you may moſt require advertiſement.

HERE all things are putt in good readynes for the furtherance of Mansfelts enterpriſe; his armes being already ſent downe into Zealand, to be ſo much nearer the place where he ſhall have vſe of them; and 50 hering-buſſes are putt in readines in the Maze for tranſport of his men, when they ſhalbe ſent for, being botes to indure a winter ſea. And by what order, and how thoſe men are to be leavyed, your lordſhip, I preſume, is particularly advertiſed out of England; and in ſuch forwardnes the leavyes were, when our laſt meſſengers came over, (which is 10 or 12 dayes ſince) that there was then halfe the number of the Londoners rayſed.

THE king was much troubled with the newes of Mansfelts ſhipwrack, till he heard of his eſcape for his owne perſon, which was not without perill, his ſhip (as I advertiſed your lordſhip in my laſt) being broken in peeces by the fault of a druncken Duch pilote; and who are loſt with her, your lordſhip will ſee by the note which goeth herewith.

WEE have had letters from count Mansfelt ſince his arrivall in England, wherby he haſtens away the High Duch foote are leavyed near Hamburgh and Bremen; but contracts his numbers of horſe from thoſe and theſe parts, of which he requires no more then may be conveniently tranſported by ſea; that is, about 500, for 3 companies; his owne, the duke Chriſtian of Brunſwicks, and the count de la Tours.

THE king and queen of Bohemia, with all their ſweete children, continue chearefull, and well in health; a rare bleſſing of God in this ſad ſickly ſeaſon, which caryeth away ſo many of all ſorts, both in townes and abroade, as yf the ayre were generally contagious! And wee have a particular loſſe of the noble earle of Southampton, and his hopefull ſonne the lord Wriothſley, both which ſickned and dyed within 4 dayes one of the other; the ſonne firſt at Roſendal, and the father

THE prince of Orange, having fayled of a ſecond enterpriſe vpon the caſtle of Antwerp, (which deſſigne kept him longer at Roſendal, then agreed with his health) came hether from thence on Munday laſt was ſeavenight, and hath lived here ever ſince, languiſhing in much payne of a cyathica in his loynes; which hath brought him to crutches, and takes away his ſtomacke and ſleepe; but his phyſitians eſteeme his diſeaſe rather dolorous then dangerous.

THERE is ſicknes in the towne of Breda, and want of delicacyes, but not of neceſſaryes, neyther wilbe as yet for theſe 5 or 6 monthes. For the reſt, the three camps are rather at a vye which ſhall ſuffer moſt, then that they otherwiſe much moleſt one another: but when Mansfelt begins to march, wee ſhall ſee ſome alteration; of which I will not fayle to advertiſe your lordſhip, or of any thing which ſhall occurre in the meane tyme worth your knowledge. So, hauing nothing to adde, but that the count de la Torre hath ſecretly ſtollen a iorney into England, which way he went, ſans dire adieu to me, or any of his frends, on Saturday laſt; I committ your lordſhip, with all yours, to Gods bleſſed protection.

Hagh, this 2d of
Decemb. 1624.

DUDLEY CARLETON.

THE queen of Bohemia defers anſwearing your lordſhips laſt letters, till ſhe heare out of England.

From Mr. BRANTHWAITE.

Right Honorable,

THIS ſignorie is dailie renewinge of theire prouiſions for warre bothe at lande and ſea, hauinge giuen order of late for the furniſhinge of 30 gallies, betweene Venice, Cephalonia, and Candie: but what can be doone with them before the openinge of the yeare, I doe not ſoe well imagine.

HERE is nowe little ſpeeche at the preſente of the comeinge vpp of the Frenche towarde the Valtelina, although this ſtate haue furniſhed Valcamonica, thereunto adioyninge, with good ſtore of forces to expect them; ſoe that, it maie be, theire courage growes colde with the ſeaſon; or that perchaunce the nation is yett ſubiecte to that cenſure, which Julius Cæſar, that famous general, gaue them, when he ſaid, Vt ad bella ſuſcipienda Gallorum alacer ac promptus eſt animus, ſic mollis ac minime reſiſtens ad calamitates perferendas mens eorum eſt. But becauſe a litle more time will diſcouer theire reſolutions, I thinke I maie, till fitted with a better occation, be altogether ſilent in that kinde.

YESTERNIGHT arriued here Monſieur d'Alligre, ſonne to the chaunceller of Fraunce, ambaſſador in ordenarie from the Frenche kinge to this republique: but when he ſhall haue his publique reception, (this duke beinge nowe ſoe weake, that his deathe is expected euerie hower) I cannot ſoe certainlie ſett downe. And I vnderſtand by a letter from our ambaſſador of the ſeaconde preſent, that the next daie he, with his ladie, and whole familie, meant the nexte morninge to imbarque themſelues vpon the Poe to come for this place.

FROM Rome I heare, that the pope, and the reſte of the congregation held for that purpoſe, are reſolued to graunte a diſpenſation for the mariage treated betweene the two crownes of Englande and France; but (beinge deſirous to vpholde the grauitie and greatneſſe of that ſea) they will not ſoe ſuddenlie haue it iſſu forthe.

AND thus, with my ſeruice moſte humblie remembred to your lordſhip, wiſhinge you all healthe and hapineſſe, I kiſſe your lordſhips hands, and reſte

Your Honors alwais at commaunde,

MIC. BRANTHWAITE.

WHILE I was a datinge this letter, newes is brought me, that the duke is deade; which peraduenture maie keepe the ambaſſadors from haueinge audience ſome weekes. What letters are come to my handes for your honor this week, you maie pleas to receiue herewithal. 1624.

To my Lord Archbiſhop of CANTERBURY.

May it pleaſe your Grace,

THERE is no excuſe ſo acceptable, as an ingenuous confeſſion of a fault: I haue bene a trewant in this kind of obſeruance of your grace, longer then doth agree with my humble and true profeſſions of loue; eſpecially hauing receiued your graces plentifull fauour by your letters of June paſt; which did comfort my heart, that yett I was remembred, and preſerued, at this diſtance, in your affection; and brought mee ſuch a relation of a bleſſed change, ſo many hopes of good ends from dangerous beginnings, ioyes out of feares, health out of ſickneſs, that I was full of exultation, and knowe not howe to expreſſe it, [but by] that ſong of the prophett, which ſeemes to bee made on purpoſe for that occaſion, or, at leaſt, is moſt aptly applyed to it: Celebrate Jehovam, quia bonus eſt; quia in ſæculum benignitas eius. Jehova adeſt mihi; ideo deſpicio oſores meos: omnes gentes circumdiderant me, ſed in nomine Jehovæ enervavi eas. Vox cantus et ſalutis eſt in tentoriis juſtorum: dextra Jehovæ agit ſtrenue. And is not then as well the poſy of the ſonne, and the whole land, as of the father, A Jehova eſt, eſtque mirabilis in oculis noſtris?

I SHALL make your grace a barren retorne; for ſince their owne harmes haue made theſe people duller, if not wiſer, they make no ſport, nor giue no great occaſion to mention them. Their affaires ſeeme to ſettle: the great rebellion in Aſia ſo farre appeaſed, that they call it a peace. Butt Abaſſa baſſa, the chiefe of them, doth hold his baſſaleeke of Arzrum by compoſition, and will not part with it; only hee hath taken 1000 Janizaries in name of a garriſon, in ſhowe of obedience, and promiſes to keepe that quarter for the grand ſignior againſt the Perſian; butt is retyred thither with his whole army, ſtrong, and in truſt of himſelfe. This they are content withall; and ſeeing they can gett no more without danger, take it for a ſubmiſſion, and ſeeme to reioyce in it. Butt ſo bold traitors are neuer good ſubiects. Great ſtates may bee enforced to winke, butt neuer forgiue ſuch offences. The like peeceing vpp is accepted from Tartary, where the danger was nearer; yett not only the ſcarrs, butt the wounds remayne; and it is freſhly aduiſed, the Tartar han hath ſent two ambaſſadors to conduct another from the king of Perſia into Poland, to enter into a confederacy whereinto they hope to drawe Gabor: butt it is too early as yett to coniecture at this buſineſs. The great vizier is retyred to Tocatt, his army diſperſing, as if all were done; yett promiſing to retorne in the ſpring againſt the common enemy, the Perſian; who, in the meane tyme, it is feared, will aduance much in the parts betweene Babilon and Aleppo. I neede not trouble your grace with theſe; you haue, I hope, receiued the continuance of this ſtory, by my relations ſent Mr. Branthwaite; and ſeeing, at this inſtant, beeing winter, there is nothing to doe here, I haue looked abroad for contemplations, and haue written to the duke of Buckingham a diſcourſe of a great practice nowe in working in theſe parts, at leaſt, as I am (I think) well informed. A copy thereof I haue ordered to bee preſented to your grace; which when you haue read, if you wonder why I ſtraggle ſo farre extra provinciam, to trouble myſelfe with Poliſh affaires, I hope you will alſo diſcouer, that my end therein is vpon Gabor, who though hee hath made a peace with the emperour, it is impoſſible it ſhould laſt: this practice, if nothing elſe, will ſeperate them further in heart then euer. Whether it ſucceed or not, it matters not to my purpoſe; which is to ſhowe, (for his hopes are very great, and his faction ſtrong) that hee is a prince of ſo much action and expectation, that, as our buſineſs in Germany ſtands, hee is worthy of great conſideration. Hee will neuer be quiett till hee bee dead; and though hee hath vſed Turks for his owne ends in Hungary, hee hath [ſuch] reputation in theſe parts, (and I beleeue, the emperour himſelfe doth beleeue ſoe, though it doth aduantage him to ſowe other ſuſpitions) that hee will not giue them one foote of ground. I haue continually aduiſed his majeſtie of what I thought might conduce to his ſeruice; and, like

Cato's

I HAVE acquainted the patriarch with your graces firſt and laſt letters concerning Metrophanes; who can heare nothing againſt him, that affection doth not enterprett to the better. Hee expects him daily, and your worthy preſent of bookes: I feare they wilbee pawned in the way. Of wandering Greeks there is ſo great ſtore, that I am forced daily to deny my paſports; yett, at the third inſtance and preſſure of the patriarch, I haue giuen one, and but one in all, to a Jewe become Chriſtian, that is gone for Chriſtendome. If hee arriue in England, I can ſay no more, then that I haue the hand of the patriarch for my warrant, that hee is a true Chriſtian; and ſo could not, for generall encouradgment of others, refuſe him ſo ſmall a charity. I ſent your grace a letter from the patriarch more then a yeare ſince; and haue often ſollicited a fewe lynes in anſwere, which hee expects from mee. I heare your grace hath written by one Mr. Petty, that is arriued at Smirna, ymployed by my lord of Arundell to buy books and antiquities. Hee will find, that barbariſme hath worne out all the footſtepps of ciuility and learning: yett manuſcripts are plenty, old Greeke books, that are litle worth; they haue bene cerned ouer by many of good iudgment, and I think the gleanings are very poore. When hee comes, I will preſent and aſſiſt him.

IT is as tyme now to aske pardon for my trouble, as it was at firſt for my ſilence: ſo that euery way committing faults or errors, I will refuge only to your graces fauour; that with all them, you will yett eſteeme mee

Conſtantinople,
$\frac{9}{19}$ Dec. 1624.

Your Graces moſt humble ſeruant.

To my Lord GRANDISON.

My Lorde,

IF I ſhould forgett myſelfe, and neglect that obſeruance I owe your lordſhip, your fauour receiued by your letter of Auguſt would obiect ingratitude, and recall mee. I perceiue your care had of mee for my retorne; and in that, an intimation of counſell, to continue in a good imployment, if this were ſuch. I humbly thank your lordſhip for both. I neuer purpoſed to ſtart from my couenant, butt will willingly fullfill it: yett I find no cauſe to conſume more of my tyme for bread and meate: proffitt or increaſe I make litle; nor can exact more, where I find their trade not able to beare it: or if I ſhould, yett the tymes are ſuch, and the ſtormes ſo daungerous, that a good pilott will ſeeke a harbour. I haue done what I came for, reuiued the trafficque, made a peace, and opened the ſeas (if it may bee maynteyned) with Barbary. I haue, by Gods mercy, ſuffered no loſſe nor diſgrace, though I haue wreſtled with many: proſperity is no mans inheritance; there is a good tyme to retyre, while all is faire. This imployment doth not agree with ſuch a family. Good husbands are tender of their companyons: and ſometyme our buſineſs are ſuch, that wee muſt rather attempt deſperate, then temperate, remedyes. Here is no iuſtice, all fury, extortion, and corruption. Hee that will gayne here, muſt doe it vpon his enterteynment, or no way, honeſtly; which cannot bee done, where there is ſo greate a charge as myne. I deſire not to retorne, out of any greate ambition; and though good imployments are ſcarſe, yett I hope quiett and content is to bee had at home: if better come, I will thank God; if nothing, I will thank him for what I haue. This is my philoſophy; not to fly the world, nor to follow it too carefully: Ad manum eſt quod ſufficit. Therefore, nowe the moneth of warning beeing come, I haue, by this diſpatch, opened myſelfe to my lord duke of Buckingham, aſwell for my retorne, as for the care of my ſucceſſor, that may bewtify and build vpon my foundations. For though this place bee ſlighted in England, it will require more ſufficiency then I carry away, and as much honeſty and diſcretion as any man hath. Here are many ambaſſadors, all experienced and tryed in other parts, before they arriue at this truſt. Here is a concourſe of all nations, great and many varietyes, important to Chriſtendome: therefore I hope his grace will rightly enterprett my boldneſs, to take care of thoſe, for whom I haue ſerued, in the future. The induſtrious merchant enricheth the land, and filleth the kings coffers: theſe reſpects are great. I haue done the like to the company, deſiring their good-will, and that they will prepare for their owne good, and bee content. And ſo I reſt, vntill I heare their anſwere, which I hope wilbee as reaſonable as my ſeruice hath bene faithfull; for my reſolution is, not to bee tyed to any ſtay, though I ſtand not vpon a moneth or twoe. 1624.

I FIND your lordſhip, out of my diſcourſes, doth collect a kind of ſetling in this ſtate: and it is true, there appeares a calme; the citty is quietted, a forme of peace made with Abaſſa baſſa; butt judge what it is: hee, a rebell, hath dared to oppoſe and fight with the imperiall army, and in that heate hath made a compoſition to keepe his owne gouerment of Arzrum; only, in ſeeming obedience, hee hath admitted in name of a garriſon 1000 Janizaries, and promiſed to keepe that quarter from the Perſian, for the grand ſignor; and on theſe conditions is departed thither with his whole army, truſting only to himſelfe: and this is taken with joy (neceſſity enforcing the deceipt) for a ſubmiſſion; butt the wounds and mutuall miſtruſt remayne. Whereupon the great vizier is retyred to Tocatt, his army diſperſing, as if all were done; yett promiſing to retorne in the ſpring againſt the Perſian, the common enemy, who in the meane tyme, it is feared, will aduance much, betweene Babilon and Aleppo. This is the beſt I haue deliuered your lordſhip; for there is a rumour, that the Spahees haue mutined, and wounded the vizier; and that hee is retorning hither. The accord with Tartary is not much ſounder, and the danger nearer and greater; for it is freſhly aduiſed, that that prince hath ſent two ambaſſadors to conduct another from the Perſian, to make a confederacy with the Polands; but it is too tymely to make coniectures vpon theſe: only thus; the ayre ſeemes cleare for the moſt part; yett there is a great cloud whiffled about with the wynd, that is not ſettled, and it muſt fall. I dare ſay no more: Spayne is their only enemy, by whom they enioy quiett.

I HAUE ſent Mr. Branthwaite, for want of matter here, a diſcourſe extra provinciam. If your lordſhip wonder why I wander into Poland, my purpoſe is vpon Gabor, to ſhowe that his hopes are great, and that hee is worthy of ſome better conſideration. Whether his deſſignes ſucceed or not, it matters not, to our ends: they will nouriſh yll bloud betweene him and the emperour; and his peace cannot laſt, nor can hee bee quiett till hee bee dead. While he liues, there is no prince may bee ſo fitly vſed for the eaſe of the Lower Germany; and hee is not miſtruſted in theſe parts, to giue away any thing to the common enemy; on them only hee ſerues his turne. Butt in this theame I haue bene formerly ſo large to them that might (if they pleas'd) apprehend it, that it will bee like the viccars preaching: whatſoeuer his text were, hee had butt one ſermon; and that was enough, if it had bene followed.

I HOPE to ſerue your lordſhip at home, before the ſunne clymbe twice the northerne tropicque, where whateuer my fortune bee elſe, I wilbee found

Your Lordſhips moſt affectionat ſeruant.

I BESEECH your lordſhip, enforme mee how his majeſtie takes my earneſt deſire to retorne, and in what eſtate I ſhall find my ſelfe with his majeſtie and the duke, and what acceptance my letter hath for a ſucceſſor: my meaning is ſyncere for his majeſties true ſeruice.

From Sir ROBERT AMSTRUTHER.

Right Honorable, my good Lord,

YOUR lordſhips of the 23. of September, from Turin, I haue receaued at Hamburgh, as allſo your former: I would bee glad, that mine to your lordſhip might haue the like ſucceſſe. In my laſt, I did giue vnto your lordſhip a full accompte what I then had done with thoſe princes in the ſayd letters mentioned, who then were not ſatisfied of our gratious maſters forwardnes, although they did vnderſtand by me the counſells and intentions then on foote; but now, I hope, Mansfeilds army, together with that of Sauoy, and the bruite of the French amongſt the Switzers, will giue them a great deale of ſatisfaction.

1624. I HAUE beene ſince with the dukes of Macklenburgh, and the towne of Lubeck, and thoſe petty princes of Sax-Lowenburgh, ſcituate vppon the Elb; and albeit I doe perceaue in them a willingnes to regaine ther German liberty, and that the electorall college might bee, as formerly, equally ballanced, and a free paſſage for religion, which by the catholique league, and Auſtrian victoryes, hath of late yeares beene ſorely oppreſſed; they ſeing allſo the danger to bee allmoſt at their doores, the emperor hauing allready demanded, that diuers monaſteryes within the circle of the Lower Sax bee forthwith deliuered into the hands of the catholiques; from whence it is eaſy for them to gather, that when he hath ſubdued thoſe of the reformed religion, which adioyne vnto him, the reſt will not bee ſpared; yet, before they ſee our armyes marching, and in good forwardnes, they doe not declare themſelfes, neither dare they, as they would, doe it, being not ſafe for them to expreſſe themſelfes in writing, leaſt therby they offend the emperor. Hauing now ſounded theſe princes, and knowing their minds and intentions to concurre with ours, which yet they expreſſe not by ther letters, I am next to deale againe with the kinge of Denmark for his reſolution; to whom I can now giue a great deale of more ſatisfaction, then I could at my laſt being with him; for which I ſuppoſe he hath receaued his anſweare from the emperor of that which he ſent to him by the count of Oldenburgh; which was, that in regard the emperor required his aduiſe and ayd for reſtoring of peace and tranquillitye into the empyre, he anſweared; That in his opinion, he knew no other way but an abſolute and ſpeedy reſtitution of the count Palatine, ad integrum, to his honors, lands and dignityes; deſiring withall the emperors ſpeedy anſweare, adding, periculum in morâ. And ſo he deſired my patience vntill the receipt therof.

INTENDING to take my iourny from hence for Denmark, there hath fallen ſo much ſnow the laſt weeke, and rayne this, that it hath not as yet beene poſſible for me to trauaile: ſo ſoone as I can, I intend (God willing) to ſett forward. Although he bee a wary and circumſpect king, and at this preſent ſo courted by the emperor, that he may obtayne of him almoſt what he will, yet I doe not deſpayre of working ſome good effectes with him; if not openly, yet at leaſt by way of contribution, vnderhand. Our maſters coldneſs hath made him miſtruſtfull, and loath to bee forward: yet now, ſeing England, France, Sauoy and Venice, doe not only ſay but doe, I haue a good hope he will doe the like: howſoeuer he reſolue, I will aduertiſe your lordſhip with the firſt conueniency.

I SHOULD be glad to heare that Mansfeild were once landed in France or Flanders. I haue of late ſent a gentleman of purpoſe to England, that I may receaue full information of the ſtate of thinges there, as allſo the articles of the mariage, and the league, which will bee great inducements to this kinge, who is deſirous to ſee grounds, before he ingage himſelfe; hauing ſayd to me often before, If once I enter, I muſt bee ſure to exſpect the worſt.

THE late iarrs betwixt him and the king of Sweeden hath hindred them on both ſides from declaring themſelfes freely. They are now agreed vppon the cheife differences, which are ſcarce worthy of ſuch a diſunion as was lately like to haue growen betwixt them: there doth yet remayne ſome hart-burning, which, I hope, by time, and the induſtry of good miniſters, will be taken away.

AFTER I haue diſpatched with the king of Denmark, then I hope wee ſhall haue a generall meeting of all thoſe princes of the circle of Lower Saxony, who muſt pretend, that in regard forreign forces are entring within the empire, and it is not yet knowne what in the end they may attempt, it behoueth them, for ther owne ſafety, to ſtand vppon ther guard; and ſo, being once in readines, as it were, to defend, wee ſhall (God willing) make the beſt vſe wee can of them and theirs. Wee muſt endeauor by all meanes to diuert Tilly, who houers over them, as a falcon ouer her prey.

FROM this towne there is a fleete ready to goe for Spaine with all kind of munition, vittayle, cordage, and of powder alone, to the value of a million of rix dollers. I hope this fleete will bee ſtayed this winter; for I haue ſent word both to England, and the Low Cuntryes, that from thence theſe of this towne may bee admoniſhed, either to forbeare the ſending of ſuch commodityes to our enemyes, or otherwiſe to ſtand to ther hazard: and if this fleete bee ſtayed, as I hope it ſhall, then your lordſhip may aſſure your ſelfe, the Spaniſh fleet cannot ſet forth for Braſel; for ther fleete ſtayes only for the prouiſion they exſpect from hence.

ABOUT this towne are leauied aboue three thouſand men, in the name of the States generall; but, in effect, are for Mansfeild, and are gone from hence for the Low Cuntryes, or where the court will appoynt them. It is a wonder to ſee with what alacritye thoſe men that haue ſerued Mansfeld before, doe now addreſe themſelfes towards him againe.

I WOULD to God I were ſo well furniſhed with good newes for your lordſhip as I could wiſh; but quod differtur, non aufertur. I beſeech your lordſhip, in your next, to let me know whether you haue receaued my former letters, or not.

THER is an ambaſſador of the king of Denmark come to this towne lately from Spayne, France and Flanders: his negotiation was, to relayſe ſome ſhippes of that kings ſubiects, that were arreſted. He aſſured me, that count Gondemar was in readines to returne for England with new overtures. Ther is a gentleman of France, one Mr. de Haïes, arriued in this towne yeſternight: he is to goe ambaſſador for the king of Denmarke and Sweeden, and mediate this generall good worke: he aſſures me of a generall great ioye in all good patriotes harts in France, for this match and allyance.
